self-asserting. Thus the reins of government would be in the abbat's own hands. If, however, for some special reason, a prior should be indispensable to a monastery, he was to be chosen by the abbat, with the advice of the brethren in chapter, that is of all the brethren, according to some commentators, and according to others of the elders only (Benedicti Regula Commentata, c. 65). The wisdom of the great reformer's policy has been demonstrated again and again by experience. His canon on this point was reaffirmed by Charlemagne in the council of Maintz (Conc. Mogunt. I. c. 11). Lay abbats subsequently found it far more convenient for their purposes to be represented by deans than by a prior (Altes. Ascet. ii. 9). Lay priors, another innovation on the primitive strictness of the Benedictine rule, were prohibited by Charlemagne (Capitul. A.D. 805, c. 15).

The forms of institution are of comparatively recent origin (Bened. Reg. Comment. u. s.).

The conventual prior was a later development of monasticism, and was, of course, essentially more independent than his claustral brother. Next in rank to him in larger monasteries was the sub-prior (Anselmi Epist. iii. 29. Ad monachos Cantuar). Among the "canonici regulares" the bishop was supreme generally, but the prior in questions relating to the rule, or while the see was vacant (Altes. Ascet. v. s). The conventual priors were summoned to provincial synods, and in some cases to the election of bishops. They were sometimes styled "summi priors," or "majores"; they were to be over twenty-five years of age, and in priest's orders. They exercised the same powers of discipline in their priories as the abbat in his abbey—they were elected as he was; but their investiture belonged to the abbat, under whose jurisdiction they nominally were. The order of Premonstratensians was at first under priors, afterwards under abbats (Altes. Ascet. v. s.). Very small priories were invariably discouraged by those who desired to preserve the true monastic spirit. Priories of this kind were the result of several different causes. Sometimes they were simply an overflow from a monastery more than usually popular for the abbat's sake, or for some other reason; sometimes they were the consequence of a monastery, which had known better days, being annexed in its decrepitude as an appendage to another more flourishing; sometimes the priory was merely an outpost of the monastery which gave it birth, on some detached grange or farm. Whatever might be its origin, a priory on a very small scale was only too apt to degenerate into laxity and secularity. Benedict, in the very commencement of his rule, reprobates strongly the vicious custom of two or three monks herding together promiscuously, being really neither hermits nor monks (Bened. Reg. c. 1). Monks of this description were termed "Sarabaitae," or "Remoboth." Bernard calls such priories "synagogues of Satan" (Bernard. Epist. 254 ad Guarinum abbatem). It was ordered by a council at Aachen that no priory should consist of fewer than six members (Conc. Aquisgr. A.D. 817, c. 44). Peter the Venerable, of Clugny, required at least twelve, and this became the rule of the Cistercians and Carthusians (Bened. Reg. Comment c. 1). It is matter of notoriety in the history of the English reformation in the 15th century that the most flagrant immoralities were generally found in the smallest monasteries. [CELLITAE, p. 328.]

The office of prioress, under an abbess, was very similar to that of the claustral prior. She was to be firm and discreet; old in character though not in years; she was to superintend the behaviour of the nuns, chiding and, if necessary, whipping them for their faults; she was held responsible in particular for their clothes and dormitories (Regula Cujusdam, c. 2). The nuns, by this rule, which is one of more than ordinary strictness, were only allowed to make any communication to their abbess through their prioress (Ibid. c. 22). PROCESSION. I. The word procedere was used by the early Christians in the especial sense of leaving the house and going forth for some stated and grave purpose; in particular and chiefly for going to a religious service. Tertullian, A.D. 192, addressing Christian women says, "With you every reason for going forth (procedendi) is of a solemn character: either some sick brother is to be visited, or the sacrifice is offered, or the word of God is ministered" (De Cult. Fœm. 11). Dissuading from marriage with a heathen, he says, "If you have to go to a service (si procedendum erit), never will household business be more urgent" (Ad Uxor. ii. 4). See other examples in St. Jerome (Ep. 128 ad Gaud. 3; Ep. 107 ad Laet. 9; Ep. 22 ad Eustoch. 17), St. Augustine (De Civ. Dei, xxii. 8, § 22), Uranius (De Obitu Paulini, 11), Ennodius (Vita Epiphanii Ticin. Migne, lxiii. 214), and Pseudo-Ambrose (Serm. vii. 3, inter Opp. Ambr.). When the fame of a saint attracts many to a church in which his relics lie, "major est (it is said) pro meritis ejus frequentia procedendi" (Passio S. Quiriui, 4; in Ruinart, Acta Mart. 439, ed. 1731).

Hence processio acquired the conventional sense of going to church. Tertullian: "Where the fear of God is, there is . . . . devout attendance, and a modest going to church (processio) and an united congregation" (De Præscr. Hær. 43). This usage led to the application of the word to the assembly or to the service itself. Thus Leo of Rome, A.D. 445, writing to the bishop of Alexandria of an Alexandrian presbyter, who had sojourned some time at Rome: "Nostris processionibus atque ordinationibus frequenter adfuit" (Epist. 11, al. 81, ad Diosc. 2). The context shews that by processionibus we are to understand congregations for the celebration of the Eucharist. Gelasius of Rome, 484, advised a bishop to suspend the services (processionem) of a certain church, because the lord of the place seized all the oblations (Victori Episc. Hard. ii. 927). In the version of the seventeenth canon of Laodicea, probably about 365, by Dionysius Exiguus, 533, we find the word συνάξεσι (religious assemblies [SYNAXIS]) rendered by processionibus (Hard. Concil. i. 783). The Liber Diurnus Romanorum Pontificum, compiled in the 9th century, gives the form of letter by which the bishop of Rome sanctioned the consecration of monastic oratories. This was permitted, "sic tamen ut non illud publica processione a conditore aliquatenus teneatur" (v. 13). So of a baptistery added to an old church: "Nihil illic juris fundatori ulterius jam debere, nisi processionis gratiam, quæ Christianis omnibus in commune debetur" (ibid. 20).

II. Processions in the ordinary sense (Processus, Processio, Litania, Letania, Laetania, Rogationes, Supplicationes, Pompa, Λιτανεία, Λιτή, Περίπατος) were common in the early church. Having regard to such passages as Num. x. 33; Josh. vi. 13; 2 Sam. vi. 4, 5; 1 Chron. xiii. 7, 8; 2 Chron. xx. 27, 28; Ps. lxviii. 25, &c. the first Christians probably believed that they had the sanction of Scripture. They certainly inherited a taste for them from their Greek and Roman forefathers, and appear to have taken the more ancient processions in some respects as their model. [See, for instance, Δαφνηφορία and TRIUMPHUS in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Roman Antiq.] In the triumphal processions from the Campus Martius to the Capitol (to omit what is less to our purpose) flowers were strewn, images were carried, incense burnt, and songs of praise sung (Livy, iii. 29, xxxix. 7; Pliny, v. 5; Ovid, Tristia, iv. 2, 3–6; De Arte Am. i. 213–220; Pontica, ii. 1, 35–40, iii. 4, 23–40). Many features of these ancient rites reappear under Christian sanction after the conversion of the empire. The people naturally clung to every custom of their fathers not condemned by the gospel, and their rulers indulged them in it.

A. Processions in the Churches.—These were probably in use in larger churches with many clerks before the toleration of Christianity.

(1) Processions before the Service.—The earliest Ordo Romanus about 730 describes an elaborate rite. All met and rested in the SECRETARIUM, or by the door of it, the bishop was led out by the archdeacon and the second deacon, each taking a hand. "The sub-deacon, following with a censer, goes (procedit) before him . . . and the seven acolytes of the region, whose turn comes on that day, precede the pontiff up to the altar, carrying seven stands of lighted wax candles. But before they come to the altar, the deacons take off their planetae in the presbytery, and the sub-deacon of the region takes them, and hands them to the acolytes of the region to which they belong" (Ordo Rom. i. 8, in Mus. Ital. ii. 8; Comp. Ord. ii. 4, p. 43; iii. 8, p. 55; v. 5, p. 65; vi. 2, p. 70). (Compare Capit. Reg. Franc. v. 372.) The Greeks have for many ages had a procession in monasteries on the vigils of the greater feasts (Diataxis Philothei, in Eucholojion, Goar, 8; comp. Lucernarii Orationes, 40–43).

(2) For the Procession before the Reading of the Gospel, see ENTRANCE; GOSPEL. For that on PALM SUNDAY, see p. 1549.

(3) After the Gospel.—This eastern rite is thus described by John Maro: "After the reading of the gospel the ancients used to go out (of the bema) and make a procession or circuit through the church. And first in the procession were carried lights that mystically denoted the prophets and John the Baptist, who glow and shine as stars before the Sun of Righteousness. But the deacons and presbyters who went in procession with songs of praise represent symbolically the evangelists and twelve apostles who went forth and preached before Christ" (Expos. Minist. u. s. 9).

(4) After the Liturgy.—"Then the seven candlestands and the subdeacon of the region precede the pontiff to the secretarium. But as he descends into the presbytery, let the bishops first say, 'Jube, domne, benedicere.' Resp. 'Benedicat nos Dominus.' Resp. 'Amen.' After the bishops, the presbyters, then the monks, then the school (choir), then the milites draconarii, i.e. those who bear the standard (see the notes of Lindenbrogius and the Valesii to Ammianus, xx. 4), after them the bearers of the wax candlestands, after whom the acolytes who keep the sacred gate [RUGA], after them, without the presbytery, those who carry the crosses, then the junior churchwardens;—and he enters the secretarium." This is the description of the procession to the vestry after a pontifical mass at Rome in the 8th century (Ordo Rom. i. 21; comp. Ord. ii. 15; iii. 18).

B. Public Processions.—The earliest allusion to them appears to be in the writings of St. Basil. When, in the year 375, the clergy of Neocaesarea objected that the method of psalmody in use in his church, as elsewhere in the East, was unknown in the days of Gregory Thaumaturgus, who died about 270, Basil replied, "So were the litanies which ye now practise" (Epist. 207 ad Neoc.). These were evidently of a penitential character, for he adds, "I do not say this as accusing you, for I would that ye all lived in tears and constant penitence." But we find that in the West processions were at the same period used on festive occasions also, at least by the monks; for St. Ambrose, in 388, speaks of monks "singing psalms after the custom and ancient use, as they went to the celebration of the feast of the Maccabean martyrs" (Epist. 40, § 16, ad Theodos.). About the same time the Arians at Constantinople sang hymns antiphonally as they went through the city to their church; whereupon St. Chrysostom, to counteract the effect of such public demonstrations, organized processions of the orthodox, in which silver crosses, given by the empress, and lighted tapers, were borne, and psalms sung (Sozom. Eccl. Hist. viii. 8; Pallad. Dial. de Vita Chrys. 15).

(1) The Procession on St. Mark's Day.—On the 25th April (VII. Kal. Maii) a procession ("obstitit in mediâ candida pompa via," Ovid, Fast. iv. 906) was held by the Romans in honour of the goddess Robigo, and prayers offered to her for the preservation of the fruits of the earth from mildew (Ovid, u.s. 905–942; Pliny, xviii. 69; Varro, De Re Rust. i. 1; De Ling. Lat. vi. 3).

A document issued by Gregory of Rome in 591 speaks of a "laetania quae major ab omnibus appellatur," which was held on a Friday in that year, with a procession from the church of St. Lawrence, "qui appellatur Lucinae," to that of St. Peter, as if it were already an old custom, "solemnitas annuae devotionis" (Charta Epist. lib. ii. praef.) Referring to some of the most ancient MSS. of the Gregorian sacramentary, we find set down for the 25th of April, "Letania majore ad S. Laurentium in Lucinae" (Liturg. Rom. Vet. Murat. ii. 80; Rituale PP. Pamel. ii. 285). This procession also ends at St. Peter's, as the last prayer ("in atrio") proves by its reference to the intercession of that saint. The inference is that this procession is the same as that of which St. Gregory speaks. His procession, therefore, took place on the 25th of April, and, from its antiquity, may be supposed with probability to have been a Christian substitute for the heathen Robigalia, formerly held on the same day. In France the procession of St. Mark's day was traditionally held to be celebrated "pour les fruits de la terre" (De Moleon, Voyages liturgiques, 307).

Other churches took this rite avowedly from Rome. The council of Cloveshoo, 747, orders litanies "on the seventh day before the calends of May after the custom of the church of Rome" (can. 16). The second council of Aachen, 836, recognizes the "Roman" observance of the 25th of April as the custom of the empire, and decrees its continuance (can. 10; see also Capit. Reg. Franc. vi. 74). Similarly Herard of Tours, 858, "De Letania Romana vii. Kalendas Maii rememoretur" (Capit. 94). This procession was observed in France during the last century at Nantes, Orleans, Rouen, &c. (De Moleon, 79, 186, 306, &c.).

(2) The Procession of the Litania Septiformis.—On the 29th of August, 602, Gregory I. of Rome ordered a sevenfold procession of clerks, laymen, monks, nuns, matrons, widows, poor persons and children (probably those supported by the alms of the church) to depart in separate bands from seven several churches, and all to meet in the church of St. Mary (Sermo inter Epist. Greg. xi. 2, given also at length by Amalarius, De Eccl. Off. iv. 25). [LITANY, p. 1003.]

(3) On ROGATION DAYS, see that heading.

(3) Occasional Public Processions. (1) At times of Public Calamity.—These were very common, especially in the East. Thus Gregory of Tours tells us that at Clermont, about 580, when very violent rains were doing, near the harvest, after a night spent in watching and prayer, "the deacons took the relics of the saints, suitably and reverently covered with a silken pall, and went forth in white dresses to a procession" (Vita S. Aridii, 8). A similar rite was observed at Rome under Adeodatus, A.D. 671, when the letanise took place daily during the rains (Liber Pontif. n. 78). In a plague at Rheims, 546, "having taken a pall from the tomb of the blessed (Remigius), and arranged it like a bier, and having lighted wax candles on crosses and stands, they raised their voices in canticles, and so went the circuit of the city; nor did they pass any hospice without including it in their perambulation" (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Conf. 79; see also Hist. Franc. iv. 5; Vitae PP. vi. 6). Gregory I. in 600 advised a procession twice a week to stay the threatened invasion of Sicily (Epist. ix. 45). Public processions with similar objects were also frequent in the East; e.g. during an earthquake at Constantinople in the time of Theodosius II. (Cedrenus, i. 600). A similar procession was celebrated every year in memory of the great earthquake in the twenty-seventh year of Justinian (Id. ii. 674).

None of the processional prayers now in use proper to a special object, as relief in a drought, deliverance from storms, &c. (Goar, Euchol. 768–769), appear to be of primitive antiquity. Some of them are ascribed to one of the patriarchs named Callistus, who sat about 1400 (ibid. 785).

It is probable that all litanies ordered for a special purpose were sung in procession, though it is not always so expressed. [LITANY.]

(4) The Processions after Baptism.—So long as many were baptized on the eves of Easter and Pentecost, it was the custom for the neophytes to leave the church after their baptism, and again to repair to it on the seven following days in procession, clothed in albis, there to receive the holy communion. The earliest witness is Gregory Nazianzen, A.D. 370, who, preaching on Easter Day, says: "Beautiful yesterday was the wearing of white and the carrying of lights, which we observed together both in private and public, men of almost every rank, and the whole magistracy, lighting up the night with a fiery blaze" (Orat. 45, § 2). There is direct testimony in the West to the repetition of these processions during the week after baptism. Thus Amalarius: "Our baptized, their past sins done away, are conducted daily to the church, a lighted pillar of wax" (an allusion to Exod. xiii. 21) "going before them" (De Eccl. Off. iv. 33; Pseudo-Alcuin. de Div. Off. 21).

(5) Before Baptism.—When Clovis was to be baptized, A.D. 496, there was a procession, with all the usual accompaniments, to the baptistery (Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rem. i. 13), a ceremony probably common in the case of great personages, but of which other examples do not occur to me.

(6) Before laying of the first stone of a Church, &c.—A law of Justinian, 527, says: "We decree that, before all things, no one be free to commence the building of a monastery or oratory before the most God-loving bishop of the city, coming thither, pour out prayers on the spot, and, a public procession having been instituted, set up a cross, and make the fact manifest to all" (Novella, 67).

(7) At the Dedication of Churches. — Processions on such occasions were evidently usual within our period, both in the East and West; but they seem to have been somewhat differently managed. When the first encaenia of St. Sophia at Constantinople were celebrated in 530, there was a procession (lite), which "started from the holy Anastasia, Menas the patriarch being seated in the imperial chariot, while the emperor joined in the procession (συλλιτανεύοντος) with the people" (Theophanes, Chronogr. ad an. i. 338, ed. Nieb.). At the second encaenia (the church having been restored after injury from an earthquake), after vigils kept in the church of St. Plato, a procession was formed, in which the emperor himself again took part, "the patriarch Eutychius riding in a chariot, and dressed in his apostolical habit, holding the holy gospels in his hands, the people all chanting, "Lift up your heads," &c. (ibid. 360). The Western rite is best seen in the early English pontificals. [CONSECRATION, p. 431.] The English pontifical, formerly at Jumièges, now No. 362 in the public library at Rouen, directs the first procession to go round the church thrice before it enters (Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. ii. 250; or Archaeologia for March, 1833, p. 259).

(8) Ad Stationes.—In the cities of the West, from the 7th century downwards, there were processions on many of the greater days from one church, at which the people collected by appointment, to another, at which the service took place. Hence the phrases "collecta ad Sanctum M." (used first for the gathering, then for the prayers, at the church of St. M.), and "statio ad S. N." (the church at which the procession stopped and entered on the chief service of the day. See Ménard's notes to the sacramentary of St. Gregory, Opp. Greg. iii. 604, 662; ed. Ben. and art. STATION).

(9) Other processions which may be mentioned are, that on Easter Eve, on the Annunciation (Goar, Euchology. 34), at the translation of RELICS, or with relics at other times, and at funerals [OBSEQUIES, § xiv.]

C. Procession held at the will of the Bishop.—From a spurious addition to Gennadius (De Vir. Illust. 99), we infer that in the 5th century processions were celebrated irregularly, as the bishop thought them required for the good of his flock. For it tells us of Honoratus, bishop of Marseilles, 490: "Litanias ad supplicandam Dei clementiam cum plebe sibi credita pro viribus agit." A law of Justinian, 527, made the concurrence of the bishop necessary: "Omnibus autem laicis interdicimus ne supplicationes publicas peragant sine religiosissimis episcopis, et qui sub eis sunt reverendissimis clericis." The context shews that these "supplicationes" were made in processions: "Sed et venerabiles cruces, cum quibus sacerdote in supplicationibus ingrediuntur non alibi quam in locis venerabilibus reponuntor" (Novella, 123).

PROCESSUS, martyr with Martinianus, said to have been baptized by the apostles Peter and Paul; commemorated at Rome in the cemetery of Damasus July 2 (Bed., Wand., Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Hieron. Mart.; Mart. Rom.). Hieron. Mart. has also May 31 for his natale. In Gregory's sacramentary the natale of these saints is observed on July 2, and both are mentioned in the collect (Greg. Sacram. Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. ii. 105). Pope Paschal I. erected an oratory to them, in which their bodies are believed to lie (Ciamp. de Sac. Aedif. 57, 1).

PROCESSUS. In the liturgy of Gothic Spain, a part of the church which might be either a chamber in the sacrarium, a part of it, or a place close to it, was so called, obviously because the clergy formed in it before they entered the church in procession. Thus, on Easter-eve, the deacon and clerks, after vesting, "enter the processus," in which is "a seat set for the pontiff according to custom." There he gives tapers to all present, which he afterwards lights with the "new fire" (See LIGHTS, § v.). This is followed by a procession of the clergy through the vaulted way towards the choir. "Vadunt per bubata ad chorum" (Missale Mozar. Leslie, 174, 175, 521).

PROCHORUS, one of the seven deacons; commemorated Ap. 9 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart. at Antioch; Mart. Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Ap. i. 828); by the Greeks July 28 (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 264; Boll. l. c.). [C. H.]

PROCLUS (1), martyr with Hilarius, both natives of Ancyra, under Trajan; commemorated July 12 (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 263; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. iii. 279, or PROCULUS with HILARION or HILARIUS; Mart. Rom.).

(2) Deacon, Sept. 19. [PROCULUS (2).]

(3) "Our father," patriarch of Constantinople; commemorated Oct. 24 (Basil. Menol.; Mart. Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. x. 637); Nov. 20 (Cal. Byzant.). [C. H.]

PROCOPIUS (1), confessor with Basilius, under Leo Iconomachus; commemorated Feb. 27 (Basil. Menol.; Col. Byzant., bishop of Decapolis; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 254, Decapolita).

(2) Martyr, commemorated July 8 (Wand.; Basil. Menol. Dux Alexandriae, magnus martyr in city of Aelia); in Palestine (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Bed. Mart.; Mart. Rom.); Cal. Byzant. "glorious and holy martyr;" Daniel (Cod. Liturg. iv. 262), "great martyr" at Caesarea; Hieron. Mart. PROCOBUS, which Boll. Acta SS. Jul. ii. 577 from the same passage read PROCOPIUS, with Quartus and Felix at Caesarea Capp. [C. H.]

PROCULUS (1), martyr at Interamna with Efybus and Apollonius, all disciples of Valentinus presbyter of Interamna; commemorated Feb. 14 (Bed. Mart.; Mart. Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 756, cf. p. 862); Ap. 14 (Usuard. Mart. at Interamna; Mart. Rom.; Hieron. Mart. at Interamna with Valentinus and others).

(2) Deacon, martyr with Januarius; commemorated Sept. 19 (Basil. Menol. PROCLUS at Puteoli; Vet. Rom. Mart., at Naples; Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart.; Mart. Rom.).

PROCURATIONS. The fees due at visitations to bishops and archdeacons from the parishes within their respective jurisdictions, intended to cover the expenses of their journeys. A series of canons and decrees of councils were found necessary to keep these fees within their lawful limits, and to prevent extortion under various pleas. The second council of Braga A.D. 570 (c. 2) prohibits a bishop when he visits his diocese, "per dioceses suas ambulat," from taking any fee beyond two solidi, the honorary payment due to the office, "honorem cathedrae suae," especially forbidding him to claim the third part of the offertories made in parish churches, which is allotted to the lighting and repairs of the churches themselves. The seventh council of Toledo A.D. 646 (c. 4), after reprehending the extortionate practices of the bishops of Gallicia, re-enacts the canon already quoted of the council of Braga, fixing two "solidi" as the legal fee, but exempts from payment the churches belonging to monasteries. It also provides that when a bishop visits his diocese he is not to be unfairly burdensome to any particular parish, nor to demand an unreasonable number of horses for conveyance (see Bruns. Councils, i. p. 264, note) nor to remain more than one day in any parish. The council of Merida, A.D. 666 (c. 11), provides that all clerics, whether presbyters, abbats, or deacons, should receive a bishop at his visitation with all due honour, and provide him with all things reasonably necessary according to their means, "prout habuerint aut ratio permiserit." The second council of Châlons A.D. 812 (c. 14) rebukes the oppressions and exactions sometimes practised by bishops at their visitations, and (c. 16) forbids them to exact anything for the lamps and oil of their churches, and (c. 17) speaks of an annual tax (census) of 12 or 14 denarii, which some bishops were in the habit of exacting, and emphatically prohibits it, "quod penitus abolendum est." In the same council (c. 15) the archdeacons are rebuked for certain exactions from their presbyters and parochial clergy, and exhorted to be content with their legal dues. It was probably to excessive demands made under the name of procurations that the council of Paris A.D. 829 (cc. 25, 31) referred when they denounced the extortions practised in some places by the bishops (episcoporum ministros), not only on the presbyters but on the laity agents. The fourth council of Valentia A.D. 855 (c. 22) orders that no visitation fee shall be claimed if the parish has not been visited that year, and the second council of Ticine in the same year limits the quantity of bread and wine and meat which a bishop may demand at his visitation.

The same principle that procurations were only intended to cover the legitimate expenses of a visitation pervades all legislation on the subject. A Capitulary of Ludwig the Pious (l. i. c. 100, Sirmondi Conc. Gall. ii. 432) expressly prohibits bishops from becoming a burden to their flocks when they visit their parishes for the purpose of preaching or confirming, and orders them so to arrange their visitations that they may not be burdensome or unwelcome (importuna vel onerosa). Hincmar of Rheims appears to have been most anxious to check all extortionate practices under the name of procurations, and his writings clearly indicate the abuses which had crept into this part of the system of the church. Thus, in his epistle to the clergy of Laon (Sirmondi Conc. Gall. ii. 660) he warns the bishops not to oppress the parishes which they visit, nor to exact more than the contribution (collatio) which had satisfied their predecessors, nor to require a separate contribution from each church and its dependent chapelries, but only one paid in due proportion by the whole parish; nor were they to claim or exact, under pretence of receiving a voluntary contribution (accipiat, id est rapiat), any subsidies (adjutoria) in money or provisions under the plea of meeting expenses incurred in the reception of the king or his ambassadors, or for the adornment of the cathedral church. Again in his precepts to his archdeacons (id. ii. 378) he forbids them (c. 1) during their visitations of their country parishes, either when accompanying him or by themselves, to be guilty of oppression by demanding things not necessary, or by taking with them a superfluous retinue, or their own relations, to be quartered upon the parishes which they visited; or (c. 2) by visiting their parishes too frequently, so as to live at their expense and save their own income; or (c. 5) by demanding as offerings (eulogiae) any contribution either in money or in any other way from the presbyters when they came to attend a synod, or to obtain the chrism, or for enquiry into their ministry, beyond such as they might be disposed to make willingly.

A Capitulary of Charles the Bald (id. iii. 2, 3) enacts (c. 1) that bishops were to receive either a definite quantity of provision or the two "solidi" allotted to them by the councils of Braga and Toledo (c. 4); that the bishops should choose the richer parishes for their visitations, and that four parishes might unite to share the expenses of a visitation; and (cc. 5, 6) that they might visit parishes once a year and receive procurations, but could require nothing from parishes not visited. If they visited any parish more than once in the same year, they were to pay their own expenses. [P. O.]

PROCURATOR. In its general meaning a person in charge of the interests of another as agent or factor (see Ducange, Gloss.), but more usually applied in a more limited sense to lawyers in the civil, or proctors in the ecclesiastical, courts.

These employments were in general forbidden to the clergy, as involving secular business inconsistent with their office and position. Augustine (de Op. Monach. c. 15) draws a distinction between occupations which are carried on by manual labour, and those whose nature it is to distract the mind with cares and anxieties about secular business (ipsum animum occupare curis colligendae sine corporis labore pecuniae), and expressly numbers "procuratores," probably using the word in its general meaning, among the latter class. So Jerome (ad Nepot. c. 16) asks how the clergy, who are bidden to renounce all care for their own temporal possessions, can possibly undertake to be managers (procuratores et dispensatores) of the houses and estates of others. The decrees of the church speak with united voice in the refusal to admit into the number of the clergy any who were actually engaged in managing the affairs of others. The first council of Carthage, held in the year A.D. 348, expressly decreed (cc. 8, 9) that no "procuratores," or those in any way engaged in the affairs of others (obnoxii alienis negotiis), should be admitted to number of the clergy, till they were free from their secular obligations, lest disgrace should be brought upon the church. The third council of Carthage, A.D. 397 (c. 15), prohibits not only bishops and priests, but any of the clergy from being procuratores, or seeking their livelihood by any ignoble or dishonest occupation, giving as a reason that those entrusted with the service of God must not be entangled in secular affairs. The council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (c. 3), forbids any belonging to the clerical or monastic orders to charge himself with any secular business (ἐπεισάγειν ἑαυτὸν κοσμικαῖς διοικήσεσιν) making, however, exceptions in case of any business imposed upon them by law, or committed to them by the bishop of the diocese, or undertaken on behalf of widows and orphans. The council of Tarragona, A.D. 516 (c. 11), forbids any monk to take any part in any legal business (forensis negotii susceptor aut executor existat) except on behalf of the monastery, and under order of the abbat. This exception, however, was not allowed by Justinian, who in one of his laws (Novell. cxxiii. c. 6) positively prohibits any bishop or oeconomus, or clergy of any grade or any mark, from acting as manager (procuratorem litis), either on their own behalf, or of any church or monastery. Later councils, however, appear to have insisted on retaining the principle that the clergy might act as advocates in certain cases. The council of Verno, A.D. 755 (c. 16), forbids any of the clergy to conduct any legal business, except on behalf of widows and orphans, or in cases where the property of the church was concerned, and then acting under orders for their bishop or abbat. In like manner, the council of Mayence, A.D. 813 (c. 14), forbids any of the clergy to act as agents or managers (conductores aut procuratores) in any secular matters, except in defence of widows and orphans. See also LAWYERS, p. 947. [P. O.]

PROEORTIA. The προεορτία of the Greek church corresponds in the main to the Eve or VIGIL of the Latins. But some of the greatest festivals have a προεορτία of more than one day. Thus the προεορτία of the Epiphany begins on January 2, of Christmas on Dec. 20 (Neale, Eastern Ch. Introd. p. 764). [C.]

PROFANATION. [SACRILEGE.]

PROFESSION. For the profession of faith in Baptism, see BAPTISM, §§ 43, 46; CREED, § 4, p. 489; INTERROGATIO, p. 865. To these it may be added that the form of profession given by the council of Lestines (Concilium Liptinense, A.D. 743) is one of the oldest specimens of a liturgical formula in a Teutonic language. It is given as follows by Professor Swainson (The Nicene and Apostles Creeds, &c., p. 22):—"Gelobistu in got alʷmehtigan fadaer. Ec gelobo in got alʷmehtigan fadaer. Gelobistu in crist godes suno. Ec gelobo in crist godes suno. Gelobistu in halogan gast. Ec gelobo in halogan gasto." That is: "Q. Believest thou in God the Father Almighty? A. I believe in God the Father Almighty. Q. Believest thou in Christ God's Son? A. I believe in Christ God's Son. Q. Believest thou in the Holy Ghost? A. I believe in the Holy Ghost." [C.]

PROFESSIONS. [TRADES.]

PROHIBITED BOOKS. I. Heathen Precedent.—The suppression by public authority of books adverse to the prevailing religion was common long before the Christian era; e.g. the Athenians scandalized by a declarantion of Protagoras, B.C. 411, that he was uncertain of the existence of gods, "called in his books from their possessors by the voice of a public crier, and burned them in the market-place" (Diogen. Laert. Vitae Philos. ix. 8, § 3; sim. Lactant. de Irâ Dei, 9). Another instance, in which the actors were Greeks, is recorded in the First Book of Maccabees (i. 56): the officers of Antiochus Epiphanes, B.C. 168, "rent in pieces the books of the law which they found, and burnt them with fire." Examples are frequent among the Romans. During the second Punic war, B.C. 213, when foreign superstitions were gaining a footing in Rome, a senatus consultum was passed, and published by the praetor urbis, to the effect that any one possessed of "books of soothsaying, or prayers or written treatises on the art of sacrificing," should give them up to the praetor by a certain day (Livy, Hist. xxvi.). On a discovery of the nature of the Bacchanalian rites, B.C. 186, the consul Posthumius, when explaining the cause of their suppression to the people, declared that the magistrates had often been charged with the duty of "forbidding the performance of foreign rites . . . collecting and burning books of soothsaying, and abolishing every mode of sacrifice not after the Roman custom" (ibid. xxxix. 16). Five years later the Greek books found near the tomb of Numa were immediately burnt "per victimarios . . . in conspectu populi, quia aliquâ ex parte ad solvendam religionem pertinere existimabantur" (Valerius Max. Memorab. I. i. 14. Compare Plutarch in Numa, Reiske, i. 298; Lactant. Instit. i. 22). When Augustus became Pontifex Maximus, he collected and burnt above two thousand "libri fatidici" (Suetonius, Octav. 31). The works of political opponents were exposed to the same fate. Thus the writings of Labienus, about 12 B.C. (Seneca, Controvers. vi. Praef.), those of Cremutius, A.D. 25 (Tacitus, Annal. iv. 35), those of Fabricius Veiento, A.D. 63, of Arulenus Rusticus and Herennius Senecio ("monumenta clarissimorum ingeniorum," Tacit. Agricola, 2) were in the same manner publicly destroyed. The books of the Manichaeans were also under the ban of heathen princes. Thus Diocletian and Maximian, A.D. 289, ordered the teachers of the "Persian doctrine to be burnt with their abominable books" (Baron. ad ann. 288; iii. 252, ed. 1738), and Cabades, king of Persia, A.D. 516, after a great slaughter of the sect, caused their books to be burned throughout his dominions (Theophanes, Chronogr. ad ann. i. 263, ed. Bonn).

II. Christian Books suppressed by Jews and Heathens.—When Christianity began to acquire strength, this familiar mode of suppression was applied both by Jews and Gentiles to all writings that were supposed to teach or favour it. Addressing the Jews of his day, Anastasius-Sinaita, A.D. 561, says: "Your fathers, who were then completely worsted, . . . commanded that none of the Jews should possess in writing an account of the things done by Christ, or seek after them at all, or read them" (Disput. adv. Judaeos; Migne, Ser. Gr. lxxxix. 1246). The existence of such a law explains, as nothing else can, the total silence of Philo and the probable silence of Josephus on that subject; or if the passage in his Antiquities (xvii. 4, § 3) be not an interpolation, it accounts for the very brief notice which the facts on that supposition extorted from the latter. The Jews hoped that the new religion would die out if left to oral tradition. The heathens were influenced by the same policy. "Through the agency of wicked demons," says Justin Martyr, "death was decreed against those who read the books of Hystaspes, or the Sibyl, or the prophets" (Apol. i. 44; comp. Clem. Alex. Stromata, VI. v. 43). Diocletian ordered "the destruction of the Scriptures by fire," in edicts published throughout the empire (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. viii. 2). In every persecution, in fact, they were demanded of the Christians for this purpose, and many were required to attest their abjuration of the gospel by burning its sacred records themselves. Those who gave them up were conventionally termed "traditores" [TRADITOR], a name which, according to St. Augustine, came into use some forty years after the death of St. Cyprian (d. 258), when a great "burning of the divine books" took place in Africa under Maxentius (De Baptismo, v. 1; vii. 2; Optat. de Schism. Donat. i. 13).

III. Christian Prohibition of Heathen Books.—The works of the heathen were, on the other hand, proscribed by the Christians, but not without discrimination. Some writers were more severe and strict than others, but we are evidently to understand their denunciations for the most part of those books only which had a bearing on religion, or encouraged a loose morality. The Apostolical Constitutions (i. 6) in both recensions say: "Refrain from all the books of the Gentiles; for what hast thou to do with strange discourses or laws, or with false prophets, which even turn the light-minded from the faith?" Gregory Nazianzen, A.D. 363, hearing that his namesake of Nyssa, instead of reading to the people as before the "sacred and refreshing books" of holy Scripture, had turned to the "brackish and undrinkable" founts of heathen knowledge, accused him at once of "desiring rather to be called a rhetor than a Christian" (Epist. 12, al. 43). St. Basil, the brother of the latter, has left a discourse addressed "to the Young on the Way to profit by the Hellenic Literature." His opinion is that much good may be obtained from it by those who resolutely put aside the evil part, and study to bring the innocent into the service of religion. Then, "if the two literatures are at all in harmony with each other, the knowledge of them both will be of great service to us; but if not, to have compared them, and ascertained the difference will tend not a little to the confirmation of the better" (§ 2; ii. 175). St. Jerome, 378, referring to Eph. vi. 4, says: "Let those bishops and presbyters read it who train their sons in secular literature, and make them read comedies, and sing the shameful writings of the actors," &c. (Comm. iii. in Ep. ad Eph. v. s. See also Epist. 22 ad Eustoch. § 30; comp. Aug. in Ps. 103, Enarr. S. ii. § 4; in Ps. 31, Enarr. S. ii. § 18; De Anima et ejus Orig. ii. 17, § 23). One ground of abstinence from even the more innocent productions of heathen writers is mentioned by Germanus, the monk, in Cassian (Collat. xiv. 12), viz. the distractions that arise at prayer from images suggested by a study of poetry and history. Paulinus of Nola (Poema, 10) tells us that hearts devoted to Christ are closed to Apollo and the Muses. The council of Carthage, 398, decrees: "Ut episcopus Gentilium libros non legat, haereticorum autem pro necessitate temporis" (can. 16). Much later Gregory I. strongly denounces a French bishop who was said to teach belles-lettres, "quia in uno se ore cum Jovis laudibus Christi laudes non capiunt"

Monks were especially bound to renounce the works of heathen writers. Isidore of Pelusium, A.D. 412, writing to one, says: "What is there among them to be preferred to ours? What is there that is not full of falsehood and matter for laughter in the subjects which they study? Are not their divine principles framed out of passions? Are not their manly actions for the sake of passions? Are not their conflicts for passions? Shun, therefore, the reading of the shameful stuff, for it hath a terrible power to reopen wounds that are skinned over," &c. (Epist. i. 63). St. Nilus, 440, to a monastic collector of books: "The rubbish and ashes and mud of the books of the Gentiles why dost thou with such diligence rake together, to no profit, but to hurt, after renouncing them in a monastery" (Epist. ii. 73). To a disciple he says: "Read not the books of the heathen, neither historical nor tropological, nor touch the old literature at all; but read the New Testament, and the accounts of the martyrs, and the lives of the fathers, and the sayings of the aged" (iv. 1). Isidore of Seville, in his Regula Monachorum: "Let the monk be careful not to read the books of the Gentiles, or the volumes of the heretics; for it is better to be ignorant of their pernicious tenets than by experiment to run into any snare or error" (viii. 3). Eginhard, who had been secretary to Charlemagne, but afterwards an abbat, to his son, a monk at Fulda: "Grammatica et rhetorica, caeteraque liberalium artium studia, vana sunt, et valde nociva servis Dei nisi per gratiam Divinam bonis moribus subesse noscantur, quia scientia inflat, caritas vero aedificat. Melius mihi quidem est ut te mortuum videre contingat quam inflatum et scatentem vitiis" (Epist. 30, ad Vussin. Migne, 104, col. 519).

It is probable that in no single instance are we to understand a Christian writer as desiring the absolute suppression, without qualification or exception, of the entire body of the ancient literature. This was, for example, very far from the meaning of St. Jerome, who elsewhere defends the appeal of Christian writers to the testimony of the heathen, and instances Cyprian, Quadratus, Aristides, Justin Martyr, Clemens of Alexandria, and many others, as men who had made a good use of secular learning (Epist. 70 ad Magnum Orat.). Long before this we find Origen exhorting Gregory Thaumaturgus to study the philosophies of the Greeks as προπαιδεύματα to Christianity, and "geometry and astronomy as likely to be useful in the interpretation of the holy Scriptures" (Epist. ad Greg. § 1, ed. Lomm. xvii. 49). It is clear that these pursuits were even carried to a dangerous excess by some, and that so early as the 5th century. For a proof we may refer to the applause which Sidonius, bishop of Clermont (472), bestows on the secular poems of Consentius (Epist. viii. 4), and to the spirit in which he compares the work of Mamertus (de Statu Animae) with the productions of various heathen, as well as Christian, writers (iv. 3). The poem of Mamertus himself (Contra Poetas Vanos) "bears evidence of its writer having carefully studied some of the Roman poets" (Smith's Dict. of Greek and Roman Biogr. n. Mamertus); nor does he in the course of it condemn the study of them as sinful, but rather as unsatisfactory, and fit for children only, desiring to direct his friend to the higher themes which the gospel can supply (Biblioth. Vet. PP. v. pt. i. 979).

IV. Spurious and supposititious Writings claiming to be Christian.—These were very numerous at an early period, and as their object was in almost every case to recommend some heresy, cautions against them abound from the 3rd century downwards. Thus one of the apostolic canons (n. 60): "If anyone shall publicly set forth as holy in the church the books of the impious with false titles (ψευδεπίγραφα) to the destruction of the people and the clergy, let him be deposed." We may remark that the canon is evidently dealing with a well-known class of writings. The Apostolical Constitutions, in the longer Greek recension: "You must not regard the names of the apostles, . . . for we know that the disciples of Simon and Cleobius have compiled poisonous books in the name of Christ and His disciples . . . Also among the ancients some have composed apocryphal books of Moses and Enoch, and Adam and Esaias, and David and Elias, and the three patriarchs, that are pernicious, and opposed to the truth" (vi. 16).

For details of this literature see DICT. CHR. BIOG. s. vv. ACTS, APOCRYPHAL; APOCALYPSES, APOCRYPHAL; EPISTLES, APOCRYPHAL; GOSPELS, APOCRYPHAL; CLEMENTINE LITERATURE; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIC LITERATURE; the several names of the supposed authors of apocryphal works, and the titles of anonymous works.

V. Fictitious Martyrologies.—Stories of persecutions and martyrdom were naturally popular, and were easily made the vehicle of heresy. A decree against such false or tainted narratives by the council in Trullo (A.D. 690) shews that the danger from this source was still recognized, and that the church in the East was still vigilant against it, at the end of the 7th century: "We command that the martyrologies falsely compiled by the enemies of truth to do dishonour to the martyrs of Christ, and lead those who hear them to unbelief, be not read publicly in the church, but that they be delivered to the fire" (can. 63). An illustration occurs in the document transcribed in the next section, viz. in Passio Quirici, &c., Passio Georgii.

VI. The Roman Index Librorum Prohibitorum.—The earliest example of a list of proscribed books proceeding from Rome is a document variously ascribed to pope Gelasius (A.D. 494), or to Hormisdas (514), but more probably of the 8th century. It will be well to give this in extenso with such notes as may appear useful. We print it from Hard. Conc. ii. 940, where it occurs among the decrees of a Roman council, said to have been held in the time of Gelasius:—

"Notitia Librorum Apocryphorum qui non recipiuntur (al. qui recipi non debent).

"Evangelium nomine Andreae apostoli, apocryphum (Innoc. u. s., who ascribes it to Xenocharides (or Nexocharides) and Leontius; August. c. Advers. Leg. et Proph. i. 20, § 39).

"Evangelia quae falsavit Lucianus, apocrypha. (The forger more commonly known as Leucius Charinus; see below.)

"Liber de Infantia Salvatoris, apocryphus. (Irenaeus, c. Haer. i. 20, § 1, ascribes a story found in this to the Marcosians. Anastasius Sinaita perhaps refers to it, Hodegus 13. Pseudo-Jerome seems to speak of this, or a part of it (Epist. ad Chromat. et Heliod. inter Opp. Hieron.) under the title of Liber de Nativitate S. Mariae. He ascribes it to Seleucus (= Leucius). Its full title is Libellus de Miraculis Infantiae D. J. C., but the first twenty-four chapters have been known as Liber de Nativitate Mariae, et de Infantia Salvatoris.)

"Evangelia quae falsavit Esitius (al. Isicius), apocrypha. (St. Jerome (Epist. ad Damasum) couples Hesychius with Lucianus as giving name to books held genuine by a few.)

"Liber de Natvitate (al. Infantia) Salvatoris, et de Maria et obstetrice (al. ejus), apocryphus. (Probably, from the matter, the Protevangelium Jacobi before mentioned under another title.)

"Liber qui appellatur Pastoris, apocryphus. (The Shepherd of Hermas. No book is more frequently cited by early writers, as Irenaeus, Tertullian, Clemens Al., Origen, Athanasius, &c. It proceeded from Rome, and the ground of its condemnation here is only matter of conjecture.)

"Libri omnes quos fecit Leucius discipulus diaboli, apocryphus. (This arch-forger is so called by Evodius (de Fide c. Manichaeos, 4, inter Opp. Aug. App. vi. ed. Ben.; but the older editions give Leontius and one Vatican MS. Locutius), by Innocent (u. s.) as author of a 'book under the name of Peter and John,' by Turribius (u. s.), Photius (Biblioth. 114), according to whom all the 'Apostolorum Periodi,' containing 'Acts of Peter, John, Andrew, Thomas, and Paul,' were written by 'Leucius Charinus.' St. Augustine writes the name Leutius (Acta cum Felice, ii. 6; but some MSS. give Levitico or Lentitio). His full name, Leucius Charinus, is also thought to be disguised under 'Xenocharides and Leonidas' in Innocent (u. s.). Atto Vercell. calls him Seleucius (Hard. in loc.); Pseudo-Jerome (u. s.), Seleucus, and in the present document he has appeared as Lucianus; and so Jerome; Ep. ad Damas., as above.)

"Liber qui appellatur Fundamentum, apocryphus. (Ascribed to the founder of the Manichaeans, Aug. de Nat. Boni, 42, 46; comp. Acta cum Felice, ii. 1. It was in the form of an epistle.)

"Liber qui appellatur Thesaurus, apocryphus. (Cyrill. Hier. Catech. vi. 13. It is ascribed by him to Manes, but by Archelaus, A.D. 278, Disp. cum Manich. (Galland. Biblioth. iii. 569), to Terbinthus or Turbo (572). See Photius, 85.)

"Liber de Filiabus Adae Leptogeneseos, apocryphus. (Mentioned by Epiphanius, Haer. xxxix. 6; Jerome, Ep. 78 ad Fabiol. 18; Cedrenus, Compend. Hist. 9, ed. Nieb.)

"Centones de Christo, Virgilianis compaginati versibus, apocryphi. ('Proba, uxor Adelphi, centonem ex Virgilio de Fabrica Mundi et Evangeliis plenissime expressit . . . Et quidam Pomponius ex eodem poeta . . . Tityrum in Christi honorem composuit: similiter et de Aeneide'; Isid. Hispal. Etymol. i. 39, § 26.)

"Liber qui appellatur Actus Theclae et Pauli apostoli, apocryphus (Tertullian de Bapt. 17; Greg. Naz. Orat. iv. 69, xxi. 22, xxiv. 10; Greg.

Nyss. Hom. xiv. in Cant. Cant. i. 676; Jerome, Ep. 21 ad Eustoch. § 40; Aug. de Sanc. Virginitate, 44, § 45; and many others.)

"Liber qui appellatur Nepotis, apocryphus. (The work of a Judaizing Egyptian bishop of that name, Euseb. H. E. vii. 24; Vigilius, de Trib. Capit. 60.)

"Liber Proverbiorum, qui ab haereticis conscriptus, et sancti Xysti nomine praenotatus est, apocryphus. (The Sententiae of Sextus Pythagoreus mistaken for a Christian book in the unfaithful translation of Rufinus, and ascribed to Xystus of Rome; Orig. c. Cels. viii. 30; Jerome, adv. Jovin. i. 49, Ep. 133 ad Ctesiph. 3, Comm. in Jerem. xxii. 24, Comm. in Ezek. xviii. 5; Aug. de Nat. et Grat. 64, § 77, Retract. ii. 42; Gennadius, de Vir. Illust. 17.)

"Revelatio quae appellatur Pauli apostoli, apocrypha. (Probably the 'Ἀναβατικόν (founded on 2 Cor. xii. 2), a Cainite forgery. See Tertull. Praescript. 24; Epiphan. Haer. xxxviii. 2; Aug. Tract. 98 in S. Joan. Ev. § 8; Sozom. H. E. vii. 19, &c.)

"Revelatio quae appellatur Thomae apostoli, apocrypha.

"Revelatio quae appellatur sancti Stephani, apocrypha. (Epistola Luciani de Revelatione corporis Stephani. Probably condemned, because the writer was mistaken for Leucius. See Aug. Serm. 318, § 1, 319, § 6; Gennad. de Vir. Illustr. 46. There is a Latin translation by Avitus inter Opp. Aug. App. vi. ed. Ben.)

"Liber qui appellatur Transitus, id est, Assumptio sanctae Mariae, apocryphus. (Pseudo-Jerome, ad Paul. et Eustoch. de Assumpt. B. V.; Bede, in Acta Apost. Retract. 8, 13; Pseudo-Alcuin, Opp. Alc. P. ix. Hom. 3, de Nat. M.)

"Liber qui appellatur Poenitentia Adae, apocryphus. (Gnostic; and probably the same as the Apocalypsis Adae; Epiph. Haer. xxvi. 8; Cedrenus, u. s. 17.)

"Liber Ogiae (Thiel's second copy ascribed to Hormisdas reads Eugenio, Epist. Rom. Pontif. i. 398; others variously), qui ab haereticis cum dracone post diluvium pugnasse fingitur, apocryphus. (Probably the Manichaean Book of the Giants; Timoth. C. P. de Haeret. Recept. in Meursii Varia Divina, 117; Photius, Biblioth. 85.)

"Liber qui appellatur Testamentum Job, apocryphus.

"Liber qui appellatur Poenitentia Origenis, apocryphus.

"Liber qui appellatur Poenitentia sancti Cypriani, apocryphus. (The Confessio S. Cypriani, a spurious tract, in which he is made to represent himself as having practised magic, &c., before his conversion; printed by Fell, ad Calc. Opp. Cypr. 53, 2nd pagination. See below.)

"Liber qui appellatur Poenitentia Jamrae et Mambrae, apocryphus. (2 Tim. iii. 8.)

"Liber qui appellatur Sortes sanctorum Apostolorum, apocryphus. [SORTILEGY.]

"Liber qui appellatur Laus (al. lusus; Thiel, 468, Lusa, 937, Jus) Apostolorum, apocryphus. (The true reading is most probably Jussa, by which we are to understand the Constitutions. This is confirmed by the immediate mention of the canons in some MSS.)

"Liber qui appellatur Canones Apostolorum, apocryphus.

"Liber Physiologus qui ab haereticis conscriptus est et beati nomine Ambrosii signatus (al. praenotatus), apocryphus.

"Historia Eusebii Pamphili, apocrypha. (But see below, sect. VIII.)

"Opuscula Lactantii (al. Firmiani), apocrypha. (Not a theologian, and therefore falling into some minor errors, though probably orthodox in intention.)

"Opuscula (Julii) Africani, apocrypha. (Condemned for no better reason, we presume, than that the Chronicon of Eusebius was founded on his Chronica).

"Opuscula Postumiani et Galli, apocrypha.

"Opuscula Montani Priscillae et Maximillae, apocrypha. (See Apollon. in Euseb. H. E. v. 18; Petrus Siculus Hist. Manich. 23.)

"Opuscula omnia Fausti Manichaei, apocrypha. (The writer confuted by St. Augustine.)

"Opuscula Commodiani, apocrypha. (On account of some errors in his poems, partly akin to those of Lactantius in reference to the Millennium, the Resurrection, &c.)

"Opuscula alterius Clementis Alexandrini apocrypha. (This author could hardly have been understood in the West in the 8th century, and we may conjecture that his 'gnostic' was ignorantly confounded with the heretic so called.)

"Opuscula Tascii Cypriani, apocrypha. (The saint's full name was Thascius Caecilius Cyprianus. As the 'Opuscula beati Caecilii Cypriani Martyris et Carthaginiensis episcopi' are fully approved in the former part of the alleged decree of Gelasius, Hard. ibid. 939, the reference here must be to the magician Cyprian of romance, with whom he was confounded, Greg. Naz. Orat. 18; Prudent. de Cor. 13. See before.)

"Opuscula Arnobii, apocrypha. (His work Adv. Nationes was a very able defence of the Gospel and exposure of paganism, but written before he was fully instructed in Christian doctrine.)

"Opuscula Tychonii, apocrypha. (A Donatist, who yet wrote against his own party, A.D. 390. See Aug. de Doctr. Christ. iii. 30-37, where his Book of Rules is dissected.)

"Opuscula Cassiani (al. Cassionis) presbyteri Galliarum, apocrypha. (John Cassian, the Semipelagian founder of monachism in the Latin church.)

"Opuscula Victorini Pictaviensis (al. Petabionensis), apocrypha. (Bishop of Pettaw on the Drave, a Millenarian.)

"Opuscula Fausti Regensis Galliarum, apocrypha. (The Semipelagian, A.D. 472.)

"Opuscula Frumentii Caeci, apocrypha.

"Epistola Jesu ad Abagarum regem, apocrypha. (Received by Eusebius, H. E. i. 13, Darius, whose epistle to Augustine is extant (Ep. 230 inter Epp. Aug. § 5), Procopius (de Bello Persico, ii. 12) and others.)

VII. Other Books proscribed for alleged Heresy.—The Notitia of Pseudo-Gelasius does not profess to be complete. The tracts of Aetius (Conc. C. P. 359, Theodoret, H. E. ii. 28), of Monothelite authors (Conc. C. P. A.D. 680, Actio 13, Hard. iii. 1353), of the Iconoclasts (Conc. Nic. ii., A.D. 787, can. 9), of the Saracens (Nicholas I. Resp. ad Bulg. 103), &c. were equally ordered to be destroyed. On the Harmony of Tatian or Gospel of the Four, see Epiph. Haer. xlvi. 1; Euseb. H. E. iv. 29; Theodoret, Haer. Fab. i. 20. The extant harmony ascribed to him is now restored to Ammonius of Alexandria A.D. 228 (Galland, Biblioth. ii. Proleg. c. 19, p. l). For the Helchesaites and their book, see Hippol. Refut. Omn. Haer. viii.; Origen in Ps. 82; Euseb. H. E. vi. 38; Timoth. Presb. de Recept. Haeret. in Cotel.; Monum. Graec. iii. 390; Epiph. Haer. 19, c. Ossen.; 53, c. Samps.

VIII. Modified Judgments.—In the earlier part of the Pseudo-Gelasian decree it is said of certain "new narratives of the invention of the cross, and the invention of the head of John the Baptist," "When they come into the hands of Catholics, let the sayings of the blessed Paul the apostle go before, prove all things: hold fast that which is good." On the works of Rufinus, the reader is referred to the judgment of St. Jerome. Some of the works of Origen which Jerome does not reject may be read. "Reliqua autem omnia cum auctore suo dicimus esse renuenda" (Hard. ibid. 940). On the works of Origen see especially Jerome, Epp. 80-100, 124; Epist. Synod. Theophili, inter Epp. Hieron. 92, § 1; Socr. H. E. vi. 7, 10; Soz. H. E. viii. 11, 14; Sulp. Severus, Dial. i. 3; Vita Pachomii, 17. The Chronica and Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius, though the latter is condemned in the Notitia Apocryphorum, are for their utility not "altogether to be rejected, but the lukewarmness of the First Book, and his defence of Origen are noted" (Hard. u. s.).

IX. Suppression effectual.—When the bishops could appeal to no express law of the empire, they could at least excommunicate for the offence of reading books condemned by the church: and they did so. E. g. the patriarch of Constantinople, 595, punished a priest of Lycaonia for possessing and reading a book "in which many heretical things were contained." He fled to Rome, but was not received to communion there, until he made a declaration of having done it "in simplicity," professed the orthodox faith, condemned everything heretical in the book, manifest or latent, and pledged himself never to read it again (Epist. Greg. M. v. 64).

Gretser de Jure et More prohibendi, expurgandi, et abolendi, Libros Hæreticos et Noxios, Ingolst. 1603; in the Supplementum Duplex Epinetrum sive Auctarium; all printed together in the 13th volume of his works, Ratisb. 1739. PROHIBITED DEGREES. In order to prevent incest, marriage has been forbidden in all civilized nations between persons related to one another by blood or through marriage. How far the prohibition should extend has differed in different nations or in the same nations at different times.

The words "prohibited degrees" are not free from ambiguity. They mean that marriage is forbidden between persons related or connected with each other within certain degrees or steps of nearness. Thus, in the direct line father and daughter are related in the first degree; the same man and his grand-daughter are related in the second degree; the same man and his great-granddaughter are related in the third degree, and so on, whether in the descending or ascending line. The principle here is plain—there is one step between father and daughter, two between grandfather and granddaughter, three between great-grandfather and great-granddaughter; consequently they are related to one another in the first, second, and third degrees respectively. But when we pass from the direct line to the collateral line, a confusion arises, owing to a different manner of calculation adopted by canonists and civilians. According to the canon law, brothers and sisters are related in the first degree, because there is but one step from each to the father, in whom their blood unites. First cousins are said to be related in the second degree, because from each there are two steps to the grandfather in whom their blood unites; and similarly the children of first cousins, commonly called second cousins, are said to be related in the third degree, because each is separated by three steps from the common grandfather. When one of the parties is distant only two steps from the common stirps, and the other three steps, they are said to be related to each other not in the second but in the third degree.

But the civil lawyers calculate otherwise. According to them, the brother and sister are related in the second degree, because from the brother to his father is one step, and from the father to his daughter (that is, the brother's sister) is a second step. On the same principle an uncle and niece are related in the third degree, because from the uncle to his father there is one step, from that father to his son a second step, and from that son to his daughter (the uncle's niece) a third step. First cousins, according to this calculation, are related only in the fourth degree, because from one cousin to the grandfather there are two steps, and from the grandfather to the other cousin there are two steps more.

Consequently, when we speak of "prohibited degrees" of propinquity, we must understand whether we are speaking the language of the canon or of the civil law. In the Digest, lib. xxxviii. tit. x. (Corpus Juris Civilis, tom. i. p. 1423, Paris, 1627), an enumeration is made of all relationships in the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh degrees, but it will be seen at once how much these must differ from the relationships calculated on the principles of the canon law (see Vinnius, In quatuor libros Institutionum Commentarius, De Nuptiis, § 4, p. 53, and De Gradibus Cognationum, p. 507, ed. 1672; Selden de Jure Gentium, v. ii. Op. vol. i. p. 558, Lond. 1726; Brouwer de Jure Connubiorum, lib. ii. c. 9, p. 442, Delphis, 1714). Degrees of affinity are calculated in the same way as those of consanguinity; a man is therefore in the first degree of affinity (according to the method of calculation adopted by the canon law) with his brother's wife, in the second degree with his cousin's wife, in the third degree with the wife of his second cousin.

It is necessary to have a clear apprehension of what is meant by consanguinity or affinity in the different degrees, in order to follow the changes of the canon law as it varied its prohibitions from time to time.

The early Christians found two tables of prohibitions already framed, one contained in the books of Moses, the other in the Roman law. They supplemented these lists by two other tables, which they created for themselves by Imperial legislation and by the decrees of councils.

The Mosaic Code.—In the law of Moses, marriage is forbidden with the following blood relations:—Mother (Lev. xviii. 7), daughter (Lev. xviii. 17), sister and half-sister (Lev. xviii. 9; xx. 17; Deut. xxvii. 22), granddaughter (Lev. xviii. 10), aunt (Lev. xviii. 12, 13; xx. 19). In this list the mother, daughter, and sister are related in the first degree of consanguinity, the granddaughter and aunt in the second degree. The grandmother and the niece are omitted. By the same law, marriage is forbidden to the following relations by affinity:—Mother-in-law and grandmother-in-law (Lev. xviii. 17; xx. 14; Deut. xxvii. 23), daughter-in-law (Lev. xviii. 15; xx. 12), brother's wife (Lev. xviii. 16; xx. 21), except in one case where it is sanctioned by a positive enactment for a special political purpose (Deut. xxv. 5), step-mother (Lev. xviii. 8; xx. 11; Deut. xxii. 30), step-daughter (Lev. xviii. 17), step-granddaughter (ibid.), aunt by marriage, or uncle's wife (Lev. xviii. 14; xx. 20), "a wife to her sister" (Lev. xviii. 18). In this list the wife's mother, the wife's daughter, the wife's sister (if such be the meaning of the expression "a wife to her sister"), the step-mother, the daughter-in-law, the brother's wife would be related in the first degree of affinity, the wife's granddaughter and the uncle's wife in the second degree.

Whether marriage with two sisters successively is either allowed or forbidden, or not touched by Lev. xviii. 18, is a question which has been hotly contested. The verse, as translated in our version, reads thus: "Neither shalt thou take a wife to her sister, to vex her, to uncover her nakedness, beside the other in her lifetime." These words cannot be construed to condemn successive marriage with two sisters, if they refer to such marriage at all, they must be regarded as permitting it; for the words "in her lifetime" cannot be understood otherwise; but the Hebrew words may be translated in such a way as to give a very different sense to the verse. Accordingly the marginal reading runs,

"Neither shalt thou take one wife to another," in place of the words, "Neither shalt thou take a wife to her sister." Thus rendered, the verse forbids not merely the simultaneous marriage of two sisters, but of any two women; in other words, it is a prohibition of polygamy. Though the marginal reading was first suggested only in the 16th century, there is no doubt that grammatically the Hebrew phrase may be so rendered (see Exod. xxvi. 3, 5, 6, 17, and Ezek. i. 11, 23), and it is rendered in some such manner in every other place in the Bible where it occurs. The objections taken to such rendering are minute and arbitrary. But though grammatically unassailable, it lands us in this difficulty, that the verse, if so interpreted, appears to be a distinct prohibition of polygamy, and yet there are other passages which seem equally clearly to permit it (Ex. xxi. 7–11; Deut. xxi. 15–17; xvii. 17). And it cannot be denied that, if polygamy was to be forbidden, we should expect it to be forbidden in a more unmistakable manner. To this objection it may be replied that the verse does not contain a general prohibition of polygamy, but that it commands a man not to take one wife to another "to vex" the latter. According to this interpretation, the verse would neither be a prohibition to marry two sisters during the lifetime of both of them, nor consequently a permission to marry a wife's sister after the decease of one of them, nor again would it be a prohibition of polygamy in general, but it would be an injunction addressed to a polygamist forbidding him to marry a woman who would be likely "to vex" a wife whom he had already married, from being known to have a spite against her, or any other reason. If this is the true interpretation of the verse, as seems probable, it has no bearing upon our subject. Marriage with a wife's sister is not forbidden by the Mosaic tables unless it come under the general prohibition, "None of you shall approach to any that is near of kin to him to uncover their nakedness" (Lev. xviii. 6), where there is no doubt that the expression "near of kin" denotes those related not only by consanguinity but by affinity. The fact of a wife's sister being in the first degree of affinity and the argument from analogy make it likely that she is included under the generic term, "near of kin," but she is not specifically named.

The Roman Code.—By the Roman code marriage was forbidden with the following blood-relations (natural or adopted):—Mother, daughter, grandmother, granddaughter, sister, half-sister,[a] and aunt. Marriage with a niece was likewise regarded as incestuous, but when Claudius desired to marry Agrippina, he obtained from the senate a decree, "quo justae inter patruos fratrumque filias nuptiae etiam in posterum statuerentur" (Tac. Annal. xii. 7), thus causing marriage with a brother's daughter to be legalized, though marriage with a sister's daughter still continued illegal. The innovation introduced in Claudius' favour, though afterwards acted upon by Domitian, was never sanctioned by public feeling.

The marriage of first cousins was also originally disallowed, but by the 2nd century A.C. it had come to be regarded as unobjectionable.[b]

According to Roman law, therefore, marriage with blood relations was forbidden to those related in the first and second degrees of proximity, except so far as the ancient severity was relaxed by custom in respect to cousins, and in respect to brothers' daughters, for the sake of indulging the desires of Claudius.

By the same law, marriage was forbidden with mother-in-law and daughter-in-law, step-mother and step-daughter (natural or adopted), that is, with those related in the first degree of affinity, omitting the brother's wife and the wife's sister.

It will be seen that the Mosaic and the Roman tables almost coincide. The chief difference is that the Roman table named the niece, until altered at the instance of Claudius, while the Hebrew table omits to name her, though she at least is undoubtedly covered by the expression, "near of kin." The Koran, basing its regulations on the Mosaic code, specifies the niece, and adds foster-mother and foster-sisters (Sur. iv. 20).

We may note in passing that the Greek tables of prohibition were less austere than those of the Romans, as would be expected from the character of the two peoples. In Athens and Sparta marriage with half-sisters and nieces was permissible. But Greece was chaste in comparison with Persia and Egypt, in the first of which marriage with mothers was the custom, and in the last marriage with sisters (see Selden, who enters at length into the question of gentile licence (De Jure Gentium, v. 11; Op. vol. i. p. 553).

The Imperial Code.—The Christian Imperial code was not a separate whole in itself. It took up the old Roman law where it found it, and enlarged, curtailed, or otherwise modified it, according to the altered needs of the times (see Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. iv. leg. 17, de Cognatis et Affinibus). In respect to marriage there were three questions on which opinion was divided: 1. Marriage with a niece; 2. Marriage with a deceased wife's sister; 3. Marriage with a first cousin.

The shock given to public opinion and religious feeling by the legislation which sanctioned the marriage of the emperor Claudius with his brother's daughter Agrippina was not got over. Domitian indeed followed the example of Claudius, and married the daughter of his brother Titus; but such marriages were forbidden by Nerva, who prohibited all marriages with a niece, whether she were the daughter of the brother or of the sister. By the time, however, of Caracalla we learn from Ulpian that marriage with a brother's daughter was again permissible, and this continued to be the law down to the time of Constantine. Sozomen reports (Hist. Eccles. lib. i.

[a] The consanguinity and affinity resulting from adoption was called legal relationship. It ceased to be an impediment to marriage in the case of brothers and sisters by adoption as soon as the adoption itself had ceased by the death of the adopting parent or the emancipation of either the adopted or the real child. Legal relationship was acknowledged by the church as an impediment (Nicholas, I. Resp. ad Bulgar. c. ii.).

[b] Spurius Ligustinus, A.C. 171, says, while recounting the good things that he had done or which had befallen him, "Pater mihi uxorem fratris sui filiam dedit" (Liv. xliii. 34). Vitellius, in arguing for Claudius's marriage with his niece, A.C. 50, says: "Conjugia sobrinarum diu ignorata tempore addito percrebuisse" (Tac. Annal. xii. 6).

cap. viii. p. 21, Cantab. 1720) that Constantine passed some laws to restrain unlawful marriages, but no such laws have come down to us. Constantius, in the year 339, took up the question of marriage with a niece, and not only utterly forbade it, whether she were the daughter of a brother or of a sister, but imposed the penalty of capital punishment on any guilty of the offence, thus restoring the Roman law (except as regards the penalty) to the state in which it was before the innovation of Claudius, and at the same time bringing it (with the same exception) into accordance with Christian feeling (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. xii. leg. i. tom. i. p. 294).

In the year 355, Constantius took up the question of marriage with a deceased wife's sister and with a deceased brother's wife. These marriages he forbade as peremptorily as those with the niece; but allowing that they were regarded in old times as admissible, he did not impose such extreme penalties; but he denied them the name of marriage, and declared the children born of them to be illegitimate (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. xii. leg. 2, tom. i. p. 296). This legislation was confirmed by Theodosius the Great, Arcadius, Theodosius junior, and Anastasius. The frequent repetition of this law shews that it was frequently infringed, and we have a remarkable example of its infringement in the marriage of the emperor Honorius with the two daughters of Stilicho. In Constantius' law, marriages with a deceased brother's wife and a deceased wife's sister are placed upon the same footing, and no distinction is drawn between cases in which the previous marriage had been dissolved by death and those in which it had been dissolved by divorce—in both alike the second marriage is made unlawful. This continued to be the law of the empire.

Theodosius the Great took in hand the question of marriage between first cousins. We have seen that the earliest Roman law did not permit these marriages (Tac. Annal. xii. 6), but by the year 171 A.C. they had come to be looked upon without any disapprobation (Liv. xlii. 34). Theodosius condemned them utterly in a law made in the year 384 or 385. This law is no longer extant, but it is referred to in the writings of St. Ambrose[c] and St. Augustine, and by Arcadius and Honorius, in their subsequent laws of A.D. 396 and 409, in a way to dispel all doubt as to its bearing. St. Ambrose says: "Theodosius the emperor forbade under the severest penalties the union of first cousins, whether born of the father's brother or sister" (Epist. lx. (al. lxvi.) ad Paternum, Op. tom. ii. p. 1018; Paris, 1690). St. Augustine says, that within his own memory such marriages had been allowed by the civil law, but that at the time that he was writing the De Civitate Dei (about A.D. 428) they were prohibited (De Civitate Dei, xv. 16, Op. tom. vii. p. 459, ed. Migne). Arcadius states that the punishment inflicted by the Theodosian law (for it is to that to which he clearly refers, Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. xii. leg. 3, tom. i. p. 297) consisted of lynes and bonorum proscriptio, explaining thus the meaning of St. Ambrose when he speaks of its penalty as being severissima. Honorius refers to it as a law of his father's (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. 10, tom. i. p. 287). In the year 396 Arcadius repeated the prohibition of marriage between first cousins, removing only the terrible penalties which his father had imposed; eight years later, A.D. 404, he changed his mind, and made the marriage of first cousins lawful for the Eastern empire. (See two very valuable notes of Gothofredus on Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. x. and tit. xii. leg. 3, tom. i. pp. 288, 298). Five years later (A.D. 409) Honorius published a law by which the same marriages were declared to be only legitimate in the Western empire by the rescript or dispensation of the emperor, causing thus a difference of sentiment and of law in East and West (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. 10; Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. iv. leg. 19). Arcadius' law of A.D. 404 was adopted by Justinian, and its provisions became acknowledged as the rule of the Eastern empire. In the West also, marriages with cousins became freely permissible, but were never looked upon with so much favour as in the East. The barbaric codes for the most part regard them as unlawful.

Canon Law.—The canons of the early church, in so far as they deal with prohibited degrees of marriages, are concerned with the same three cases that we have seen engage the attention of the civil legislator, and also with attempted marriages between step-parents and step-children. Thus the council of Elvira, A.D. 305, imposes the penalty of a five years' excommunication on any one who marries his deceased wife's sister, can. lxi., and that of perpetual excommunication on any one who marries his stepdaughter, can. lxvi. (Hefele, History of the Councils, Eng. transl. i. pp. 164, 165). The council of Neocaesarea, A.D. 314, imposes perpetual excommunication on a woman who marries two brothers, can. ii. (ibid. p. 224). The Apostolical Canons declare that a man who has married two sisters or his niece may not be a clergyman can. ix. (ibid. p. 465).[d] A Roman synod under Innocent I. A.D. 402, forbids marriage with a deceased wife's sister, can. ix. and with a deceased uncle's wife, or the son of an uncle, i.e. a first cousin, can. xi. (ibid. ii. p. 429). The council of Agde, A.D. 506, defines as incestuous those who marry their brother's widow, wife's sister, stepmother, cousin, uncle's widow, uncle's daughter, stepdaughter, or any kinswoman, can. lxi. (Labbe, Concil. tom. iv. p. 1393). The first council of Orleans, A.D. 511, forbids marriage with a brother's widow or a deceased wife's sister, can. xviii. (ibid. p. 1407). The council of Epaone, A.D. 517, forbids marriage with a brother's widow, wife's sister, stepmother, cousin, uncle's wife, or daughter, stepdaughter, or any kinswoman, can. xxx. (ibid. p. 1580). The council of Auvergne, A.D. 533, repeats the legislation of the councils of Epaone and Agde, can. xii. (ibid. p. 1805). The second council of Orleans, A.D. 533, forbids marriage with a stepmother, can. x. (ibid. p. 1718). The third council of Orleans, A.D. 538, prohibits marriage with stepmother, stepdaughter, brother's widow, wife's sister, cousin, and uncle's widow, can. x. (ibid. tom. v. p. 297). This canon was renewed by the fourth council of Orleans, A.D. 541, can. xxvii. (ibid. p. 326). The third council of Paris, A.D. 557, prohibits marriage with brother's widow, stepmother, uncle's widow, wife's sister, daughter-in-law, aunt, stepdaughter, stepdaughter's daughter, can. iv. (ibid. p. 816). The second council of Tours, A.D. 567, recites the marriages forbidden in Leviticus xviii. and adds to them those with niece, cousin, wife's sister, and confirms the canon of 1 Orleans, Epaone, and Auvergne, can. xxi. (ibid. p. 872). The Capitulary of Martin of Bracara, A.D. 573, forbids marriage with two sisters, cap. lxxix. (ibid. p. 914). The council of Auxerre, A.D. 578, forbids marriage with stepmother, stepdaughter, brother's widow, wife's sister, cousin, uncle's widow, can. xxvii. 33 (ibid. p. 957). The third council of Lyons, A.D. 583, renews the ancient canons against incest, can. iv. (ibid. p. 974). So, too, the second council of Mâcon, A.D. 585, can. xviii. (ibid. p. 987). The fifth council of Paris, A.D. 615, renews the legislation of Orleans, Epaone, Auvergne, Auxerre, can. xiv. (ibid. p. 1652). The council in Trullo, A.D. 691, forbids marriage with cousin (uncle's daughter), and prohibits a father and a son marrying a mother and a daughter, or two sisters, and two brothers marrying a mother and a daughter, or two sisters, can. liv. (ibid. tom. vi. p. 1167). The first Roman council under Gregory II., A.D. 721, forbids marriage with brother's wife, niece or grandchild, stepmother and stepdaughter, cousin, all kinsmen, and any one married to a kinsman, can. v.–ix. (ibid. p. 1456). See also the Judicia of Gregory III. Jud. xi. (Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 1873). Pope Zachary, A.D. 743, forbids marriage with two sisters, Ep. vii. c. xxii. (Labbe, Concil. tom. vi. p. 1512). The first Roman council under pope Zachary, A.D. 743, forbids marriage with cousin, niece, mother-in-law, brother's wife, and all relatives, cap. vi. (ibid. p. 1547). The same council states, that pope Gregory had allowed marriage after the fourth degree, on account of the rudeness of the persons with respect to whom he was writing, but as a general rule it lays down the principle that there should be no marriage where any relationship is known, cap. xv. The council of Vermerie, A.D. 752, pronounces that those married in the third degree of relationship are to be separated, while those in the fourth degree are only to do penance, can. i. (ibid. p. 1657). The council of Metz, A.D. 753, prohibits marriage with stepmother, stepdaughter, wife's sister, niece, granddaughter, cousin, aunt; any offender to be fined, and if unable to pay the fine to be sent to prison in case he is a freeman, and if not, to be beaten with many stripes, cap. i. (ibid. p. 1660). The council of Compiègne, A.D. 757, orders separation of those who are (even one of them) in the third degree of propinquity, can. i. (ibid. p. 1695). The sixth council of Arles, A.D. 813, makes the same prohibitions as previous councils, can. xi. (ibid. tom. vii. p. 1236). The council of Mayence, A.D. 813, forbids marriage in the fourth degree, can. liv. (ibid. p. 1252).

The impediment of affinity was considered to be created by illicit connexion, as well as by marriage (Council of Agde, can. lxi. Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1004).

Prohibitions on the ground of spiritual relationship belong both to the civil and to the canon law. They were first introduced by the emperor Justinian, who passed a law, A.D. 527, forbidding any one to marry a woman for whom he had stood as godfather in baptism, the tie of the godfather and godchild being so analogous to that of the father and child as to make such a marriage appear improper (Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. 4, leg. 26). The council in Trullo, A.D. 691, prohibited marriage between the godfather and the child's mother, ordering that all who should hereafter enter upon such marriages should be separated, and do penance, can. liii. (Labbe, Concil. tom. vi. p. 1167). The first Roman council under Gregory II., A.D. 721, anathematizes all who marry their commatrem, can. iv. (ibid. p. 1256). Pope Zachary, A.D. 741, forbids the marriage of the godfather with mother or child, Ep. vii. c. xxii. (ibid. p. 1512). The first Roman council under pope Zachary, A.D. 743, forbids marriage with "presbyteram, diaconam, nonnam, monacham, vel etiam spiritualem commatrem," cap. 5 (ibid. p. 1547). The council of Metz, A.D. 753, forbids marriage with "commatre suâ aut cum matrinâ spiritali de fonte et confirmatione episcopi," cap. i.; that is, it prohibits the marriage of the father with the godmother of his child, and the marriage of the child with his godmother, and the marriage of the confirmed person with the person who presented him for confirmation (ibid. p. 1660). The council of Compiègne, A.D. 757, lays stress on the spiritual relationship created by confirmation. If a husband offered for confirmation the son of his wife by a previous husband he thereby became so nearly connected by spiritual kinsmanship with his own wife as to have to put her away, and he was not allowed to marry again, can. xii. (Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 2005). The council of Mayence, A.D. 813, forbids marriage with the godchild or the godchild's mother, or the mother of the child offered for confirmation, can. lv. (Labbe, Concil. tom. vii. p. 1252). This kind of relationship is recognized also by pope Nicholas I., A.D. 860, in his reply to the Bulgarians (Hard. Concil. tom. v. p. 343). For a list of spiritual relatives between whom marriage was prohibited in later times, reference may be made to the council of Saltsburg, A.D. 1420, can. xv. (ibid. tom. viii. p. 980). The council of Trent found it necessary to restrain these extravagances by confining spiritual relationship to sponsors and the child and the parents of the child, to the baptizer and the baptized and the parents of the baptized, to the confirmer and the confirmed and the parents of the confirmed, and to the presenter for confirmation and the confirmed and the parents of the confirmed (Conc. Trident. Sess. xxiv.; De Reform. Matrimon. cap. 2; Hard. Concil. tom. x. p. 151).

It will be seen from the above review that during the whole of the eight first centuries marriages were never allowed, either by civil or canon law, in the first degree, whether of consanguinity or affinity, nor, with one exception —that of cousins—in the second degree. The first degree of consanguinity comprises the mother, the daughter, and the sister. With regard to these no question has ever been raised among Christians. The first degree of affinity comprises the stepmother, the wife's mother, the wife's daughter, the son's wife, the wife's sister, the brother's wife. The repetition of prohibitory canons shews that it was necessary to guard against the force of temptation by again and again re-affirming the law of the church with respect to these cases, but there is no wavering or hesitation as to what was the law binding upon Christians. The prohibitions of marriage with the stepmother, stepdaughter, mother-in-law, daughter-in-law, sister-in-law, and wife's sister are as decided as those of marriage with the mother, daughter, and sister.

The second degree of consanguinity comprises the grandmother, the father's sister, the mother's sister, the son's daughter, the daughter's daughter, the brother's daughter, the sister's daughter, the first cousin. Marriage with all of these was unanimously prohibited, with the one exception of the cousin, on which, as we have seen, great differences of sentiment existed. The second degree of affinity comprises the following: Grandfather's wife, wife's grandmother, father's brother's wife, mother's brother's wife, wife's father's sister, wife's mother's sister, son's son's wife, daughter's son's wife, wife's son's daughter, wife's daughter's daughter, brother's son's wife, sister's son's wife, wife's brother's daughter, wife's sister's daughter. With regard to these there has been no difference of sentiment. The church of England in its "table of kindred and affinity, wherein whosoever are related are forbidden in scripture and our laws to marry together," confines itself to the relationships of the first and second degree (omitting, what the early church omitted, that of cousins), for within these two degrees are practically comprised all the relatives that a man could or would marry; but during the period with which we have to do marriages within the third and fourth degree were also pronounced unlawful, and, indeed, the prohibition was extended by the end of the 6th century to the seventh degree; and so it continued until in the Western church it was once more reduced to the fourth degree by the Lateran council under Innocent III. in the year 1215.[e] Two inferior kinds of affinity, arising from the second marriage of a sister-in-law, and of that sister-in-law's second husband, were also abolished by the fourth Lateran council; and the affinity caused by illicit connexion was declared by the council of Trent not to extend beyond two degrees (Sess. xxiv. c. 4).

It is not necessary to quote the judgments of the great church teachers with respect to any prohibition, except that which related to the marriage of cousins. For on all other cases there is an universal agreement; and we have only to say that every writer who deals with the subject at all, witnesses to the prohibitions of the canon and civil law, and endorses sometimes one and sometimes another of them. Thus St. Ambrose insists upon the prohibition of marriage with a niece in writing to Paternus, who had proposed a marriage between his son and granddaughter (Epist. lx. al 66; Op. tom. ii. p. 1018). St. Basil argues with great force and ingenuity, in his letter to Diodorus, against marriage with a wife's sister[f] (Epist. 197; Op. tom. iii. p. 213, Paris, 1638). But on the subject of the marriage of cousins there is no such consensus. St. Augustine gives it as his opinion that such marriages are not contrary to the divine law, as they were not contrary to Roman law until the legislation of Theodosius the Great. Until that time, that is, the end of the 4th century, no objection appears to have been taken to these marriages by the church; but when the state changed its mind, and after having vehemently condemned them for twenty years, once more declared them permissible, the church, which had followed the imperial lead in the first instance, did not change back again so readily. From the 5th century onwards ecclesiastical authority first frowned upon the marriage of first cousins, and then condemned them, partly as being in the second degree of propinquity, and partly for physiological reasons, as stated by pope Gregory in his fifth answer to St. Augustine of Canterbury. "Sed experimento didicimus, ex talf conjugio sobolem non posse succrescere. Et sacra lex prohibet cognationis turpitudinem revelare. Unde necesse est ut jam tertia vel quarta generatio fidelium licenter sibi jungi debeat; nam secunda quam prae diximus, a se omni modo debet abstinere" (Bede Hist. Eccles. i. 27, p. 49, Oxon. 1846). We have already noted that they were condemned by the councils of Agde, A.D. 506, of Epaone, A.D. 517, of Auvergne, A.D. 533, by the third council of Orleans, A.D. 538, by the fourth council of Orleans, A.D. 541, by the second council of Tours, A.D. 567, by the council of Auxerre, A.D. 578, and by others, including even the great Eastern council in Trullo, A.D. 691. But these prohibitions did not begin till after the legislation of Theodosius, out of which they sprang at the end of the 4th century. It is noticeable that [e] The growth of the enlargement of the area of prohibitions may be studied in the history of our own country. In the time of Augustine of Canterbury, A.D. 601, marriages in the first and second degrees of relationship were forbidden, those in the third degree being counted of doubtful legality. (See Gregory's Answers to Augustine, answer v.; Johnson's English Canons, vol. i. p. 69, Oxf. 1850.) Seventy years later, in the time of Theodore of Canterbury, A.D. 673, marriages in the first, second, and third degrees were forbidden, and those in the fourth were only not to be dissolved (Theod. Paenit. ed. Petit, c. xi. p. 13). By the time of Lanfranc, A.D. 1075, the prohibition, in England as elsewhere, had been extended to the seventh degree. (See Lanfranc's Canons, made in London, can. vi.; Johnson's English Canons, vol. ii. p. 14.) It was owing only to the "rudeness" of the English that marriages so far as the seventh degree were not forbidden as early as even the time of St. Augustine. Gregory explains that elsewhere he prohibited them to that extent. (See his Rescript to Felix, bishop of Messana; Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 518.) On like grounds Gregory II. "concedes" marriages after the fourth degree to the Germans (Epist. ad Bonif.; ibid. p. 1858).

[f] Under the shadow of the system of dispensations the practice of marriage with nieces and sisters-in-law has become once more not unfrequent. Cardinal Guibert, archbishop of Paris, in an address to his diocese made at the beginning of Lent, 1877, which is devoted to the question of marriage, complained that in Paris the infractions of the rules as to intermarrying within the prohibited degrees had become alarming in their number. "Marriages between uncles and nieces, and between brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law, which used to be unknown, or almost unknown, have multiplied in these latter times to a degree which saddens us, inasmuch as it is a grievous weakening of the principles of the Christian faith." The archbishop can complain of the evil, but he cannot forbid it, and he acknowledges that the state of things is worse in the rest of France than in Paris. (Mandement de S. Em. le Cardinal-Archevêque de Paris pour le Carême de 1877.)

prohibitions of marriage on the ground both of cousinhood and of spiritual relationship originated not with the church, but with imperial legislation.

PROKIMENON (προκείμενον). A short anthem consisting of a verse and response, generally, but not always, taken from the psalms, and often chosen so as to point the lesson contained in the Epistle for the day. It answers on the whole in the Greek liturgy to the Western Gradual, notwithstanding that it is sung before the Epistle, while the place of the Gradual is between the Epistle and Gospel. The custom in both cases doubtless arose from the earlier custom of singing a psalm between every two lections. [GRADUAL.] In the liturgy of St. Chrysostom the prokimenon is preceded by a proclamation of the deacon, viz. ψαλμὸς τῷ Δαυΐδ, Σοφία, though no psalm is sung there. The words ψαλμὸς τῷ Δαυΐδ are repeated after the Epistle, where again no psalm, but only "Alleluia," is sung. This probably represents a remnant of the ancient custom, and supports the inference that, as the Gradual of the West stands for the psalm between the Epistle and Gospel, so the Prokimenon represents that which used to divide the Old Testament lection (now disused in that liturgy) from the Epistle.

A Prokimenon is also sung in the Vesper office of the Greek church, and on Sundays and festivals in that of Lauds also. The ordinary Vespers prokimenon is invariable for the day, but on the other occasions it refers to the Epistle, as in the liturgy. [C. E. H.]

PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH. [Compare ORDERS, HOLY, p. 1490.]

A. SOURCES OF CHURCH PROPERTY.

1. Lands.—In the earliest days of the church those who had lands and houses sold them and gave the price to the church fund (Acts iv. 34). This continued to be the custom of the church of Rome (Theod. Lector. Coll. ii. p. 367), which, as Valesius thinks had no immovable property until the time of Gregory the Great, excepting of course church buildings and cemeteries. So Augustine would never purchase land or houses, but if such were given or bequeathed to the church he accepted them (Posid. Vita Aug. c. 24).

We find the church in possession of land before it was a body recognized by the state. Alexander Severus adjudged to the church a piece of common land to which the vintners also laid claim (Lamprid. 49). In A.D. 261 Gallienus restored the cemeteries. The edict of Constantine A.D. 313 declares that the Christians are known to possess places belonging not to any individual but to the whole body, and he commands Anulinus to restore the houses, gardens, and other property to the several churches (Euseb. Hist. x. 5). From this time immovable property was given to the church in abundance. Sometimes the donor reserved the usufruct to himself or some near relative, as Ambrose (Surius, Apr. 4), but many bestowed all their farms and property absolutely. Augustine (Ep. 199) rebukes Eudocia for impoverishing her household in this way.

(For the alienation of church property, see ALIENATION.) The statute of limitations did not apply to church property; recovery was not barred for a hundred years (Cod. Just. 1, 2, 23), which was afterwards reduced to forty (Nov. cxxxi. 6), the regular limit being thirty. An annual charge upon land by gift or legacy could not be redeemed (C. J. 1, 3, 46), A.D. 530, or in any way cease to be paid in perpetuity; if alienated it could be recovered with interest (ibid. 57), but it might be exchanged with another church.

Leases.—The usufruct of church property could be enjoyed by a layman for his lifetime or a term of years, in return for an equivalent paid at death or the end of the contract (Nov. vii. 4). Justinian forbade church estates to be let according to the ius colonarium (a kind of beneficial lease (Nov. vii. praef.). EMPHYTEUSIS was permitted only for the life of one tenant and two specified heirs (Nov. vii. 3); it was forbidden in perpetuity (ibid. 7) unless the estate was profitless and could not be improved (Nov. cxx. 1). An ordinary lease was limited to twenty years (C. J. 1, 2, 24), which was afterwards extended to thirty (Nov. cxx. 3).

Another method of granting church money or farms was per precariam, so called either "quia illud precario possidet" or "quia precibus obtinetur" (Ducange). This is sometimes regarded as a kind of benefice. One form was a lease for one or a few, generally five, years, and rent was paid; sometimes the terms were the same as the emphyteusis of Justinian (Nov. vii.), of which kind forms are found in Marculphus, ii. form. 39, 40.

The earliest notice of precariae is in a canon ascribed by Gratian to some African council (Labbe, Conc. ii. p. 1178), which permits a rector to revoke any precariae made by his predecessor to the injury of the church. [PRECARIAE.]

2. Legacies.—A.D. 321. Constantine decreed that any one might bequeath to the church any property he pleased (Cod. Just. i. 2, 1). Full liberty was taken of this privilege, and it was soon abused. Many bequeathed all their property to the church, leaving in poverty those dependent upon them. Augustine refused to receive legacies if they were needed by poor relatives (Posidonius, Vita Aug. 24). He was obliged to defend himself against the charge of discouraging legacies. Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, restored his property to a man who, having given all to the church, afterwards had a son; so when an angry father disinherited his son, Augustine would not accept the legacy for the church (cf. Sermo de diversis, 49). Ambrose (in Lucam. 18) forbids to pinch relatives in order to leave money to the church. Jerome (Epit. Mar.) applauds Marcella for surrendering her own wishes to her mother's, and bequeathing her property to relatives rather than the church. On the other hand he advises the widow Furia, in spite of the opposition of her father, to leave her money to the church. Gregory the Great restored an estate rather than impoverish the children.

A.D. 455. The law of Valentinian (Cod. Just.

xvi. 2, 20), which forbade clerics to receive legacies from virgins and other religious persons even as trusts, did not probably prevent legacies to the church, for Jerome (ad Nepotian.) and Ambrose (ep. 50) do not complain of the law, but of the greediness of those will-hunters who made the law necessary. Theodosius (xvi. 2, 27, A.D. 390) forbade deaconesses to make bequests to the church; they might however give what they pleased in their lifetime (ibid. 28). Full liberty was restored to them by Marcian (Cod. Just. i. 2, 13).

Augustine advised those who had sons to add Christ as one more heir and give the church an equal share with the rest (De Div. Serm. 49); dead children were to be counted in and their portion go to the church (ibid. 44). Justinian ordered that, on accepting a legacy, the bishop should enrol the amount and the date before the civil magistrate (Cod. i. 3, 28). Also (Nov. 131, 9, A.D. 541), if a legacy be left to God or Christ, it is to go to the church of the place where the testator lived; when a saint or angel is named, but not the place, then if there are many chapels so named, the legacy is to go to the poorest (unless there be one which the testator was known to favour, C. J. i. 2, 26); if there are no chapels in the city, to one in the province, and failing that, to the church of the testator. If money were left to build a house for charitable uses, the work must be completed within a year (C. J. i. 3, 46). The canons of Carthage (Con. iv. c. xviii. xix., A.D. 398) forbid the bishop to enforce a bequest by law, but Justinian commands the bishop to see that a bequest is duly carried out (Nov. cxxxi. 11.). Annual legacies might not in any way be changed, but were to remain annual (C. J. i. 3, 46, A.D. 530; confirmed ibid. l. 57, A.D. 534).

The minute requirements of the Roman law were sometimes relaxed in favour of the church —e.g. bequests to the poor (C. J. i. 3, 24), or for the redemption of captives (ibid. 28), were valid, although the persons benefited were uncertain, and the claim to such money was not barred for a hundred years (C. J. i. 2, 23). The French kings confirmed the canons which ordered that wills in favour of the church should be valid, although in some points informal (C. Lugdun. ii. 2; Paris, iii. 1). [MORTMAIN.]

The Lex Falcidia, which forbade a man to leave more than three-fourths of his property in legacies, was repealed in the case of the church (Nov. cxxxi. 12). A.D. 772 a Bavarian council (c. ii.) arranged for the alteration of a will leaving property to the church.

3. Grants.—Grants from the imperial funds formed another source of revenue. Constantine gave a large sum to be distributed by Caecilian, bishop of Carthage, among the clergy of Africa, Numidia, and Mauretania (Euseb. Hist. x. 6), to defray expenses—a precedent which was frequently followed by later emperors. He also granted an annual allowance of corn to the widows, virgins, and clergy in each province (Theod. iv. 4). This was revoked by Julian, but one-third was restored by Jovian and confirmed by Marcian (Cod. Justin. i. 2, 12). At the council of Chalcedon, Dioscorus, bishop of Alexandria, was accused of appropriating it (act. 3). Gregory the Great (viii. ep. 20) writes to the proconsul of Italy not to withhold this grant from the church of Naples. In iv. 42 he blames Leontius for appropriating the corn at Ariminum. The civilis annona, or grant of bread to the poor, is oftener mentioned along with the immovable property of the church, and could not be alienated (Cod. Just. i. 2, 14; Nov. vii. praef. and cxx. 1). There is a decree of Marcian, A.D. 454, which is thought to refer to this corn (C. J. i. 2, 12): "Et quia nostrae humanitatis est egenis prospicere et dare operam ut pauperibus alimenta non desint, salaria etiam quae sacrosanctis ecclesiis in diversis speciebus de publico hactenus ministrata sunt, jubemus nunc quoque inconcussa et a nullo prorsus imminuta praestari."

Anastasius granted seventy pounds of gold to the church of Constantinople for the proper conduct of funerals (C. J. i. 2, 18; cf. Nov. lix.).

When the barbarians divided the lands of the empire, the church estates remained sacred; generally they were increased. Clovis and his first successors awarded large tracts. St. Remigius received a great number of lands to be distributed among the destitute churches. The royal exchequer was greatly impoverished (Greg. Turon. vi. 46). Ludwig made grants to the church of Orleans (Con. Aurel. i. c. 5, A.D. 511). Dagobert I. gave the royal revenue from Tours to the church of St. Martin (Eligii Vita, 1, 32). So rapidly and alarmingly was the church of France becoming rich, that king Chilperic annulled all testaments in which the church was made heir, but this was repealed by Gunthram soon after. Charles Martel seized a quantity of church land to reward his soldiers, A.D. 740, but part was restored by Pippin (Gesta Francorum, Planck). Frequently the gifts made by kings were confirmed in synods, as those of Gunthram at Valence, and of Dagobert (Planck, ii. 203), and of Pippin at Ratisbon, A.D. 742.

4. Slaves. — A.D. 590 the first council of Seville (c. 1) was requested by the deacons to annul some manumissions of the late bishop Gaudentius. They found that the existing canons forbade the alienation of church property, and rendered all such transactions void. It was decreed that if Gaudentius had left property to the church the slaves might remain free, otherwise he ought not to injure the church. Still, to judge more according to the precepts of humanity than by strict law, such freed men were to remain in ius ecclesiae, ut idonei: their property they might leave to their sons, but to no others. See SLAVERY.

5. Occasional sources of revenue were the estates of clerics and religious persons who died intestate and without relatives (Cod. Just. i. 3, 20). Theodosius extended to the church this privilege which all other collegia possessed. Clerics without relatives were expected to leave their property to the church (Salvian. ad Salonic.), and were allowed no heirs but their nephews by C. Agath. c. 24, A.D. 506. Also all the property of a bishop, except what he possessed before his appointment or inherited from relatives (Nov. cxxxi. 13; cf. C. Rhem. c. 10, 20): the estates of freed men of the church who died childless (Greg. M. v. 12): the marriage fees of slaves on church land (ibid. i. 42): property stolen from a church tenant, if recovered (this was forbidden by Gregory, l. c.): fines for ecclesiastical offences: the estates of clerks who became seculars again (C. J. i. 3, 55). The goods of heretics were sometimes bestowed on the church, as were those of Nestorius when he was sent into exile by Theodosius. So also were the houses where Montanists assembled (Cod. Theod. xvi. 5, 57), and Donatists (ibid. 54). Honorius gave several heathen temples (Cod. Theod. xvi. 10, 20). Constantius gave a temple of the sun at Alexandria (Sozomen, v. 7), and some basilicas, as the Sessorian and the Lateran. The statue of Serapis and other idols at Alexandria were melted down for the use of the church, the emperor giving orders that the gods should help to maintain the poor (Socrates, vii. 7).

Fees for baptism were at one time paid. Greg. Naz. (de Bapt. Fr. 635) writes against it. The Con. Eliberis, c. xlviii. forbids this practice, so does Gelasius (Ep. ix. c. 5); and for confirmation also. Con. Braccara, ii. c. 7, forbids the exaction of a pledge at baptism from those who were too poor to make an offering; and c. v. forbids the bishop to extort a fee from the founder at the consecration of a church. Jerome (Quaest. Hebraic. Gen. xxiii.) censures the practice of exacting money for a burial-place.

6. Benefices.— Ducange defines a benefice to be "praedium fiscale quod a rege vel principe vel ab alio quolibet, ad vitam viro nobili utendum conceditur. Ita autem appellatum est, quod is ex mero dantis beneficio ac liberalitate illud possideat." The word had a wider sense in ecclesiastical usage, "beneficia ecclesiastica dicebantur universim res ecclesiae in beneficium datae, sive a principibus sive ab ipsis ecclesiis et earum praelatis in beneficium datae essent." It has apparently the sense of oblations in the first canon of the council of Auxerre, A.D. 578. In the laws of the Visigoths (ix. 5, 5), it is equivalent to merces, and is used in this widest signification by Thomassin in his work, Vetus et Nova Ecclesiae Disciplina circa Beneficia et Beneficiarios, which treats of every kind of payment to the clergy.

Originally a benefice was not separate from ordination. By the fact of ordination a clergyman was attached to a church and could claim maintenance. All the funds throughout the diocese were handed over to the bishop, who gave the clergy their portions. Gradually the custom grew up of making special reservations to particular places; the right to maintenance was no longer personal but local; the principle prevailed, "ut qui titulum haberet ius quoque fructus percipiendi ex bonis titulo annexis consequeretur." Ultimately the canonists defined a benefice as "ius perpetuum percipiendorum fructuum quorumcumque ex bonis ecclesiasticis seu Deo dicatis" (Van Espen. vol. i. part 2, tit. xviii.). For other sources from which the clergy were maintained, see also TITHES, OBLATIONS, FIRST-FRUITS.

Thomassin considers the history of the word to be as follows (ii. lib. iii. c. xiii.). Benefices were originally lands granted by the emperor: when laymen seized church lands, these were held also of the prince or the church by military tenure, and called benefices: the name remained after they had been restored to the church. The other explanation is that they were granted to the soldiers of Christ on condition of serving faithfully in the army of the church.

Binius, followed by Baronius (anno 502), fixes the origin of benefices at the beginning of the 6th century. That benefices were only just coming into use in the church at this time is supported by the fact that some clergy, after enjoying the usufruct for thirty years or forty (Just. Nov. cxxxi. 6), claimed the lands as their own by prescription. The first council of Orleans (c. xxiii.), A.D. 511, decreed that if the kindness of the bishop had allowed clerics or monks to till or hold lands or vineyards, even though many years could be proved to have passed, the church was to suffer no harm, and the secular law of prescription (thirty years) was not to be put forward to the prejudice of the church. It was also found necessary to forbid all clerics to go to the prince to seek for benefices without letters commendatory from the bishop (can. vii.). In A.D. 517 it was decreed (Conc. Epaonense, c. xiv.) that if a beneficed priest be elected bishop of another church, he is to return all gifts previously made to him by his church. Canon xviii. enacts that the secular law of prescription is not to apply to the church.

Although a benefice was altogether the free gift of the bishop, yet his right to revoke his gift was questioned. In A.D. 538 the third council of Orleans (c. xvii.) forbade a bishop to revoke the benefices (munificentias) granted by a deceased predecessor, except for improper conduct, but he could force an exchange; his own gifts he might revoke if the recipients proved contumacious.

Benefices were granted by word of mouth or by writing (C. Aurel. iv. c. xviii. A.D. 541), as the bishop thought fit; in neither case could the benefice be alienated. If a benefice were granted to a cleric of another church, at his death the benefice returned (ibid. c. xxxvi.). Improvements went to the church at the death of the beneficiary (ibid. c. xxxiv.). If a bishop, by will, left a farm to a cleric, who entered upon it during the vacancy, the new bishop might confirm or annul the legacy (ibid. c. xxxv.). A.D. 554 the fifth council of Arles (c. v.) forbids clerics to deteriorate the property of which they have the use; the younger are to be punished; the older to be regarded as murderers of the poor. A.D. 567 the second council of Lyons (c. v.) forbids bishops to withdraw the gifts of their predecessors; if the beneficiaries need punishment, it should be on the persons rather than their property. Such canons were rendered necessary by the frequent quarrels of the bishop and his clergy, (Gregory of Tours, Hist. iv. 7; v. 49; vi. 36). The will of Hadoind, a Gallican bishop (apud Baronium, A.D. 652), mentions a villa "quam Lupus quondam per beneficium nostrum, tenere visus fuit, similiter villa quam ex munificentia nostra concessimus." Lupus is to enjoy the usufruct, and on his death they are to be restored to the church.

In the Church of Italy the epistle of Symmachus to Caesarius of Arles probably describes the custom of that time, to give a benefice only to deserving clergy, or monks or strangers, when there is some strong necessity (Epist. v.). This was confirmed by a council held at Rome (cap. iv. A.D. 502). Gregory the Great granted a benefice to a presbyter at the request of his bishop; but ordered the annual value of the benefice to be deducted from the presbyter's share at the ordinary division (Thomassin, pars 3, lib. 2, cap. v.).

In Spain, the second council of Toledo (can. iv. A.D. 531) enacts: "si quis clericorum agellos vel vineolas seu alia aedificia in terris ecclesiae sibi fecisse probatur, sustentandae vitae suae causa, usque ad obitus sui diem possideat. Post decessum, ius suum ecclesiae restituat, nec testamentario aut successorio iure, cuiquam haeredum aut prohaeredum relinquat nisi forsitan episcopus pro servitiis aut praestatione ecclesiae largiri voluerit." A.D. 589 the third council of Toledo, c. iii., enacts that bishops are not to alienate the property of the church. However, if they give to the churches of their diocese anything which does not seriously hamper the utility of the church, "firmum maneat"; and to strangers, clerics, and the needy, "salvo iure ecclesiae praestare permittantur." "Firmum maneat" implies that the land would never return to the mother church; it is the contrary to the phrase "salvo iure ecclesiae." So canon iv. allows a grant to a monastery. Sometimes a benefice was granted by way of reward and incentive to further effort: if the bishop's hopes were disappointed he might recall his gift (Con. Emerit. c. xiii. A.D. 666).

The laws of the Visigoths (iv. 5, 6) forbid the usual law of prescription to apply to benefices, and order the bishops to supply rectors of churches with a list of the property of the benefice: the widow and children of a deceased beneficiary were not to be turned out of the benefice (i. 1, 4). A.D. 779. Charles the Great ordered "decima et nona cum ipso censu sit soluta" by those who held church estates, and Selden explains nona to mean (Tithes, chap. vi.) that, in addition to the tithe which all land was supposed to pay, a ninth part was to be paid as rent to the church. A.D. 794 the council of Frankfort, c. xxv., orders "decimas et nonas sive census, donent qui debitores sunt ex beneficiis et rebus ecclesiarum." Can. xxvi. orders churches to be restored by those "qui beneficia exinde habent."

In the East there is no trace of the custom of granting benefices. The decree of Leo and Anthemius (A.D. 470, Cod. Just. 1, 2, 14), which Thomassin quotes, has reference, not to granting a benefice, but to making a lease in the usual way; for the usufruct is granted only in exchange for usufruct of equal value (sec. 5). So also Nov. vii. 4.

B. Administration of Church Property.

The administration of church property was the duty and privilege of the bishop, as is declared by the council of Antioch, can. xxiv., A.D. 341; cf. Cl. Rome, vi. c. 7; Gelasius, ep. x.; Gregory the Great, ii. 13. All subordinate officials were bound to give an account to the bishop and to act according to his judgment, whether they were oeconomi (Chalcedon, c. xxvi.), or managed the guest-houses (Greg. Mag. iii. 24), or poorhouses (Chalcedon, c. viii.), or parishes (ibid. c. xvii.), or charitable trusts in general (Justin. Nov. cxxiii. 23). Yet the power of the bishop was far from absolute. He was controlled by (1) the rights of the clergy, (2) by the laws of the empire, and (3) by the decrees of his metropolitan and of the provincial synod or of general councils. [Bishop.]

1. The rights of the clergy cannot be defined with exactness, but they possessed the following privileges. A.D. 341. The council of Antioch c. xxiv., decrees that the bishop is to administer, but the presbyters and clergy are to be made acquainted with, the property of the church, that it may not be confused with the private property of the bishop. (Cp. to the same purpose Apostolic Canon xxxix. or xl.) Canon xxv. reserves to the bishop the right of dispensing to the poor, but if the presbyters and deacons disapprove they may summon the bishop before the provincial synod. So the Cl. of Braccara, iii. c. 16, A.D. 572. The Cl. of Carthage, iv. c. 32, A.D. 398, declared a sale or gift to be void if made by the bishop without the consent and subscription of the clergy. The edict of Leo, A.D. 470 (Cod. Just. 1, 2, 14), recognizes the clergy of Constantinople as having a voice in the alienation of church property. So also Justinian, A.D. 536 (Nov. xlvi. 1, 2), relaxing the strict prohibition of Nov. vii. 1, allows to the clergy of a church the right of judging whether it were expedient to alienate property; and by Nov. vii. 3 the consent of five priests and two deacons is required to make valid the kind of lease called emphyteusis. [Alienation.] Thus the rights of the clergy were limited to control, the active administration being the privilege of the bishop. In some cases presbyters seized this privilege, but it was held to be an act of insubordination (Greg. Turon. ii. 23). The council of Gangra, c. vii. viii., A.D. 324–371 (the date is doubtful), anathematizes any who give or receive gifts for the church, save the bishop and his appointed officer. This has reference most probably to heretics who persuaded people to trust the dispensing of alms to them rather than to the orthodox bishop (Binii Annot.).

2. The imperial laws limiting the power of the bishop as to alienation and leases will be found in the article Alienation, and above under the heading leases.

3. A council had at all times the right to overrule a bishop. Charges of maladministration are frequent in the history of the church. Athanasius was charged before the council of Tyre; Dioscorus also, bishop of Alexandria, before the council of Chalcedon, where Iba of Edessa was also tried. See Council.

Patrons were not allowed to interfere with the endowments which they had made to churches (Cl. Toledo iii. c. 19). [Patron.]

The increase of wealth, and in some cases the negligence or dishonesty of the bishop, required that he should have the aid of an official. The Arabic canons of the council of Nicaea (c. lviii. iv.) decree that the citizens of each city are to choose some monk or ecclesiastic to manage the hospitals. Canon lxxxvi. orders an oeconomus, or steward, to be appointed in each church, and with him others, to manage the estates, farms, fruits, and vessels. (Cf. chap. lxiii. of the other Arabic version in Labbe, Conc. ii.) Gregory of Nazianzum, when made bishop of Constantinople, found no account of the property of his see, and during his occupancy he kept no accounts (Carmen de Vita Sua). Chrysostom was accused of managing his revenues without giving any account to the clergy (Photius, Bibl. Cod. 59). Soon after his time the church of Constantinople possessed more than one steward, as we find from the letter of the council of Ephesus addressed "presbyteris et oeconomis," though perhaps these were assistants to the steward, of whom there is mention in the Life of Chrysostom by Palladius (c. 20). [OECONOMUS.]

In the Western church the assistant of the bishop was generally a deacon, or archdeacon, or subdeacon, sometimes a presbyter, occasionally a layman. Cyprian brings charges of fraud and embezzlement against the deacon Felicissimus and another (Epp. 49, 55), but similar charges against Novatus, who was a presbyter. Augustine committed the property of his see to certain of the clergy, from whom he required a strict account every year (Possid. Vita, 24). When on a journey he had to make a payment from the church funds, he wrote to the presbyters (ep. 219), and at his death left the charge of all the property to the presbyter Fidelis, who had previously had care of the fabric of the church. Ambrose left the finances of his see of Milan to be administered by his brother Satyrus, who was a layman. Prudentius (περὶ στεφ.) celebrates the archdeacon, St. Laurence, who had charge of the buildings and dispensed the alms. St. Martin orders his deacon to clothe a poor man (ap. Sulpitium). At Ticino, Epiphanius, before he was made bishop, managed the property as deacon (Eunodius, Vita Epiph.). Pope Agapetus transferred to an archdeacon the government of the church of Rogium in Gaul (Conc. Gall. i. 239, A.D. 535). The council of Paris V. c. 8, joins the archdeacon with the bishop in a decree against the unlawful assumption of monastic lands. In the letters of Gregory the Great we find that it fell chiefly to the archdeacon to have charge of the property, and he would have to make good any loss (i. 10, 19; ii. 14, 15; vii. 130). He was assisted by a deacon or subdeacon (i. 70), and in some cases was released from his onerous duties after five years (vii. 130). The Cl. of Braccara [Braga]. II. c. 7, A.D. 563, orders the archdeacon to manage the fund for repairs and account to the bishop. Deacons managed the Sicilian estates of the church of Ravenna (Greg. M. ix. 4), and as such duties formed their main employment, diaconia came to express the duties of a steward. The Cl. of Seville II. c. 9, A.D. 619, forbids the appointment of a layman to the office of oeconomus as contrary to canon xxvi. of Cl. Chalcedon, and regards every bishop guilty of contempt and punishable who shall administer without an oeconomus. The fourth council of Toledo, canon. xlviii. A.D. 633, confirms this. Gregory (Epp. vii. 6) had already forbidden the appointment of a layman. An oeconomus is ordered by Gregory to manage the funds of the see of Dalmatia, which were under the care of the subdeacon during a vacancy (Epp. ii. 22). This officer was also sent by him to look after the guest-houses of Sardinia (ii. 59).

If a bishop neglected his duties, the metropolitan had the right of compelling him (Justin. Nov. cxxxi. c. 11). In later times the popes assumed a general supervision, and often appointed a deputy. Simplicius transfers to Onagrius, a presbyter of the church of Ausona, the administration of the fund for the poor and for repairs (epp. 3). Gregory (ep. ix. 28) orders the bishop of Ravenna to appoint a deputy, and sends the presbyter Candidus to see after the estates of the Roman see in Gaul (v. 5; x. 55).

The letters of Gregory the Great shew how large an amount of work fell upon an active administrator. The church of Rome possessed estates in Sicily, Sardinia and Corsica, in Apulia Campania Liguria, in Dalmatia, Illyricum, Gaul, Africa, and even in the East. There are letters addressed to the administrators of papal estates in all these territories, and in many cities. Gregory prescribes the most minute regulations for these lands, shields the peasant from the exactions of the farmer or papal officer, fixes the amount of small vexatious payments, destroys false weights and measures, and, lest abuses should be revived, provides legal forms of security (see espy. i. 42). He lowered the charge for marriage of slaves, secured succession to the relatives of the deceased, and repressed the unscrupulous zeal of the clergy. Besides deacons and subdeacons, he appointed eminent bishops as his vicars (Milman, Latin Christianity).

C. THE DISTRIBUTION OF FUNDS.

1. This was the duty of the bishop. Originally all revenues, from whatever source throughout the diocese, were paid into his hands. Afterwards reservations were made to persons and places. The Apostolic Canons and Constitutions may be taken to represent the customs of the third and fourth centuries. Canon xxxvii. (or xxxix.) recognizes the bishop as the distributor of all goods of the church, and warns him not to appropriate them to himself or his parents, unless they are poor. Canon xl. (or xli.) commits all to the care of the bishop, who is to dispense to the poor through the presbyters and deacons. The Apostolic Constitutions (ii. 28) order that at the agape a portion is to be set apart for the bishop as first-fruits, even though he may not be present. A deacon is to have twice as much as a deaconess; a priest who has laboured assiduously is to have a double portion, a reader or singer, or doorkeeper, has one share. The priests are to have the first-fruits of new bread, of wine from the cask, of oil, honey, apples, grapes, and other fruit; first-fruits of money or clothing were for the orphan and widow. Every tithe was to be given to the orphan and widow, the poor and the proselyte (vii. 30). It is ordained (viii. 30) that all first-fruits are to support the bishop, priests, and deacons; the tithes are to maintain the other clerics, virgins, widows, and poor. In Book viii. c. 31, it is ordered that what remains over after the eucharist is to be divided by the deacons among the clergy: to the bishop four parts, to a priest three, to a deacon two, to a subdeacon, reader, singer, or deaconess, one part. In Book ii. c. 25, tithes and first-fruits are to be taken by the bishop and distributed to orphans and widows, the afflicted and distressed.

Cyprian (Epist. vii. ed. Goldhorn) leaves the care of the widows and poor to the presbyter, but if any needy foreigners arrive they are to be supplied from his special share. In his time division was regulated by dignity. Cyprian writes (Epist. xxxix.) that for certain confessors who were only readers he has designed the honour of the priesthood, that they are to have an equal share with the presbyters (sportulis iisdem) of the food distributed, and an equal share in the monthly divisions. Probably these monthly divisions were of the money which we read in Tertullian (Apol. 39) was paid into the chest monthly, or when any pleased; cf. Cypr. ep. xxxiv. When Natalius was made a bishop of the sect of Theodotus, he was promised 150 denarii per month (Euseb. Hist. v. 28). The Cl. of Antioch, A.D. 341, c. xxv. orders the bishop to dispense to the poor, but he may take what is required of necessity for himself and the brethren. St. Augustine and his clergy made no division, but had all things in common (Sermo 50), but he was afterwards obliged to give this up (Sermo 46). According to Baeda, this was the custom in Britain until the arrival of Augustine (Hist. Gent. Angl. iv. 27). Ambrose says the bishop should decently adorn the temple of God, bestow what humanity suggests upon strangers, be neither too niggardly with his clergy nor too indulgent (Off. ii. 21).

In all this we see no trace of the fourfold division which afterwards became the recognized custom of the West. In the Eastern church this custom does not seem to have obtained at any time. In the Western church there are no traces of it for the first four centuries and a half: "non enim propriae sunt sed communes ecclesiae facultates" (Julianus Pomerius de Vita Contempl. ii. 9). In early times it was openly proclaimed that the property of the church was the patrimony of the poor. The clergy for the most part claimed a maintenance as amongst the poor; those who had property generally gave it to the church; or if they retained it, they lived upon it and had no stipend (ibid. c. ii. 12).

2. But the neglect or the avarice of the bishop required some settled plan of distribution. A.D. 475. Simplicius (Epist. iii.) writes to Florentius and Severus to take charge of the church of Osane, as its bishop was guilty of fraud. Of the revenues of the church and the oblation of the faithful, one-fourth is to be given to the suspended bishop, two parts are to be for the fabric of the church and the poor and strangers, the last part to the clergy. A.D. 494. Gelasius (Epist. ix. 27), writing to the bishops of Lucania, decrees the fourfold division to the bishop, the clergy, the poor, the fabric. The epistles of Gregory the Great shew that the fourfold division was then thoroughly recognized as law. He bids Felix of Messana give to his clergy the customary payments (lib. i. ep. 64): orders the bishop of Panormus to allow his clergy their fourth part (ii. 51); blames the bishop of Syracuse because, although the revenues of his church had increased, he allotted to repairs only a fourth part of the unincreased revenue, and adds: "quartae secundum distributionem canonicam dispensentur" (iii. 11); he takes away from the bishop of Agrigentum the fourth which he ought to receive, and gives it to the visitor to whom the church was entrusted (iv. 12). When Augustine had made converts in England, he asked how he should divide the funds. Gregory replies (xii. 31) that it is the custom of the apostolic see to order bishops to make four portions, one for the bishop and his household for hospitality and maintenance, for the clergy, for the poor, for repairing churches; but as Augustine and his company were monks, they had better live in common. The fourth part, which was assigned to the clergy, was not divided equally, but according to the order and the merits of each, of which the bishop was judge. Simplicius (l. c.) says, "clericis pro singulorum meritis dividatur." Gregory (ii. 5) orders a sick man to receive his usual pay, "secundum loci eius ordinem," and Gaudentius of Nola is to distribute the fourth part to the clergy of Capua, "iuxta antiquam consuetudinem secundum personarum qualitatem" (iv. 26). So also the bishop of Panormus is to give to the clergy of his church a full fourth part, "secundum meritum vel officium, sive laborem suum ut ipse unicuique dandum prospexeris" (xi. 51). The church of Catana supplies more minute details of division (vii. 8). The clergy complained to Gregory of their bishop's method. Cyprian, a deacon who was despatched by Gregory, decided that of the clergy's fourth a third part should go to the presbyters and deacons, the remaining two thirds to the inferior clergy. The former appealed to the pope, asserting that it had always been the custom to give two-thirds to the priests and deacons, and only one-third to the inferior clergy. Gregory left the division to the judgment of the bishop, to divide according to merit; "Ut tibi visum fuerit discrete dividere; ita sane ut unicuique sicut meritum laboris exegerit, libera tibi sit juxta quod provideris largiendi licentia." In an epistle of Gregory (ix. 29) to Paschasius, bishop of Naples, we have an instance of the proportion it was thought fit to preserve in distributing to the several orders a sum of which the church had been defrauded: to the clerics of the church, a hundred solidi; to one hundred and twenty-six needy persons on the church books (praeiacentibus quos centum viginti sex esse cognovimus) half a solidus each; to the priests and deacons and foreign clerics fifty solidi; to poor men ashamed to beg, one hundred and fifty solidi; to public beggars, thirty-six solidi. In the absence of the bishop of Ariminum Gregory appointed a visitor and ordered him to set apart the two fourths for the clergy and the poor; the remainder was to be divided into three parts: for the fabric, the titular bishop, the visitor (iv. 42). Gregory used to make distribution four times a year, as is stated by Johannes Diaconus.

Such was the custom of the church of Rome. It was extended to Bavaria and ultimately to the German church by a capitulary of Gregory II. There also the fourth for the clergy is to be distributed "pro suorum officiorum sedulitate."

In the Gallican church, the council of Agde, c. 36, A.D. 506, orders that all clerics who faithfully serve the church are to receive the stipends due to their labours: "secundum servitii sui meritum vel ordinationem canonum." Canon ii. enacts that the negligent or contumacious should be reduced to "foreign communion," that is, the condition of clerics of another church who were without commendatory letters from their bishop. In A.D. 511 the first council of Orleans c. v., enacted that the produce of the estates which the king had given to the church should be used for repairs of churches, maintenance of clergy and poor, or the redemption of captives. Canon xiv. renews the ancient statutes, and orders that of the oblations offered upon the altar the bishop is to claim half, the clergy are to receive the other half to be divided according to their degrees; the farms are to remain under the bishop's power. Canon xv. orders that lands, vineyards, slaves, and cattle given to the parishes are to be in the bishop's power. Of the offerings upon the altar only one third is to be paid to the bishop. But as some of the parishes were very poor the council of Carpentras, A.D. 527, ordered the gifts to the parishes to go to the clergy and to repairs of the church, if the bishop's see was adequately rich; if not, the parishes are to keep only so much as is absolutely needed for the clergy and repairs; the surplus to go to the bishop. A.D. 538. The third council of Orleans, c. v., decreed that oblations made in city churches were to be in the power of the bishop, who might set apart what he thought fit for repairs. The parishes and country churches are to keep their own customs. Canon xi. withholds the stipends of the contumacious; so does the council of Narbonne, c. x. A.D. 589, and also from priests or deacons who could not read (c. xi.). Gregory of Tours (Spicil. tom. v. p. 107) allows some who were suspended to receive their share (portulam).

In Spain the division was into three parts, the duty of repairing the churches being thrown upon the bishop. A.D. 516. The council of Tarraco, c. viii., complains of the state of the churches, and orders the bishop to go round annually and see that they are repaired, according to old custom; for by an ancient tradition the bishop receives a third of all. A.D. 563. The council of Braccara, c. vii., orders three equal portions to be made: for the bishop, the clergy, and for repairs and lights, of which last fund the arch-presbyter or archdeacon who administers it is to account to the bishop. By canon xxi. the oblations of the faithful and gifts in memory of the dead are to be divided once or twice a year among all the clergy equally. As the bishops unjustly seized the revenues of the smaller churches in their dioceses, the fourth council of Toledo, c. xxxiii. A.D. 633, ordered them to take no more than a third, and to go round annually and repair the churches (c. xxxvi.). A.D. 655. The ninth council of Toledo, c. vi., allows the bishop to bestow his third of the oblations on any church he pleases. A.D. 666. The council of Emerita, c. xiv. divides the money offered in divine service into three parts: one for the bishop, one for the priests and deacons, who are to apportion their share according to order and dignity, and one share to the subdeacons and clerics. Canon xvi. forbids the bishop to take a third of the oblations from a parish, and throws the duty of repairing their church on the priests. A.D. 693. The sixteenth council of Toledo, canon v., decrees that as the ancient canons allowed the bishop a third, he may exact it if he thinks he ought, but must then take the duty of repairing the churches; if he waive his claim, the worshippers must keep their church in repair under the supervision of the bishop; but when all the churches are in good repair the bishop is to have his third. Many of these canons regard the property of a diocese as no longer a fund controlled by one head, but as more or less separated and attached to particular places. At what time this practice began cannot be exactly fixed. Theodorus Lector (i. p. 553) says that about A.D. 460 Marcion, oeconomus of Constantinople, was the first to order the clergy of each church to receive the oblations of their church. Under Justinian founders of churches gave endowments (Nov. lvii. 2; cxxiii. 18), which would naturally be reserved to their churches, though the Novels do not state this; on the other hand, the law prohibiting the clergy or any manager of a charitable house to alienate, speaks only of ecclesia or sacra domus.

3. Churches.—It was found desirable to regulate church building by law. The council of Chalcedon, c. iv., forbids the erection of a domus oratoria [ORATORIUM] without consent of the bishop. Justinian decreed (Nov. lxvii. 2, A.D. 538), that any one who desired to build a church must get leave from the bishop, and must also give first an endowment for lights, repairs, and the support of the clergy; if he cannot afford so much, he may restore an old church. The bishop is to consecrate the ground and fix a cross there, and when the building is once begun the civil judge is to enforce its completion by the donor or his heirs (Nov. cxxxi. 7, A.D. 541). If funds are bequeathed for building a church, the bishop and civil judge are to see it completed within three years (Cod. Just. I, 3, 46, A.D. 530), which was afterwards extended to five years (Nov. cxxi. 10). Consecration is forbidden before endowment by c. v. of the third council of Braccara, A.D. 572. See CHURCHES, MAINTENANCE OF, p. 388.

4. The Poor.—In the earliest account of church property (Acts ii. 45) we read "that distribution was made to every man according as he had need." The first council of the church ordered that the poor should be remembered (Gal. ii. 10). During the first eight centuries of the church, almsgiving was carried to a pernicious excess. The earliest notices of church service (Justin M. Apol. 2; Tertull. Apol. 39) tell us that the collections were made for the orphans, widows, the sick and shipwrecked, all who suffered for the faith in mines, in prison, or in exile. Also as in apostolic times the wealthier churches made grants to the poorer; the church of Rome was especially noted for its liberality (Dionysius, Bp. Cor. Epist.).

First in the ranks of the poor were found the clergy. Some clergy, it is true, were notoriously wealthy; but a natural reaction against such unbecoming luxury, aided by the influence of the monks, led many to abandon all their property to relatives, or bestow it upon the church. Augustine was especially anxious to promote community of goods among the clergy. He refused to accept for the church a legacy from a presbyter who had been apparently supported from the common fund (Sermo 49). He declared he would ordain none but those who would profess poverty, and would deprive all who broke this rule. But he was unable to carry this out, and made poverty optional (Sermo 46). Many of the most eminent fathers of the church gave up all their property upon being ordained, as Cyprian and Ambrose, Gregory of Nazianzum and Basil (Thomassin, iii. 3, 3). There are many references in the fathers and a few in the councils to the duty of the church to support the poor. [POOR, CARE OF.]

5. Pensions.—The council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, assigned pensions to four persons: to

Domnus, ex-bishop of Antioch, was granted maintenance (Act x.); two rival claimants to the bishopric of Ephesus were to have an annual allowance of 200 gold solidi (Act xii.); another disappointed candidate for the office of bishop was to be kept as the funds of the church might permit (Act xiv.). Agapetus (Ep. 2) orders the bishops of Africa to support the heretical clergy who returned to the faith, although forbidding them all clerical functions. The letters of Gregory furnish many instances of pensions in the church of Rome. [PENSIONS.]

PROPHECY, LITURGICAL (1). A lesson from any part of the Old Testament read in divine service.

(1) Incidental Notices.—The Old Testament was read, it is believed, universally at the celebration of the eucharist in the first liturgic period. Thus Justin Martyr, A.D. 140, describing that service: "The commentaries of the apostles and the writings of the prophets are read as time permits" (Apol. i. 67). In the Constitutions, Greek and Coptic, the apostles are made to speak of "the reading of the law and prophets, and of their epistles, and of the gospels (viii. 5; sim. more fully, ii. 57). According to St. Chrysostom, 398, Christians "heard the prophets and the apostles" in that service (Hom. iii. de David et Saul, 2). St. Augustine, 396, refers to first lessons from the Old Testament read in it, as from Isaiah (Serm. 45, § 1, "Prima lectio Isaiæ"), Micah (48, § 2, "Lectio prima prophetica"), and Proverbs (82, § 8, "Primitus audivimus"). In his church, however, the Old Testament was not always read first, or perhaps was sometimes, already, not read at all; for elsewhere he says, "Primam lectionem audivimus Apostoli" (Serm. 176; see also S. 165). In France, 554, Childebert, in a decree for the suppression of idolatrous practices, speaks of the priest giving out from the altar the teachings of "the gospel, the prophets, and the apostles" (Baluz. Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 7). Germanus of Paris, his contemporary, in his description of the Gallican, or more correctly the Frankish liturgy, says, "The prophetic lesson keeps its own place, reproving evil things and declaring the future, that we may know Him to be the same God who has thundered in the prophecy, taught in the apostle, and shone forth in the brightness of the gospel" (Epist. i.; Migne, Patrol. Lat. 72, col. 90). Gregory of Tours, 573, speaks of the "three books" read at masses, "viz. of the prophecy, the apostle, and the gospels" (Hist. Franc. iv. 16). Elsewhere he mentions an occasion on which "the prophetic lesson having been read, the reader was already standing before the altar to read the lesson of the blessed Paul" (De Mirac. S. Mart. i. 5). Pseudo-Dionysius in the East, probably about 520, tells us that "then (i.e. after the Psalms) follows the reading of the sacred volumes by the ministers in course" (De Eccl. Hier. iii. 2). These volumes are, according to Maximus, his commentator, 645, the Old and New Testament (Schol. in loc.). An Armenian canon of the 6th century: "Let them duly celebrate the liturgy, singing psalms, prophecies, epistles, and gospels, in their order" (Script. Vet. Nova Collect. Mai, x. 278).

The Ecclesiastical Books.—The liturgy of St. James: "Then (after the prayer of the TRISAGION) are read in great detail (διεξοδικώτατα) the sacred oracles of the Old Testament and of the prophets, and the incarnation of the Son of Man, His sufferings, &c., are set forth" (Lit. of St. James, ed. Trollope, 41). It is evident that when this rubric was composed the prophecies were no short extracts appointed for the day, but were left to the discretion of the officiant. We should naturally infer also that the New Testament was not yet in the hands of the church at Jerusalem; for while the Old Testament is "read," the subjects of the New are "set forth."

The Old Testament lesson has long disappeared from the Greek liturgies of St. Mark, St. Basil, and St. Chrysostom; nor are there now any traces of it in the Eastern liturgies derived from them in use among the Abyssinians, Copts, and Syrians, whether Melchites or Jacobites. The Nestorians retain it under the name of Karyâna, or "reading." Sometimes they have two lessons from the Old Testament; but generally the second before the epistle is taken from the Acts of the Apostles (Badger's Nestorians, ii. 19, 217; Renaudot, Liturg. Orient. ii. 589, 599, "ad Lectiones"). The prophecy is preserved in the Armenian rite, where it is still preceded by a psalm (Le Brun, Dissert. x. 14; Neale, Introd. Hist. East. Ch. i. 402). A psalm, we may mention, is also left in the Syrian Ordo Communis, but it is there now followed by the epistle (Renaudot, ii. 7).

In the West, the Gothico-Spanish Missal provides lessons from the Old Testament for every celebration (Missale Mozar. Leslie, 1, 7, 10, &c.). They are called lectiones. Thus: "Lectio Libri Esaye prophete" (12); "Lectio Libri Ecclesiastici Salamonis" (29). The old Gallican lectionary found at Luxeuil, which is assigned to the 7th century, gives one or more prophecies under similar headings for most, not for all, days (Liturg. Gall. (106–173)). We also observe some left in the Besançon sacramentary of the same date (Mus. Ital. i. 278, 283, 289, &c.), though that rite is in several respects conformed to the practice of Rome. In the Ambrosian, a "Lectio Prophetica" is read in every mass, except the first two on Christmas day (Le Brun, Dissert. iii. art. 2). It was revised by Charles Borromeo, after a period of neglect; but had lasted in some of the churches of Lombardy till the 14th century, the greater number being then "content with a single lesson [before the gospel] after the custom of Rome" (Radulph. Tungr. de Canonum Observ. prop. 23). This single lesson was, we further learn, taken at that period sometimes from the one, sometimes from the other, Testament (ibid.). The old Roman lectionary, the Liber Comitis, testifies to that "custom of Rome;" for there also the one lesson before the gospel is taken indifferently from either book (inter Opp. Hieronym. x. 523, ed. Vallars.; Cap. Reg. Franc. ii. 1309; Rituale SS. PP. Pamel. ii. 1, &c.). We take this as an indication that, during the first liturgic period, the church of Rome agreed with all other churches in reading from the Old Testament at every celebration. A remnant of that rite is still found in the substitution of lessons from that book for the epistles on the week-days of Lent, and in the use of such lessons, even with epistles, on the ember days. Another witness to the primitive rule at Rome is the third ambo for the prophecy still to be seen in the church of San Clemente in that city. It stands with that for the epistle on the right of the altar; while that for the gospel, which is higher and more ornate, is on the left (Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. iv. 3).

Later Testimony.—From Rupert of Deutz, 1111 (de Off. Div. iii. 15), we learn that "two lessons,' i. e. a prophecy and an epistle, were read at mass "tam die quam nocte" at Christmas. Durandus, whose experience lay in France, A.D. 1286, says that some churches read "prophecies" before the epistles on Christmas eve and Christmas day (Rationale, vi. 12, n. 3; 13, n. 20). Such lessons are found in many of the mediaeval missals of France (Mart. de Ant. Eccl. Rit. iv. xii. 21).

Posture of the Hearers. — According to the Apostolical Constitutions (ii. 57) the people sat while the Old Testament, the Acts, and Epistles were read, rising for the gospel. In the West, the earliest custom was to stand during all; for we find Caesarius, A.D. 502, giving permission to the women to sit when the "lessons," i. e. the prophecy and epistle, were longer than usual (Serm. 95, § 1). But from the language of Amalarius, who wrote about 827, we gather that the practice had become obsolete long before his time: "Quamdiu haec duo celebrantur, id est, lectio et prophetia, solemus sedere, more antiquorum" (de Eccl. Off. iii. 11).

The Old Testament lessons in the daily service of the Mozarabes are also called "prophetiae" (Breviarium Gothicum, Lorenzana, 7, 9, 12, 17, 19, &c.).

For notices of this subject see Sala's note (4) on Bona's Rer. Liturg. ii. 6, § 2; Mabillon de Liturgia Gallic. i. 5, § 4; Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. 4, § 1; Neale, Hist. of the Eastern Church, Gen. Introd. p. 369; Notitia Eucharistica, 238–243, ed. 2.

(3) The hymn of Zacharias, "Benedictus Dominus," &c. (St. Luke i. 68–79), was always sung, except in Lent, before the eucharistic lessons in the old Gallican liturgy suppressed by Pepin and Charlemagne in the 8th century; and as so used was conventionally known as "the prophecy." Its connexion with the lessons is thus explained by Germanus of Paris, 555: "Canticum autem Zachariae pontifex in honorem sancti Johannis Baptistae canebat, pro eo quod primordium salutis in [illegible] sacramenta (sic) consistit . . . et [illegible] medius est, prophetarum novissimus [illegible] evangelistarum primus" (Epist. i. or Expos. Miss. de prophetia).

The prophecy was on some days, in most of the Gallican liturgies, followed by an "Oratio" or "Collectio post Prophetiam." In the Frankish Missal this seems to have been said in every ordinary mass (Lit. Gall. 322–325). In the Besançon sacramentary collects "post prophetiam" are provided for Advent (Mus. Ital. i. 285, 287), St. John the Baptist's day (340), and most Sundays (365, 370, 373). The Gothico-Gallican gives two only, one for Christmas day, and the other for the first Easte rmass (Lit. Gall. 190, 231). There is but one left in the Reichenau fragment (Forbes and Neale, Gallican Liturgies, 8). A second, the title of which, "post Profetia" (sic) remains, has been supplanted by an Apologia Sacerdotis (28). There are none in the Missale Gallicanum Vetus of the collections.

The Frankish Missal has substituted Roman collects which have no reference to "the prophecy" for its original prayers "post prophetiam." All the other examples extant shew that these were properly founded on the canticle itself. Some of them preserve much of its language: e.g. "Blessed holy God of Israel, visit Thy people, bless Thy people, and deliver it from all its sins; and grant, O Lord of Hosts, that we may be delivered out of the hands of our enemies, and may attain to serve Thee alone with righteousness and holiness all our days; and direct our feet in the way of peace, that we may be able to fulfil Thy will in all things" (Sacr. Gall. (Vesont) in Mus. Ital. i. 370).

PROPHETEUM (προφητεῖον). Churches or memorials erected in honour of a prophet, or in his name, were in ancient times called Prophetea. In the council of Constantinople under Mennas (Act. iii. A.D. 538, Labbe's Concil. v. 5, 67) mention was made of the Propheteum of Isaiah, and Theodore the Reader (lib. ii. p. 568) speaks of the remains of the prophet Samuel being deposited in a separate shrine of his own (ἐν τῷ προφητείῳ αὐτοῦ). Compare APOSTOLIUM. (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v.)

[E. C. H.]

PROSA. In singing the Alleluia [ALLELUIA] a custom grew up of prolonging the last syllable upon a series of notes. This was called the jubilatio, and sometimes sequentia. A further development followed, of setting words to these, not in strict metre, but in rhythmical prose, hence called Proses: then metrical hymns (Sequences) were introduced. Notker, abbot of St. Gall in the 9th century, is commonly said to have been the first writer of them. The Syrian liturgies have a hymn called Sedra, which is strictly a prose.

PROSDOCIUS (PROCHORUS), martyr at Antioch with Veronica and Romanus; commemorated Ap. 20. (Wright, Syr. Mart.) [C. H.]

PROSMANARIUS. The word προσμανάριος seems to designate the verger or watchman whose office it was to trim and extinguish the church-lamps, and to remain permanently in the building to guard it from pollution or robbery. Thus the recluses (ἐγκλειστοι) and prosmanarii are mentioned by Theodorus Hermopolites as the persons who were bound not to leave the church. It seems to be equivalent to the Latin MANSIONARIUS (Suicer, Thesaurus, s. v.). Compare PARAMONARIUS.

[C.]

PROSPHONESIS, the act or office of calling on the congregation to pray, and suggesting the several subjects of their prayer.

The council of Laodicea, about 365, directs that in the liturgy, after the dismissal of the catechumens and penitents, "the three prayers of the faithful be said as follows: one, viz. the first, in silence; but the second and third by the method of prosphonesis" (διὰ προσφωνήσεως can. 19). By reference to the liturgy in the Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 6), we learn the meaning of this to be, that those prayers are to be "bidden," or dictated to the people, who respond.

Κηρύσσειν is used in the same sense as προσφωνεῖν. Thus the Constitutions: "After this [the departure of the competentes], let the deacon proclaim (κηρυττέτω), Pray ye that are under penance;" and petitions for them are then dictated to the faithful, as before, for the other non-communicating classes (viii. 8). So on a certain occasion, St. Athanasius "ordered the deacon" κηρύξαι εὐχήν (Socr. Hist. Eccl. i. 13). By a canon of council of Ancyra, 315, deacons who had sacrificed to idols during the persecutions of that period were no longer to "make the proclamations" (κηρύσσειν, can. 2). Such biddings of prayer are called by St. Basil, 373, κηρύγματα ἱκεσιαστικά. See Epistle 155 (ed. Ben.), where he mentions some of the subjects suggested; as the welfare of brethren in foreign lands, of those in military service, &c.

Examples of prosphonesis from liturgies that were in actual use will be interesting. In St. James, after the sermon, "the deacon says, Let us all say, Lord, have mercy. O Lord Almighty, the God of our fathers, we beseech Thee, hear us. For the peace from above, and the salvation of our souls, let us beseech the Lord. For the peace of the whole world, let us beseech the Lord," &c. (Lit. Hieros. Trollope, 42). Again, after the offertory and creed, "the deacon makes the universal synapte," or collection of petitions for all sorts and conditions of men. "The deacon: Let us beseech the Lord in peace. The people: Lord, have mercy. The deacon: . . . For them that bear fruit and perform good works in the holy churches of God, for them that remember the poor, the widows and orphans, strangers and them in need, and for those who have desired us to remember them in the prayers, let us beseech the Lord. For them that are in age and infirmity, for the sick and afflicted, . . . let us beseech, &c. For travellers by sea or land, for Christians in foreign lands, . . . let us beseech," &c. (55). Compare St. Chrysostom, in which, after a similar beginning, the deacon bids the people pray thus: "For this holy house, and for those who enter it with faith, devotion, and the fear of God, let us beseech the Lord. Choir: Lord, have mercy. The deacon: For our archbishop N., for the honourable presbytery, for the ministry (deacons) in Christ, for all the clergy and the people, let us beseech the Lord. The choir: Lord, have mercy. The deacon: For our most religious God-protected emperors," &c. (Euchol. Goar, 64; similarly, 70, 71, 74, 80). A similar ecteno is bidden by the deacon in the Armenian liturgy (Neale's Introd. Hist. East. Church, 420), in several clauses, to each of which the choir responds; as it does to those of another bidden by the whole body of priests and deacons chanting (398). Instances in the Latin church are the two litanies used in the Milanese liturgy alternately on the second and three following Sundays in Lent: "The ingressa ended, the preces bidden by the deacon, the choir responding. Imploring the gifts of divine peace and pardon, from our whole heart and our whole mind, we pray Thee. R.: Lord, have mercy. For Thy holy catholic church, here and throughout the world, we pray Thee. R.: Lord," &c. (Pamel. Rituale SS. PP. i. 328). In the second form, the deacon bids thus: "Let us all say. R.: Kyrie eleyson. The deacon: Almighty God of our fathers. R.: Kyrie, &c. The deacon: Look down, O God, from heaven, and from Thy holy seat. R.: Kyrie, &c. The deacon: For Thy holy catholic church," &c. (331).

It will be observed that, in the foregoing examples, the prosphonesis is, except in one case, assigned to the deacon alone. It was at first his office in every church, and the fact is recognized by many early writers. E. g. St. Chrysostom: "Ye all in common hear the voice of the deacon commanding and saying, Let us pray for the bishop," &c. (de Prophet. Obscur. ii. 5). In another homily (ii. in 2 Cor. § 5), this father, commenting clause by clause on the prayer for the catechumens, mentions it as bidden by the deacon. (See Socrates, u. s.) It was owing to this that the eirenica of the Greek liturgy were also called diaconica. Latin witnesses are St. Augustine in Africa: "communis oratio voce diaconi indicitur" (Ep. 55 ad Januar. 18, § 34); Caesarius (502) and Germanus (555) in France: "Oratio clamante diacono indicitur" (Caes. Serm. 85, § 1), "Preces vero psallere levitas pro populo ab origine libris Moysacis ducit exordium" (Germ. Epist. i. "De Prece," Migne, lxxii. 92); and Isidore in Spain, 610: "Ad ipsum quoque [sc. diaconum] pertinet officium precum" (Epist. ad Leudefr. 8).

The prosphonesis of the deacon is lost in most of those Oriental liturgies in which the petitions of the diaconica are now gathered or expanded severally into long prayers and assigned to the priest; as in the Coptic St. Basil (Renaudot, Liturg. Orient. i. 5, 7; but see a trace in the previous "Deacon: Pray ye for the Holy Gospel," p. 7), in St. Mark (ibid. 138, 150–153); in the Ethiopic (505–507); in the Syrian anaphorae of Clement of Rome (ibid. ii. 192), of Severus of Antioch (325), St. James of Edessa (375), St. Basil (555), &c.; and in the Nestorian of Theodore (ibid. 619) and Nestorius (630). It is preserved in the Syrian Ordo Communis, the first part common to all the liturgies (5), and in the anaphora of St. James (34–38), which is used by Melchites and Jacobites alike.

PROTHESIS (Πρόθεσις; Credentia; Copt. Tahaddemet). The term was clearly adopted into Christian ritual from the Mosaic, where it is part of the Alexandrine equivalent for shew-bread (ἄρτοι τῆς προθέσεως and πρόθεσις ἄρτων).

In the Greek ritual, the term is applied both to the recess upon the left of the holy table and to the lesser altar which the recess contains. Bingham observes that in many churches "there was a place where the offerings of the people were received, out of which the bread and wine was taken that was consecrated at the altar . . . . This is called πρόθεσις" (Antiq. viii. vi. 22). Similarly, with a slight enlargement, Renaudot describes it as "that part to the right of the bema in which the priest, about to celebrate Mass, arranges and prepares what is necessary, and from which he proceeds to the altar with a certain solemn ritual" (Liturgiae Orient.). Du Cange. (Gloss. Graec. s. v.) confines his account to this sense of the word, and does not even hint that any other is possible. Suicer, however, says that Prothesis was altare minus, to the left of the principal altar, and that it had its name from the fact that the bread which was to be consecrated by the priest was first placed upon it (Thesaurus, p. 842). In this sense the term prothesis corresponds to the modern Credence. It is remarked by Renaudot that the term "altare minus" is improperly applied to the table of the prothesis "because the sacrifice is not offered upon it" (Lit. Orient. i. 188, ed. Paris, 1716).

Most of the writers upon the subject appear to be agreed that the prothesis stood to the left of the holy table as you face it. So it is placed by Leo Allatius, by Goar, and by Beveridge (in the plan given by Bingham, though Beveridge's own words, subsequently quoted, seem to place it otherwise). The points on which they differ are two: (1) whether the Prothesis was a part of the bema or distinct from it; and (2) whether there was a direct approach to the prothesis from the bema or not. Beveridge (Annot. in Can. Conc. Nic. Primi in can. xi. 16) considers that the prothesis was a distinct place from the bema, and that there was an immediate communication from one to the other, basing his conclusion upon these words from the liturgy of St. Chrysostom: "Καὶ εὐλογῶν τὸν λαὸν, εἰσέρχεται (sc. into the bema) μετὰ δὲ τὴν ἀπόλυσιν, εἰ οὐκ ἐστὶ διάκονος, εἰσέρχεται ὁ ἱερεὺς εἰς τὴν Πρόθεσιν, καὶ μεταλαμβάνει τὸ ὑπολειφθὲν ἐν τῷ ἁγίῳ ποτηρίῳ προσεχῶς καὶ εὐλαβῶς καὶ ἀποπλύνει τὸ ἅγιον ποτήριον τρὶς, καὶ ὁρᾷ μὴ μείνῃ τὸ λεγόμενον μαργαρίτης. He afterwards quotes a passage of Marcus Hieromonachus to shew that the censing minister sometimes had to make his entrance into the sanctuary through the prothesis and not through the holy doors. That the prothesis was, in some sense, a distinct apartment from the sanctuary, and that sundry liturgical actions had to be performed in it and not in the sanctuary seems clear; but it may fairly be doubted whether ancient churches were always built in the same way. In a modern church, a vestry is sometimes a distinct construction and sometimes an apartment merely curtained off from the church. And it seems quite conceivable that when Leo Allatius places the prothesis in the bema, while Goar separates it from it, both may be correct. In a handsome church the prothesis may very well have been the apse of an aisle, whilst in a church of humbler pretensions the liturgical requirement of the prothesis may have been met by separating off a part of the bema itself. This appears actually to be the case at the present day according to the description given by Dr. Neale: "The chapel is usually divided by a wall from the bema, a passage being pierced through it; sometimes it is separated by a screen, and in poor country churches has occasionally no division at all" (Holy Eastern Church, Introd. p. 190).

The view of Mr. Freshfield is that the construction of the prothesis in an apse is a question of date; that Byzantine churches had not at first an apse for the prothesis, but that it was introduced to meet the requirements of the ritual when developed beyond its pristine simplicity. He says that "where an ancient Greek church is found with three apses it is subsequent in date to the emperor Justin II. (i.e. the middle of the 6th century), or has had a new east end applied: where it has only one apse it is prior to that date" (Archaeologia, vol. 44, xxiv.).

It should be noticed that in Beveridge's plan of an ancient church as given by Bingham, the prothesis is placed on the left of the spectator looking towards the altar, whereas Beveridge's words seem to insist upon the contrary. He seems, indeed, to take some pains upon the point, as if he were writing against the conclusions of previous authors. He says, "Et διακονικὸν quidem ad dexteram Pontificis in throno sedentis et Occidentem respicientis collocatur, πρόθεσις ad sinistram," and much more to the same purport (Annot. in Can. Conc. Nic. Primi, in Can. xi. 15). In point of fact, amongst the several writers there seems to be some confusion in the use of the terms "right" and "left."

In the Eastern ritual the procession from the prothesis to the altar with the sacred elements is called the Great ENTRANCE (p. 612) μεγάλη εἴσοδος, while that with the Book of the Gospels is called the Little Entrance (μικρὰ εἴσοδος). The complete rite is described by Goar (Euchol. p. 131). The office of the prothesis is the preparation of the oblation for the eucharistic service. It opens with the rite of washing the hands on the part of the priest and deacon, saying the Psalm, "I will wash my hands in innocency, O Lord, and so will I go to thine altar." Dr. Neale infers the extreme antiquity of this rite from the words of St. Cyril of Jerusalem, "Ye have seen the deacon giving water to the priest to wash his hands, and to the presbyters who surround the altar of God" (Catech. Mystag. 5). The whole office is given in English by Dr. Neale (Eastern Church, Introd. p. 341). [H. T. A.]

PROTOAPOSTOLARIUS, the first epistoler. The liturgical epistle is called the apostle, because taken from the writings of the apostles, in the Greek and Oriental churches (Liturg. S. Chrys. in Goar, Euchol. 68; S. Marc, in Renaud. Collectio Lit. Orient. i. 137; the Coptic rite, ibid. 6; the Ethiopic, 508; the Syrian [Melchite and Jacobite], ii. 19, but "epistle" also 8, 19; the Nestorian, 585), as formerly among the Latins (Childeberti Constit. A.D. 554, Capit. Reg. Fr. Baluze, i. 7; Germanus Paris. 555, Expos. Missae in Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. 12; Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, can. 12; and some copies of the Gregorian sacramentary, Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. ii. 1, Ménard. Opp. S. Greg. iii. 1, ed. Ben.; Rocca, Opp. Greg. V. 63, ed. 1615). Hence the epistoler was called by the later Greeks apostolarius. Describing the ceremonies of Easter Eve at Constantinople, Codinus tells us that "the protoapostolarius reads the prophecy and the apostle" (de Offic. vi. p. 46, ed. Niebuhr).

PROTOLICUS, martyr with Bassus and Antonius at Alexandria; commemorated Feb. 14 (Usuard. Mart.; Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

PROTONOTARIUS. By this hybrid word the Greeks denoted the ecclesiastical officer at Constantinople, who had his counterpart at Rome in the primicerius notariorum. "The office [of the protonotary] is evident from the name; for he is the first of the notaries or scribes" (Codinus, de Offic. Palat. C. P. v. 41, ed. Bekk.). In a very ancient Notitia Officialium, or "catalogue raisonné" of church officials at C. P., printed by Goar, we read: "The protonotary stands in the church for the service of the bishop, and it is his business to write, if there be any occasion for it. He also examines (or makes a visitation of) the lawyers, and writes wills and manumissions, and precepts and the like." (MS. Allat. in Euchologion, 276). Another document of the same kind tells us that his station was in the bema, that at the time of the elevation he gave the basin to the bishop, that he might wash his hands, and that he also held the DICERIUM (ibid. 269). He read the gospel on Palm Sunday (277; similarly 270). The protonotarius took precedence after the EXOCATACOELI (Joan. Citrii Resp. 8, Jus Graeco-Rom. v. in the notes of Gretser and Goar to Codinus, 132). In the 12th century, under Georgius Xiphelinus, the protecdicus [ECDICUS] was charged with the duties of the protonotary, their offices being amalgamated under the former name (Joan. Citr. u. s. in Goar, Euchol. 283). In what century the title of protonotary was first used by the Greeks, I cannot say. The imperial officer, so called, is termed by Socrates, A.D. 439, πρωτοστάτης τῶν βασιλικῶν ὑπογραφέων (Hist. Eccl. vii. 23). Agatho, who had been employed as a notary at the sixth oecumenical council, writing in 712, calls himself "protonotary of the patriarchic secretum" (Epilogus, Hard. Conc. iii. 1833). This is, I think, the earliest example. The term was adopted by the Romans not much later. Ammianus, 389, calls the civil officer merely "primus inter notarios omnes" (Res Gestae, xxv. 8). Gregory of Rome, in 592, still uses the phrase "primicerius notariorum" (Epist. ii. 22) when speaking of the ecclesiastic. Similarly, in the Liber Pontificalis (Julius, No. 36): "Hic constitutum fecit, ut . . . . omnium monumentorum in ecclesia per primicerium notariorum confectio celebraretur." Hadrian of Rome, 772, uses the word, but applies it only to a chancellor of the empire (Epist. ad Car. M. Hard. Conc. iii. 2017; inter Epp. Hadr. 85). After our period, however, it became the common title of the papal officers. Thus e.g. John de Trembley was "protonotary of the apostolic see and of the sacred council of Constance" (Hard. viii. 492). A bull of Leo X. speaks of the "protonotariatus officium" and "protonotariatus habitus" (Hard. ix. 1776). [W. E. S.]

PROTOPAPAS (πρωτοπαπᾶς, πρωτοιερεύς, πρωτοπρεσβύτερος). I. The chief of the presbyters in an episcopal church was so called. Hence he may be compared to the dean of a western cathedral. At Constantinople, "when the bishop celebrates the liturgy, the protopapas stands above all the rulers of the church, and in the divine liturgy gives the holy communion to the bishop. The bishop likewise gives it to the πρωτοιερεύς. He is also the chief in the higher ranks of the church; thus occupying the place of the bishop in the church" (Official. Catal. ex. Allat. antiquissimo MS. printed by Goar, Euchol. p. 277; compare the similar Catal. p. 271). He is "the first of the bema," says Codinus, "and has the second place after the bishop" (De Offic. Palat. i. p. 6, ed. Bekk.). A brief form of appointment is given by Goar from an ancient Euchologion (287). Some special duties of the protopapas of Constantinople are mentioned by Codinus, which probably did not differ from those discharged by the same officer in other great churches (xiv. 79).

II. The chief of the clergy in attendance on the emperor was also called the protopapas. Thus Codinus: "The emperor has a protopapas among his clergy, the church has the same" (De Off. xvii. 94). Under Constantine VIII. "the protopapas of the palace was commanded to precede the army with the precious wood of the cross" (Cedrenus, Hist. Comp. ii. 285, ed. Nieb.). One Stylianus is mentioned as the protopapas of the great palace under Nicephorus II. (ibid. 252).

III. Parish priests who had others under them were also called protopapas. The eighth canon of Antioch, A.D. 341, forbids "presbyters in the country districts to give canonical epistles," but permits the chorepiscopi to do so. Balsamon, commenting on this, says, "some maintain that the presbyters in the country districts, i.e. the protopapades, can give letters of peace" (Pandect. Bever. i. 437). Again, he says that "because the canons forbade bishops in small cities and villages, therefore they ordained for them presbyters; that is, protopapades and chorepiscopi" (Comm. in Cem. x. p. 439). They probably had some power over their brethren, as well as precedence, from the first, but its extent does not appear. In the modern Greek church the protopapas "in vicis episcopo absente, reliquis sacerdotibus semper praeeminet, et in eos jus exercet" (Goar, 287). [W. E. S.]

PROTOPRESBYTER. The protopapas was anciently so called. In the acts of the synod at the Oak, A.D. 403, we read of "Arsacius (of Constantinople), the protopresbyter, who succeeded Chrysostom" (Hard. Concil. i. 1041). A protopresbyter of Alexandria is spoken of at about the same time (Socr. Hist. Eccl. vi. 9). In the Monumenta Syn. Nic. ii. A.D. 787, one of the Roman legates is called πρῶτος πρεσβύτερος of the church at Rome (Hard. iv. 28). See PROTOPAPAS, ARCHPRESBYTER, DECANUS. [W. E. S.]

PROTUS (1), pedagogus, martyr with his pupils Cantianus and Cantianilla; commemorated May 31 (Usuard. Mart.; Hieron. Mart., at Aquileia; Mart. Rom.); June 15, with Cantianus and Clemens (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr with Jacinctus, both eunuchs, under Gallienus; commemorated Sept. 11, on the old Via Salaria (Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart., with Hyacinthus, both eunuchs of St. Eugenia; Hieron. Mart., with Jacinctus, at the cemetery of Basillae on the old Via Salaria; *Vet. Rom. PSACHNION. This word, whose meaning is quite uncertain, occurs in the account of the sufferings of pope Martin I. (ob. A.D. 655). After very cruel treatment had been inflicted on him at Constantinople, the sacellarius (see Ducange, s. v.) ordered one of the guards standing by, a barber, to remove at once the pope's psachnion (Patrol. lxxxvii. 115). This done, he was delivered to the prefect of the city with a view to his being put to death, which he but narrowly escaped.

Ducange (Glossarium, s. v.) considers that the text is corrupt, and that saccion should be read, the saccus being an article of dress worn by patriarchs, &c. This does not seem very probable, because the pallium would be above all the other vestments, and the removal of that is subsequently mentioned. In the text as given by Baronius (Annales, A.D. 651, cc. 10, 11), the reading psachnion is found, which, however, leaves the matter quite as doubtful. Baronius gives the rather far-fetched theory that the meaning is that of a satchel or purse (pera). Macer (Hierolexicon, s. v.) considers the word to refer to the tonsure, laying stress on the fact that it is a barber who is bidden to act on this occasion. This would be tantamount to a degrading from the clerical office, so that the secular power could be then called upon to act. [R. S.]

PSALLENDA, the proper antiphon on a saint's day in the Ambrosian offices of lauds and vespers. Ex. On St. Andrew's day at vespers. "Psall. Inveni David servum meum: Oleo sancto meo unxi eum. Gloria Patri, &c. Inveni," &c. [W. E. S.]

PSALLENDUM, the anthem between the prophecy and epistle in the liturgy of Gothic Spain: "Postea, iterato Dominus sit semper tobiscum, canitur aut profertur psallendum, quod idem paene est atque responsum, non dispar graduali officii Latini" (Ordo Div. Off. Goth. from Roblesius, Vita Ximenii, 27, in Conc. Hisp. Aguirre, iii. 264). Leslie (in Psallendo, Miss. Mozar.) denies its close resemblance to the gradual. In the Missal this anthem is always headed by the word "psallendo," which is, I conceive, not the oblique case, but the lower Latin form. Compare sono for sonum in the Breviar. Goth. Lorenzana, 1, 6, 8, &c. [W. E. S.]

PSALLENTIA, a method of singing the psalms, hymns, &c. "Graecorum psallentiam ad nos dirigere tua fraternitas dignetur." This occurs in a letter to Jerome, which has been ascribed to Damasus of Rome, the ground of the request being the rudeness of the Roman psalmody at that time: "Nec psallentium mos tenetur, nec hymni decus in ore nostro cognoscitur." The authenticity of the epistle and of Jerome's reply is denied by Hardouin, &c. (Mansi, Concil. iii. 428). [W. E. S.]

PSALLENTIUM (or PSALLENTIUS), a service of psalms and hymns; a word in very common use in France in the 6th century and later; but less frequent elsewhere. "Cum psallentio sacerdotum crucem Domini vel pignora sanctorum commendavit" (Baudonivia in Vita Radegundis, 19): "Dum sub muro cum psallentio sanctum ejus corpus portaretur" (Ib. 28). "Prostrati solo Dominum diebus singulis cum psallentii modulamine deprecantur" (Greg. Turon. de Vit. PP. i. 1; see Hist. Franc. i. 43: "Psallentium audierunt in caelo; ii. 21, in a procession; 37, of an antiphon, &c.). In 653 Clovis II. made a grant to the church of St. Denys, "ut sicut tempore domini genetoris nostri ibidem psallencius per turmas fuit institutus; vel sicut ad monasthirium St. Mauricii Agaunis die noctoque tenetur, ita in loco ipso celebretur" (De Re Diplom. Mabill. 466). "That on the Lord's Day every priest go round his church, together with the people cum psallentio" (Capit. Reg. Fr. v. 372). [W. E. S.]

PSALMELLUS, an anthem from the Psalms sung after the prophecy in the Ambrosian liturgy (Rituale SS. PP. Pamel. i. 295), and therefore corresponding to the PSALLENDUM of the Mozarabic. Its analogy to the GRADUAL is observed by Ralph of Tongres, who speaking of the responsories of the mass, says, "In the Roman office they are called graduals, and in the Ambrosian, psalmeli" (sic.; De Can. Observ. 12). The following rule for its use is given in the Missal of 1609; "Post lectionem [prophetiae], responso per ministrum Deo gratias, dicitur psalmellus, quando sequitur epistola; alioquin post lectionem dicitur alleluia cum suo versu, vel cantus" (Lebrun, Dissert. iii. art. 2). [W. E. S.]

PSALMISTA. The Statuta Antiqua of the African Church (c. 10) declare that a "psalmista, i.e. cantor," may undertake the office of a church singer at the mere bidding of the presbyter, without consulting the bishop. The presbyter is to say to him, "tu vide ut quod ore cantas corde credas, et quod corde credis operibus comprobes." Compare ORDINATION, p. 1509. [C.]

PSALMODY. The object of this article is to give some account of the rise, method, and peculiarities of Psalmody in early Christianity and to trace the progress of ideas that were associated with it.

It has been already stated in this work [see OFFICE, THE DIVINE] that psalmody formed so prominent a constituent of ancient choir services as actually to have given its name to some of the earliest service books that are known to us. Indeed, the psalmody of any given service may be considered as the thread upon which the pearls of lesson, versicle and collect are strung.

Germs of Choir Services.—We can trace the rise of the elaborate services that have been used in the Christian church in the little that has come down to us about the practice of the ancients in psalmody.

The earliest writers as well as the uniform tradition of Christendom imply that the musical performance of psalms has always formed a part of Christian worship. The first passage in Christian literature which makes any reference to the subject is the well-known passage from the epistle of St. Ignatius to the Ephesians. He uses expressions there which can only be explained on the hypothesis that the early Christians sang. He does not indeed say that what they sang was the Psalms of David. But if we bear in mind the practice of the age immediately subsequent and that of the Jewish church before, there can be no reasonable doubt that the Psalms of David formed at least a part of what the early Christians sang.

Justin Martyr, again, in his Apology addressed to the emperor Antoninus Pius, speaks of the Christians singing "hymns." But the learned Benedictine editor observes there that "it is plain enough that the name of hymns was given both to the Psalms of David and to lyrics composed by Christians themselves, which used to be sung in church." Tertullian (Apol. 39), mentions the singing of compositions taken from the Holy Scriptures, amongst which it can hardly be doubted (though he does not distinctly say so) that the Psalms of David were included. Origen too (contra Celsum, viii. 37) makes use of expressions which may fairly be interpreted in the same direction; yet he does not explicitly affirm that the psalms were sung in public worship. Indeed the earliest mention known to the present writer of the use of ψαλμοί in Christian worship is contained in a passage quoted by Eusebius against Artemon, the heretic, ψαλμοὶ δὲ ὅσοι καὶ ᾠδαὶ ἀδελφῶν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς ὑπὸ πιστῶν γραφεῖσαι τὸν λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ τὸν Χριστὸν ὑμνοῦσι θεολογοῦντες (Hist. Eccl. v. 28). There is indeed one passage which may contest the priority with this quotation of Eusebius. It is a passage attributed to Hippolytus in the oration on the end of the world: τὸ στόμα ὑμῶν πρὸς δοξολογίαν καὶ αἶνον καὶ ψαλμοὺς καὶ ᾠδὰς πνευματικὰς ἠτρέπισα λαλεῖν. But though the passage is ancient, yet it is of doubtful authenticity, and therefore cannot be advanced with confidence in the argument. After this period the mention of psalmody properly so-called is so frequent as to enable us to dispense with specific citation.

Athanasius (de Virginitate) tells a lady, "Say as many psalms as you can, and to every psalm let there be joined prayers and bending of the knees with tears, . . . and after three psalms are finished, say Alleluia."

This practice seems to be the prototype of that which was long afterwards the Mozarabic and Gallican rule, according to which it was directed that after each antiphon which followed the psalm there should be said collects, which were for the most part compiled from the language of the psalm itself. These prayers are probably the Collectiones spoken of in the council of Agde in the year 506 (can. 30), which were to be said by bishops and presbyters. If neither bishop nor presbyter but only a deacon were present, then these prayers were not said. There is a difference of opinion as to where the practice originated of interspersing psalms with collects. Tomasi attributes it to the Spanish and Gallican churches. Gerbert thinks it was brought by Cassian from the East into Gaul. In the council of Laodicea (4th century) there is a canon which forbids psalms to be said without a lection between them (Conc. Laod. can. 17).

The use of any human composition is expressly forbidden by the first council of Braga: "Ut ultra psalmos vel canonicarum Scripturarum novi et veteris Testamenti nihil poetice compositum in ecclesia psallatur, sicut et sancti praecipiunt canones" (Conc. Brac. I. c. 12). The stiffness of this prohibition was afterwards modified (Conc. Tolet. iv.). It seems however that it was not meant to exclude what we should call hymns, but only the so-called psalms of Solomon and other compositions which might seem to claim rank as canonical scripture. (See Balsamon on Conc. Laod. can. 59.) By a canon (67) amongst the capitula of Martin of Braga it was forbidden to use psalms in church that were not in Scripture (compositos et vulgares) The same thing is repeated in the 9th century, shewing that former prohibitions had been ineffectual (Conc. Aquisgr. can. 86). In connexion with this branch of the subject it will be remembered that there was often a disposition to propagate false teaching through the medium of psalms composed by such teachers themselves; as in the case of Paul of Samosata, mentioned by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. vii. 30); Valentinus, mentioned by Tertullian (de Carne Christi, 17); Apollinarists in Sozomen (Hist. Eccl. vi. 25); and the most famous example of all—the Donatists, attacked by St. Augustine (Ep. 55, al. 34). The use of such psalms, however, does not seem to have been confined to the schismatic party; for St. Augustine himself composed a long psalm against the Donatist party. He says Retract. lib. i. 20) that he meant it to be sung by the multitude, in order that the unlearned might become acquainted with the errors of the Donatists. The psalm is peculiar in its structure. It is an alphabetic psalm (Abecedarius) with an intercalated antiphon. It consists of strophes of twelve lines each. The strophes begin with the letters of the alphabet down as far as V, the antiphon being said at the beginning of the psalm, and after each strophe. The antiphon in question is the line:

"Omnes qui gaudetis de pace, modo verum judicate."

This antiphon the writer himself calls Hypopsalma. The whole is followed by an epilogue, which is an address from the Catholic church exhorting the people to a loyal adherence to her. Such psalms of human composition were sometimes called Psalmi plebeii or vulgares; and in Greek ἰδιωτικοί.

The commanding position which psalmody occupied in the early monastic life cannot be better depicted than in the striking phrase of St. Jerome's about the convent at Bethlehem, "extra psalmos silentium est." St. Ambrose even proposes the example of birds, as a consideration which should lead people to begin and end the day with psalmody: "Quis enim sensum hominis gerens non erubescat sine psalmorum celebritate diem vel inchoare vel claudere; cum etiam minutissmae aves solemni devotione et dulci carmine ortus dierum et noctium persequantur?" (S. Ambr. in Ps. 118.)

In later times we meet with a curious term, which appears to have arisen from this universal obligation to psalmody—Psalmi superpositi. In the Benedictine Rule it denotes certain psalms enjoined for meditation upon itinerant monks, who were too illiterate to read the psalter at large. (See Du Cange, Gloss. s. v. "Superpositi.")

It is sometimes inferred from a passage in St. Augustine, that psalmody was not introduced into the church of Milan until the Arian persecutions in the time of St. Ambrose, "tum hymni et psalmi ut canerentur secundum morem orientalium partium, ne populus maeroris taedio contabesceret, institutum est." (St. Aug. Conf. lib. ix. cap. 7). His meaning, however, probably is not that the use of psalms was hitherto unknown in the Milanese church, but that until this emergency the congregation had not performed them "secundum morem orientalium," i.e. had not sung them antiphonally, and with the people joining in. (See Mabillon de Cursu Gallicano Disquisitio.) Indeed, it will be sufficient to quote the phrase of Augustine himself to shew that the practice of singing the psalms was not confined to any particular church, but was universal, "toto orbe cantantur" (St. Aug. Conf. ix. 4).

Amongst special uses the psalmody of the ancient Gallican church occupies a prominent position. Cardinal Tomasi observes that in more modern times it is represented, subject to certain alterations of detail, by the Mozarabic (or ancient Spanish) rite (Opp. Omnia, tom. iii. praef., Romae, 1748). The rise and progress of psalmody in the Gallican church are described at length by Mabillon (de Cursu Gallicano Disquisitio). It will be seen later in this article that one of the specialities of Gallican psalmody was the use of Gloria Patri at the end of every psalm, as is done at present in the English church. As to the Roman mode of psalmody in early days Mabillon (u. s.) says that it is not easy to define it; but he gives his opinion that it differed in some respects from that laid down in the Benedictine rule. The phrase which Mabillon uses is modus psallendi. By this he probably does not mean the features of execution, that is, whether it was done by a single voice or by many, whether it was responsory or otherwise, but he probably means the choice and assignment of psalm and canticle in the several offices.

Of the condition of psalmody in this country before the arrival of Augustine (A.D. 596) very little is known. Of the British chant we know nothing but from a passage in Gildas, who praises its sweetness (Dei laudes canora Christi tyronum voce suaviter modulantes). Some writers have supposed that the Gallican psalmody was used here by Augustine; but Johnson (Canons, preface, xiii.) refuses to allow this. There are indications, indeed, that considerable pains were bestowed upon the subject in the ancient English church. Bede (Hist. iv. 18) gives an account of the work that was done here in the improvement of psalmody by John, the precentor (archicantor) of St. Peter's at Rome, who came here by command of pope Agatho. So great was the influence of his work that by the council of Cloveshoo (A.D. 747) the Roman psalmody was made of obligation in those parts of the British Islands which were under the jurisdiction of archbishop Cuthbert (can. 13, 15). With respect to the language in which the ancient English church performed their psalmody, authorities seem scarcely to be agreed. Johnson, indeed, admits that for the first 250 years after the arrival of Augustine it was done in Latin for the public service (Canons, preface, xiii.). An ancient MS. in the Cotton library is quoted by Collier (Eccl. Hist. book i. p. 48, vol. i. fol. ed.) to the effect that Germanus and Lupus brought the Gallican Cursus (ordinem cursus Gallorum) to this country in the 5th century. If that be so, the question is settled; for there can be no reasonable doubt either (1) that the term Cursus includes psalmody; or (2) that the psalmody of the Gallican rite was in Latin. On the relation between the Gallican Cursus and ancient English psalmody the reader may consult with advantage bishop Stillingfleet's Origines Britannicae, chap. iv. From that work, which takes in the period before the arrival of Augustine, it may be gathered how little is really known of the practices of Christianity in these islands during the first six centuries.

Upon the ancient distribution of the psalms for the service of the church Gavanti (Thesaurus Sacrorum Rituum, tom. ii. s. ii. cap. i. 3) writes to this effect: Walafrid Strabo reports that, to avoid confusion arising from variety of uses, pope Damasus, at the instance of Theodosius, ordered St. Jerome to arrange the psalms for the several services of day and night; that the distribution was made, was approved by Damasus, and received by the whole church. It is not unreasonable to assume that in the 9th century (Strabo's period) there were extant documents from which it could be inferred that St. Jerome really did make some such distribution as that which is alleged.

Attempts were made to introduce uniformity of use into the psalmody. Thus in the council of Vannes (A.D. 465), "Rectum quoque duximus, ut vel intra provinciam nostram sacrorum ordo et psallendi una sit consuetudo" (Can. 15). The same thing occurs again in the second council of Bracara, which guards against the introduction of private uses from the monasteries. (Conc. Brac. ii. cap. 1.)

The regular psalms that would have occurred in the office of the day were at times set aside in favour of proper psalms. A capitulum of the synod of Aix in the year 817, runs thus: "Ut praetermissis partitionibus psalterii, psalmi speciales pro eleemosynariis et defunctis cantentur" (cap. 50).

It ought to be noticed that in the performance of psalmody the headings or titles of the psalms seem always to have been recited. It is well known that in his popular sermons on the Psalms, St. Augustine often makes a great deal out of the strange words which the English reader commonly passes quite unnoticed. Indeed, he speaks of the title as the herald of the psalm (praeco Psalmi). In this respect Christianity probably followed what had always been (and still is) the usage of the synagogue, where the title is always recited as an integral part of the psalm, when the psalm is used for devotional purposes, either by a single individual or by the assembled multitude.

Mode.—The methods of performing psalmody in the ancient church are reducible to these:—

1. The psalm was executed by a single voice, whilst all the rest of the congregation listened.

2. Sometimes it was done by the whole congregation singing together.

3. The congregation was divided into two parts or choirs, which sang alternate verses.

To these methods some writers add yet another; e.g. Martene (de Eccl. Rit. IV. iii. 7) describes a method which he calls Responsorius. This very common term, however, has another meaning, which we shall consider subsequently. In this method, according to Martene, the cantor or lector recited each verse of the psalm, and then the whole chorus repeated it after he had done. He quotes indeed several passages to establish this; but it may be doubted whether they cannot one and all be otherwise explained.

(a) The method in which a single voice sang and the rest listened was afterwards called Tractus. It is described by Cassian: "Praedictum vero duodenarium psalmorum numerum its dividunt, ut si duo fuerint fratres, senos psallant; si tres, quaternos; si quatuor, ternos. Quo numero nunquam minus in congregatione decantant; ac proinde quantalibet multitudo convenerit, nunquam amplius psallunt in synaxi, quam quatuor fratres" (De Coenobiorum Instit. lib. ii. cap. 11, ad fin. The reason why a psalm was executed sometimes by a single voice and sometimes by the assembly at large is given by St. Augustine: "Ideo in Psalmis aliquando plures cantant, ut ostendatur quia de pluribus fit unus; aliquando unus cantat, ut ostendatur quid fiat de pluribus." (In Jo. Tract. xii.)

(β) Cardinal Thomasius says that when the whole choir sings a psalm together, not alternately, the ancients called this method the "direct" (directus, directaneus). Mention of this is made in the Rule of St. Benedict. It was practised in the Milanese rite, in which at matins one psalm after the chapter was sung in this manner. In the monastic rite the psalms before and after meals were to be said in this manner, without antiphon on ferial days, but with antiphon or alleluia on feasts.

(γ) The antiphonal method seems to be Eastern in its origin. [ANTIPHON, p. 94.]

It is often in the present day debated whether the psalms ought to be sung antiphonally by half verses or by whole verses. It is therefore relevant to observe that in the council of Aix (8th century) a direction is given that they should be sung according to the division of the verses (ut psalmi digne secundum divisiones versuum modulentur); that is, the clergy were not to hurry one verse into the next as if there were no division (Conc. Aquisgr. cap. 70). There is, so far as the present writer knows, no trace in early Christian antiquity of the psalms having been sung by half verses by equal choirs.

(δ) In this part of the subject the word Responsorium demands some notice. There is an ambiguity about it. First, certain psalms were so called from the liturgical position assigned to them. In very early times it appears that the epistle and gospel were divided by a psalm. [GRADUAL.] Psalms appointed for this function were called Responsoria. Bingham quotes this use of the term in the fourth council of Toledo, which complains of the omission of Gloria Patri at the end of such psalms—"Sunt quidam qui in fine responsoriorum Gloria non dicunt." But, secondly, any psalm might be called a responsory psalm, not from the liturgical use of it, but simply from the mode of its performance. St. Isidore of Seville, for instance, applies Responsorium to a psalm that was begun by one voice and taken up by the chorus, "Vocata hoc nomine quod, uno canente, chorus consonando respondeat (De Off. i. 8).

The people seem at times to have done their part most lustily. "The church is well compared to the sea," says St. Ambrose, for "Responsoriis psalmorum, cantu virorum, mulierum, virginum, parvulorum consonans undarum fragor resultat" (Hexem. iii. 5).

The mode of performing psalmody in the East is described by St. Basil the Great. The people, he says, having divided themselves into two parties, perform (ἀντιψάλλουσιν) antiphonally to one another. . . Then, again, having entrusted to one person the duty of incepting the tune, the rest succent (ὑπηχοῦσι) (S. Bas. Mag. Ep. 207, Ad clericos Neocaesarienses). [ANTIPHON, p. 94.] This seems to have been the ordinary method of performing psalmody in St. Chrysostom's part of the church (whether Constantinople or Antioch), for he complains that as soon as they had succented (ὑπηχήσαντες) two or three psalms, they hurried off from church and thought it was enough for their salvation (Hom. xi. in Matt.).

It may be gathered that in very early times there were leaders of the psalmody who became afterwards called κανονάρχαι, and in Latin, praecentores. [PRECENTOR.] One of the most famous examples of this mode of performance is the escape of St. Athanasius when the church was surrounded by Arian soldiers, and he says, "Sitting on my throne, I ordered the deacon to read a psalm and the people to respond (ὑπακούειν al. ὑπηχεῖν), for His mercy endureth for ever" (Ath. Apol. de Fugâ, p. 717, tom. i. ed. Colon. 1686).

In the rule of St. Benedict and elsewhere in connexion with psalmody there is a phrase of very frequent occurrence, psalmum imponere. It means to lead the choir in performing the psalm; as we should say, to set the psalm. By the Capitula of Martin of Bracara (cent. 6) no one was to lead the psalmody (psallere) in the desk unless he had been ordained lector by the bishop (Cap. Mart. Brac. can. 45).

The ritual of the psalmody as it was practised amongst the monks of Egypt is thus described by Cassian, a writer of the 4th century: "Unus in medium psalmos Domino cantaturus exsurgit. Cumque sedentibus cunctis (ut est moris nunc usque in Aegypti partibus) et in psallentis verba omni cordis intentione defixis, undecim psalmos orationum interjectione distinctos contiguis versibus parili pronuntiatione cantasset, duodecimum sub Alleluia responsione consummans, ab universorum oculis repente subtractus, quaestioni pariter et caeremoniis finem imposuit" (De Coenobiorum Instit. lib. ii. cap. 5). From this passage it will be gathered that while the singer of the psalm stood, the others sat down.

From some of the expressions already used it will be gathered that the recital of the psalms was commonly—it would obviously be too much to say always—musical. In this respect they shared the privilege that belonged to other passages of Scripture. So far as we know, it appears that in the Jewish church the Scriptures were never read in the colloquial inflexions of ordinary speech, but were recited with fixed solemn musical intonation. Every word in the Hebrew Bible is accompanied by a mark or accent, which indicates not only the logical position of the word in the sentence, but also the particular musical inflection with which the word is to be recited. That distinction applies to the words of the Book of Psalms as to every other book of Scripture. In such a matter, what every Israelite was familiar with, the Christian Church would be likely to continue. Basil the Great (and after him other writers) explains two of the names that occur in the titles of the psalms as having reference to the mode of their execution. A psalm, he says, is a composition which is instrumentally accompanied (ὅταν εὔρυθμως κατὰ τοὺς ἁρμονικοὺς λόγους κρὸς τὸ ὄργανον κρούηται): a song on the contrary is a melodious utterance without the accompaniment of an instrument (φωνὴ ἐμμελὴς ἀποδιδομένη ἀναρμονίως χωρὶς τῆς συνηχήσεως τοῦ ὀργάνου. Hom in Ps. 29). We may gather from a phrase of St. Basil's that the music with which the psalms were performed was at times as elaborate as the condition of musical art permitted. He says that "harmonious tunes of psalms were devised by us" in order that those who were young in years or character might be attracted and instructed thereby. (S. Bas. Mag. Sermo ii. de Doctrina).

Protests against irreverent methods of psalmody occur from time to time. "Psalmi in ecclesiâ non cursim et excelsis atque inordinatis seu intemperatis vocibus, sed plane ac dilucide et cum compunctione cordis recitentur" (Conc. Aquisgr. c. 137). At one time it seems that the psalmody was even accompanied by gesticulations of the hands (ὀρχήσεις τῶν χειρῶν). (See Balsamon on Conc. Trull. can. 75.) The conditions of good psalmody are well described in a regulation of Louis the Pious: "Psalmi namque in ecclesiâ non cursim et excelsis atque inordinatis intemperatisque vocibus, sed plane ac dilucide et cum compunctione cordis recitentur, ut et recitantium mens illorum dulcedine pascatur et audientium aures illorum pronunciatione demulceantur, quoniam quamvis cantilenae sonus in aliis officiis excelsâ solet edi voce, in recitandis tamem psalmis hujuscemodi vitanda est vox" (Ludovici Pii Reform. Eccl. de Reg. Cleric. cap. xxiv. ap. Melchior Goldastus, ed. Frankf. 1673, tom. iii. p. 217).

Gloria Patri in Psalmody.

(1) For the various forms in which the Doxology has appeared, see DOXOLOGY.

(2) The use of it appears to have differed in the East and West. It is implied by Cassian (Instit. ii. 5) that the use of Gloria Patri as a response at the end of every psalm is a Western practice, whilst in the East, or at least amongst the monks of Egypt, it was only after the antiphon which followed the last psalm that it was said. St. Benedict enjoins that at the end of a psalm Gloria Patri be said "in the Western manner." Some of the longer psalms he divides into two Glorias. This practice of dividing psalms (as we still do the 119th psalm in the English psalter) is referred to in the third council of Narbonne (A.D. 589). "Ut in psallendis ordinibus per quemque psalmum Gloria dicatur omnipotenti Deo, per majores vero psalmos, prout fuerint prolixius, pausationes fiant et per quamque pausationem Gloria Trinitatis Domino decantetur."

The reader will specially observe that the use of Gloria Patri was one of the points which distinguished the Gallican from the Roman rite. The Gallicans said it at the end of every psalm, thus furnishing an early precedent for the rule of the English Prayer Book that "at the end of every psalm . . . shall be repeated this hymn;" but the Romans did not. The authorities may be seen in Collier, Eccl. Hist. book 1, cent. 5.

Versions Used.—It is not within the scope of this work in any way to discuss the character, origin, or authorship of the several versions of the psalms; but one or two points about the use of them may be advanced here.

A long discussion of them is given by Lorinus (Praef. in Pss. cap. xiii.), from whom these facts may be gathered.

At the request of St. Jerome, pope Damasus caused one of his versions of the psalms to be sung in the churches of France—a version which from that use of it has been since known as the Gallican psalter. It should be stated, however, that there is some reason for thinking that it did not generally prevail in the French Church till after this date.

The churches of Rome, including the church of St. Peter's, until long after the period embraced in this work used the old version of the psalms which St. Augustine calls Itala, St. Gregory the Great Vetus, and St. Jerome Vulgata. The psalter used in the church of Milan, and known as the Ambrosian psalter, does not differ materially from this.

On a point about which it is easy to make mistakes it may be well to set before the reader the very words of some accepted authority. Zaccaria, then, says this:—"Duplicis porro Latinae versionis, psalterium habemus, Veteris, quam Italam vocant, a S. Hieronymo, sive Damasi jussu, sive amicorum precibus Romae, sed ut ipse ait cursim emendatae, et Hieronymianae quam scilicet Paullae atque Eustochii votis satisfacturus S. Doctor postea suscepit. Illam Romanam vocant, quod Romae praesertim in usu fuerit; hanc Gallicanam quod hujus versionis psalterium in Gallias finitimasque Germaniae ecclesias inductum fuerit, atque hinc ad alias etiam Italiae ecclesias propagatum. Primae tamen seu Romanae versionis psalterium ad S. Pii V. tempora in omnibus urbis ac suburbicariis intra xl. ab urbe lapidem constitutis ecclesiis retentum est; ab eo autem Pontifice Vulgatae editionis, quae ad Hieronymianam seu Gallicanam interpretationem maxime accedit, psalterium praescriptum, Romae in solâ Vaticanâ S. Mabillon, observing that the Gallican Christians had their own version of the psalms for their psalmody—a version which differs from the Roman psalter—quotes Walafrid Strabo upon the point:—"Psalmos autem cum secundum LXX interpretes Romani adhuc habeant, Galli et Germanorum aliqui secundum emendationem quam Hieronymus pater de LXX editione composuit, psalterium cantant, quam Gregorius Turonensis episcopus a partibus Romanis mutuatam in Galliarum dicitur ecclesias transtulisse" (Wal. Strab. de Rebus Ecclesiasticis, cap. 23). This latter point as to the Gallican version having been introduced into France by Gregory of Tours seems open to some doubt.

This feature of Gallican psalmody—that they had their own version for it—is of some interest to us in England, as the version in question has influenced our psalmody at the present day. It will be observed that the Prayer Book version contains a verse at the end of Ps. 136, "O give thanks unto the Lord of lords; for His mercy endureth for ever," which is not in the Bible version, and which is not found in the Hebrew original. The Gallican Psalter, which now indeed has taken its place in the Vulgate, is the only ancient psalter which contains it.

Posture.—All that we can gather on this branch of the subject is what may be inferred from a few incidental expressions of early writers. From the phrases of Cassian in the passage already quoted, "Unus in medium psalmos Domino cantaturus exsurgit cumque sedentibus cunctis," &c., we have a trace of the executant standing, while the listeners sat. The use of the terms στάσις and κάθισμα, too, as applied to the lesser and greater divisions of the Greek psalter, contain, no doubt, some reference to the posture maintained during and at the close of the psalm, though learned writers are not agreed as to the precise reason for their adoption. Durandus speaks of its being customary to stand for psalmody, assigning a mystical reason for it, "ad ostendendum quod stantes in bonis operibus vincimus" (Rationale, lib. iv. rubr. 2). That this posture was an ancient one may be inferred from the bitter words of St. Jerome, addressed to the recreant deacon Sabinianus: "Tu stabas in choro psalleutium" (Ep. xlviii. in Sabin.). So, again, after the meal had been taken in a recumbent posture, the guests in St. Chrysostom's time were to stand up for the psalmody, which closed the repast (S. Chrys. Hom. in Ps. 41). That the clergy sometimes sat in their stalls during psalmody appears from the account of the bishop of Rouen given by Gregory of Tours, "Cumque inter psallendum formulae decumberet" (Hist. Franc. viii. 31). It was the custom amongst some of the ancient monks to stand during psalmody with outstretched hands pointing to heaven (see Martene, de Antiquis Monachorum Ritibus, I. ii. 56). The greatest care seems to have been necessary to guard against sleep during the services, which were so long in some monasteries. All monks, of course, could not have a book in those days, and so they were even to plait straw in order to keep awake, and one of the brethren walked about the choir with a lantern and thrust it into the face of any one who might be overcome with sleep (Martene, ib.).

One other posture remains to be noticed here—that of leaning upon the staff (reclinatorium), which was a common support in church before the days of seats. The monks of Fulda even complained to Charlemagne about the tyranny of their abbat, that even in the case of the infirm he would allow them the use of neither staff nor stall. The rule of Chrodogang, bishop of Metz (9th century), in prescribing the disciplina psallendi, directs that the clergy should not keep their staves in their hands during psalmody, save on account of bodily infirmity (Reg. Chrod. cap. vii.). Lorinus, while contending for the antiquity of the sitting posture during psalmody (sc. amongst the Egyptian monks, as recorded by Cassian), remarks that in the opinion of some writers the psalms which are called "penitential" were recited kneeling, and the rest of the psalms standing (Praefatio in Pss. cap. xiv.).

Psalmody without Book.—One remarkable effect of the prevalence of psalmody and the scarcity of books was that the psalter was frequently learnt by heart. In the 6th century this is reported by Cyril of Scythopolis to have been done by St. Theodosius. St. Jerome desired that it should be done even by very young people. Sketching the perfect monk, he requires that by such a character it should be learnt word for word (ad Rusticum.) The damsel Pacatula was to commit the psalms to memory at seven years old (ad Gaudentium). No one of the sisters in the Jerusalem convent might be ignorant of the psalter (ad Eustochium). Even the Huns, he says, are learning the psalter (ad Laetam.). Cyril of Scythopolis, in the Life of St. Sabas, says that monks were not admitted till they had learnt the psalter and the rule of psalmody. Hence it was ruled by the second council of Nicaea (can. 2), that no one should be advanced to be a bishop unless he knew the psalter by heart, and that he was to be examined by the metropolitan. Gregory the Great says that he would not ordain John the Presbyter because he did not know the psalms (S. Greg. M. lib. 4, Ep. 45). The same pope would not allow Rusticus the deacon to be made bishop of Ancona for a similar reason. He was a vigilant man, indeed, he said, but according to report, he did not know the psalms.

A curious story of an ineffectual attempt to learn the psalter by heart is told of the archimandrite Theodore, a portion of whose life is given in the Acts of the second council of Nicaea. He had been miraculously cured of an epidemic sickness which had threatened to prove mortal; and on his recovery, apparently by way of thank-offering, he resolved to learn the psalter. He learned the first seventeen psalms; but the eighteenth baffled him, presumably by its length. He was in despair about his task. But prostrating himself on the pavement of an oratory, he prayed for success. At length on rising, he gazed upon the image of the Saviour; he felt in his mouth a taste sweeter than honey; his prayer was granted, and from that moment his task proceeded smoothly till he had learned the entire psalter.

So great was the zeal of holy men for psalmody that wonderful achievements are recorded as to the number of psalms which they recited. St.

Gregory Thaumaturgus passed entire nights in church with prayers and psalmody. St. Isidore had no fixed number of psalms which he said in the service of God, for the night and the day used to be spent upon it. St. Germanus, who was bishop of Paris in the latter half of the 6th century, would say fifty psalms or more before he rose from his bed and called his companions (Vita, ad fin.). Of St. Maur, the disciple of St. Benedict, it is related that he would repeat commonly fifty psalms, often a hundred, and sometimes even the entire psalter before the night office. St. Gregory of Tours (de Glor. Confess. 47) has even a wonderful story of two dead priests miraculously taking part in the psalmody of the choir with the rest of the clergy.

Palaemon, the abbat, would say the whole psalter and the canticles by night without any sound. By the rule of St. Benedict (Reg. c. 18) the whole psalter was to be gone through in the week—a light rule, he urges, seeing that the holy fathers did as much in a single day. In England, also, a similar devotion to the psalter appears to have prevailed. King Egbert even made a vow that besides the psalmody in the canonical offices he would daily chant the whole psalter (Bede, Eccl. Hist. iii. 27).

Laymen seem at one time to have equalled, if not surpassed, the clergy in their zeal for psalmody. A constitution of the emperor Justinian draws from this fact a consideration as to why the clergy should not neglect to say the daily service: "Si enim multi laicorum, ut suae animae consulant, ad ecclesias confluentes studiosi circa psalmodiam ostenduntur, quomodo non fuerit indecens, clericos ad id ordinatos non implere suum munus" (Cod. lib. i. 41).

As a specimen of a very ancient allotment of psalms we subjoin the day and night canons of psalms of Eusebius, which shew what psalms were to be said at the several hours:—

(2) Arrangement of Psalms in the Offices.—This portion of the article confines itself to reciting the contents of the principal arrangements of the Psalter, after it had been definitely distributed for the "Divine Office," the "Opus Dei." It may, however, be permitted to point out the coincidence (surely more than accidental) by which certain psalms have become attached to and associated with certain hours, e.g. (the Western church), 94 [95],[a] as an introductory psalm to the psalmody of the day; and both in East and West, 62 [63], 66 [67], to the early morning; 50 [51], to the early morning and to terce; 56 [57], to sext; 85 [86], to none; 90 [91], to sext or compline; 4 and 133 [134], to nocturns or compline; 19 [20] and 20 [21], to Sunday morning.

We will take the Eastern church first, to follow the order of the article, OFFICE, THE DIVINE.

The Psalter, according to the Greek church, is divided into twenty sections called cathismata [καθίσματα],[b] each of which is subdivided into three staseis [στάσεις],[b] and at the end of each stasis, Gloria is said—

These cathismata are said in the following order:—

From the octave of Easter (ἀντίπασχα) till the Sunday after the octave of the exaltation of the cross [September 14], the Psalter is said once a week, thus:—

On Saturday, at vespers, cathisma	1,
On Sunday, at matins,	2,	3

On Friday, at matins,	16,	17	At vespers,	18
On Saturday, at matins, as before.

Thence onwards to the vigil of Christmas,[c] the same arrangement is followed, except that at vespers on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, cathisma 18 (containing the gradual psalms) is always said, and the cathisma assigned to vespers and those days is added to those for [a] In this article the Psalms are numbered as in the Vulgate. The numbers of the English version are added in [ ].

[b] Cardinal Bona says the sections are called by these names because at each pause in the psalmody (στάσις) the monks rose two and two by turns to recite, and that while they stood, the rest sat.

matins, so that three cathismata are then said. During the same period cathisma 17 is added to those of Sunday. Thence to the Sunday of Tyrophagus, which corresponds to Quinquagesima Sunday, the arrangement according to the table given above. From Sunday of Tyrophagus up to Wednesday before Easter, the Psalter is said twice in the week, thus:—

On Saturday, at vespers, cathisma 1.

On Sunday, at matins, cath. 2, 3, 17.

On Monday, at matins, cath. 4, 5, 6; at terce, 7; at sext, 8; at vespers, 18.

On Tuesday, at matins, cath. 9, 10, 11; at prime, 12; at terce, 13; at sext, 14; at none, 15; at vespers, 18.

On Wednesday, at matins, cath. 16, 19, 20; at prime, 1; at terce, 2; at sext, 3; at none, 4; at vespers, 1°.

On Thursday, at matins, cath. 5, 6, 7; at prime, 8; at terce, 10; at sext, 11, at none, 12; at vespers, 18.

On Friday, at matins, cath. 13, 14, 15; at terce, 19; at sext, 20; at vespers, 18.

On Saturday, at matins, cath. 9, as usual. From Thursday before Easter to the Octave of Easter (exclusive) the Psalter is not said.

The fixed psalms said at the hours in addition to the cathismata are as follows:—[d]

At nocturns (μεσονύκτιον), on Sunday, Ps. 50 [51]; on week days, except Saturday, 50 [51], 118 [119], (i.e. cathisma 17, and known as ὁ ἅμωμος), 120 [121], 133 [134]; on Saturday, 64 [65] to 69 [70] (i.e. cath. 9), 120 [121], 133 [134].

At lauds, Pss. 19 [20], 20 [21]–3, 37 [38], 62 [63], 87 [88], 102 [103], 142 [143] (these six known as the Hexapsalmus), 50 [51], 148, 148, 149 (οἱ αἶνοι).

At prime, 5, 89 [90], 100 [101]. At the mesorion of the first hour, 45 [46], 91 [92], 92 [93].

At terce, 16 [17], 24 [25], 50 [51]. At the mesorion of the third hour, 29 [30], 31 [32], 60 [61].

At sext, 53 [54], 54 [55], 90 [91]. At the mesorion of the sixth hour, 55 [56], 56 [57], 69 [70].

At none, 83 [84], 84 [85], 85 [86]. At the mesorion of the ninth hour, 83 [84], 84 [85], 85 [86]. At the typics (τὰ τυπικά), 102 [103], 145 [146]; 33 [34].

At vespers, 103 [104] (the prooemiac psalm, ψ. προοιμιακόν), 140 [141], 141 [142] (these psalms are known as the Κύριε ἐκέκραξα), 129 [130], 116 [117], 122 [123].

At great compline, 4, 6, 12 [13], 24 [25], 30 [31], 90 [91]; 50 [51], 101 [102], 109 [110], 142 [143].

At little compline, 50 [51], 69 [70], 142 [143].

The Armenian church divides the Psalter into eight sections, called canons, as follows:—

I. contains Pss. 1–17	[18].
II.	18 [19]–35	[36].
III.	36 [37]–54	[55].
IV.	55 [56]–71	[72].
V.	72 [73]–98	[99].
VI.	99 [100]–105	[106].
VII.	106 [107]–118	[119].
VIII.	119 [120]–150.

[d] These have been mentioned in the article, THE DIVINE OFFICE, but for completeness they are here inserted.

These canons are divided among the daily services, so that the Psalter is gone through once a week, and in monasteries every day in the following order:—During nocturns, sections or canons, 1, 2; after nocturns and before lauds, 3, 4, 5; at terce, 6; at sext, 7; and at none, 8.

The following psalms are also appointed for the hours:—

At nocturns (called midnight), Pss. 3, 87 [88], 102 [103], 142 [143].

At lauds (called daybreak), 89 [90] (v. 14: "O satisfy us with Thy mercy," to end), 50 [51], 148 [149], 150, 112 [113]–5, 114 [116, vv. 1–9], 129 [130], 53 [54], 85 [86] (last two verses).

At prime (called sunrise), 71 [72] (v. 19 to end), 91 [92], 62 [63], 64 [65], 21 [22], 142 [143] (v. 8 to end), 44 [45], 69 [70], 85 [86] (last two verses).

At terce, 50 [51], 21 [22], 142 [143] (v. 8 to end).

At sext, 40 [41] (first four verses), 90 [91].

At none, 50 [51], 114 [116, vv. 1–9], 115 [116, v. 9 to end], 116 [117].

At vespers, certain verses from the Psalms: Pss. 85 [86], 139 [140], 140 [141], 141 [142], 120 [121], 90 [91], 122 [123], 53 [54].

Compline (called peace or rest) is double. The former is said in church immediately after vespers; the latter is said by each individual in private at the end of twilight.

At the former compline are said Pss. 87 [88] (vv. 1, 2, 4, 6), 12 [13], 15 [16], 16 [17], 41 [42], 69 [70], 85 [86] (last two verses), 26 [27].

At the latter, 42 [43] (3 to end); the following four sections from Ps. 118 [119]: "Et veniat super me"; "Memor esto servi tui"; "Iniquos odio habui"; "Appropinquet deprecatio"; 35 [36] (9 to end), 90 [91], 122 [123], 53 [54], 150, 137 [138] (last two verses), 141 [142] (6 to end), 85 [86] (last two verses), 4.

In the Western church the three most important distributions of the Psalter are, (1) the Gregorian, (2) the Benedictine, (3) the Ambrosian, called respectively after the names of their reputed authors, and all, with change of detail only, in use at the present time. Of these, the Gregorian is the Psalter of the secular breviary of the Roman obedience, the Benedictine that of the monastic, and the Ambrosian that of the diocese of Milan. Hence the two former, from their wide-spread adoption, are practically of most importance.

Taking them in order:—

(1) The Gregorian or Roman Psalter.

The following is the distribution "juxta antiquiorem psallendi modum Ecclesiae Romanae, ex antiquis monumentis excerpta," as given by Thomasius, and with the exception of two points, which will be noticed in their place, is still that of the present Roman breviary.

On Sunday, at matins, Ad vigilias in primo galli cantu, 94 [95] (said daily); in nocturn 1, Pss. 1, 2, 3, 6, 7, 8, 9 [9 and 10], 10 [11], 12 [13], 14 [15]; in nocturn 2, 15 [16], 16 [17], 17 [18]; in nocturn 3, 18 [19], 19 [20], 20 [21].

At lauds ("Ad matutinos diluculo"), 92 [93], 99 [100], 62 [63], and 66 [67], said as one psalm under one Gloria, Benedicite[e] ("Benedictiones sive canticum trium puerorum"), 148, 149, 150, said under one Gloria, and called Laudes, Benedictus ("Canticum evangelicum Zacharine").

At prime, 21 [22], 22 [23], 23 [24], 24 [25], 25 [26], 53 [54], 117 [118], 118 [119]. (1) "Beati immaculati"; (2) "In quo corriget" (said under one Gloria); (3) "Retribue"; (4) "Adhaesit," under one gloria," Athanasian Creed ("Fides Catholica S. Athanasii Episcopi").

[In the later revisions of the Roman breviary, Pss. 21 [22]—25 [26] are not said on Sunday at prime, but are thus said on the several week days:—On Monday, Ps. 23 [24]; on Tuesday, 24 [25]; on Wednesday, 25 [26]; on Thursday, 22 [23]; on Friday, 21 [22]. This is the first change above alluded to. In the Sarum and other English breviaries the old arrangement by which these psalms were all said on Sunday was adhered to.]

On Sundays from Septuagesima to Palm Sunday inclusive, the following changes are made:—

At lauds, instead of the two Psalms, 92 [93], and 99 [100], 50 [51] and 117 [118] are said.

At prime, instead of 117 [118], 92 [93] is said.

At terce, 118 [119] ((5) "Legem pone," and (6) "Et veniat"; (7) "Memor esto," and (8) "Portio mea"; (9) "Bonitatem," and (10) "Manus tuæ," under three glorias).

At sext, 118 [119] ((11) "Defecit," and (12) "In æternum"; (13) "Quomodo," and (14) "Lucerna"; (15) "Iniquos," and (16) "Feci," under three glorias).

At none, 118 [119] ((17) "Mirabilia," and (18) "Justus es"; (19) "Clamavi," and (20) "Vide"; (21) "Principes," and (22) "Appropinquet," under three glorias).

These psalms are said daily at terce, sext, and none, whatever be the office.

At vespers, 109 [110], 110 [111], 111 [112], 112 [113], 113 [114 and 115]. Magnificat.

At compline, 4, 90 [31], vv. 1–6, 90 [91], 133 [134], Nunc dimittis. These psalms are said daily at compline, whatever be the office.

On Monday, at matins (in the nocturn), 26 [27], 27 [28], 28 [29], 29 [30], 30 [31], 31 [32], 32 [33], 33 [34], 34 [35], 35 [36], 36 [37], 37 [38].

At lauds, 50 [51], 5, 62 [63] and 66 [67] (said under one gloria), Song of Isaiah ("Confitebor," Is. xii.), 148, 149, 150 (said under one gloria), Benedictus.

At prime, 53 [54], 118 [119] (the first four sections, said under two glorias as on Sunday).

[These psalms are said on every week day, whether a festival or not, except where specially directed.]

At vespers, 114 [116, vv. 1–9], 115 [116, ver. 10 to end], 116 [117], 119 [120], 120 [121], Magnificat.

[On ordinary week days throughout the year, except in Eastertide, at all the hours except nocturns, Ps. 50 [51] is said with intercessory prayers (in precibus).]

N.B.—In the later revisions of the breviary this is no longer the case. Preces (curtailed) are only said in Advent, Lent, and on a few other days of fasting, in which Ps. 129 [130] is said at lauds, and 50 [51] at vespers. At the little hours no psalm is said at preces. Here also the English, which were not subject to this revision, retained the old arrangement. This is the second of the two points changed, which were mentioned at the outset as alone of any importance.

On Tuesday, at matins, in the nocturn, 38 [39], 39 [40], 40 [41], 41 [42], 43 [44], 44 [45], 45 [46], 46 [47], 47 [48], 48 [49], 49 [50], 51 [52].

At lauds, 50 [51], 42 [43], 62 [63], and 66 [67] (said as one, as before), Song of Hezekiah ("Ego dixi," Is. xxxviii. 10), 148, 149, 150 (as before), Benedictus.

At vespers, 121 [122], 122 [123], 123 [124], 124 [125], 125 [126], Magnificat.

On Wednesday, at matins, 52 [53], 54 [55], 55 [56], 56 [57], 57 [58], 58 [59], 59 [60], 60 [61], 61 [62], 63 [64], 65 [66], 67 [68].

At lauds, 50 [51], 64 [65], 62 [63], and 66 [67], The Song of Hannah ("Exsultavit," 1 Sam. ii.), 148, 149, 150, Benedictus.

At vespers, 126 [127], 127 [128], 128 [129], 129 [130], 130 [131], Magnificat.

On Thursday, at matins, 68 [69], 69 [70], 70 [71], 71 [72], 72 [73], 73 [74], 74 [75], 75 [76], 76 [77], 77 [78], 78 [79], 79 [80].

At lauds, 50 [51], 89 [90], 62 [63], and 66 [67], The Song of Moses ("Cantemus," Ex. xv.), 148, 149, 150, Benedictus.

At vespers, 131 [132], 132 [133], 134 [135], 135 [136], 136 [137], Magnificat.

On Friday, at matins, 80 [81], 81 [82], 82 [83], 83 [84], 84 [85], 85 [86], 86 [87], 87 [88], 88 [89], 93 [94], 95 [96], 96 [97].

At lauds, 50 [51], 142 [143], 62 [63], and 66 [67], The Song of Habakkuk ("Domine audivi," Hab. iii.), 148, 149, 150, Benedictus.

At vespers, 137 [138], 138 [139], 139 [140], 140 [141], 141 [142], Magnificat.

On Saturday, at matins, 97 [98], 98 [99], 99 [100], 100 [101], 101 [102], 102 [103], 103 [104], 104 [105], 105 [106], 106 [107], 107 [108], 108 [109].

At lauds, 50 [51], 91 [92], 62 [63], and 66 [67], The Song of Moses ("Attende coelum," Deut. xxxii.), 148, 149, 150, Benedictus.

At vespers, 143 [144], 144 [145], 145 [146], 146 [147, vv. 1–11], 147 [147, ver. 12 to end], Magnificat.

The outline of the scheme is thus seen to be very simple. The psalms from 1 to 108 [109] are said in order at matins, and the remainder, from 109 [110] to the end, at vespers, throughout the week, omitting those psalms which are said at other hours, and are thus distributed:—

On Sunday, at matins, in the first nocturn, twelve psalms; in the second and third, three psalms in each.

On week days, twelve psalms said in one nocturn.

At vespers, five psalms are said daily.

For the other hours, at lauds, five psalms [i.e. what reckons as five] are said daily.

At prime, three daily, with additional psalms on Sunday.

At terce, sext, and none, three daily.

At compline, four daily.

In addition, Benedictus is said daily at lauds, as are Magnificat at vespers and Nunc dimittis at compline.

Into the festal arrangements of the Psalter it is not necessary to enter. The chief variations are the following:—

In festivals of nine lessons, nine psalms taken from the matin psalms are said at matins in three nocturns of three psalms each, instead of the psalms in course.

At lauds and vespers, the Sunday psalms are for the most part said, instead of the psalms in course. At vespers on festivals, Ps. 116 [117] is often substituted for the last Sunday psalm, 113 [114 and 115]. Earlier usage assigned special psalms for lauds and vespers much more rarely than was afterwards the case.

(2) The Benedictine or Monastic Psalter.

The germ of the monastic rite is supposed to have been derived from the solitaries of Egypt. St. Benedict framed a rite for monks, which was approved by Gregory the Great, and henceforth adopted for the use of monastic congregations. It is used, with slight modifications of detail, by the Cistercians, Carthusians, and other monastic orders. The so-called mendicant orders use the secular breviary.

The main idea, so to speak, of the distribution of the Psalter is the same as that of the Gregorian office, that the Psalter should be said once a week, but the order in which it is said differs in many important points. Dealing here with the psalms only, the following is the general outline of this office:—

At matins on Sundays there are three nocturns; in each of the first two, six psalms are said; and in the third, three canticles. Week days have twelve psalms, said in two nocturns.

At lauds, five (i.e. what count as five) psalms are said.

At each of the lesser hours, three, at vespers four, and at compline three psalms are said.

The following is the distribution:—

On Sunday, at matins, Pss. 3, 94 [95] (these two psalms are said daily); in nocturn 1:—20 [21], 21 [22], 22 [23], 23 [24], 24 [25], 25 [26]; in nocturn 2:—26 [27], 27 [28], 28 [29], 29 [30], 30 [31], 31 [32]; in nocturn 3, three canticles.

At lauds, 66 [67], 50 [51] (these two psalms are said daily), 117 [118], 62 [63] (these two counting as one), Benedicite, 148, 149, 150 (as one), Benedictus.

In Eastertide, and on certain other festivals when they fall on Sundays, instead of Pss. 50 [51] and 117 [118], these two, 92 [93] and 99 [100], are said.

At prime, 118 [119] ("Beati"—"In quo corriget"—"Retribue"—"Adhaesit"—said as four).

At terce, 118 [119] "Legem pone"—"Et veniat"—"Memor esto."

At sext, 118 [119] "Portio mea"—"Bonitatem"—Manus tuae."

At none, 118 [119] "Defecit"—"In aeternum"—"Quomodo"—said as three.

At vespers, 109 [110], 110 [111], 111 [112], 112 [113], Magnificat.

At compline, 4, 90 [91], 133 [134]. These psalms are said daily throughout the year. On the three days before Easter 30 [31] vv. 1–6, and Nunc dimittis are added.

On Monday, at matins, in nocturn 1:—32 [33], 33 [34], 34 [35], 36 [37] (said in two parts, vv. 1–26, and ver. 27 to end), 37 [38].

In nocturn 2:—38 [39], 39 [40], 40 [41], 41 [42], 43 [44], 44 [45].

At lauds, 66 [67], 50 [51], 5, 35 [36], Song of Isaiah (Is. xii.), 148, 149, 150, Benedictus.

At prime, 1, 2, 6.

At terce, 118 [119] "Lucerna"—"Iniquos"—"Feci."

At sext, 118 [119] "Mirabilia"—"Justus es"—"Clamavi."

At none, 118 [119] "Vide"—"Principes"—"Appropinquet."

At vespers, 113 [114 and 115], 114 [116, vv. 1–8] 115 [116, ver. 9 to end], and 116 [117] (as one), 128 [129], Magnificat.

On Tuesday, at matins, in nocturn 1:—45 [46], 46 [47], 47 [48], 48 [49], 49 [50], 51 [52].

In nocturn 2:—52 [53], 53 [54], 54 [55], 55 [56], 57 [58], 58 [59].

At lauds, 66 [67], 50 [51], 42 [43], 56 [57], Song of Hezekiah (Is. xxxviii.), 148, 149, 150, Benedictus.

At prime, 7, 8, 9 (to "non peribit in finem"), [9, vv. 1–18].

At terce, 119 [120], 120 [121], 121 [122].

At sext, 122 [123], 123 [124], 124 [125].

At none, 125 [126], 126 [127], 127 [128].

These psalms are said at terce, sext, and none, on Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday.

At vespers, 129 [130], 130 [131], 131, [132], 132 [133], Magnificat.

On Wednesday, at matins, in nocturn 1:—59 [60], 60 [61], 61 [62], 65 [66], 67 (pt.) [68, vv. 1–18], 67 (pt.) [68, ver. 19 to end].

In nocturn 2:—68 (pt.) [69, vv. 1–16], 68 (pt.) [69, ver. 17 to end], 69 [70], 70 [71], 71 [72], 72 [73].

At lauds, 66 [67], 50 [51], 63 [64], 64 [65], Song of Hannah (1 Sam. ii.), 148, 149, 150, Benedictus.

At prime, 9 (pt.) [9, ver. 19 to end, and 10], 10 [11], 11 [12].

At vespers, 134 [135], 135 [136], 136 [137], 137 [138], Magnificat.

On Thursday, at matins, in nocturn 1:—73 [74], 74 [75], 76 [77], 77 [78] (in two), 78 [79].

In nocturn 2:—79 [80], 80 [81], 81 [82], 82 [83], 83 [84], 84 [85].

At lauds, 66 [67], 50 [51], 87 [88], 89 [90], Song of Moses (Ex. xv.), 148, 149, 150, Benedictus.

At prime, 12 [13], 13 [14], 14 [15].

At vespers, 138 [139] (in two), 139 [140], 140 [141], Magnificat.

On Friday, at matins, in nocturn 1:—85 [86], 86 [87], 88 [89] (in two). 92 [93], 93 [94].

In nocturn 2:—95 [96], 96 [97], 97 [98], 98 [99], 99 [100], 100 [101].

At lauds, 66 [67], 50 [51], 75 [76], 91 [92], Song of Habakkuk (Hab. iii.) (in three divisions), 148, 149, 150, Benedictus.

At prime, 15 [16], 16 [17], 17 [18] (1–24).

At vespers, 141 [142], 143 [144] (in two), 144 [145] (1–9), Magnificat.

On Saturday, in nocturn 1:—101 [102], 102 [103], 103 [104] (in two), 104 [105] (in two).

In nocturn 2:—105 [106] (in two), 106 [107] (in two), 107 [108], 108 [109].

At lauds, 66 [67], 50 [51], 142 [143], Song of Moses (Deut. xxxii.) (in two divisions), 148, 149, 150, Benedictus.

At prime, 17 [18] (25, "Cum sancto," to end), 18 [19], 19 [20].

At vespers, 144 [145] (10, "Confiteantur," to end), 145 [146], 146 [147, vv. 1–11], 147 [147, ver. 12 to end], Magnificat.

The general plan then is this:—

Pss. 1–19 [20] are said at prime on week days, beginning on Monday, three each day.

Pss. 20 [21]—108 [109], are said at nocturns throughout the week, beginning on Sunday, twelve each day, said in two nocturns of six psalms each.

Pss. 108 [109] to end are said at vespers throughout the week, four each day.

Psalms which are said in other parts of the office are omitted when they occur in course.

Ps. 118 [119] is said at prime on Sunday, and at terce, sext, and none on Sunday and Monday.

Certain of the gradual psalms are said at terce, sext, and none daily on each of the other week days.

Pss. 3 and 94 [95] are said daily before nocturns.

Pss. 66 [67], 50 [51], 148, 149, 150, are said daily at lauds.

Benedictus is said daily at lauds, and Magnificat daily at vespers.

In comparing these two great psalters of the Western church, the Benedictine arrangement appears somewhat inferior in simplicity to the Gregorian. The reason for beginning the psalms on Monday at prime is not obvious, and the division of the longer psalms into parts, so as to equalize in some degree the length of the psalmody on different days, while the number of psalms is the same, is not without awkwardness when the divisions of a psalm fall into different days (see prime and vespers for Friday and Saturday). The distribution of the psalms for the little hour is also less natural. On the other hand, there is a greater variety in the psalms at lauds, though one misses the daily use of Ps. 62 [63], and the psalms at nocturns are more nearly of the same length than in the Gregorian Psalter.

(3) We come now to the Ambrosian Psalter, equally venerable and interesting with the two preceding and more curious, and still a living rite, though of much less practical importance, owing to the small area over which it is used. In its main features, it is doubtless the work of St. Ambrose, and shows Eastern influences.

The chief peculiarity in this rite is the arrangement of the matin psalms (1–108 [109]), which are divided into ten decuriae, and are gone through in the course of a fortnight. Each decuria is divided into three nocturns, and is said under three antiphons, one to each nocturn; and gloria is said only at the end of each nocturn. The decuriae are as follows:—

Decuria I.	Pss. 1–16 [17].
II.	17 [18]–30 [31].
III.	31 [32]–40 [41].
IV.	41 [42]–50 [51].
V.	51 [52]–60 [61].
VI.	61 [62]–70 [71].
VII.	71 [72]–80 [81].
VIII.	81 [82]–90 [91].
IX.	91 [92]–100 [101].
X.	101 [102]–108 [109].

The name decuria is plainly derived from the fact that they all, with the exception of the first, second, and tenth, contain ten psalms. Psalms which are said in other parts of the office are also said in course.

The psalms at matins are thus arranged:—

There is no invitatory psalm, but in its place the first part of the Song of the three Children (called Benedictus, as distinguished from the second part, known as Benedicite). This is said daily.

On Sunday no psalms are said; but three canticles, one in each nocturn.

Matins, on Sunday, in nocturn 1, Song of Isaiah ("De nocte vigilat," Is. xxvi.); in nocturn 2, Song of Hannah (1 Sam. ii.); in nocturn 3, in winter, Song of Habakkuk (Hab. iii.); in summer, Song of Jonah (Jon. ii.).

On Monday in the first week . (Feria 2ª in Hebdomada 1ª.)	Decuria I.
Tuesday	II.
Wednesday	III.
Thursday	IV.
Friday	V.
Saturday, in nocturn 1, Song of Moses (Ex. xv.); in nocturns 2 and 3, Ps. 118 [119], 1–88, said consecutively, but divided into parts, one in each nocturn.
On Monday in the second week .	Decuria VI.
Tuesday	VII.
Wednesday	VIII.
Thursday	IX.
Friday	X.
Saturday, in nocturn 1, Song of Moses (as in first week); in nocturns 2 and 3, Ps. 118 [119], 89 ("In æternum") to end, said as in the first week.

The first decuria is said on Monday after Septuagesima Sunday. The regular course is interrupted by holy week (called authentic week) and Easter week. Dec. i. is said on Monday after Low Sunday (Fer. 2ª post albas). The course is again interrupted by Whitsunday and Corpus Christi, with their octaves, and on the Friday after the octave of Corpus Christi, Dec. x. is said; and so on.

Lauds. On Sundays, Benedictus (Song of Zacharias), Song of Moses ("Cantemus," Ex. xv.), Benedicite, Pss. 148, 149, 150, 116 [117], a direct psalm ("Psalmus directus"), so called because said straight through and not antiphonally, and sometimes a psalm of four verses, so called because four verses only, almost always the first four, are said.

On week days (except Saturdays), Benedictus, Pss. 50 [51], 148, 149, 150, 116 [117], a direct psalm, and a psalm of four verses.

On Saturdays, Benedictus, Pss. 117 [118], 148, 149, 150, 116 [117], a direct psalm, and a psalm of four verses.

The direct psalms are these. They are the same for both weeks.

Sunday, 92 [93] (said also on festivals). Monday, 53 [54]. Tuesday, 66 [67]. Wednesday, 69 [70]. Thursday, 112 [113]. Friday, 142 [143]. Saturday, 89 [90].

The psalms of four verses are:—

Monday, in the first week, 5, vv. 1–4; in the second week, 83 [84], vv. 1–4. Tuesday (in both weeks), 87 [88], vv. 1–4. Wednesday, 66 [67], vv. 1–4. Thursday, 62 [63], vv. 1–4. Friday, 107 [108], vv. 1–4. Saturday, 88 [89], vv. 1–4.

On ordinary Sundays there is no psalm of four verses. The psalms at the other hours are nearly the same as the Gregorian for the same hours, and were doubtless taken from that psalter.

Prime, 53 [54], 118 [119] (first four sections, said as two), Athanasian Creed (said daily, and headed Symbolum).

These psalms are said daily on Sundays and week days. In the week day office ("in officio feriali") 50 [51] is said also "in precibus."

Terce, 118 [119] (next six sections, said as three, as in the Gregorian Psalter). Also in the week day office, 50 [51], "in precibus."

Sext, 118 [119] (next six sections, said as three). In the week day office, 56 [57], "in precibus."

None, 118 [119] (next, and last, six sections, said as three). In the week day office, 85 [86], "in precibus."

Vespers. The daily psalms, including Magnificat, are the same as the Gregorian, with the addition of a psalm of four verses on week days, and in special seasons on Sundays. These are—on Monday, 8, vv. 1–4. Tuesday, 14 [15], vv. 1–4. Wednesday, 30 [31], vv. 1–4. Thursday, 36 [37], vv. 1–4. Friday, 74 [75], vv. 1–4. Saturday, 91 [92], vv. 1–4.

Compline. The daily psalms are 4, 30 [31], vv. 1–6, 90 [91], 132 [133], 133 [134], 116 [117], Nunc dimittis, and in the week day office 12 [13], "in precibus."

There is no distinction between the weeks in any of the hours but matins and lauds.

The festal arrangement of psalms differs in the following points. The psalms at matins are unchanged except on a few special days and seasons, when a complicated series of psalms and extracts of psalms, of varying number, and not arranged according to their order in the Psalter, is said.

On vespers, at festivals, instead of the psalms in course, two psalms, the latter followed by 133 [134] and 116 [117], the three said under one gloria, are said at different parts of the office.

The direct psalms, and psalms of four verses, vary. The psalms throughout are said according to the old Italian version ("Veterem septuaginta versionem"), as in the breviary of the canons of the Vatican Basilica at Rome.

It will not have escaped notice, as bearing upon the connexion of the church of Milan with the East, that the decuria of the Ambrosian rite have a close family likeness to the cathismata of the Eastern church, and that the psalms said "in precibus" at the third, sixth, and ninth hours are among those said at the corresponding hours in the Eastern Psalter. The difference between the office for Saturday and that for other days of the week is strong evidence of such connexion.

The Mozarabic rite has the strange peculiarity, that the psalms are never said in course. In the first three weeks of Lent, and on a few other days psalms are said at terce, sext, and none instead of the fixed psalms, three at each hour; and a psalm is said at vespers, but the order in which they are taken is very irregular, and while many psalms are frequently repeated, nothing like the whole psalter is said. This peculiarity is so unlike what is found in any other known rite that some have conjectured that the distribution of the psalms as said in regular course has dropped out of the breviary as we possess it; and that in its present shape it only contains the fixed psalms at the daily hours and those for special days. This, however, as far as we are aware, is pure conjecture.

The following are the psalms assigned to the several hours. The psalms are said after the old version, and not after the Vulgate.

At matins, Pss. 3, 50 [51], 56 [57], or one of them.

At lauds, a canticle (varying), Benedictus (i.e. an abridgment of both parts of the Song of the Three Children) not said "in feria", 148, 149, 150.

At aurora (said before prime on week days, throughout the year, "in diebus feriis per totum annum"), 69 [70], 118 [119] ("Beati immaculati"—"In quo corriget"—"Retribue").

At prime, 66 [67], 144 [145] (in two), 112 [113], 119 [118] ("Adhaesit pavimento"—"Legem pone"—"Et veniat"), and on Sunday and festivals, Te Deum.

At terce, 94 [95], 118 [119] ("Memor esto"—"Portio mea"—"Bonitatem").

At sext, 52 [53], 118 [119] ("Feci judicium"—"Mirabilia"—"Justus es Domine").

At none, 145 [146], 121 [122], 122 [123], 123 [124].

At vespers (no psalms on ordinary Sundays and week days).

At compline, 4 (two last verses), 133 [134], 90 [91].

The later Western arrangements of the Psalter, such as those of Cardinal Quignon, or of the reformed French breviaries, besides being of less interest, are not within our limits of time.

[H. J. H.]

PSALTER. When we call to mind the use which has been made of the Psalms in both Jewish and Christian churches, we must expect to find distinct volumes containing them. Thus there are in the Bodleian Library alone eleven Hebrew MSS. containing the Psalms without any other book, and in the main without note or commentary. It would seem evident that these MSS. were prepared for devotional use.

2. And so we find, even in the west of Europe, a few early MSS. containing the Psalms in Greek. The most famous and the most beautiful of these is the Greek Psalter, in the Stadt-Bibliothek at Zürich, which Tischendorf reproduced in his Anecdota Sacra. In this, as in all other Greek Psalters, according to Zaccaria (Bibliotheca Ritualis, p. 80, ed. 1776), the Psalms are followed by the ten canticles of the Greek church, as they are also in the Alexandrine MS. Tischendorf mentions six such psalters. Of these the Veronese contains the Magnificat but not the song of Zachariah or of Simeon. The Zürich MS. contains the ὕμνος ἑωθινός of the Alexandrine MS. and the three canticles from St. Luke. The others contain (apparently) the three canticles. Sometimes, as in the Veronese Psalter, Isaiah xxvi. 9–20 is displaced for the hymn in Isaiah v. 1–9. (See CANTICLES.)

3. The Greek Psalms were used in some of the monastic churches of Italy, and possibly of France, even as late as the 8th century, after these churches had become otherwise thoroughly Latinized. For this purpose copies of the Greek Psalms were made in which were reproduced the Greek words in Latin letters; thus—"Meta su e arche en imera tes dynameos su en te lamprotete ton agion." The oldest MS. of this character extant is the famous Veronese Psalter to which we have already referred. It is supposed to be of the 6th century. Its contents are printed by Bianchini in his Vindiciæ, with a facsimile of two pages. The Septuagint, in Latin letters, is on the left page, the old "Itala" on the right. It contains the apocryphal Psalm Pusillus eram in Greek and Latin, but this (in Bianchini's opinion) was added by a writer of the 7th century.

Another famous psalter forms part of the Codex Seguerianus, the Paris manuscript of Cyprian (St. Germain des Près, 186, now Paris, 10,592). The Psalter was considered by the Benedictines to be of the 7th century.[a] It contains the Greek, and a Latin version "very different from ours" (Nouveau Traité, tom. iii. p. 55, note), in two columns. There is the latter portion of another psalter, Greek and Latin, at St. Gall. (No. 17); this is of the 10th century. It contains the Canticles, and also the Lord's Prayer and Apostles' Creed, and also a Litany in Greek and Latin.

4. The Library of St. Germain des Près contained a beautiful MS., which, according to tradition, belonged to St. Germanus himself; the vellum is coloured purple. The letters are silver, except that the names of God are in gold; it is now in the National Library in France, No. 11,947. A facsimile is given by Silvestre, vol. ii. plate 113. It is considered possibly to be of the 6th century (see Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartes, series vi. vol. iii. p. 343). It is represented as having the famous words—"Dominus regnavit a ligno" (Psalm xcv.), whence it would appear that it contains either the old translation, or what is called the Roman version of Jerome. This Roman version was the result of Jerome's first attempt to correct the translation current in his day, which he did, according to his own account, after the Septuagint "licet cursim" (Migne, xxix. 121). This was done at the request of pope Damasus; and it was in use at Rome for some centuries, and is still used at the Vatican Basilica. Indeed, the Canticles of the modern Breviary follow this version. It seems to have been brought into England with St. Augustine, and so was used at Canterbury. Copies are found in the British Museum, Vespasian A. 1 (to be described just now); Regius II. B. 5; and also in the Cambridge Psalter, Ff. i. 23.

5. The Psalter, Vespasian A. 1, has peculiar interest. By comparing it, page by page, with the account of a volume described by Thomas of Elmham, as having been placed "super tabulam magni altaris,"[b] at the church of the great monastery of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, there can be no doubt that it is the one that is so described; the contents correspond exactly in the two, although unfortunately the modern paging, which differs from the original reckoning of the folia, produces some confusion. It begins with the tract "Omnis scriptura divinitus inspirata," which is followed by the letter of Damasus to Jerome, and Jerome's reply. Then it contains an account of the various books into which the Psalms are divided: this and other similar matters fill up the first ten leaves. According to the account of Thomas, the eleventh leaf began with the text of the Psalter, having on it a picture of "Samuel the Priest." This leaf has been torn out, and so the first Psalm is missing, the next leaf beginning with Psalm ii. v. 4, "Qui habitat." The picture of Christ, which is now placed at the beginning of the volume, was clearly inserted at the binding, when the old silver figure of our Lord was removed. There are a few curious drawings in the volume, and at the end of Psalm cl. there comes, apparently on an inserted leaf, the apocryphal Psalm "Pusillus eram." The canticles for the various days of the week follow, and the hymn "Benedicite." After that we have the song of Zachariah, the "Magnificat," and three old hymns: "Splendor paternæ" for the matins, "Creator omnium" for vespers, and the "Rex eterne" for Sundays. Here the original volume ended, but appended to it, at a confessedly later date, we find the "Te Deum," the "Fides Catholica," and a few prayers. This volume has of course attracted great attention. Some account of it will be found in Professor Westwood's Palaeographia Sacra, No. 40, and in the same writer's Miniatures, p. 10, plate 3. The early part of this MS. is supposed to be of the 8th century, and so falls within our date. (It is sometimes spoken of as St. Augustine's Psalter.) The others which we have mentioned are assigned to the 10th and 11th respectively.

6. In the public library at Rouen there is a psalter which belonged originally to the abbey of St. Evroult in Normandy, and from that passed to the church of St. Ouen. An account of this is given in Silvestre, vol. iv., and in Prof. Westwood's Miniatures, p. 81. The Benedictines (Nouveau Traité, ii. 226) considered it to be of the 7th or 8th century; Prof. Westwood of the 10th. It contains the two more recent translations of Jerome in parallel columns, the one which he corrected from the Septuagint version of Origen's Hexapla, and which, from its obtaining use north of the Alps, is called the Gallican Psalter and has subsequently been adopted in the Vulgate; the other, which he took direct from the Hebrew, and is therefore called the Hebraic. A marginal note, considered to be of the 11th century, has been found in the volume: "Hoc psalterium anglicum est, ut ipsa littera manifestat" (Nouveau Traité, p. 383).

Of the Gallican Psalter we have numerous copies, because this version was adopted in the writing-schools of Charlemagne, after orders were given that every priest should possess his own psalter. There are several volumes containing this version, of remarkable beauty and interest. One is in the library at Vienna (No. 1861), and is supposed to have been prepared by the order of Charlemagne for presentation to the pope Hadrian I. Of this there is a long account in Kolzar's Catalogue, vol. i. pp. 347–415, and a facsimile in Silvestre, ii. 126; see, too, Denis, i. xxviii. Of another beautiful copy notice has been given by the Palaeographical Society (see Plates lxix, lxx. xciii.); this seems to have belonged to the emperor Lothair, A.D. 825. A third is in the great library at Paris (1152), and retains still the beautiful ivory plaques which formed its original binding. This belonged to Charles the Bald (see Silvestre, ii. 129, 131). Another of almost equal beauty is in the Douce collection at Oxford (No. 59), and a fifth is in the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge (No. 272, O. 5. It belonged to a certain count Achadeus). The same Gallican version is found in the celebrated psalter Claudius C. vii., which belonged to the Cotton collection, but is now in the library at Utrecht. The Vienna copy has much prefatory matter, corresponding in some degree to that in Vespasian A. 1, including, however, the creeds of St. Gregory of Rome, St. Gregory of Neocaesarea, of "Jerome" and St. Ambrose, together with the genuine Nicene creed. They all, or almost all, contain the full series of Canticles, the "Te Deum," the "Quicunque vult," the "Lord's Prayer," and the Apocryphal psalm.* The MSS. assigned to Lothair and Charles the Bald, and that in the C. C. C. library, contain litanies by which, indeed, their original ownership is established. There is another MS. in the library at Paris, No. 13,159, which contains the same Gallican version, together with prayers belonging to each psalm, and copies of two litanies, of which one is called "Litania calula," and the other "Litania Gallica." If this MS. is contemporary with the litanies it contains, we must assign it to some date between A.D. 795 and 800. It is probably later. It contains the Athanasian creed.

[a] Later writers say of the 8th century.

[b] The position of the volumes mentioned by Elmham may be seen in the MS. in the library of Trinity Hall, Cambridge; a copy of the drawing is given in Dugdale's Monasticon, under St. Augustine's monastery, Canterbury. The work of Thomas of Elmham has been published in the series of the Master of the Rolls, but unfortunately the drawing was omitted.

8. At a period somewhat below our date, great attention was paid to St. Jerome's three versions, and several psalters are in existence in which we have two or three in parallel columns. There is one, indeed, in the Vatican library (Regin. xi.) which was given to it by queen Christina, and is assigned by some authorities to the 7th, the 6th, or even the 5th century. This contains the Gallican and Hebrew in parallel columns. In the library of Trin. Coll. Cambridge is a volume of remarkable size and beauty, in which are found the three versions, with notes in the intermediate spaces and margins. A volume corresponding to it in most respects (being almost a facsimile) is in the library at Paris, No. 8846; of this Siltre gives a notice in vol. iii. no. 188. The former of these has reproductions of the drawings of the Utrecht Psalter, and the latter has some of the drawings.

Further information as to later psalters will be found in Prof. Westwood's works, above cited. An account of an important Bamberg psalter is given by Dr. Schönfelder in the Serapeum of Nov. 1865. This has, in four columns, the Gallican, Roman, and Hebraic versions, and the Greek in Latin letters. See, too, Cardinal Thomasius' Psalter, published separately at Rome, 1697, and in his collected works. The Psalterium Quincuplex of J. Le Fevre, published first by Henry Stephens, 1509, contains in the text the three versions of Jerome, and in a kind of appendix the Vetus and what he calls "Psalterium Conciliatum," an attempt to produce a version from the Gallican agreeing "more with the truth and the Hebrew." Mr. Birch of the British Museum promises a work on this subject.

* Charlemagne's Psalter does not contain this.

Some notes on more recent volumes will be found in the writer's volume on the creeds, Murray, 1872, chaps. xxiii. and xxiv. Copies of Jerome's Roman and Gallican translations, with the "obeli" and asterisks, will be found in Migne, vol. xxix. pp. 119–420; of the Hebraic in vol. xxviii. pp. 1183–1306. The last is also given from the Codex Amiatinus, in the notes of the edition of the Vulgate by Tischendorf, Leipsic, 1873. An interesting account of the Psalterium Aureum of St. Gall (no. 26) has been recently published by the Historical Society of St. Gall, but it is mainly occupied with its palaeographical and artistic characteristics.

PUNISHMENTS. [CORPORAL PUNISHMENT; DISCIPLINE; FINE; PENITENCE.]

PURIFICATION OF THE ALTAR, VESSELS. I know of no reference to the subject in any document within our period. It is noticed, however, in the general instructions given to parish priests in the West at the visitation of the bishop in the 9th or 10th centuries, and we may presume that the practice which they prescribe had been in some degree observed previously. In the Sermo Synodalis, ascribed to Leo IV. 847, but perhaps later, we read, "Wash and wipe the holy vessels with your own hands . . . . Let a place be prepared in the sacrarium (secretarium, Rather.; Admon. Synod. below) or near the altar, where the water may be poured out when the sacred vessels are washed, and there let a clean vessel with water be hung, and there let the priest wash his hands after the communion" (Hard. Concilia, vi. 785). The same directions appear also in a very early recension of this document printed by Baluze (Admonitio Synodalis, ad calc. Reginon. de Discipl. Eccl. 502), and in the Synodica of Ratherius, A.D. 928 (Hard. u.s. 790). They have also been preserved in the later pontificals of Rome (Regin. u.s. 505, 508). Yet the order that the celebrant should himself cleanse the vessels could hardly have been general, for in the 11th century we find John of Avranches, about 1060, assigning this office to the deacon (Epist. ad Maurilium, in App. ad Opp. Greg. M. ii. 256, ed. Ben.).

PURIFICATION, FESTIVAL OF THE. [MARY, FESTIVALS OF, § 1, p. 1140.]

PURPURA. The band or stripe of purple used as an ornament in the dresses of the ancients. [CLAVUS.] Caesarius of Arles, in his rules for nuns, forbids them to use "vestimenta lucida vel nigra vel cum purpura," &c. (Reg. ad Virg. Recap. 7; Patrol. lxvii. 1118). A canon of the second council of Nicaea (787 A.D.), in ordaining that clerics should dress plainly, adds that anciently they did not wear variegated dresses of silk, nor προσετίθεσαν ἑτερόχροα ἐπιβλήματα ἐν τοῖς ἄκροις τῶν ἱματίων (can. 16; Labbe, vii. 609). Another illustration of the practice is furnished us by Gregory of Tours, who dwells on an incident where a mafors holoserica is turned into an altar-cloth, a strip torn off being used for the above-mentioned decoration (Hist. Franc. x. 16; Patrol. lxxi. 548). [R. S.]

PYTHON. The word is connected with the Hebrew אוֹב, pethen, a venomous serpent, which is rendered in the Septuagint by Ἀσπίς, Deut. xxxii. 33; Job xx. 14; Ps. lviii. 4; Isaiah xi. 8; by Δράκων, in Job xx. 16; and by Βασιλίσκος in Ps. xci. 13, b. v. Throughout the East evil spirits received names from this reptile, an usage originating, we cannot doubt, in traditions of the event recorded in Gen. iii. In Scripture itself we have "the great dragon . . . that old serpent called the devil" (Rev. xii. 9; xx. 2). One result was that the attributes of the demon and the serpent were interchanged. Hence the python slain by Apollo at Delos was thought to have inspired the oracle before the god took his place: "Pythone serpente interfecto totius vaticinationis auctore et principe" (Orosius, adv. Pagan. Hist. vi. 15); "Ante Apollinem responsa dare solitus" (Hyginus, Fabul. 140). Hence, also, it was that both in Jewish and Christian antiquity the name of python was given to prophesying spirits. Hesychius says, Πύθων· Δαιμόνιον μαντικόν. In Acts xvi. 16, we read of "a certain damsel, who had a spirit of python" (in Eustathius, de Engastrim. 11, τὴν πυθόμαντιν). In the Vulgate of Lev. xx. 27, we have, "Vir aut mulier in quibus pythonicus vel divinationis fuerit spiritus." Compare Deut. xviii. 11; 1 Sam. xviii. 7, 8 (Eustath. u. s. 20, πυθόμαντις); 2 Kings xxiii. 24; 1 Chron. x. 13, "pythonissam"; Isaiah viii. 19; xix. 3.

The lower animals were supposed to be subject to this possession. In the time of Justinian there was a dog at Constantinople that would scratch up and return to their several owners rings of iron and gold that had been buried together; and indicate correctly the characters of men and women in a crowd,—"on which account they said that the dog had a spirit of python" (Cedrenus, Hist. Compend. i. 657, ed. Nieb.).

Among modern writers consult especially J. B. Deane, The Worship of the Serpent traced throughout the World, Lond. 1830; Leo Allatius, de Engastrimutho Syntagma, appended to Eustathius, u. s.; J. H. Heidegger, Dissertatio de Pseudo-Samuele, Tigur. 1675. [W. E. S.]

PYX (Greek, πυξίς, πυξίον; Latin, pyxis, pyxida, a box). In ecclesiastical usage the box in which the host is reserved after consecration. The word is used in this sense in a decree of pope Leo IV., A.D. 847–855 (Labbe and Mansi, Concil. ed. Venet. t. lxiv. p. 891), "Super altare nihil ponetur nisi capsae cum reliquiis sanctorum aut pyxis cum Corpore Domini ad viaticum pro infirmis." In the first Ordo Romanus (Migne, vol. lxxviii.), in the part which contains the detail of the order of the procession before the celebration of the Eucharist by the pope, the passage occurs, "duo acolythi tenentes capsas cum sanctis apertas." This is generally interpreted to mean vessels in which the Eucharist was placed; but a comparison with the decree of pope Leo IV. seems to make it doubtful whether such is the true meaning. [RESERVATION.]

It is the opinion of many writers that the earliest receptacles for the reserved portion of the Eucharist were vessels in the form of a dove [DOVE, EUCHARISTIC], but such was probably not invariably the case; and the round boxes formed from a section of an elephant's tooth, dating from various periods, from the 4th to the 7th century, nearly all of which bear sculptured on them subjects which may be held to have some reference to the eucharistic sacrifice, have been (v. observations by Padre Garrucci, Archeologia, vol. xliv

p. 322) confidently supposed to have served for this purpose. Such may very possibly have been the case in some instances; but it must be observed that the subjects carved upon many of them would be well suited to appear on a receptacle for a BRANDEUM or cloth, which, as we learn from St. Gregory's (the pope) letter (Ep. lib. iv. ep. 30) to the empress Constantina, was, down to his period, the customary substitute for a relic, and was habitually enclosed in a pyxis. His words are as follows: "Cognoscat autem tranquilissima Domna quia Romanis consuetudo non est quando Sanctorum reliquias dant ut quidquam tangere praesumant de corpore sed tantummodo in pyxide brandeum mittitur atque ad sacratissima corpora Sanctorum ponitur. Quod levatum in ecclesia quae est dedicanda debita cum veneratione reconditur."

One which we can scarcely doubt to have been made for the purpose of containing a brandeum (or possibly a vessel of oil) is that which has been engraved and commented on in the Archeologia (vol. xliv. p. 321). On it are two subjects, one the martyrdom of St. Menas, the other the saint in a glorified condition [RELIQUARY]. Several examples of such boxes bear secular subjects, as one in the museum at Zürich, on which are Venus and Adonis; on another is Bacchus; on one, in the treasury of the cathedral of Sens, a lion hunt; and a like subject is on one in the British Museum. Of those which bear Christian subjects, the earliest and finest is that in the museum at Berlin, on one side of which is Abraham about to sacrifice Isaac, on the other our Lord teaching in the Temple. This is probably as early as the 4th century.

In this instance it is difficult to see the appropriateness of the latter subject to a vessel employed in connexion with the Eucharist, though in the former it is obvious. By Mr. Westwood (Fictile Ivories, p. 272) the second subject is said to be Christ seated among His apostles; but one of the figures would seem to be that of a woman pressing in through a crowd, and the next figure an elderly baldheaded man raising a hand with a gesture of surprise, figures which would seem to point to our Lord's teaching in the Temple. Several examples present the history of Jonah; the raising of Lazarus is found upon at least five; the three Hebrew youths in the furnace on one, various miracles of our Lord on others. All these may be thought to refer in some way or other to the Eucharist, but most would be applicable to pyxides containing brandea or oils from the holy places in Palestine.

These boxes appear to vary in date from the 4th to the 7th century, and in size from about 3½ inches to 5 inches in diameter and height; several have had locks; among them that of St. Menas. A lock is perhaps an indication of the use of a pyx as a reliquary rather than as a receptacle for the host, for while many would have stolen a relic few would have dared to steal a host.

It is difficult to find examples of pyxes (in the restricted sense) earlier than A.D. 800 which, either by inscriptions or ornamentation, indicate clearly their destination. We find, however, great numbers of pyxes made in the 12th (some possibly in the 11th) and 13th centuries, chiefly at Limoges, of copper enamelled and gilt. These are usually circular, with a conical cover, and about 3 inches in diameter.

QUADRAGESIMA. [LENT.]

QUADRAPOLA. This word, whose meaning is quite uncertain, often occurs in Anastasius Bibliothecarius. He tells us (e. g.) that Adrian I. made for the church of St. Peter "cortinas . . . . de palliis stauracinis seu quadrapolis" (p. 320). It has been suggested that by the name is to be understood pieces of cloth, in whose four corners gold or silken threads are interwoven. This, however, seems nothing more than a guess. Reference may be made to Ducange's Glossary, s. v.

R

RACANA, a word whose spelling is as varied as its meaning is disputed. Thus Gregory the Great, in the two passages we have cited below, spells it on one occasion racana, on another rachana. The former spelling is that found in Ennodius, the latter that in Anastasius Bibliothecarius. In the Regula Magistri, and the remaining passages referred to below, it is spelt rachina.

It seems to us most likely that the racana was some kind of rug or blanket, not, apparently, of the thicker or coarser kind. The following order from the Regula Magistri tells pretty strongly for both points, "in lectis habeant . . . . et lanas, in aestate vero pro lanis rachinis propter aestus utantur" (c. 81, Patrol. lxxxviii. 1031; cited in the Concordia Regularum, Patrol. ciii. 1255, where see Ménard's note). On one occasion we find Gregory the Great sending a present of thirty racanae with laenae and lecti; on another he receives a present of two (Greg. Mag. Epist. xi. 1, 78; Patrol. lxxvii. 1119, 1210, where the notes may be referred to).

It was made of hair cloth (r. cilicina), sometimes at any rate (Vita S. Radegundis, c. 4; Patrol. lxxii. 666). It was a thing worth stealing (Audoenus, Vita S. Eligii, ii. 38; Patrol. lxxxvii. 570). This last was a r. caprina . . . . valde optima, and perhaps therefore better than the ordinary run, for in Anastasius we read of four rachanellae being sold numismate uno. In a later passage the association cum storeis et rachanis is important for the view which we have adopted as to the meaning of the word. It ought to be added, as seemingly conflicting with the Regula Magistri, that the words following the above-cited clause are per totam hiemem (Vita Johannis Eleemos. 9, 52; Patrol. lxxiii. 356, 363). The word is also used by Ennodius (Epist. ix. 17; Patrol. lxiii. 156), who asks that a laena and racana, which are to be presented to him, shall be "coloris rubei aut fusci." On a survey of the foregoing passages it will be seen that something of the nature of blanket makes very good sense throughout. The same can hardly be said of some other views. Thus Sirmond (Ennodius, not. in loc.) thinks it must be some kind of boot, by assuming that racanae are the same as ragae [RAGAE], and that these latter are boots, because the Theodosian Code prohibits them in company with Tsangae, which certainly are boots! Ducange's theory is equally unsatisfactory, which explains it of a patched and worn dress, such as monks would wear, thus deriving it from ῥάκος. It is hard on this theory to understand such an allusion as that we have cited, where a rachana is called valde optima, and is thought quite worth stealing, or to explain several passages distinctly connecting it with bed furniture. Other views which explain the word as a kind of breeches, or as something worn round the neck, need not be discussed, in the absence of anything like evidence in support of them.

Besides the notes we have already mentioned, reference may be made to Rosweyd, Onomasticon in Vitas Patrum, s. v. (Patrol. lxxxiv. 489), and Ducange's Glossarium, s. v. [R. S.]

RADEGUNDIS, ST., queen, Aug. 13, commemorated at Poitiers (Mart. Usuard., Hieron., Flor., Wandalb.; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iii. 46). [C. H.]

RAGAE. The Theodosian Code (lib. xiv., tit. 10, l. 3), in a law put forth by Honorius in A.D. 399, forbids the wearing within the city of ragae and tsangae. [TSANGAE.] The meaning of the former word is very doubtful. The preceding law, issued two years earlier, had prohibited the wearing of brachae and tsangae; and thus one theory has been to read brachae in both passages. This view, not very probable in itself, is rendered still less so by the existence of a diminutive ragella (Ducange, Glossarium, s. v.). Others connect it with ῥάκη, ῥάκια, and illustrate it by such words as ῥακοδυτεῖν, ῥακενδυτεῖν. This would give us the meaning of a monkish cloak, so-called from its apparently ordinary condition. This view also seems somewhat unsatisfactory, seeing that the object of the two laws appears to be to put down the wearing of foreign dresses in Rome, under a penalty of total confiscation of property and perpetual exile. The theory that a monkish dress is intended does not seem to harmonize with the direct object of the law, and the penalty in this case would be out of all proportion. Others, again, would read ruchae, deriving it from ῥοῦχον, a garment (Ducange, Glossarium Graecum, s. v.). It seems to us, however, that the prohibition appears aimed at something too special to be satisfied by a quite general word. (See Gothofredus, not. in loc.; Ducange, Glossarium, s. v.) [R. S.]

RAILS. [CANCELLI.]

RAM. The Ram is not unfrequently used as a symbol on Christian monuments, and there seems to be ground for thinking that it was employed to symbolize other ideas than those signified by the Lamb. St. Ambrose (Ep. lxiii.) says that it is used as a symbol of the Word, even by those who deny the coming of Christ, and finds in the fleece of the ram a symbol of the "clothing-upon" of Christians (2 Cor. v. 2); in his defence of the flock against the wolf, a symbol of Christ's victory over Satan; in his leading the flock, a symbol of the Divine guidance; in his substitution for Isaac, a symbol of the one sacrifice; in his dumbness before his shearers (Is. liii. 7), a symbol of the meekness of Christ. And another father of the Church (Prosper de Promiss. Dei, pars 1, c. xvii.) sees in the "thicket" a type of the crown of thorns. Where found on fonts and other monuments having any reference to baptism, it was probably used as a symbol of force, and as an encouragement to "fight manfully" (Perret, Catacombes de Rome, v. iii. pl. 8); and under the same idea of encouraging themselves with the device of a valiant animal in times of persecution, Christians seem to have worn rings with a ram engraved upon the stone. It may be added that two rams face to face, with a cross between them, are not an uncommon symbol, and may be seen on the capitals of columns in the churches of St. Ambrose and St. Celsus at Milan (Allegranza, Sacr. Mon. di Milano, tav. vii. etc.).

(1) A.D. 768, says Mansi (xii. 699), but this being the year in which Pepin died, it could not well have been held for another year or more, to have been held under his son Charles, who seems to refer to it in a later capitulary as having legislated on the subject of country bishops. We learn from another source that it disallowed their performing any episcopal functions, unless they had been ordained by three bishops.

REBRACHIATORIUM. We once meet with this word in Cassian's description of the monastic dress (De Coenob. Inst. i. 6; Patrol. xlix. 71), where, from the number of synonyms used to describe the article (ἀναβολαί, succinctoria, redimicula), it may fairly be said with Gazaeus (in loc.) to be "obscuratus potius quam illustratus." It would seem to mean some sort of cords or bands (resticulae duplices) passing over the neck and down the two sides, being then so fastened as to hold the garments together, while leaving the arms free. See Isidore (Etym. xix. 33, 5, where Cassian is cited), Gazaeus (not. in loc.), and Ducange's Glossary, s. v. [R. S.]

RECEPTORIUM. [SALUTATORIUM.]

RECLINATORIUM. [STAFF.]

RECLUSE. [HERMIT, p. 771.]

RECONCILIATION OF PENITENTS. This was the last stage in the discipline of PENITENCE. By it the penitent was fully restored to all the sacred privileges which he had forfeited. This restoration was expressed by different terms. Tertullian uses the phrases, "veniam, abolitionem delictorum, indulgentiam, remissionem, concessionem, &c., sacramentum benedictionis, pacis redditionem, communicationem." With Cyprian the ordinary expressions are, "pacem dare, accipere, ad pacem admitti, communicationis jus accipere, dare, veniam, peccatorum remissionem, indulgentiam." The council of Elvira has "communionem dare, accipere, praestare, Dominicae communioni sociari, reconciliari." Many canons express reconciliation simply by the word "communio," and Greek councils speak of those unreconciled as ἀκοινώνητοι. In the council of Nice (c. 13) absolutio is called a viaticum, τὸ τελευταῖον καὶ ἀναγκαιότατον ἐφόδιον. The same word was adopted by 1 Conc. Arausic. c. 3; 1 Conc. Vasens. c. 2; Conc. Gerund. c. 9; 3 Conc. Aurelian. c. 25, &c. A general term in ecclesiastical documents of a later age was "absolutio" (λύσις). The act expressed by these several phrases was the solemn absolving of public penitents, and restoring them to full communion. The act of reconciliation was outward and visible, but a spiritual remission of sins was held to accompany it. Although in the theological doctrine of absolution regard must be paid both to the forum internum—the conscience of the sinner, and the forum externum—the discipline of the church, there is no trace of any such formal distinction having been drawn through the period embraced by this work. It was considered that when a penitent was reconciled, his sin was pardoned. His whole course of penance had been a petition for the divine forgiveness, and when the term of the sentence expired, the offence was judged to be fully expiated; the offender was then restored to communion, and that restoration presupposed the forgiveness of God. The office of the priest in the forum internum was ministerial, and the form through which he exercised his ministry was an intercessory prayer. A judicial absolution of sin was reserved for the Almighty. "Christ alone," says Clemens Alexand. (Paedagog. i. 18, vol. i. p. 138), "is able to forgive our sins, He alone being able to discern the sincerity or insincerity of our obedience." The early doctrine on absolution is well expressed by Pacian (Ep. i. 15): "Not indiscriminately to all is this very pardon through penance granted, nor until there shall have been either some indication of the divine will, or perchance some visitation, may men be loosed; that with careful pondering and much balancing, after many groans and much shedding of tears, after the prayers of the whole church, pardon is in such wise not refused to true penitence, so that no one thereby prejudgeth the future judgment of Christ." The language of Ambrose (de Spirit. Sanct. iii. 18) is equally clear: "By the Holy Spirit sins are pardoned; men do but apply their ministry towards the remission of sins; they do not exercise any power of authority. Nor do they remit sins in their own names, but in that of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. They ask, God gives." Compare at a later date the statement of Gregory (in Evangel. Hom. 26, vol. i. p. 1555): "Then only is the absolution of the bishop valid, when it follows the decision of the judge within." In the forum externum, the court of the church, the bishop's office was more directly judicial. By his own authority, through imposition of hands, he restored the penitent to the peace and communion of the church, and this restoration so far partook of a sacramental character that an African synod under Cyprian (Ep. lxiv. 1) ruled that peace, however irregularly given by a priest of God, was not to be taken away.

The complete ritual of reconciliation in the early ages is nowhere preserved, but there can be little doubt that it comprised one or more of these ceremonies: public prayer was offered in behalf of the returning penitent; hands were solemnly laid upon his head; the Eucharist was administered to him as a token of his return to communion, and a declaration was made that he was again in the society and peace of the church. In the most primitive times, perhaps, even these rites were wanting. It seems probable that then the delinquent, who had been subjected to a certain penance, during which the hands of the bishop were frequently laid upon him, was ipso facto reconciled at the conclusion of his sentence, and with the last imposition of hands. Morinus (de Poenit. vi. 21) raises the question whether, at a later date, when the station of the consistentes was in use, the penitent was absolved as he entered upon the station, or at the close of it. He argues that the "viaticum" of Conc. Nicaen. c. 13, is not participation in the sacrament, but a sacerdotal absolution, and that therefore absolution is distinct from communion, and from this he infers that absolution was given as the penitent was advanced to the stage of consistentia, and full communion only as he left it. But the whole tenor of the canons which mention a viaticum is opposed to this view, and a statement of 1 Conc. Arausic. c. 3, seems to put the matter beyond doubt, for after declaring that a dying penitent might communicate without imposition of hands, it adds that the fathers fitly named a communion of this sort a viaticum.

1. Petitions for Absolution.—In the simple mode of discipline administered in the earliest times, it rested entirely with the discretion of the bishop to determine what length and severity of penance entitled the penitent to absolution. It seems to have been the custom for members of a congregation to petition the bishop to take back again any one of their number who had been ejected, as soon as they were persuaded of his repentance, and for the penitent at the same time to join with the clergy and bishop in earnest prayer that he might be worthy of restoration. The entire congregation thus participated in their erring brother's return. In the Apost. Const. (ii. 16) this duty of intercession is committed to the deacons. But more usually the penitent himself, by the depth and earnestness of his self-abasement, was his own best intercessor. An instance of a successful petition to be absolved is that of the confessor Natalis (Euseb. H. E. v. 27); an unsuccessful one, though supported by the supplication of the people, is related by Synesius (Ep. 67) of a certain Lamponianus. In no case does it appear that reconciliation was granted as a matter of course; the penitent must ask for it, and beseech the congregation to unite with him in his request. Tertullian (de Poenit. c. 9) says that he "ought to enjoin all the brethren to bear the message of his prayer for mercy;" and in the following section (c. 10), "When thou throwest thyself before the knees of the brethren, thou entreatest Christ." Similar language was held by Pacian (Ep. i. 15, Paraen. ad Poenit. c. 24). In the letters of Cyprian and the Roman clergy, there are frequent references to the part borne, in the reconciliation of the lapsed, by the prayers and intercessions of those who had stood firm, "stantis plebis" (Cyp. Epp. xix., xxx. 9, xxxvi. 6, xliii. 5). Ambrose likewise speaks (de Poenit. i. 16, ii. 9, 10) of the pardon of an offender being sought by the tears and lamentations of the whole congregation. This supplication of the people ceased after the 4th century to be part of the ritual of reconciliation in the East; but in the West the pontificals and rituals of a date as late as the 13th century exhibit the practice of the whole body of the clergy and all the people on the Thursday of holy week offering public prayers for the penitents about to be absolved, and the bishop pronouncing the prayer of absolution in the name of the whole church; and as Morinus (viii. 13), writing at the close of the 17th century, adds, "idem adhuc ritus in hunc usque diem perdurat, sed verbo tenus tantum."

2. Absolution withheld till the Completion of Penance.—The original idea of absolution was that of a correlative to public discipline; restoration to communion implied its having been before withheld, and those only could properly be said to be loosed who had previously been bound. Accordingly it was for many centuries an inflexible rule of the church that absolution should not be granted till the offender had shewn some proof of contrition by the performance of certain outward acts of penance. The evidence of this practice is spread over the whole penitential literature. See especially Tertullian, de Poenit. passim; also the canons of Elvira, so many of which attach the words "acta legitimâ poenitentiâ" as a condition of restoration; also the indignation expressed throughout Cyprian's epistles against those of his presbyters who transgressed the settled laws of the church by reconciling the lapsed without penance, an abuse equally corrected and condemned in the 6th century by 3 Conc. Tolet. c. 11; and for pontifical decisions see Syric. Ep. i. 3; Innocent. Ep. i. 7; Leo, Ep. xci. The principle, of course, holds good only in respect to penitents strictly so called; in the case of simple separation from communion (ἀφορισμὸς, segregatio, separatio), where no penalty was attached, none could be exacted. The rule was sometimes relaxed in time of persecution, as in Africa, after conspicuous zeal and resolution succeeding a lapse (Cyp. Epp. xxiv., xxv.); or in deference to the request of the martyrs [LIBELLATICI]; or in favour of the sick; or in case of the clergy who were suspended or deposed, but not subjected to penance. There are also traces in the Eastern ritual, of a comparatively early date, of absolution being granted immediately after confession, and prior to penance. Morinus (vi. 24) assigns the origin of this custom to the abrogation of the office of the penitentiary. The earliest documentary evidence is to be found in the penitential of John the Faster, the date of which is yet to be determined. In that treatise the penitential course begins with a minute confession of sin, immediately upon which follow several prayers of absolution (λύσεις), but even after these the penitent is still held to be ἀκοινώνητος, his final and complete restoration being delayed, and communion withheld, till after the completion of his penance, which in some cases did not take place for long years after he had been absolved (Morin. de Poenit. appendix, p. 628). On the contemporary Greek practice of absolution, see the evidence collected by Morinus (ibid. p. 660). If, in consequence of the duration of the sentence, abstinence from communion was much prolonged, the penitent was allowed at intervals to receive an ἀντίδωρον [EULOGIAE, p. 629]. It was probably the influence of his Greek training which led Theodore to introduce among his canons (Poenitentiâl, I. xii. 4) a permission for communion to be given "pro misericordiâ," at the end of a year or six months, although the penance was still unfinished. The history of the steps by which in the Western church the primitive custom gave place to the mediaeval practice of first absolving and reconciling, and then inflicting penance, belongs to a date which lies outside this work.

3. Form of Absolution.—Till long after the Carolingian era, absolution was given in the supplicatory, not in the indicative, form. No penitent was reconciled without imposition of hands, and imposition was never unaccompanied with prayer. "Nihil est aliud," says August. (de Bapt. iii. 16), "manus impositio nisi oratio super hominem." And this in itself is strong evidence that the form was precatory. The union of prayer with laying on of hands had strong scriptural authority (S. Matt. xix. 13; Acts vi. 6; xiii. 3; xxviii. 8), and was supported by the practice of the church for many centuries. The precatory form was used both in public and private reconciliation and in absolving equally the sound, or the sick, or the dying. And for 1200 years no other form, as an appointed ordinance of the church, usurped its place. Morinus sums up (viii. 11) his investigation into the practice of the Latin church with the broad statement, "Demonstratum videtur continuâ antiquae ecclesiae traditione peccatorum remissionem publice privatimque deprecative concessam esse." An indicative absolution first appears about the year 1300. Its use occurs in an ancient MS. of that date, in Gothic characters, of the abbey of St. Remigius. The MS. contains various episcopal benedictions, after which, in addition to a form of reconciliation, similar to that contained in the Ordo Romanus, there is given, "Item absolutio," in these terms, "Auctoritate, et vice B. Petri principis apostolorum, cui traditae sunt claves regni caelorum, cui dedit Deus potestatem animas ligandi atque solvendi, dicens ei familiarius prae coeteris. Quodcunque ligaveris, &c. Vice inquam ejusdem B. Petri, cui licet merito longe sumus dissimiles, quoniam potestate a Deo concessâ existimamus consimiles, ego divinitus vos absolvo a vinculis peccatorum vestrorum." Morinus considers the term "absolution" in this MS. to be of the nature of a blessing, partly confirmatory, partly dimissory, after the final reconciliation, rather than signifying a remission of sins; and that this was the ordinary signification of the word at that period. A copy of the Gregorian sacramentary of about the same date, contained in the library of the cathedral of Tours, has a form which combines the two modes. After a long discourse on the scriptural authority for declaring the remission of sins, the ritual continues, "Cujus nos virtute freti, et clementiâ confisi, humillime imprecantes pietatem suam, absolvimus te a vinculo tuorum omnium delictorum, et quidquid pro eis mereris, oramus ut avertat propitius, et merearis cernentem omnia cernere, suâ frui visione et uti consolatione, ad gloriam resurgere, et interim sine laesione manere aggregatus sanctorum omnium consortio, tribuente Deo Patre." Then follows another form, but entirely precatory. It does not appear that these forms superseded the solemn supplicatory reconciliation, they were rather supplementary benedictions. Speaking generally, the history of the change from one form to another is this, the supplicatory was the almost universal use of the church up to the 13th century; in the course of that century the indicative gradually crept in, and before its close had altogether taken the place of the earlier and more scriptural precatory absolution (Morinus de Poenit. viii. 8–12; Bingham, Antiq. XIX. ii. 5). The following is a very old form of supplicatory reconciliation from a Latin missal, cited by Bingham from cardinal Bona (Rer. Liturg. appendix, p. 763): "Qui mulieri peccatrici omnia peccata dimisit lacrymanti, et latroni ad unam confessionem claustra aperuit paradisi, ipse vos redemptionis suae participes ab omni vinculo peccatorum absolvat," &c. For other forms in the Latin church, see Sacramentar. Gregor. ed. Ménard, p. 226.

In the Greek church the supplicatory form has never been abandoned. Both in the earliest and more recent Euchologies, the absolution is distinctly a prayer to God for pardon, εὐχὴ ἐπὶ τῶν ἐξ ἐπιτιμίων λυομένων. The following compendious form was represented to Morinus (viii. 12) as in general use through the Greek church in the middle ages, having come down from an earlier date: Αὐτὸς Δέσποτα ἄνες, ἄφες, συγχώρησον τὰς ἁμαρτίας τοῦ Δ., ὅτι σὺν τὸ κράτος, &c.

4. Rites.—The most conspicuous act in the ceremonial of reconciliation was the imposition of hands. There is no occasion to cite authorities for a practice which was as essential to the rite of reconciliation as to that of confirmation or ordination. Indeed in many passages the expression "imposition of hands" is identical with absolution; see, for instance, Apost. Const. ii. 18; Pacian, Ep. iii.; Statut. Eccl. Antiq. cc. 76, 78; August. de Bapt. iii. 16; v. 20; Leo, Ep. xcii. 17. With the exception of this act, no other part of the early ceremonial is known. It is probable that for many centuries the whole form of reconciliation consisted in the bishop laying his hands on the head of the penitent and saying certain prayers, and perhaps making a public announcement of his return to the peace of the church. Afterwards, no doubt a more elaborate ritual was introduced, but there are no materials from which to ascertain even approximately the date of its introduction. The Gelasian sacramentary is adduced by Morinus as the earliest authority on the subject. After the prayers of the Mass, on "Feria 5 in Coen. Dom." it publishes an "ordo agentibus poenit. public.," to this effect: "On the morning of Holy Thursday the penitent is to come forth from the place where he has done penance, and to present himself in the body of the church prostrate on the ground." The deacon (in the Ordo Rom. the archdeacon) is then to accost the bishop in an address which begins thus: "Adest, O venerabilis Pontifex, tempus acceptum, dies propitiationis divinae et salutis humanae," &c., at the end of which the bishop, with the whole congregation, is to say certain verses of Psalm li. The archdeacon is then to ask the bishop to pray that the penitent may be brought near to God by the divine grace of reconciliation. After which the penitents, having been solemnly warned against a relapse by an attendant priest, are to be formally absolved by the bishop. Similar directions, under the heading "de Reconciliatione Poen. Capital. Criminis," are given in the Rule of Chrodogang, of Metz (c. 28). This ritual is also found, with some additional prayers, in the most ancient MSS. of the Ordo Romanus; in the Gregorian sacramentary, "in Feriâ 5 de Coen. Dom.; and with some further additions, which indicate a later compilation, in the spurious de Divinis Officiis, cap. de Coen. Dom., which bears the name of Alcuin, and there can be little doubt that it represents in general outline the use of the Latin church on both sides of the Alps from a very early age (Morin. de Poenit. viii. 11; ix. 30). In the English church, public reconciliation was never appointed, as there was no public penance (Theodor. Poenitential, I. xiii. 4). In the Gallican church there are traces of a more elaborate ceremonial. Morinus prints (Appendix, pp. 598–608) an office book from the cathedral of Toulouse, apparently of the date of the 9th century, containing very full and interesting directions for the reconciliation of penitents. Palm Sunday it calls the Sunday of indulgence, and appoints that at 8 o'clock in the morning of the following Thursday the archdeacon is to approach the bishop, seated on his throne, surrounded by his clergy, and to bow and kiss his knees, and announce to him that a crowd of penitents is standing outside waiting to be reconciled by his ministration. Upon hearing which, the bishop will arise and walk in procession with his clergy to the door of the church, and, seating himself there, will investigate the case of each, and set apart those who are to be reconciled. He will then re-enter the church and ascend the steps of the altar, with his face turned towards the penitents at the door, while four singing men, placed at the door, chant an antiphon, "If Thou, Lord, wilt be extreme," &c., and four others from behind the altar respond, "As a shepherd gathereth his flock that is lost, so have I gathered thee." The deacon is then to bid the penitents enter the church, where they prostrate themselves, while an office with special lections is sung on their behalf, after which a special Mass, with appropriate prayers and readings, is offered for them; and immediately after the gospel, the priest is to preach to them, and when he has finished, the deacon is to read a long exhortation, the priest explaining particular points in it. When the missa poenitentium is over, then are to follow the missa pro baptizandis and the missa chrismalis, and then comes the final office of reconciliation. The bishop ascends the pulpit, the penitents prostrating themselves round it, and the deacon addresses him with the same formula contained in the earlier rituals: "Adest, O venerabilis Pontifex, tempus acceptum," &c., at the conclusion of which he leaves the pulpit and kneels before the altar, while a long penitential litany is sung; he then again mounts the pulpit, the priests standing in front of it, and on the deacon saying "Orate poenitentes," they prostrate themselves; and while the bishop pronounces the prayer of absolution, seven forms of which are given, two or four or more of the attendant priests lay their hands on the penitents' heads. The deacon then accosts them, "surgite de terrâ reconciliati Deo," and they are admitted to communion, receiving before the rest of the congregation, and, after one more admonition, finally cease to be penitents.

Private reconciliation would differ from the public form only in the absence of ceremonial, the two essential points of prayer and laying on of hands being maintained. For a specimen of this administration of the private rite, see what is published from a Rouen MS. of the 10th century by Morinus (ix. 31).

5. Minister.—The universal practice of the church committed the power of absolution to the hands of the bishop absolutely. The decrees of Nice (cc. 12, 13) and Ancyra (cc. 2, 5), leaving to him the determination of the length and severity of penance, assume the prevalence of this power. At a later date it was the subject of special enactments. Thus the second council of Carthage (c. 3) altogether forbade a presbyter to administer public reconciliation, a decision repeated by Conc. Agath. c. 44, and 2 Conc. Hispal. c. 7. See also Conc. Eliber. c. 32; 3 Conc. Carthag. c. 32; 1 Conc. Arausic. c. 1; Conc. Epaon. c. 16; Leo, Ep. 88. Similarly the penitential of Theodore (I. xiii. 2) confines the office to the bishop. And in the Western church, so long as public discipline was in force, he was the sole minister of reconciliation. In the East the office was delegated to the penitentiary, one of whose functions Sozomen expressly states (H. E. vii. 16) was that of absolving penitents. But although the bishop was alone formally invested with the power, in practice it was sometimes delegated to the presbyters. There is a long array of canons authorizing the ministry of a presbyter in case of emergency, only, however, with the sanction and as the representative of the bishop, as in the absence of the bishop (2 Conc. Carthag. c. 4, 3 Conc. Carthag. c. 32), or when the penitent was in danger of death (Ep. Dionys. Alex. ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 44; Conc. Eliber. c. 32; Cyp. Epp. xviii., xix.; 1 Conc. Arausic. c. 1; Conc. Epon. c. 16). And not only a priest, but if the danger was urgent a deacon might take his place; if the priest had ordered him (Conc. Eliber. c. 32), or if a priest could not be found, and death was imminent (Cyp. Ep. xviii.). The same usage is apparent from c. 2 of the first council of Toledo, A.D. 398, which prohibits the ordination of penitents, and decrees that if one has been ordained deacon, he shall be placed among the sub-deacons, and denied the privilege of laying on hands. Imposition of hands was used only in ordination, confirmation, and reconciliation; deacons took no part in the two former rites, it must therefore have been customary for them sometimes to administer the last. The same custom reappears in the 9th century, in a ritual of Noyon, printed by Martene (de Rit. i. 8), and at a later date in the introduction to the ps. Roman Penitential (Wasserschleben, Bussordnungen, p. 360). No such privilege appears to have been given to deacons in the Greek church. On the force of lay absolution, and on the opinions of the Roman canonists on its validity, see Bingham, Antiq. XIX. iii. 4; Morinus, de Poenit. viii. 24). In Africa, under the administration of Cyprian, the clergy joined with the bishop in laying on hands. Reference is made to this on two occasions (Epp. xvi. 2, xvii.). The custom appears to have been an isolated one, and as the second council of Carthage, A.D. 390, forbade presbyters to undertake the rite of public reconciliation, it had probably fallen into disuse by that date. In the Toulouse Pontifical, to which reference has been already made, the attendant priests laid their hands on the penitents, while the bishop read the prayers of absolution.

6. Time.—Reconciliation being consummated by a public admission to communion, it must always have taken place in public service during the celebration of the sacred mysteries. "Reconciliare quemquam in publicâ missâ" was the language of councils both in the 4th and 7th centuries (2 Conc. Carthag. c. 3; 2 Conc. Hispal. c. 7). All extant ritual books similarly connect public reconciliation with the service of the Mass. But there is some variety of custom with regard to the particular period in which the rite was administered. Some place it at the beginning of the office, and this appears to be the intention of the Ordo Romanus; but the more usual interval was immediately after the reading of the Gospel. In the Gelasian sacramentary the penitential office is succeeded by the direction, "Postea offert plebs," that is to say, it immediately preceded the offertory. In the Toulouse Pontifical (Morin. App., pp. 598–608) the ritual of reconciliation is intermingled with three masses, but the final absolution takes place after the gospel of the last and the most solemn of them. In the Greek euchologies the prayers of absolution for one under excommunication are to be said just before the priest places the elements on the altar.

With regard to the time of year, reconciliation appears from an early age to have been restricted to the paschal season, although there is no evidence by which to ascertain when the restriction began. In the time of Innocent I., A.D. 402–417, both the season and the day had become fixed. "De Penitentibus . . . . quintâ feriâ ante Pascha eis remittendum Romanae ecclesiae consuetudo demonstrat" (Ep. i. 7). The Thursday in Holy Week, from a period at least as early as the beginning of the 5th century, was therefore the day in general use in the Western church. So the Penitential of Theodore (I. xiii. 2), and the subsequent penitentials, to which an "ordo" is attached. A passage in Ambrose (Ep. 33 ad Marcell.) points to Good Friday as the usual day for relaxing penance in the north of Italy, a supposition which is perhaps supported by the prayers appointed for "Feria sexta in Parasceue," in the Ordo Ambrosianus, all of which relate more directly to pardon and remission of sins than those of the Thursday previous. Morinus relying on a passage in 4 Conc. Toiet. c. 7, would extend the same custom to the Spanish church, but the words of the canon clearly refer, not to penitence, but to repentance generally. There was no reason why one day in the Holy Week should not be held as suitable as another, and it is highly probable that in different parts of the church different days were selected; but after the 7th century all trace of variety o time ceases. No surviving ritual or pontifical alludes to any other day than the Coena Domini, and all Roman canonical writers cite the assertion of Innocent as conclusive with respect to the western custom. In the east public reconciliation was granted apparently on any day at the close of the Holy Week, or even on Easter Day. This appears incidentally from a letter addressed by certain monks under excommunication to the council of Chalcedon; they complain that the times of Christ's passion and the holy eve, and day of Resurrection, on which festival penance was wont to be remitted by the Fathers, had passed by and they had not yet been absolved (Bingham, Antiq. XIX. ii. 10). Gregory of Nyssa, at the opening of his canonical epistle, similarly speaks of Easter as a time suitable for the sinner's restoration. In the case of the sick or dying, reconciliation was given of course at any season; and so with respect to private penance, absolution could not have been confined to a particular season although, to a great extent, the private ministration kept to the time of the public and more solemn rite.

7. Place.—When the system of the stations [PENITENCE, p. 1591] was rigidly enforced, the penitent was moved station by station towards the sanctuary, till he arrived among the consistentes, and stood with them near the altar when the sacred mysteries were being celebrated. So when his own time of reconciliation came, the bishop's hands were laid upon him, kneeling in front of the altar: "divino altario reconciliatus" (1 Conc. Tolet. c. 2). The third council of Carthage has a canon (c. 32), which, after stating the conditions on which a priest may reconcile, adds, that where the crime has been scandalous the reconciliation shall take place, "ante absidem;" on the principle, no doubt, that when the offence had been open and notorious, the absolution should be open and public also. In the elaborate Gothic ritual cited above from the Codex Tolosanus of Morinus, the penitents are gathered round the pulpit to receive imposition of hands, and their reconciliation is afterwards completed by reception with the faithful, of course at the altar. In the Ordo Romanus, Feria 5, in Coen. Dom., in the Gelasian sacramentary, and in the later pseudo-Alcuin, De Divinis Officiis, the penitents are directed to present themselves for reconciliation, "in gremio ecclesiae." And in a MS. of Evreux appended to the Pontifical of Egbert (Martene, de Rit. i. 6) directions are given that the bishop is not to mount his throne on the day of reconciliation, but is to remain either near or in front of the altar.

8. Absolution of the Sick.—There are two leading decisions on the treatment of the sick in the early centuries, which at first sight are at variance. The first council of Arles (A.D. 314) (c. 22) had decreed that apostates and others who sought communion on a sick bed were to be refused it until they recovered, and had had an opportunity of performing penance. And this is in accordance with what Innocent (Ep. iii. ad Exsuper.) states to have been the early custom, that at first penance was granted to such delinquents, but not communion; and that afterwards, on the conversion of the empire, a more lenient rule prevailed, and communion was refused under no circumstances to a dying man. On the other hand, the council of Nice (c. 13) orders the παλαιὸς καὶ κανονικὸς νόμος to be maintained of giving an ἐφόδιον to a dying man. The explanation of the apparent discrepancy is that the canon of Arles applied to delinquents generally, while the Nicene canon, as is evident from the decisions immediately before and after it, had reference to those who were already penitents. The primitive church order therefore was that notorious offenders, whose repentance began only on their death-bed, were to be granted penitence, but not communion, while those who were already penitents were always to be allowed plenary reconciliation when in danger of death. Afterwards, from the beginning of the 4th century, the former restriction was removed, and all sick men who desired it were to be allowed the benefit of absolution. "They," said Leo (Ep. xci.), "who in time of urgent danger seek the safeguard of penance and subsequent reconciliation must not be refused, because we cannot restrict the time to God's compassion nor put any limit upon it. Therefore we ought not to be hard in dispensing the gifts of God, nor ought we to ignore the tears and the contrition of the penitent, because we believe that that very emotion of repentance springs from the inspiration of God." He therefore rules in the same epistle that the grace of communion is to be given if the sick penitent has lost his voice, and can only make a sign. At the same time there was not the same assurance felt of the final pardon of the sinner. "I can give him penitence and absolution," said Ambrose (in Exhort. ad Poenit.), "I cannot give him certainty." The fourth council of Carthage (A.D. 76) had decreed that if the patient had become senseless before his request for absolution could be complied with, he should still be absolved, and the sacred elements be put into his mouth, to which the eleventh council of Toledo, A.D. 675 (c. 11), added that the communion would be complete though the sick man could drink the cup only, and was too weak to swallow the bread (see 12 Conc. Tolet. c. 2, 13 Conc. Tolet. c. 9). And further, if any penitent was snatched away by sudden death, in the fields or on a journey, without communion, the first council of Vaison, A.D. 442 (c. 2), decided that his memorial and funeral rites should be the same as if he had died in the peace of the church. The 4 Conc. Carthag. c. 79, and 11 Conc. Tolet. c. 12, came to the same decision. In the Roman church, however, a severer practice prevailed. "We cannot," says Leo (Ep. xcii. 6), "communicate with those when dead with whom we did not communicate when living." This strictness was maintained by the subsequent popes Gelasius and Vigilius, but afterwards abandoned in the fifth Roman council, A.D. 553, and the whole western practice was then uniform. From the ecclesiastical rule that a penitent did not die out of communion with the church, who, from the accident of his death, was unable to obtain the eucharist, arose the custom of absolving the dead. Gregory the Great ordered a prayer of absolution to be read over the body of a certain monk who had died suddenly under excommunication, with miraculous results, according to John the deacon (Vita Greg. i. 45). For similar instances of absolution of the dead see Gregor. Dialog. ii. 23, iv. 55. At first the absolution went no further than the offering of prayers and masses for the souls of the dead, but in the time of Innocent III. it was decreed that the whole ceremonial of absolution, with penitential psalms, &c., was to be observed. Early Greek euchologies contain many special prayers for absolving the dead (Morin. de Poenit. x. 9).

There is no record of any early rites peculiar to the reconciliation of the sick. The ceremony would probably be confined, with more or less formality, to prayer and imposition of hands, and administration of the eucharist. The third council of Toledo (c. 12), followed by 12 Conc. Tolet. c. 2, 13 Conc. Tolet. c. 9, ordains that the sick penitent, no less than the sound, should be shaved, and if a woman, be veiled, and be sprinkled with ashes, and clothed in sackcloth. And this practice, with some variety, long continued, for some ancient MSS., quoted by Ménard in his notes to the Gregorian sacramentary, refer to sackcloth being laid about the head of the dying, and a cross made of ashes and water being placed in some instances on his breast, and in others on his forehead. It was the custom of the Benedictines to wrap a brother in extremity altogether in haircloth. For further particulars see VIATICUM, and for clinical penance generally, PENITENCE, p. 1605.

9. For reconciliation of heretics, which was consummated sometimes by imposition of hands, sometimes by unction, sometimes by a profession of faith on the part of the returning heretic, see HERESY.

[G. M.]

RECONCILIATION, OF A CHURCH POLLUTED. (Reconciliatio; Apertio. A church under a ban was said to be clausa.) Certain passages of the Old Testament and Apocrypha doubtless served to quicken and guide the instinct of the church, when occasion unhappily arose, to the propriety and the need of doing something to free her sacred buildings from the pollution contracted. 2 Chron. xxix. (for instance) relates at great length how king Hezekiah "opened the doors of the house of the Lord," after they had been "shut" by the wicked Ahaz, and with what rites and sacrifices he "made reconciliation" (v. 24) upon the altar. The chief instance of reconciliation of the (second) temple took place after the pollution of it by Antiochus Epiphanes, all the details of which are given in full in 1 Macc. i. 4. And that which gives this ritual its abiding interest and influence is not only that the anniversary was soon after observed as the Feast of Dedication, but that it was kept by the Saviour Himself (St. John x. 22), even by Him who twice drove the buyers and sellers out of the temple, using the significant words, "make not My Father's house a house of merchandize."

The early part of the 4th century, which was an active time for church building, was also marked by the rise and spread of the Arian heresy, which, as it was aggressive in the employment of litanies, in a like spirit gained for the heretics the (temporary) possession of the sacred buildings. The pious horror entertained by the Catholics of any contact with heretics doubtless led them to institute and use some kind of rite suitable to the occasion when they recovered their own churches, though no early instance or form has come down to us. Nicephorus refers to the edict of Jovian by which the churches of God were again "opened." In the sacramentary of Gelasius, No. xciii., there is an office for dedicating a building hitherto used as a synagogue, "quod perditum fuerat ante latibulum, et quia infidelium turba in isto loco conveniebat adversa" (p. 617; ed. Murat.). "I would scarcely venture to affirm (says Gussanvillaeus, the annotator on St. Gregory the Great) that the churches of the Catholics, after occupation by Arians and other heretics and restoration to the Catholics, were always dedicated by a fresh rite. But whatever took place in former times, Gregory certainly, a most experienced Ritualist, consecrated anew churches polluted by heretics."

And accordingly we find instances recorded in Gregory's writings. In a letter to Peter, a subdeacon of Campania (Epist. lib. iii. 19), he expresses his great anxiety to dedicate to the reverent worship of the Catholic religion places once given up to execrable error; e.g. a church in the third region in Rome, which the Arian superstition had for a long time retained, he now desired to consecrate in honour of St. Severinus, and in order to accomplish his purpose he asked for some relics of St. Severinus, &c. Again, in Dialog. iii. 30, he says, "The church of the Arians, in that region of the city called Suburra, as having been shut up (cf. 2 Chron. above) for two years, was to be dedicated afresh in the Catholic faith." And this was done. "We entered the church, with a great multitude of people, singing praises to Almighty God, and whilst the solemnities of the Mass were going on, and the crowd stood without the sacrarium, some of them felt a pig pressing in here and there, and it made its way to the gates—a proof (says Gregory) that from the same place was going out the unclean inhabitant of the place." He records sundry other "wonders" of the same kind.

The story receives illustration from Victor of Utica in his account of the persecution of the Vandals (lib. ii. 2, no. 6). "A presbyter saw the basilica of Faustus filled with crowds of people, and after a little while emptied and filled with a multitude of swine, a parable of its being given up to the Arians."

A very old MS. of the sacramentary of Gregory contains an office entitled "Reconciliatio Ecclesiae violatae" (p. 490; ed. Muratori).

Agapetus, bishop of Rome, is said to have purged by his catholic prayers the veils of the altar and of the see polluted by the sacrilegious fables of the (Eutychian) Anthimus, patriarch of Constantinople (Goar, p. 618). Gratian (de Consecrat. Dist. I. c. 20 et seqq.) records the direction of pope John I., in the same century, to the bishops of Italy, saying it was what he had done himself at Constantinople for the sake of the Catholic religion and king Theodoric, the pious orthodox emperor Justin extirpating the Arians. Whatever churches we found in their parts, we consecrated, &c. (See Milman's Latin Christianity, bk. iii. cl. 3.)

Tarasius, patriarch of Constantinople, who died A.D. 806, had like work to do. Amongst the forms collected by Goar (Euchol. Graec.) is found "a prayer of Tarasius on the opening or reconciliation of a church profaned by the heretics" (p. 618). Other forms are given; e.g. "a prayer on the release, i.e. the reconciliation of a temple polluted by a heretic or by heathen, to be said before the vestibule of the church." "A prayer to be said by the bishop over the holy table where the heretics have celebrated." "A prayer to be said, before the customary one at the beginning of the Mass, on the reconciliation of a church in which it has happened that a man has met with a violent death."

Martene (tom. ii. lib. ii. cap. xv.) supplies several offices with special prayers from the pontifical of Egbert, from the book of Jumièges, &c.

Hospinian (de Orig. Templorum, lib. iv. p. 379, ed. Tiguri), according to his custom of disparagement, ridicules all ritual of this kind. And he refers with more approval to the case of a deacon of Nestorius, who had polluted a church at Constantinople, when Nestorius "did not use holy water or the like, but simply removed the deacon from his place and office." To inflict punishment on the offender is, he says, the right course. Of old, however, a different view was taken of such calamities. Socrates (Eccl. Hist. vii. 33) relates: "The slaves of a rich barbarian master, to escape his cruelty, fled to the church, and with drawn swords leaped on the altar. Of course the divine office could not go on. They threatened every one that came near, killed one, wounded another, and then killed themselves. One of those who were there said that the profanation of the temple foreboded no good. Nor was that saying false, for it portended the rupture of the people, and the deposition of him who caused it (i.e. Nestorius)." [H. B.]

RECTOR. (1) The word rector is used by Gregory the Great in the Regula Pastoralis as equivalent to pastor; and a priest is said to rule (regere) his people (Conc. Elib. c. 77). See PARISH, 3, iv. p. 1560.

(2) The lead r of each side of an antiphonal choir is called rector chori, as in an ancient Sarum missal quoted by Martene, De Rit. Ant. i. 240.

(3) The pope is sometimes styled rector sanctae sedis (Macri Hierolex.). [C.]

REDEMPTION (Redemptio).—Commutation of ecclesiastical penance. The origin of the system is doubtless to be traced in the dispensing power vested in the hands of the bishop. This power existed from the very first. Indeed the later custom of assigning fixed sentences to particular sins was a development of a far earlier practice, which left the determination of the length of penance entirely in the hands of the bishop. But even after a code of penitential laws was established all authorities agreed in leaving to the bishop the power of relaxing or remitting a sentence. The bishop, declared the council of Ancyra (c. 5), shall be the judge of the sincerity of a penitent's contrition, and may either increase or diminish his period of exclusion. If the delinquent manifested his earnestness by fear and tears and patience, and good works, then, said the council of Nice (c. 12), the bishop may relieve him from passing step by step through his allotted stations. For further illustrations of the exercise of INDULGENCE see Basil, Ep. ad Amphil. cc. 2, 7, 54, 84; Greg. Nyss. Ep. ad Letoi., passim; 4 Conc. Carthag. c. 75; Conc. Andegav. c. 12; Innocent, Ep. i. 7; Leo, Ep. cxxix. 5. The object of this power of dispensation was not to exempt men from penance, but to excite them to perform it. It was natural and equitable that one who shewed earnestness in his repentance should not be debarred from the privileges of the church for so long a time as one who paid only a formal and perfunctory obedience to the letter of the law which had condemned him. And probably for the first five centuries the only means of redeeming penance were zeal and sincerity in the performance of it. After the 6th century there begin to be traces of a more corrupt dealing with the censures of the church. As the life of the penitential system died out penance came to consist more and more in outward acts alone; it lost its original notion of a censure and means of improvement, and came to be regarded solely as a punishment; sin was to be expiated by submission to certain penalties, regardless of the state of mind of the offender. To redeem penance was therefore to substitute one outward form for another. The delinquent was allowed to purchase a remission of lengthy acts of self-denial by undertaking others which were shorter and more laborious, or by voluntarily depriving himself of something valuable to him. The principle being once conceded, redemptions of penance would become general, and would be tolerated more leniently from the circumstance that they brought material profit to the church and her rulers. Moreover, in those parts of the church where the system prevailed, penance consisted almost exclusively of long fasts and abstinences, and it must frequently have happened that owing to sickness, or other circumstances, it would be impracticable to observe them, or from an accumulation of crimes their duration might be so extended that life would not be long enough for their completion. Some dispensing power would then be necessary to assign more expeditious modes of carrying out the sentence. The practice also among the Teutonic tribes of compounding for personal injuries by money payments would readily lead to a similar composition for infringements of the law of the church. Thus the system of the commutation of penance, which is altogether alien from the meaning and object of a spiritual censure, but which has the sanction of honoured names in early English church history, grew up. The power of granting or refusing such redemptions at first no doubt rested entirely with the bishop or priest; afterwards the penitent was allowed to choose for himself, and systematic scales of penitential values were drawn up. It has been customary to assume that the system originated in our own land with archbishop Theodore. Morinus (de Poenit. x. 17), however, had the sagacity to reject as spurious the chapter in his so-called penitential on which the assumption is based. Since the discovery of the true penitential it is clear that redemptions were permitted a century before Theodore's time. Wasserschleben (Die Bussord. pp. 136–140) has published fragmentary collections of Irish canons, all of very early date, and some containing decisions of synods over which St. Patrick presided. [PENITENTIAL BOOKS, p. 1609.] Among these "Canones Hibernenses" is one series which treats entirely "De arreis" (arrhis, pledges). It contains nine different redemptions of the penance of a year. In the preface to the penitential of Theodore is an acknowledgment by the unknown editor of the use in its compilation of a "libellus scotorum," i.e. an Irish book, and it is highly probable that from these early Irish canons Theodore drew his reference to the practice of commutations. He did not himself originate the system; he found it existing, and gave it his sanction. "Item xii. triduana pro anno pensanda Teodorus laudavit. De aegris vero pretium viri vel ancillae pro anno" (Penitent. I. vii. 5). See ibid. I. iii. 3; I. iv. 1. Such a system as that by which a sinner was allowed to purchase himself free from the spiritual penalties attached to his sin was likely to be popular; and in the interval between the publication of the penitential of Theodore and that of Bede it grew with amazing rapidity. The latter treatise concluded with a chapter on commutations under twelve headings, out of which apparently the penitent was at liberty to select the easiest and most expeditious mode of performing his penance. He might choose almsgiving, or stripes, or psalm-singing, with genuflexions, and it is further provided (Baed. Poenitent. x. 8) that if he cannot learn psalms he may pick out some holy man to undertake for a consideration the penalty instead of him. The same system was tolerated by archbishop Egbert. Under the plea of a "consilium misericordiae" his Penitential (xiii. 11, xiv.–xvi.) lays before the delinquent an almost unlimited choice of redemptions. Nor was the corruption confined to these islands. The Frankish penitentials of Cummean (Wasserseh. p. 463) is equally lenient in the remission of penance, and gives a long catalogue of the methods by which it can be redeemed. At a later date Regino of Prüm issued a table of commutations of penance, printed by Morinus (x. 16) from an unpublished MS. See also Capitula Herard. c. 26, Conc. Tribur. A.D. 895, c. 56; and illustrations cited by Ducange, s. v. "Poenitentia." At the close of the 9th century the abuse prevailed equally in Italy, Gaul, and Germany (Morin, x. 17), and the councils of the period do not appear to have made any serious efforts to check it. In England the synod of Cloveshoe (A.D. 747), under archbishop Cuthbert, published some strong but ineffectual protests. Alms, it declared (c. 26), were to be given, not for the purpose of diminishing canonical penance, but to appease the Divine wrath; similarly (c. 27), psalms were not to be sung, in order that abstinence and fasting might be omitted; still less might the rich employ their wealth to relieve them from the penalties of their sins. A century and a half later the council of Tribur. (cc. 56–58) attempted to regulate indiscriminate redemption by decreeing that the first year of penance, except for some urgent cause, should be rigidly performed; of the second and third, portions only might be commuted; on the treatment of the remaining years there was no restriction.

The methods of redemption were various. Twenty-four "biduana," periods of two days' fasting, were equivalent to a year's penance (Bacd. Pen. x. 2). Instead of one week of penance, 300 psalms said kneeling, or, if said without bending the knee, 324 (Cummean "de Modis Poenitentiae.") Fifty psalms with genuflexions, or seventy without, might compound for one day's abstinence on bread and water (Egbert, Poen. xii. 11). Fifty psalms in winter had the same value as the whole psalter at another season (Ead. xv.). The penitent wishing to say fewer psalms must prostrate himself oftener and say the Miserere (ibid. xvi.), or he may obtain remission by getting a priest to say masses for him. The "Canones Hibernenses" attach other conditions to the saying of psalms; they should be said (c. 3) at the tomb of a saint, or (c. 4) while standing for three days in a church without food, or drink, or sleep. Another method of composition was scourging. Bede (Pen. x. 6) suffers the fourth year of a penalty to be redeemed by 300 lashes on the bare body. Egbert (Pen. xv.) assesses a day's penance at twelve strokes. In the Capitula Herardi (apud Morin. x. 16) the rod was to be applied during vigils. In Bede (x. 1–5) the psalm-singing was to be accompanied by so many "palmatae," which Ducange (s. v.) conjectures to mean not strokes of a rod, but prostrations, and with the palms of the hand extended on the ground. More general and more corrupt than any of the above redemptions was that of a money payment. Theodore (Pen. I. iii. 3) allowed a thief to escape part of his penance on making restitution, or (ibid. I. iv. 1) a murderer in a blood-feud by composition with the relatives of his victim. He also (ibid. I. vii. 5) gave the sanction of his authority to the manumission of slaves in lieu of penance. But he nowhere countenanced the bare and direct purchase of remission. In Bede's compilation the door was thrown open a little wider. In place of the fifth year of a long sentence large almsgiving would suffice, or if a penitent is ignorant of his psalms, he must give a denarius daily to the poor, in addition to fasting (Pen. x. 6). With Egbert redemption by money is openly recognized. He who cannot perform his penance for the first year must distribute in alms twenty-six solidi, for the second twenty, &c. (Pen. xiii. 11); if he is a powerful man he must release so many slaves and captives. The Capitula of Regino draw up a regular scale. For seven weeks' penance a rich man must pay twenty solidi, or, if he cannot afford so much, ten, and a poor man three. The money was to be used either for the release of captives, or to be placed on the altar, or for the servants of God, or in alms to the poor. By Conc. Tribur. c. 56, the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday fasts might be redeemed by a denarius, or by the support of three poor people. At a later period the laws of Edgar (A.D. 967) (Howel, Dec. Eccl. Britt. p. 53) mention the building and endowing of churches, making bridges, and repairing the highways, as modes of commuting ecclesiastical censures. To these may be added, of a still later date, pilgrimages and war against the infidel.

REFECTORY. [MONASTERY, p. 1240.]

REGALE. By the right of regale we are to understand the claim on the part of the sovereign of a country to enjoy the incomes of vacant bishoprics, and to present pleno jure to all ecclesiastical places or benefices, except the ordinary parochial cures. And the right of the king to the episcopal income—according to the French lawyers—was not extinguished by the mere appointment of a new bishop, but continued until the newly-appointed bishop had taken the oath of allegiance in due form (Döllinger in Kirchen-Lexicon, s. v.). The full development of this claim belongs to mediaeval and modern times; but so much as belongs to our period may be seen under VACANCY; BISHOP, p. 216 f; PRINCES, ALLEGIANCE TO.

REGENSE CONCILIUM. [RIEZ.]

REGIAE, another form of "rugae." Mabillon (Mus. Ital. ii. p. CXXXVII.) draws a distinction between the two which is probably without foundation.

[E. V.]

REGINA, ST., virgin and martyr, Sept. 7; commemorated at Autun (Mart. Usuard., Hieron., Wandalb.; Boll. Acta SS. Sep. iii. 24).

[C. H.]

REGIO. In the pagan history of Rome the word means a quarter, district, or ward of the city. In the time of Augustus, the city itself was divided into fourteen such wards.

The term was adopted by Christianity, and was made to serve the purposes of the church. The Ordo Romanus (ap. Ducange) observes that there were seven Regiones in the ecclesiastical division of Rome. But in the time of Gregory the Great there were fourteen Regiones (Morinus de Sacr.

Ord. iii. 8). Each had its regionary deacons, subdeacons, and acolytes. The regions took their turn by a regulated cycle in the pontifical ministration of Easter week, each region being responsible for a day, and each region had its assigned precedence both in church and in procession.

In the collection of rubrics, taken from the Salzburg Pontifical, and headed de Gradibus Ecclesiae Romanae (Martene, I. viii. xi. Ordo 9), we find that at ordination there was a gathering of the regions—"fit enim conventus populi et congregatio regionum primum ad S. Adrianum."

The regions had officers, who were called patroni regionum (Martene, ibid.) The term existed as early as the time of Clement I.; for Publius Tarquinius, stirred with envy at the increase of the Christians, tried the influence of money with these officers to check its progress. "Vocavit ad se patronos regionum et data eis pecunia monuit ut seditionem excitarent nomini Christiano." (Hist. Clem. I.) The patroni however, in this case, may perhaps have been civil officers. [H. T. A.]

REGIONARIUS. The term is sometimes used absolutely and by itself as the name of an office (Greg. Mag. vii. i. Ep. 5), and sometimes as an epithet with other official titles, notarius, diaconus, subdiaconus, defensores. An example of this may be taken from the second council at Rome (A.D. 745), where the word occurs in this connexion: "Accipiens Theophanius notarius regionarius et sacellarius relegit. . . ." (Actio 1; Labbe, vi. 1557.)

Bona observes that the term is applied to the ostiarii and other ministers who served the pontiff when he was officiating in the several regions. (Rer. Liturg. I. xxv. 18.) He however gives no example of the term Regionarius being applied to bishops. [See BISHOP.] Nor has the present writer been able to find such an application in Martene, Thomassin, Morinus, Hofmann, Du Cange, or other authority on the subject.

The term Regionarius was looked upon as a title of honour. Gregory the Great decreed that as some of the notarii and subdeacons were appointed regionarii, so seven of the most eminent of the defensores should be decorated with the same distinction (honore regionario decorentur, lib. vii. Ep. 17). One of the seven defensores regionarii was assigned to every two of the fourteen regiones of the city.

The following passage is of interest, as shewing the application of the term to the order of subdeacons: "Subdiaconi sunt omnes numero viginti et unus, septem regionarii qui epistolas et lectiones cantant in stationibus: septem Palatini qui idem munus praestant in ecclesiâ Lateranensi: septem alii qui dicuntur schola cantorum, qui cantant tantummodo quando summus pontifex celebrare consuevit" (Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iii. 8).

The regionary deacons of St. Maria and St. Sylvester were put in charge of the hospitals of pope Stephen III., A.D. 752–757 (Anast. Vit. Pont. p. 165).

A classification of the inferior ministers (acolytes, exorcists, lectors, ostiarii) is made by cardinal Bona into (1) regionarii, who were distributed throughout the regions, and in them severally ministered to the pontiff; (2) stationarii, who performed the same office for him when celebrating in the stations; (3) basilicarii, who served by turns in the Lateran Church; (4) oblationarii, whose duty it was to receive the oblations and bring them to the archdeacon. (Rer. Lit. I. xxv. 18).

When the pope distributed the eucharist, he communicated the regionarii last of all, except his immediate ministers (acolyte, &c.). The order was first those who were in orders; then the aristocracy (magnates); then the ladies (matronae); then the regionarii; and lastly, his acolyte and servers (Martene de Eccl. Rit. i. iv. x. 4). From this passage it seems as if regionarii was applied to persons not in any orders at all; as if it meant, in fact, people of the regiones, or, as we should say, the parishioners. [H. T. A.]

REGULARES. Horizontal rods of wood or metal for the suspension of veils or curtains. They are usually mentioned in connexion with the "rugae," which appear to have been the lattice-work screens and doors separating the presbytery, the confessio, or the sacrarium from the other parts of the church. The "regulares" were often of precious metal, and were decorated with a row of images on the upper part, Stephen IV. (Anastas. § 284) made silver "regularis" above the "rugae," by which access was given to the altar, "ubi imagines in frontispicio constitutae sunt," at St. Peter's, St. Paul's, and St. Andrew's. Hadrian I. (ibid. § 330) set up a "regularis" cased with silver at St. Peter's, and placed upon it portrait-busts ("vultus") of our Lord between the archangels Michael and Gabriel. He also erected above the upper "ruga" in the middle of the presbytery another silver-cased "regularis," supporting similar portrait-busts of the blessed Virgin between St. Andrew and St. John Baptist, all six "vultus" being made of plates of silver-gilt (Mabillon, Mus. Ital. tom. ii. pp. viii. cxxx.). [E. V.]

REGULARS. [MONASTERY.]

REGULUS, bishop and confessor, Mar. 30; depositio commemorated at Senlis (Mart. Usuard.; Boll. Acta SS. Mart. iii. 816). [C. H.]

REILIG, RELEC, RELIC, RELIG, Irish name for a cemetery. It is probably derived from the Latin reliquiae (e.g. Relic Odhrain, the monastic burying-place in Iona), yet is also applied to the pagan cemeteries like the Relig na Righ at Cruachan (Reeves, St. Adamnan, 203, 204, 283, 417, 452; Petrie, Round Towers, 103–7, 155–6). Todd (St. Patrick, 476) takes the word as equivalent to Recles, which he defines "a sepulchral church," and Reeves (St. Adamnan, 276, cf. 283) "an abbey-church," as distinguished from the secular cathedral. [J. G.]

RELICS. I. Heathen Precedent.—The law of uncleanness (Num. xix. 11–22) preserved the Jews from any undue veneration of the relics of the dead; and their freedom from this superstition was inherited by the church, founded as it was by men of that nation, and at first largely composed of them. But the semi-converts of the 4th century and downwards brought with them a strong tendency to the worship of human relics and to a belief in their tuteiary power.

This had been general among their heathen forefathers, whether Greek or Roman. If we refer to a few examples, the reader will be able to judge for himself in what degree the later practice of Christians sprang from, or was moulded by, heathen precedent. We may instance the reverence paid by Athens to the supposed relics of Oedipus (Valerius Maximus, Exempl. Mem. v. 3, ext. 3), and of Theseus (Plutarch, Theseus, 36; compare Cimon, 8), by Thebes to those of Linus (Pausanias, Boeotic. 29), and by Alexandria to those of Alexander the Great (Aelian, Var. Hist. xii. 64; Suetonius, Augustus, 18). The bones of Zoroaster were the safeguard of Persia (Chron. Paschale, 67, ed. Dind.), while those of the first Perdiccas secured the kingdom to his descendants, so long as they should be buried by them (Justin, Hist. Philipp. vii. 2). An oracle declared that if the bones of Phalantus reduced to dust were scattered over the forum of Tarentum, the city would never be lost by the Partheniae (Justin, iii. 4). See the Aglaophamus of Lobeck, ii. 280.

The pomp that attended the translation of the relics of a martyr may in like manner be illustrated by the honours shewn to the remains of Demetrius (Plut. Demetr. 53), and Phocion (Id. Phoc. 37).

The heathen practice of delivering orations at the graves of heroes is mentioned by Cyril of Alexandria as a justification of the Christian rites over the remains of the martyrs (Contra Julian. x. 336, ed. Spanh.).

II. The earliest Treatment of Relics in the Church.—The first Christians regarded the bodies of their brethren as worthy of very reverent care, because they had been instruments by which God had wrought ("quibus tanquam organis et vasis ad omnia bona opera usus est Spiritus" (Aug. De Cura pro Mort. 5), and were destined to share in the future bliss and glory of the redeemed soul. It was for this reason far more congenial to Christian feeling to cover the remains of a friend with earth (OBSEQUIES, § xv.), and leave them to the natural process of decay, than to dissipate them by fire, or give them to the birds and beasts. The feeling was of course greatly intensified, when one had proved his faith in the resurrection by a death of suffering. Great efforts were therefore often made to obtain the body of a martyr for honourable burial. At first, as we shall see, this was the only motive; but as time advanced, a superstitious value began to be set on the relics of martyrs and other eminent Christians. There is, however, no trace of the error to be found before the conversion of the emperors, under whom multitudes of proselytes entered the church, who had only partially renounced heathenism.

The best illustration of the purer sentiment is found in the earliest records of the martyrs, and especially in those contemporary Acts and Passions which were prepared by the notaries of the great churches for reading in the services on their anniversaries. A careful examination of such documents, as collected by Ruinart (Acta Martyrum, ed. Veron. 1731), clearly proves the complete freedom of the first Christians from the undue veneration of relics of whatever kind. For our purpose these Acta naturally divide themselves into three classes. (1) There are fifty-six documents that make no mention of the burial of the martyr or of any subseqnent disposal of his relics. (2) There are thirty-two that mention or allude to the burial only; and (3) there are seventeen which speak of the relics as preserved for veneration or as a means of healing, or both. The first two classes range in subject from A.D. 61 or 62 (Martyrium S. Jacobi primi Hieros. Episc. Ruin. 5) to 365 (Passio S. Bademi in Persia, R. 532), and in authorship from Hegesippus A.D. 170 (R. 5, 6) to SS. Chrysostom and Augustine and Theodoret (R. 446, 496, 524). In the Acta of SS. Fructuosi, &c. (of the 2nd class), who died at Tarragona, A.D. 259, the friends are forbidden to keep any relics. The martyrs had been burnt, and at night the Christians went to the amphitheatre, "with wine wherewith to quench the half-burnt bodies, which done they appropriated, as each could, the ashes of the said martyrs which had been collected." But Fructuosus "appeared to the brethren and warned them that they should restore, without delay, what each had taken of the ashes, and see that they were buried together" (R. 193).

The earliest martyrdom in the third class is that of St. Symphorian at Autun (cir. 180), but the mention of Euphronius the bishop of Autun shews that the document cannot be earlier than about 470 (see Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii. 15). The next is that of St. Lawrence, A.D. 258; but the chronicler, or rather rhapsodist in this case, is the poet Prudentius (Hymn de Mart. S. L. See line 133 et seq.), who lived a century and a half later (R. 169). St. Eulalia, A.D. 304, is celebrated by the same writer (Hymn de Mart. S. Eul. See line 43; R. 399). Of St. Ferreolus, who died at Vienne 304, the later compiler of his Passion, says, "Sepulcrum sancti corporis ejus veneramur . . . cujus beneficia per civitates sicut expetuntur votis, ita beneficiis frequentibus approbantur" (R. 408). The graves of St. Vitalis and St. Agricola (d. 304) were opened in the presence of St. Ambrose, 393, who fully believed in the wonder-working power of relics. He calls those gathered by him "crucis tropaea, cujus gratiam in operibus agnoscitis" (Exhort. Virgin. 2; R. 410). The fervid panegyrics of Prudentius (Hymn. de SS. xviii. Mm. Caesaraug.) are again our authority for the honour paid to the relics of the martyrs of Saragossa, 304, and St. Cassian of Imola, date uncertain (R. 411, 469). Of St. Domnina etc. of about the same date, St. Chrysostom some eighty years after, says, "Let us fall down before their remains; let us embrace their coffins; for the coffins of the martyrs can acquire great virtue" (De Bernice, &c., 7; R. 419). The martyrdom of Cyricus and Julitta (at Tarsus, 305) was written by Theodotus of Iconium more than 250 years later. Of another Julitta, who suffered at Caesarea in Cappadocia some time in the 4th century, St. Basil, about 370, says that the earth where she was buried sent forth a spring of water—"both a safeguard to those in health, and source of pleasure to those who enjoy it soberly, and a comfort to the sick" (Hom. in Mart. Jul. 2; R. 424). The same father says that the ashes of the Forty Martyrs of Sebaste in Armenia, A.D. 320, being thrown into a river, carried a blessing to all the neighbouring coasts, "Like towers closely set, they afford protection against the incursions of our enemies" (Hom. de SS, xl. Mm. 8; R. 464; similarly Greg.

Nyss. Hom. i. in xl. Mm. ii. 935). St. Chrysostom again in his Laud. S. Drosidis (at Antioch, date unc.) asserts that the bones of the martyrs both drive away disease and put death to flight. They have "done the latter," he says, "in the time of our forefathers; the former in ours" (§ 4). "Where the bones of the martyrs are buried, the devils fly as from fire and intolerable punishment" (2). Passio S. Genesii (at Arles, date unc.): "The faithful servants of God at that time took care that the guardian power of this one martyr should be a defence to either bank of the river crowned with a double city (the Rhône flowing through it); for leaving the traces of his consecrated blood in the place itself of his blessed passion, they transferred his honoured remains to the other side of the river, that the holy Genesius might be present in both places, there by his blood, here by his body" (R. 474; written by Paulinus, A.D. 393, ad. calc. Epp. Opp. 316). Martyrium S. Juliani (a Cilician, date unc.): "Take one afflicted by a devil and mad, and lead him to the holy tomb, in which are the remains of the martyr, and you will see him quite starting and fleeing away . . . . Now, after so long a time, when the body has become dust and ashes, they do not dare to look towards the tomb" (Chrys. Lauaat. S. M. Juliani, § 2; R. 476). Encomium in S. M. Phocam (at Sinope, date unc.): "The relics divided among many places keep whole for the thrice blessed martyr the love of his name . . . . The Romans worship Phocas no less than Peter and Paul. Whence, as they relate, they have with great pains procured the head of the martyr . . . . to honour him, and for their own advantage" (Asterius Amas. A.D. 401, in Combefis. Auct. Gr. i. 493). Epistola Ecclesiae Gotthicae de Martyrio S. Sabae (in Gotthia, 372): the remains were left unburied by the murderers, "sed a piis fratribus servatae sunt, easque clarissimus dux Scythiae Julius Soranus, Deum colens, missis viris fide dignis, e loco barbaro in Romaniam transtulit, et gratificari volens patriae suae pretiosum munus, fructum fidei gloriosum, misit in Cappadociam ad vestram religionem, ex voluntate presbyterorum" (R. 529). S. Vigilii Tridentini Epistola ad S. Joan. Chrys. de Martyrio SS. Sisinnii, &c. (at Anagnia or Anaunia near Trent, 397) tells us that a nobleman "sanctorum recentium et vapore fumantium reliquias postulavit," which he took or sent to Constantinople (R. 535).

The necessary inference from the foregoing analysis is that the worship of relics, and the belief in them as remedies and a protection against evil, originated in the 4th century. They first appear in writings, none of which are earlier than the year 370; but they prevailed rapidly when they had once taken root. This was perhaps largely owing to the encouragement which they received, as we have seen, from some truly great men, as Ambrose and Augustine among the Latins, and Basil and Chrysostom in the East, who were evidently deceived by certain physical phenomena, the nature of which is ill understood even at the present day.

III. Multifarious Relics of Patriarchs, Prophets, Christ, the Apostles, and other Saints.—The bones of the saints of the Old Testament, long held unclean, became in the 4th century objects of great veneration. E.g. Paula and Eustochium, writing to Marcella in 386, suggest that when she visits the Holy Land they will "pray together in the mausoleum of David, . . . hasten to the tabernacles or memoriae of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, . . . go to Samaria, and together adore the ashes of John the Baptist, Elisha also, and Obadiah" (Epist. Hieron. xlvi. 12). St. Jerome, in 406, tells us that Arcadius translated "the bones of the blessed Samuel from Judaea into Thrace" (C. Vigilant. 5). Among the numberless relics collected with the aid of Charlemagne from all parts by Angilbert of Centule, A.D. 814, were the blood, hairs (also at Corbie, Acta Bened. iv. i. 376), and garments of John the Baptist, bones of his father Zacharias, memorials of Symeon, &c. (Scriptum S. Angilb. 14, 15; Bolland. Feb. iii. 103; or Acta Bened. IV. i. 114). Hair from the beard of Noah was shewn at Corbie in the same century (ibid. 377).

Alleged relics of our Lord were very numerous, and, it is to be feared, all, without exception, spurious. For the history of the cross see Vol. I. pp. 503–506. To the discovery of the cross by Helena, St. Ambrose in 395 adds that of the title written by Pilate, and of the nails, one or more of which she caused to be wrought into a bit for her son's horse (de Obit. Theodos. 46, 47), a tradition known to St. Jerome (Comm. in Zach. xiv. 20), Cyril Alex. (Comm. in loc. cund.), Theodoret (Hist. Eccl. i. 18), Sozomen (H. E. ii. 1), Rufinus (H E. i. 7), Gregory of Tours (Mirac. i. 6), and Cassiodorius (Hist. Trip. ii. 18). By the time of Gregory of Tours, 573, the holy spear (rediscovered in 1098, Guibert. Abb. Hist. Hieros. v. 19, vi. 7), the reed, the sponge, the crown of thorns, the seamless coat, and the pillar of scourging had all been supplied to the ignorant credulity of the age (Mirac. i. 6–8). The thorns were still green, or if they withered were daily restored to freshness "by divine power." Twists of bread made with water from the tomb were sent over the world, and healed many. The same virtue was ascribed to plaited thongs that had been wrapped round the pillar (ibid. 7, 8). The holy coat was kept in a chest in a very secret crypt in a basilica at Galathea, a place mentioned by Gregory only, "quae arca a devotis atque fidelibus cum summa diligentia adoratur" (8). Twenty-one "holy coats" were afterwards shewn, as at Trèves, Argenteuil, Rome, Bremen, &c. (See Gildemeister und von Sybel, Der heilige Rock zu Trier und die zwanzig andern heiligen ungenähten Röcke, Düsseld. 1845). Angilbert (u.s.) believed that he had acquired parts of the cross, bonds, nails, and sponge, of our Lord's garments and sandals, of the table and bread of the Last Supper. He also possessed water taken from the place of His baptism. At Corbie, in a reliquary called the Prima St. Petri, said to have been given to the monastery by Charlemagne, were His blood and hairs, part of the umbilical cord, of the manger, cross, napkin, table, tomb, clothing, &c. (Acta Bened. iv. i. 375).

The chair of St. James, the first bishop of Jerusalem, was in all probability the only true relic of the apostolic age that was preserved to the 4th century. It is mentioned by Eusebius as treasured at Jerusalem in his time, "a clear proof of the veneration in which holy men were and are held" (H. E. vii. 19).

In the collection of Angilbert (u.s.) were many alleged relics of the blessed Virgin—drops of her milk, some hairs, shreds of her cloak and garment (these all with parts of her veil, &c. also at Corbie, Acta Bened. iv. i. 375), and a part of the manger (praesepe Mariae), which was in the same age said to be at Rome (Notitia Eccles. Urb. Rom. Alcuini, Opp. App. iii. 598). Abundance of her hair (reliquiae tantae capillorum) was said to have been brought from Jerusalem to Spain, and to be preserved at Astorga and Oviedo (Osmundi Epist. ad Idam, Mabill. Vet. Anal. 433, ed. 2). At Corbie were hairs and some of the ointment of Mary Magdalene (Acta Bened. iv. i. 376).

Part of the remains of St. Peter and St. Paul are now "in the Vatican church, another portion in the basilica of St. Paul; but their sacred heads are in the Lateran basilica" (Ruinart ad Greg. Tur. Mirac. i. 28). The bodies of SS. Andrew, Luke, and Timothy were at Constantinople (Hieron. C. Vigil. 5). Relics of St. Andrew were also preserved at Neuvy, near Tours (G. T. Mir. i. 31). The chains of St. Paul were early said to be at Rome (Chrysost. Hom. viii. in Ep. ad Eph. 2; Greg. M. Ep. iii. 30, xi. 49). Part of a table belonging to him was in the collection of Angilbert (u.s.). Fetters of St. Paul were sent by pope John, 537, to a bishop of Vienne (Hard. Conc. iii. 342). The chains of St. Peter appeared at Rome much later than those of St. Paul, not in fact till very special claims were made for Rome on his account. If I mistake not, Gregory I. is the first to mention them. He sent to Childebert, in 595, "keys of Peter" (Greg. Tur. Mir. i. 29; see § vi. sub fin.) and some filings from his chains (Epist. v. 6; comp. ii. 33; iii. 3). So in 741 Charles received from Gregory III. the "keys of the venerable sepulchre, with the chains of St. Peter" (Fredegar. Chron. ad an.). The importance of this possession to Rome in that age may be easily understood:

"His solidata fides, his est tibi, Roma, catenis."
Alcuin. Carm. 169.

A nail from the cross of St. Peter was sent by Gregory of Rome to Secundinus, a recluse (Hard. Conc. iii. 503). At Centule (and Corbie, Acta Bened. u.s.) were hairs from the beard of St. Peter, parts of his casula, his sandals and table (Script. Angilb. u.s.); at Corbie parts of his ribs, of his cross, and dust from his tomb (Acta Bened. u.s.). The relics of the other apostles were in similar request, and were generally of the same character.

The relics of St. Stephen the proto-martyr deserve especial mention. In 415 the site of his body and of those of Nicodemus and Gamaliel was, according to one legend, revealed to a priest named Lucian. They were at a place called Caphargamala (i.e. Villa Gamalielis), near Jerusalem (Lucian de Rev. Corp. Steph. 2–3, in Opp. Aug. App. vi. ed. Ben.), to which city that of St. Stephen was removed, except some small joints and the earth into which the flesh was resolved (ibid. 8). Nevertheless another story, translated from the Greek by Anastasius Bibliothecarius in the 9th century, affirms that it was at Jerusalem in the time of the emperor Constantine (died 337) and Cyril of Jerusalem (who, however, were not contemporaries), and was by their joint action removed to Byzantium (de Transl. S. Steph. ibid.). A third document tells us of relics of Stephen brought from Jerusalem to Minorca soon after their discovery, and there working miracles, by which many Jews were converted (Ep. Severi de Conv. Jud. ibid.); while two books de Miraculis S. Stephani, said to be written at the instance of Evodius, bishop of Uzalis, in Africa, the friend of Augustine, record many alleged miracles wrought in that city by relics of St. Stephen sent thither "from the parts of the East" (i. 1). Several miracles, alleged to have been wrought at Uzalis and some neighbouring places by the same relics, were believed by St. Augustine (de Civ. Dei, xxii. 8, §§ 10–21). In the 6th century some blood of St. Stephen is found in the altar of a church at Bordeaux (Greg. Tur. Mir. i. 34). But far more singular relics were some drops of sea-water, preserved by the bishop of that city, which had fallen from his robes when he was seen in a vision after succouring a ship in distress, and some threads of a cloth with which the water had been wiped from the deck (ibid.). Angilbert (u.s.) possessed one of the proto-martyr's ribs, and one of the stones with which he was slain.

Among the numberless miscellaneous relics valued within our period, we may mention bars of the gridiron of St. Lawrence (Angilb. u.s.), the under-pall of St. Radegund, which, dipped in water, gave it the power to heal fevers (Vita, Baud. 32), the straw on which St. Germanus had lain (Vita, Venant. 46), a thread from the shirt of St. Lubin (Vita, Venant. 20), a shoe that fell from the foot of Epipodius when he was led to martyrdom (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Conf. 54), cords from a bed (ibid. 85), &c. Dust from almost any shrine was believed to have healing power. By this means St. Hilary cured leprosy (Vita, ii. 4); St. Rigobert, the ague (Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rem. ii. 14); St. Thaumastus, a French bishop, toothache and fever (Greg. Tur. u.s. 53; see also Mir. ii. 45); the woman who had treasured the shoe of St. Epipodius, ague (ib. 54); &c. Earth from Jerusalem was in equal request, and that early in the 5th century. See St. Augustine, de Civ. Dei, xxii.–xxviii. 6; Ep. 52, ad Severin. § 2. So the soil which had drunk the blood of the martyrs under Sapor II., A.D. 375, was "dug up and carried away, and preserved by the Christians as useful to heal the sick" (S. J. Assem. Acta SS. Mm. Or. et Occ. i. 162); and in the West the same thing is told of the earth on which Stratonica and Seleucus had last trodden (ibid. ii. 119), and of sand from the spot on which others had suffered (Aridii Vita, 6). Laurel leaves found in a tomb (Greg. Tur. Glor. Conf. 84), and flowers from a miraculous tree before the tomb of St. Eulalia (Glor. Mart. i. 91) were preserved for the same purpose.

The "holy grail" first appeared when Caesarea was taken by the Crusaders in 1101 (William of Tyre, Hist. Rer. Transm. x. 16), if it be correctly identified with the vessel (of green glass?) found there, but not at first deemed a sacred relic.

Long lists of relics in ancient churches at Rome and elsewhere are printed by Mai, in Script. Vet. Nova Collectio, v. i. 37–52. Perhaps the longest extant, enumerating nearly 400 articles, occurs in the Relatio de Orig. Monast. Windberg. given by Basnage, Thesaur. Monum. III. ii. 214.

IV. Spurious Relics.—St. Augustine, denouncing certain wandering impostors in the habit of monks, says: "Some of them have for sale the members of martyrs, if they were martyrs" (de Op. Monach. xxviii. 36; comp. Isidore de Div. Off. ii. 15). Fraud was, therefore, already practised by the beginning of the 5th century. Gregory I. near the end of the 6th, writing to the Augusta Constantina, declares that some Greek monks had been detected exhuming bones near the church of St. Paul in Rome, who, being closely questioned, "confessed that they had intended to carry those bones to Greece as the relics of saints" (Epist. iii. 30). About 587 an impostor appeared at Tours and Paris, professing to come from Spain with relics of St. Vincent and St. Felix. Having told the story, the historian adds: "Multi enim sunt qui has seductiones exercentes populum rusticum in errorem ponere non desistunt" (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ix. 6); and this notwithstanding the stories of divine chastisement which were circulated. For example, one who exhibited for gain a pretended bone of St. Godehard, was seized with delirium and died (Transl. S. God. 46, Acta Bened. VI. ii. 390).

Such frauds were less frequently exposed in the ages that followed, many bishops unhappily thinking that it would be inexpedient to undeceive the people; e.g. a man, who had under various names sold false relics in France, went into Switzerland, and there having, "more solito, collected by night from some vile place the bones of an unknown person, and placed them in a box on a bier, declared that he had been revealed to him by angelic information, and pretended that he was a martyr named Justus." The ignorant were deceived, miracles were said to follow, and at length the body was brought to be placed in a newly-erected church at Sus in the Engadine. Our informant was present at the consecration, and by questioning the man easily detected the imposture. Nevertheless the service proceeded, and the false relics had their part in it (see after, § xiii.). As in later times with the impostures of La Salette, Lourdes, &c. the educated and thoughtful were shocked and scandalized, but the multitude "remained in its error injusti nomen pro Justo venerans" (Glaber Rodolph. Hist. iv. 3).

We must not, however, attribute all false relics to the action of deliberate fraud. The ignorant were always disposed to regard any human remains accidentally discovered as those of a martyr, especially if found in or near a church. An altar had been reared in a certain place in the diocese of Tours on the strength of a popular tradition that a martyr had been buried there. St. Martin, A.D. 375, doubting the fact, "standing on the tomb itself, prayed to God that he would shew who, and of what merit, the person there buried was. Then, turning to the left, he saw standing near him an ill-conditioned, fierce-looking shade. He orders it to declare its name and character. It tells its name, and, touching its crime, confesses that it was a robber," &c. (Sulpic. Sever. Vita B. Mart. 8). Augustine of Canterbury found some persons, probably in France, "worshipping" a body which they supposed to be that of St. Sixtus. He wrote to Rome, asking Gregory for some genuine relics of the martyr, who, granting his request, gave him this direction: "The relics which you have asked for are to be buried by themselves, that the place in which the aforesaid body lies may be altogether closed up, and the people not suffered to desert the certain and worship the uncertain" (Greg. M. Epist. xii. 31).

V. The Trial of Relics.—Doubtful relics were often put to a deliberate test. We first hear of this in Spain, the council of Saragossa in 592 making a decree that the relics in use where the Arian heresy had prevailed should be "brought by the priests in whose churches they were found, and, being presented to the bishops, should be tried by fire" (can. 2). Actual instances of such ordeal at that period are not, so far as I am aware, on extant record; but we meet with several later on. E.g. Egbert of Trier finding what was supposed to be the body of St. Celsus, "lest any suspicion of the sanctity of the holy relics should arise, during Mass, after the offertory had been sung, threw a joint of the finger of St. Celsus, wrapped in a cloth, into a thurible full of burning coals, which remained unhurt and untouched by the fire through the whole time of the canon" (Annal. Bened. iii. 658, ad an. 979, n. 91). Similarly when a monk brought from Jerusalem to Monte Cassino a piece of linen (more probably cloth of asbestos), alleged to be part of the cloth with which our Lord wiped the feet of the disciples at the Last Supper, it was also put into a censer containing fire. "Mox quidem in ignis colorem conversa post paululum vero amotis carbonibus ad pristinam speciem mirabiliter est reversa" (Leo Marsic. Chron. Cass ii. 33; Acta Bened. s. vi. i. 101). The relics of St. Rotrudis stood the same test (Chron. Andriensis Monast. in Spicil. Dacher. ii. 78, ed. 2), which was applied also to the bones of king Wistan (Vita Wist. 5, in Boll. June 1; i. 87); and other instances might be given.

Ruinart has printed, from a MS. preserved in Rheims, a form of prayer to be used at the trial of relics (App. ad Opp. Greg. Tur. 1366), which Mabillon has reprinted in App. 2 to the Epist. de Cultu SS. Ignotorum, written by him under the name of Eusebius Romanus. It is also given from two Rheims MSS. by Martene, Ant. Eccl. Rit. iii. 8. We observe, however, that the relics referred to in the prayer are only portions of the saint's dress, "pannus iste, vel filum istud," a circumstance that suggests suspicion. It would require no great adroitness to appear to reproduce a burnt shred of cloth.

VI. Translation of Relics.—For some centuries there was an unwillingness to meddle with the bodies of the saints when once buried, arising at first from a proper feeling, but later on from a superstitious fear. A disciple of Simeon Stylites, desiring a relic of his master, thought he saw the body stir, and desisted in alarm (Antonius in Vita S. Sim. 16). This wholesome shrinking was first forgotten in the East (see the next paragraph of this section), but it remained so long a tradition of the western church that Gregory of Rome could say in 593, "De Graecorum consuetudine, qui ossa levare sanctorum se assenunt, vehementer miramur, et vix credimus" (Epist. iii. 30). He declared, though not quite truly, as we shall see: "In Romanis vel totius Occidentis partibus omnino intolerabile est atque sacrilegum, si sanctorum corpora tangere

Even down to the latter part of the 6th century (hodieque) there was "so great a fear" of meddling with the tomb of St. Cassian that "no one at all had dared to touch anything belonging to him. If any one did so, he was either seized by a demon or destroyed by a sudden death" (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Mart. 43). When the tomb of Agricola or Vitalis was opened by one who "desired to take therefrom some of the sacred ashes," the offender was caught by the stone falling on him, and with difficulty released (ib. 44). A soldier who rescued some relics of St. Andrew from a fire was seized with cramp at the door of the church, whereupon he put the casket round the neck of an unpolluted child, one of his prisoners, and so "arrived safely in his own country" (Id. Mir. i. 30). When the Manichaeans destroyed a fig-tree which had a healing power from growing on the spot where St. Narses had suffered (A.D. 341), they were punished by a plague (Assem. Acta SS. MM. iv. 101). When Constantina begged of Gregory I. some relics of St. Paul, he assured her that "the bodies of St. Peter and St. Paul blazed in their churches with miraculous terrors, so great that it was not possible to draw nigh thither even for prayer without great fear." He affirms that when his predecessor wished to change the silver covering over the body of St. Peter, "signum ei non parvi terroris apparuit;" and that when he himself wished to make some improvement about the tomb of St. Paul, the person who ordered the removal of some other bones found near it, "apparentibus quibusdam tristibus signis, subita morte defunctus est;" and again, that when the tomb of St. Lawrence was accidentally opened, all present died within ten days (Epist. iii. 30). Clovis was struck with madness because he attempted to carry off a bone of St. Denys (Gesta Dagoberti, i. 2; in Duchesne, Hist. Franc. Script. i. 589, comp. Gesta Reg. Fr. 44, ibid. 717). See also Vita S. Gudwali, vii. 72, in Bolland. June 6; i. 747; de Certatio Ep. 5, ib. 709; Illustr. Claud. iv. 44, ib. June 6, i. 678; &c.

Constantine was the first who ventured to move the bodies of saints, contrary to the spirit of the ante-Nicene church:

> "Constantino primum sub Caesare factum est."
> Paulin. Poem. xix. 321.

To gain for his new city a prestige similar to that conferred on old Rome by the remains of St. Peter and St. Paul, he transferred thither "the holy relics of Andrew, Luke, and Timothy" (Hieron. c. Vigil. 5; Procop. de Aedificiis, i. 4; Theodorus Lector, Hist. Eccles. ii. 61). A later law of Theodosius expressly forbade such translations to the subject: "Humatum corpus nemo ad alterum locum transferat, nemo martyrem distrahat" (Codex, ix. 17, § 7). Gregory I. (as we have seen) denied that it was ever lawful to disturb them. In France, however, the rule had long been relaxed. The council of Epaone, in 517, contented itself with forbidding "the relics of saints to be placed in oratories attached to vills, unless it so happened that the clergy of some parish were near to serve (qui famulentur) the sacred ashes with frequent psalm-singing" (can. 25). Under Charlemagne the old Gallican liberty was restrained, through Roman influence as we cannot doubt, by the council of Metz, A.D. 813, which decreed that no one should presume to transport the bodies of the saints from place to place without the sanction of the prince or of the bishops, and the licence of the holy synod (can. 51). Hence, generally only keys, BRANDEA, &c. were taken from the tomb of a martyr, even when a relic was required for the consecration of a church. If bodies were removed at all, it was only that they might be buried again in a more fitting place. This is shewn at length by Mabillon in Praef. Act. Bened. saec. ii. n. 42. The instances of Stephen, Gervasius, &c. (see also Greg. Tur. Mir. i. 51, 56, 63; de Glor. Conf. 72, 80) must therefore be regarded as exceptions. See other exceptions in the translations of SS. Marculfus, Quintianus, Audoenus, Leodegarius, Etheldrida, and Cuthbert (Acta Bened. from A.D. 558 to 667). At length, however, the tide had turned so completely that credulity was not overtaxed by the story of men struck with blindness because they attempted to hinder even a clandestine translation (De SS. Gratiniano et Felice, Boll. June 1, i. 24).

VII. Acquisition of Relics.—One great temptation to the production of false relics was the eagerness with which everything under the name of a relic was purchased. The sale of them was forbidden by Theodosius ("Humatum corpus . . . nemo mercetur, Codex, ix. 17, § 7); but apparently with little effect in the more distant provinces. A story told of an abbat of Bourges in the 6th century implies that it was common in France at that period (Greg. Tur. Mirac. i. 90). Q. Radegund procured a multitude of relics from all parts of the world "tam muneribus quam precibus" (Baudonivia, Vita S. Rad. 14). It was even considered a good deed to steal relics, because a proof of devotion: e. g. a German bishop, named Otwin, carried off by night from Pavia the relics of St. Epiphanius and St. Speciosa. He had scruples at first, "presumptionis ducebat," but a German presbyter "divinitus" overruled his objections (Vita Epiph. 3; Pertz, Mon. Alem. vi. 229). A French priest stole some relics of St. Helen from a church at Rome. They performed many miracles on the road to France, and were received with great honour (Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rem. ii. 8). The tomb of St. Benedict had been neglected, and its very site forgotten, but when the passion for relics became strong, a "learned presbyter" went from France to Italy to search for the body. Having with some difficulty found it, he carried it off surreptitiously, together with that of Scholastica, his sister, who had been buried in the same tomb. Miracles occurred at once. The fine linen in which the remains were wrapped became red with blood, and every natural obstacle to the priest's return yielded at once to supernatural power, until they were safely deposited at Fleury (de Transl. Corp. S. Bened. in Gall in Mabill. Anal. Vet. 211, ed. 2). There are some instances, however, in which the theft is disallowed; but these belong to an earlier period, or the circumstances were different. E. g. Gregory of Tours in the 6th century has a story of relics stolen, with a view to their being sold; but the result marked the disapprobation of Heaven (De Glor. Mart. 90). A bishop of Verdun, present at the opening of the shrine of St. Matthias at Trèves, attempted to steal a relic; but the lid fell suddenly, and he lost the end of his cope, which had been caught by it (Invent. Corp. S. Matthi. i. 4; Boll. Feb. iii. 449). In the old Calendar first published by Bucherius at the entry, "VI. idus Jul. Depos. Silani," we find the following curious note, "Hunc Silanum Martyrem Novati (Novatiani) furati sunt."

After the 6th century it was common to send to Rome for relics for the consecration of a new church, if none could be found at hand, and the request was generally answered by the gift of a brandeum, palliolum, or velamen, that had been held over the relics of St. Peter and St. Paul. Forms of letter to accompany such gifts are provided in the Liber Diurnus of the Roman Pontiffs: "Benedictiones de sanctuariis Apostolicis, id est palliola de eorum confessionibus, tradidimus collocanda (in ecclesia)" (v. 12; see tit. 15). Again: "Scias sanctuaria novitei missa. Sanctuaria vero suscepta sua cum reverentia collocabis" (17). A supplement to the Liber Diurnus gives a form in which the pope, intending himself to consecrate a church, demands of a bishop relics of the saint to whom it was to be dedicated: "Levatas reliquias contradere non omittas; ut ad nos . . . quantocius valeant reportari" (Mus. Ital. i. 35).

VIII. Receptacles of Relics.—These were called CAPSA (originally the coffin for the whole body) (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. viii. 5), which later was "capsa major" (Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rem. iii. 5); capsula (G. T. u. s. x. 31, § 19; Vita S. Aridii, 29, &c.); capsella (Suggest. Legat. inter Epp. Hormisdæ ad calc. Ep. 65; De Mirac. S. Steph. i. 8 in Ap. vi. ad Opp. S. Aug. ed. Ben.); capsis (Translatio S. Mennatis, in Martene et Durand. Ampliss. Collect. vi. 983; Mirac. S. Gibriani, i. 5, Bolland. Maii, vii. 633, &c.); arca (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. x. 15, Mir. i. 8; Conc. Bracar. A.D. 575, can. 6, "arca Dei cum reliquiis"), θήκη, theca (Sozom. Hist. Eccl. ix. 2; where = σόρος; Theodoret in Ps. lxvii. 12; Testam. Perpetui, Turon. Greg. T. Opp. 1318); scrinium (whence shrine, screen), scriniolum, Actus Pontif. Cenoman. 24, in Mabill. Analecta Vet. 300, ed. 2; Chron. Cassin. iii.; 57, &c. but I doubt if within our period; chrismarium (Vita Aridii, 6, 35, 36; Greg. Tur. de Mir. S. Mart. iv. 32); sanctuarium, at first the reliquary, but afterwards less properly the relic (Greg. M. Ep. v. 45; Conc. Meld. 845, can. 39; Mus. Ital. ii. 152, &c.); turris (Chron. Cassin. iii. 30), probably because this was a common name of the eucharistic pyx; pixidula (ibid.), &c. Relics were often inclosed in crosses (Greg. Tur. Mir. i. 11; Testam. Perpet. u. s. &c.). [RELIQUARY.]

IX. Relics carried about the Person.—The Council of Braga, 675, condemns the vainglory of some bishops, who in their progress to church on the festivals of martyrs were wont to "put their relics on their necks, ... as if they were the ark holding the relics, the Levites (deacons) in albes carrying them on litters." For the future, either the Levites were to carry "the ark of God with the relics," or the bishop might carry it himself walking in the procession (can. 6). The objection here, however, was that this practice ministered to the pride of the bishop. For it had long been the custom to carry relics about the person, and the practice continued; e. g. the leader of a party of Indian monks (perhaps about A.D. 380) wore a "scrip of hair-cloth, filled with the relics of certain holy fathers" (Joan. Damasc. Vita Barlaam, c. 22). Germanus of Auxerre, A.D. 420, when a blind child was brought to him, "took in his hands the little case (capsulam) with the relics of saints hanging by his side, and, tearing it off his neck, applied it to the eyes of the girl in the sight of all" (Constant. Vita S. Germ. i. 24). Aridius, about 580, wore relics about his own neck (Vita, 29), and hung dust from the tomb of St. Martin in a little case on that of Gregory of Tours (G. T. Hist. Fr. viii. 15; see also de Glor. Mart. i. 84). St. Willehad of Bremen "had a case with holy relics about his neck" (Anschar. in Vita Will. in Acta Bened. s. iii. P. 2, p. 406). St. Gall wore one with relics of the blessed Virgin (Walafr. Strabo in Vita S. Gall. 11). This was, however, probably always so far uncommon that the wearer of relics was supposed thereby to profess peculiar sanctity. Thus, in a particular case, "Capsulari honore, quo reliquias inclusas collo gestabat, cognoverunt Dei esse famulum et cultorem" (Vita S. Amatoris, c. iv. § 25; Boll. May 1, i. 57). [RELIQUARY.]

X. Oaths taken over Relics.—This was common at one time both in the East and West. Cyril of Scythopolita relates the story of one who, having denied a trust, was required to take an oath over the relics of Euthymius. His perjury was punished by a scourging in a vision and death (Vita S. Euth. 155). In the West we read of oaths over the tombs or relics of SS. Denys (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 33), Martin (ib. v. 49), Genesius (de Glor. Mart. 74), Maximin (de Glor. Conf. 93), Julian (de Mir. ii. 19, 39), &c. See Car. M. Capit. i. an. 7, 89 n. 62. A law of Childeric, 744 (Capit. Reg. Fr. i. 154), renewed by Charlemagne (Capit. iv. an. 803, c. 10; Capit. R. F. vi. 214), decreed that "every oath be sworn in a church or over relics."

But the laws of the Franks took cognisance of such oaths more than a century before Childeric. Dagobert in 630 prescribes the ceremonial. When the oath is taken, the accused and his compurgators shall "put their hands on the capsa, and he only whose case is being examined shall say the words, putting his hand on the hands of all the rest, that so may God help him and those relics under the hands which he holds, that he may not incur guilt in the matter for which he is questioned" (Lex Alam. vi. 7, Cap. Reg. Fr. i. 60). Hence, in the laws the accused is said to touch the relics "manu quintâ," "sextâ," &c. according to the number of his compurgators (Baluze, Notae in Marculfum in Capit. Reg. Franc. ii. 924); e. g. among the Formulae collected by Marculfus is an order that one accused of receiving a fugitive slave shall repair on a given day to the royal palace and clear himself, "sua manu septim . . . . super capella (= capsella) Domni Martini" (i. 38). Formularies used on these occasions were: "By this holy place and all the divine relics (patrocinia) of the saints who rest here" (Vet. Form. Andegav. 49, in Mabill. Anal. Vet. 396, ed. 2); "By this holy place and the relics of the blessed martyrs" (Greg. T. Hist. Franc. iv. 47).

Egbert of York, A.D. 732, imposed a penance of seven years on those who took a false oath "in a church, or on the gospel, or on the relics of the saints" (de Remed. Pecc. 9; see Rabanus Maurus, Ep. ad Heriban. 18); or bound them, as in another code (Poenitentiale, i. 34), "to fast four winters." By a law of Charlemagne a false oath over relics was to be punished by the loss of a hand, or heavy fine (Capit. 3, an. 813, n. 30). Gregory III., A.D. 731, declares that the penance for perjury "in altare ubi reliquiae habentur" was, according to ancient law, to last seven years. The penalty was the same when one led a person to commit such perjury in ignorance (Judicia, vii.; Hard. Conc. iii. 1872). Stories of divine vengeance were also current, as of sudden blindness or palsy inflicted on the perjurer (Vita Meinwerci, ix. 63; in Boll. June 5, i. 553).

XI. Relics under the Altar.—It became the custom at a very early period to build altars over the body of martyrs, or close to the place of their passion. [MEMORIA, MARTYRIUM.] The Council of Carthage, 401, ordered that all altars raised "per agros aut vias, tanquam memoriae martyrum" should be destroyed, unless relics of martyrs were really buried there (can. 7). It was natural, therefore, that when the remains of a saint were removed to a church they should be put under the altar. Thus, of the earliest translation on record we read: "Andrew, Timothy, and Luke the evangelist rest [at C. P.] under one altar" (Hodoepor. Willibaldi, Basnage, Thes. Mon. Eccl. 114). St. Jerome, addressing Vigilantius, says that the bishop of Rome "offers sacrifice to the Lord over the remains of the dead men Peter and Paul .... and considers their tombs the altars of Christ (C. Vig. 9). St. Ambrose, 386: "Ille super altare, qui pro omnibus passus est; isti sub altare, qui illius redempti sunt passione" (Epist. 22, ad Sor. 13). Of the relics of some other martyrs the same father says in 393: "Quae nunc sub altaribus reconduntur" (Exhort. Virgin. ii. 10); comp. Paulinus, Poëm. xxvii. 411). The body of St. Vincent was removed not long after his martyrdom from the "little basilica" in which it was first buried and laid "sub sacro altari" in a more important church (Passio S. V. 12, Ruinart, 329; comp. Prud. de Cor. v. 131). Similarly we read of an altar at Merida, "quo sancta membra (Eulaliae) teguntur" (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Mart. i. 91; comp. Prud. u.s. iii. 211). Symeon of Thessalonica explains at length "why the relics of the martyrs are put under the altar" (De Sacro Templo, 116).

XII. Relics in the Altar.—Sometimes the body or other relic of a saint is said to be placed in the altar, i.e. under the slab or mensa, but not in the ground below the base (see Vol. I. pp. 64, 65). Thus, of certain alleged relics of St. Andrew we read: "Collocatis in altari Novivicensis ecclesiae" (Greg. Tur. Mir. i. 31). So "in aliis basilicarum altaribus" (Vitae PP. viii. 3). See also de Mir. S. Jul. 40; Mir. i. 52; Vita S. Wilfridi (Eadmer), viii. 66.

XIII. Relics in the Consecration of a Church or Altar.—Relics were sometimes buried at the dedication of a church so early as the latter part of the 4th century. When St. Ambrose dedicated the Church of the Apostles near the Porta Romana at Milan, he translated thither the body of St. Nazarius, certain "relics of the holy apostles having been previously deposited there with the greatest devotion on the part of all" (Vita Ambr. Paul. auct. 33). When, some time after, he had dedicated the Ambrosian basilica without relics, the people begged him to do as he had done before. Having found relics, he complied with their wish (Ep. 22 ad Marcell. 13). In this and a third instance (Exhort. Virg. ii. 10) the relics are said to have been placed under the altar. Paulinus, A.D. 393, frequently recognizes the rite. His church at Nola, "reliquiis Apostolorum intra apsidem trichoram sub altaris sacratis, non solo beati Felicis honore venerabilis est" (Ep. 32, ad Sev. 12). Of the little church being built at Fundi he says: "Hanc quoque basiliculam de benedictis apostolorum et martyrum reliquiis sacri cineres in nomine Christi .... consecrabunt" (§ 17). He recommends Severus to obtain relics for the dedication of his church, and sends him verses referring to the rite:

> "Divinum veneranda tegunt altaria foedus, > Compositis sacra cum cruce martyribus."

Gaudentius of Brescia, A.D. 387, having, when on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, received at Caesarea some relics of the Forty Martyrs from the nieces of St. Basil, their original possessor, employed them many years after with other relics in the dedication of his church. In his sermon on the occasion, which is extant, he says: "Venerabiles Martyrum Quadraginta reliquias populis credentibus hodie proponimus percolendas" (Vet. Brix. Episc. Opusc. p. 341, Brix. 1738). "Habemus ergo et hos xl. et praedictos x. sanctos, ex diversis terrarum partibus congregatos, unde hanc ipsam basilicam eorum meritis dedicatam Concilium Sanctorum nuncupari oportere decernimus" (345). See an instance in Gregory of Tours, Mir. ii. 50.

In the 6th century relics were in France already thought so necessary to the consecration of a church, that in old churches not so dedicated the omission was often supplied, as in the church at Neuvy, "ubi nulla adhuc sanctorum pignora habebantur" (Greg. Tur. Mir. i. 31), and of another at Précigni till then "absque sanctorum pignoribus" (Vitae PP. viii. 11). The same practice prevailed in the East; e.g. when, in the 6th century, a church was dedicated over the tomb of Euthymius, the archbishop "deposited under the altar certain portions of the relics of martyrs" (Euthymii Vita, 122, in Cotel. Monum. Gr. ii. 305). The council of Nicaea, 787, ordered relics to be put in every church that had been consecrated without them, and deposed bishops who should in future so consecrate them (can. 7). The Liber Diurnus of the bishops of Rome in the 8th century provides a form of licence for the removal of relics from a church in ruins to a new one (v. 18). Among the Greeks Symeon of Thessalonica writes a whole chapter to explain "why the relics are carried from an old church to a new" (De S. Templo, 117).

Any relic, however trifling, might be used at consecrations. The most common were BRANDEA or the like. In one case a vessel is mentioned in which water had been turned into balsam (Greg. Tur. de Mir. S. Jul. 40). Shreds of a pall or dress were common (ibid. 34). The ceremony is described at length by Remigius of Auxerre (De Dedic. Eccl. 9), and several orders are extant; as in the Pontifical of Egbert (ed. Surtees Society, 46), the Jumièges Pontifical, also English (Martene, ii. 254), and that of Dunstan (257). See also the Ordo Romanus in Blanchini's collection of documents (Vitae Pontif. Rom. auct. Anastas. Bibl. Proleg. iii. xlviii.), and later books in Martene, u. s. pp. 267, 270, 274, 290.

At a later period relics were also used at the reconciliation of a church. See the Orders, Martene, u. s. iii. 286; iv. ib.; v. 287. Heathen temples, again, were purified for Christian worship by means of relics. Thus at Antioch one was dedicated by the bones of St. Ignatius (Evagrius, Hist. Eccl. i. 16). Gregory I. ordered them to be converted into churches by aspersion with holy water, the erection of an altar, and the deposition of relics (Ep. ad Mellitum in Bede, Hist. i. 30).

The part of the altar, &c., in which they were placed was called the SEPULCRUM, CONFESSIO, or loculus (Greg. Tur. Mirac. i. 34). It had an opening for the introduction of brandea, &c., opposite to which was a similar opening in the box inclosing the relics. See Sozom. in Hist. Eccl. ix. 2, and the notes of Vales. in loc.; or Mabillon, Praef. in S. ii. Ord. Ben. obs. 44. These holes are called by the author of the Miracles of St. Stephen "fenestellae" (De Mir. S. St. i. 12).

Sometimes the entrance of a church was hallowed by the burial in it of relics. A crime committed in the court of the church was aggravated, because "the doorway of it had been consecrated with the relics of saints" (Capit. Lud. Pii, 819, c. 1; Capit. Reg. Franc. iv. 13; Leg. Longob. i. ix. 36; Canones Isaaci Ling. ii. 2). As there is no earlier evidence of this practice, we cannot accept the suggestion of Baronius (Notae ad Martyrol. Rom. Nov. 18), and Martene (u. s. ii. 13, § 12), that the reverence shewn to the threshold of a church, especially as indicated by the much earlier use of the conventional phrases, limina sanctorum, apostolorum, is to be ascribed to the fact that relics were buried under them.

Relics were also placed in other parts of churches, or their adjuncts, as in the capitals of piers, in the corner-stones of bell-towers (Leo Mars. Chron. Casin. iii. 30); but especially in baptisteries (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. x. 31, § 19; Vitae PP. vii. 2). A form of petition for the dedication of a baptistery, "ita ut reliquias in eodem loco sanctorum martyrum Ill. et Ill. desiderem introduci," may be seen with two forms of reply in the Liber Diurnus, v. 19–21.

Forms of public notice announcing the intended deposition of relics on such occasions ("Denuntiatio cum Reliquiae Scorum Martyrum ponendae sunt)" are extant. See the Ordo Romanus in the Prolegomena to the Vitae Pont. Rom. of Anastasius Bibliothecarius, ed. Blanch. iii. xlvii.; Ordo R. Bernoldi, Hittorp. De Cath. Eccl. Off. 119, ed. 1610; Ordd. i. ii. in Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Rit. ii. 13 (Missal. Gellon. and Pontif. Egberti).

XIV. Relics on the Altar.—From the 6th century downwards relics before their deposition were commonly set on the altar, as the place of highest honour. Thus, a bishop hearing that some were brought to his church, says, "Let the blessed relics rest on the altar, until in the morning we go forth to meet them" (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ix. 6). Some shreds from the cloak of St. Julian ready to be placed in a church, as yet without relics, were set for the night on the altar (Mirac. ii. 34). It appears also that when pilgrims bearing relics halted at a church, they were so placed till their departure (De Glor. Conf. 39). Compare Baudonivia, Vita S. Radegundis, 14. Relics were not, however, allowed to remain for any time on the altar until the 9th century. It was believed that the miracles of St. Walpurgis ceased, "because her relics were on the altar of the Lord, where only the majesty of the divine mystery ought to be celebrated" (Odo, Collat. ii. 28). St. Berchar appeared to a monk and seriously rebuked him, for having placed his remains on the altar which was "Christi mensa Corporis" (Mirac. S. Berch. v. § 36 in Boll. Oct. 16, vii. 1028). The remains of St. Servatius of Tongres, when exhumed in the time of Charlemagne, were "placed before the altar, because it was not yet held lawful for anything except the sacrifice to be set upon the altar, that being the table of the Lord of hosts" (De Servat. iv. 30; Boll. May 13, ii. 218). The relics of St. Celsus were placed on the altar at Trier, 979 (Annal. Bened. iii. 658); and other examples occur in that age. The practice in fact had been fully established by the end of the preceding century, as appears from a canon of that date: "Nothing is to be set on the altar, except capsae with the relics of the saints, and the four Gospels" (Conc. Rem. c. 5, in Regino, de Discipl. Eccl. i. 60. Comp. the Admonitiones Synodales, ibid. 503, 505, 508).

XV. Watching before Relics.—This began early, and was common to East and West. Thus St. Ambrose says of the remains of Gervasius and Protasius, "The evening coming on we removed them to the basilica of Fausta. There watch was kept the whole night." The next day they were placed in the new church (Ep. 22, 13). When Gregory of Tours, 573, dedicated his own oratory, he watched the night before in the church in which the relics designed for it lay (De Glor. Conf. 20), and he incidentally mentions the practice (vigilata nocte) elsewhere (ib 59). A similar vigil was kept before the relics of Tarachus, and when others were placed in the church of the laura of Euthymius (Cyrill. Scyth. Vita Euthym. 122). The rite is recognized in the early pontificals: "Deinde vadunt ad eum locum in quo reliquiae per totam noctem praeteritam cum vigiliis fuerint" (Pont. Egberti, 44; in Martene, ii. 249; see other orders, ibid. 254, 257, 259, &c.). Vigils before relics were, however, enjoined at other times on priests who had charge of them, "Reliquias sanctorum cum summo studio vigiliarum noctis et diurnis officiis conservet" (Capit. Episcoporum, an. 801, c. 3, in Cap. Reg. Franc. i. 359).

XVI. Relics brought to Councils.—We have many examples of this, beginning near the close of our period. The object was to insure the assistance of the saint thus honoured. In 758 Tassilo, duke of Bayeux, swore fealty to Pepin at the council of Compiègne, over the bodies of several saints (Adonis Chron. ad an. Migne, cxxiii. 124). The body of St. Remigius was exposed on an altar in a council of Rheims held in the time of Leo IV. (Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. iii. i. 10). At Charroux, 989, a council was held before the relics of St. Junian (Letaldus, Hist. 2, Acta Bened. iv. p. ii. 434). At a council in Aquitaine in the next century, "multa delata sunt corpora sanctorum atque innumerabiles sanctorum apophoretae reliquiarum" (Glaber Rodolphus, Hist. iv. 5, in Du Chesne, Script. Franc. Hist. iv. 45). See other examples in Martene.

XVII. Burial near Relics.—At first there was a strong feeling and even a law against burial near the body of a martyr [OBSEQUIES, § xvi.], but in the course of time this gave way to the desire to be placed in death under the protection of the saints by such proximity to their remains. Gregory of Nyssa buried his father and mother near some small relics of the Forty Martyrs, that in the resurrection they might be "raised in the company of those allies full of confidence" (Orat. 3 in xl. Mart. App. 214). Maximus of Turin, 442: "It was provided by our ancestors that we should mingle our bodies with the bones of the saints, that the gloom of darkness may fly from us, while Christ gives them light. Resting, therefore [in the cemeteries], with the holy martyrs we escape the darkness of hell, by their merits indeed, yet partners in their sanctity" (Serm. 61). Paulinus (Poëma. xxxv. 607), says that a youth was buried near martyrs:

"Ut de vicino sanctorum sanguine ducat, Quo nostras illo purget in igne animas."

St. Augustine thinks the only advantage of it to be, "ut dum recolunt ubi sint repositа eorum quos diligunt corpora, iisdem sanctis illos tanquam patronis susceptos apud Dominum adjuvandos orando commendent" (De Cur. pro Mort. 4). James the Syrian, in the 5th century, "collected from all parts many prophets, many apostles, as many martyrs as possible (i.e. their relics), and stored them in one coffin (designed for himself), desiring to dwell with the saints and to rise and to enjoy the vision of God in their company" (Theodoret, Relig. Hist. 21). When the grave of St. Udalric was opened, there was found in it "a very large locked chest, full and crammed" with relics (Inventio Corp. S. Udal. § 3, Acta Bened. v. 470). See also the legendary Scriptura de Transl. S. Stephani, 1, Opp. Aug. App. vi.

XVIII. Miracles ascribed to Relics.—Some have already come before us; but it may be well to give examples of different kinds, to shew that there was no evil supposed too powerful for relief by their means. Compare WONDERS.

(1) The Blind receive their Sight, &c.—When the remains of Gervasius and Protasius were found at Milan, A.D. 386, a blind man having "touched the clothing of the martyrs, immediately received sight" (Paulin. in Vita S. Ambros. 14; comp. Ambr. Epist. 22 ad Soror. 17; Aug. De Civ. Dei, xxii. 8, § 2). Some years after this, when the relics of Sisinnius and Alexander were brought to Milan, a stranger professing to be blind touched the chest in which they were, and declared himself healed (Paul. u. s. 52). A blind woman touched her eyes with flowers that had been in contact with the relics of St. Stephen, and "forthwith saw" (Aug. u. s. 10). A blind man was directed by Germanus, A.D. 555, to lie between the altar and some relics of Gervasius, and was healed (Fortunatus, Vita Germ. 56). Of the shrine of St. Denys, Fortunatus says generally that there, "recipit caecitas visum, debilitas gressum, et obstrictae aurium januae recipiunt aditum" (Passio Dion. 3).

(2) The Dead raised.—St. Chrysostom has told us that the bones of the martyrs "put death to flight" (Laud. Bros. 4). Several instances are alleged by St. Augustine. A presbyter at Calauna, in Africa, laid out as dead, revived when a tunic, which had been taken to a memoria containing relics of St. Stephen, was placed on his body (Aug. de Civ. Dei, xxii. 8, § 12). A waggon-wheel went over a child and killed him, his mother took him at once to the same memoria, "and he not only came to life again, but even appeared unhurt" (ibid. 15). Two women also were restored to life on being covered with dresses that had derived virtue from the same memoria (16, 17). A dead boy "anointed with the oil of the said martyr," and an infant laid on the memoria also returned to life (18, 19).

(3) Devils tormented.—This was universally asserted. E. g. Paula at the tombs of Elisha, Obadiah and John the Baptist "cernebat variis daemones rugire cruciatibus, et ante sepulcra sanctorum ululare homines more luporum, vocibus latrare canum, fremere leonum, sibilare serpentum, mugire taurorum" (Hieron. Epist. 108, ad Eust. 13). When a demoniac was brought to the memoria of Gervasius at Hippo, the demon "with a great wail entreated to be spared, and confessed when, where, and how he had entered the youth;" whom thereupon he left (Aug. de Civ. Dei, xxii. 8, § 7). "Persons vexed by the attacks of an unclean spirit, when led to the tomb of St. Denys, "to be tried by the Divine power, were compelled by the command of the saints themselves to declare by name where each of the martyrs had been laid" (Fortun. Passio S. Dion. &c. 3). A demoniac foretold the approach of a ship containing some dust from the tomb of St. Julian. As it came to land, he rushed towards it, and after a brief struggle, was set free (Greg. Tur. de Mirac. ii. 33). When Gregory of Tours took some relics of the same saint to the church of St. Martin in that city, an energumen, with violent emotion, exclaimed, "Why, Martin, hast thou joined thyself to Julian. Why dost thou call him hither? Thy presence was punishment enough for us. Thou hast called one like thyself to increase our torments" (Id. ibid. 34; see also Vitae P. P. viii. 11. Compare Ambr. Exhort. Virg. 2; Jerome c. Vigil. 5; Hilary, c. Constantium, 8; Alcuin de Pontif. Ebor. Opp. ii. 246, &c.).

(4) General Succour and Protection.—Constantine ordered the relics of St. Andrew and other saints to be taken to Constantinople,

"Ut sua apostolicis muniret moenia laetus Corporibus." (Paulinus, Poem. xix. 335.)

Later writers affirm that he inserted a piece of the true cross in a statue of himself erected in the same city, in the assurance that it would by that means be "kept in safety" (Socr. Hist. Eccl. i. 17; Cassiod. H. E. ii. 18). "The church," says Asterius, speaking of relics, "is walled about with the martyrs as a city with brave soldiers. They who are oppressed by the contingencies of human life hasten to the resting-places of the thrice blessed as to an asylum (Hom. in SS. Mart. in Auctar. Combef. i. 185). It was believed that owing to the burial of three martyrs in a fort named Malcan, the Sabaeans could never from that time plunder it or even make their way up to it (Assemani, Acta SS.

Mart. Or. et Occ. i. 79). The neighbours of Simeon Stylites lamented the removal of his body to Antioch, because they would thereby lose the protection of his relics (Anton. in Vita S. Sim. 19). The same feeling prevailed in the West. Thus, Wilfrid leaving Rome on two several occasions, supplied himself with relics; and so "cum benedictione sanctorum" (Eddius. Steph. Vita Wilfr. 53), "cum reliquiarum sanctorum quas illic invenit auxilio" (4), reached home in safety. Similarly, the father of Gregory of Tours believed himself to have escaped in many dangers by sea and land through the relics of some unknown saints which he carried with him (G. T. de Glor. Mart. i. 84). Hincmar inclosed in a large shrine "the pledges of many saints as a protection to the whole city of Rheims" (Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rem. iii. 5). The inhabitants of Cusan in Catalonia sought to kill St. Romuald, "ut haberent pro patrocinio terræ vel cadaver exanime" (Petrus Dam. in Vita S. Rom. 13).

XIX. Evils arising from Relic-Worship.—The crowds which they attracted to a church or monastery were a serious interruption to the duties of the place, and a source of great disquiet and misgiving to the more spiritual and earnest minded. The evil was felt so strongly at the Abbey of Moyen-Moutier in the Vosges 707, that the abbat Hidulfus appealed to the departed monk by whose body the miracles were wrought: "Brother Spinulus, on account of the perils incurred by souls, stop the crowds of those who flock hither. Then the miracles ceasing, the concourse also ceased" (Vita Hid. i. in Boll. July 11, iii. 228; at greater length in Vita, iii. c. xv. 234). The monks of Rheims equally deprecated the miracles of St. Gibrian, nor was St. Bernard himself allowed more liberty at Clairvaux (Acta Bened. Praef. i. saec. iii. cx. 36). At Sarlata the monks removed the body of St. Parduif to a neighbouring church, that they might regain their former peace (ibid.). Stephen of Lüttich adjured St. Wolbodo to "abstain from miracles, through which such trouble came on the brethren by night and day through the sick" (Acta Ben. S. vi. i. 165). At St. Trond, when the relics of the patron began to work miracles, the abbat Guntram endeavoured to conceal them, remarking that "signs were given to the unbelieving, not to the believing" (Rudolph. in Chron. Trudon. i. Spicil. Dach. ii. 662). They continued under his successor to the grief and annoyance of the elder and more religious monks; for, says the historian, "the further the glorious fame of St. Trudo was carried by the report of pilgrims, the more also did the worldliness of our monks, as displayed in levity of manners and the abuse of a state without discipline, become a subject of reprehension" (Spicil. u. s. 664). "Because many," remarks Ambrosius Autpertus, "seem to have their share of miracles, but in nowise have their names written in heaven, we do not in this age by any means demand miracles in the church, but a perfect life" (Vita SS. Paldonis, &c. 14).

RELIGIOUS. The word may designate (1) ordinary Christians; (2) ecclesiastics: (3) monks. In modern usage the term is applied to those who have given themselves to the monastic life, whether they be in holy orders or not. That, however, was not the early use of the word. It appears from the second canon of the tenth council of Toledo (cent. 7) that the word included all ecclesiastics, "from a bishop down to a clerk of the lowest order, or a monk." Akin to this is the fact, that in a canon of a subsequent council of Toledo (A.D. 693) the term secular is applied to such as are not priests "Sacerdotes" (Conc. Tol. xvi. can. 6). But that the term religious, which is the negation of secular, was not anciently restricted to ecclesiastics, may be inferred from the first council of Orleans (cent. 6), where we have the term "profession of religion" applied to other than those in orders.

The earliest writer in which the use of religiosus is clearly fixed in its technical sense of "professed," is Salvian, a French writer of the 5th century. In the passages of earlier writers which we have examined, it is susceptible of the meaning conveyed by the modern English phrase a religious person. In Salvian, however, the technical meaning appears to be undeniable. "Some of your sons under pretext of religion dissent from religion, and leave the world (seculum) more in garb than in mind" (ad Cathol. Eccl. lib. 3). And again, "Multi enim Religiosi, imò sub specie religionis, vitiis secularibus mancipati. . . ." (id. de Gubern. Dei, lib. 5). The fourth council of Toledo speaks of Religiosi, who are counted neither amongst clerks nor monks. They are "per diversa loca vagi" and are to be restrained by the bishops (can. 53).

It is affirmed by Severinus Binius, in a note upon canon 17 of the council of Gangra, that "the Greeks used to call the life of those whom we call Religiosi by the name of ἄσκησις." That points to a field of Greek phraseology upon the subject much earlier than the corresponding Latin phrases can be traced. Thus we have γυμνασία μοναδική in Isidore of Pelusium; ἄσκησις τῆς εὐσεβείας in St. Basil; ἄσκησις μοναχική apud Theophanem an. 3 Constantii; and other similar expressions. It should, however, be noticed on the authority of Du Fresne (Gloss. Gr. s. v.) who quotes several Greek authorities in support of his position, that the ἀσκηταὶ were "not so much monks, especially in the first ages of Christianity, as any Christians devoting themselves to a stricter life and to holy functions of piety."

It is extremely difficult to say when from meaning devout Christian life, the word religio faded into the sense of monastic profession. Thus the word seems to be hovering between the two senses in the fifth council of Paris: "Quæ sibi vestes in habitu religionis in domibus propriis tam a parentibus quam per seipas mutaverint" (can. 13). In such a passage as the following, which is drawn from St. Gregory the Great, the word seems to have no tinge of the monastic meaning. Speaking of the attraction that was exercised upon Roman society by St. Benedict, he says, "Coepere tunc ad eum Romanae urbis nobiles et religiosi concurrere, suosque ei filios omnipotenti Deo nutriendos dare." The children may have been brought up as monks, but the parents could hardly have been so.

In the ninth council of Toledo (cent. 7) religio plainly means the monastic profession: "Parentibus sane filios suos religioni contradere, non amplius quam usque ad decimum aetatis eorum annum licentia poterit esse" (can. 6). By that date the sense seems quite established, as we have again "religionis tonsuram" and "religioni debitam vestem," where it cannot mean "holy orders," because the clause is applied to both sexes ("in utroque sexu").

Yet long after the technical sense of religiosus had made good its footing, the earlier meaning existed along with it, so that in some passages it is difficult to say which of the two meanings is intended. Thus, the sixty-first of the Capitula of Martin of Bracara reads, "Non liceat sacerdotibus vel clericis, sed nec religiosis laicis convivia facere de confertis." Here a good sense would be got either from "devout laymen," or from "professed laymen."

There is a trace of a certain restriction of dress so early as the time of Augustine. He speaks of young men who have wives alleging it to be difficult for them to assume habitum religionis. He replies to their objection, that he is not pleading so much for a change of dress, as for a change of character. Vestimenta religiosa would be of little use without good works and change of heart (S. Aug. Sermo. lxvii. "Rogo vos, fratres charissimi"). In this and similar passages, however, a restriction of dress may be meant which distinguished Christians from Pagans, rather than one which marked out one particular circle of Christians from the general mass of their fellow-believers. RELIQUARY (Gr θήκη, ἱεροθήκη; Lat. reliquiarium, capsa, lipsanotheca, locellus, cinerarium; if of such size as to be attached to a chain worn round the neck, encolpium, or ἐγκόλπιον, as to be borne ἐν κόλπῳ, in the bosom; phylacterium, and many other words; if to be carried processionally feretrum; Fr. reliquaire, châsse) a repository for relics. Compare RELICS.

Reliquaries may be divided into two principal classes—those which were not intended to be carried on the person, and those which were.

The first class contains by far the greater number of forms and sizes, both of which varied in accordance with the size and form of the object to be included.

Relics may be divided into three classes:—1st, Entire bodies of martyrs or other venerated persons, or portions of such; 2nd, clothes or other objects which had been used, or had in other ways come into contact with such persons; and 3rdly, oil from lamps which burnt before their tombs, cloths (brandea), which had been placed upon them, and dust which had been swept from the floors of sanctuaries held to be pre-eminently holy.

We accordingly find, either now in existence or in record, reliquaries of the most diverse forms and sizes: boxes, round, rectangular, octagonal, &c.; chests with gable-ended covers (models, in fact, of tombs), models of churches, cases in the forms of heads, arms, or legs, images, tubes of metal, and where a liquid, as oil or blood, was that to be preserved, bottles or flasks of various forms and substances. The materials of which reliquaries were made are not less varied. We find them of gold, silver, bronze, crystal, ivory, wood, bone, agate, sardonyx.

It will, however, be sufficient here to describe a few of the more remarkable examples which come within our period.

The desire to preserve tangible memorials of those who have been dear to us is one so universally felt, that we may well believe that relics were preserved, and, in consequence, reliquaries made, in the earliest ages of Christianity. Perhaps the earliest testimony to the fact that relics were collected is to be found in the Acts of Fructuosus, bishop of Tarragona, martyred A.D. 259 (Ruinart, Acta Sincera, p. 249), which are generally classed among those known as genuine and authentic. In these we are told (p. 221 f.), that after his martyrdom the bishop appeared to his brethren, and admonished those who had taken any of the ashes which remained after the burning of his body to restore them, so that all that remained of him and his fellow-martyrs, Eulogius and Augurius, might be buried in one common grave. The earlier cases relied on by Martigny (Dict. des Antiq. chrétiennes) and other Roman Catholic writers to prove the high antiquity of a cultus of relics, as those of St. Polycarp and St. Ignatius, are rather those where a pious and affectionate desire was felt by the surviving disciples to give honourable burial to the remains of those whom they had venerated while living than those in which a desire was felt to obtain a fragment of a holy body, to be made the object of veneration. [RELICS.] Ignorant zeal and affectionate feeling, however, concurred in desiring some visible object which should be a memorial of, or at least be in some way connected with, the departed saint; and as in the earlier ages the rulers both of church and of state strenuously opposed the exhumation and dismembering of departed saints, substitutes were found in the cloths (brandea) which were placed on the tombs of such personages, or in portions of oil taken from the lamps which burnt before them. The well-known letter from St. Gregory the Great to the empress Constantina (Epist. lib. iv. ep. 30), in which, replying to her requisition for the head or some other part ("aliud quid de corpore") of St. Paul, he expresses his horror of such an act as exhuming and mutilating such sacred remains, and suggests the sending instead brandea in a "pyxis" ("tantummodo in pyxide brandeum"), marks a point of time when the more modern system of dividing the remains of saints was coming into practice, but not as yet fully established. This practice would seem to have been introduced earlier in the East than in the West, for Gregory the Great complains (Epist. lib. iv. ep. 30) that certain Greek monks were caught in the act of digging up bones near the church of St. Paul, which they confessed they purposed to convey to Greece as relics of saints.

These details as to the character of what were deemed relics in the earlier ages are needful, as furnishing the reason why we find on ivory boxes, probably originally reliquaries, subjects from the history of our Lord; such are the circular boxes, measuring from about four to five inches in diameter; on fourteen out of fifteen examples of which such subjects as the miracles of Christ, the history of Jonah, the three Hebrew youths in the furnace, all of which, either directly or indirectly, have some reference to our Lord, and consequently to the eucharist, are carved (see Padre Garrucci's Osservazione Ant. vol. xliv. p. 322). These have been usually held to have been used as artophoria or pyxes [PYX] to hold the reserved portion of the eucharist; but the recent discovery of one on which the martyrdom of St. Menas is carved, leaves it open to doubt whether such was their original destination, and whether they may not really have been intended as repositories, either for vessels of oil or for brandea [BRANDEUM]. If such were the case, doubtless those on which acts of our Lord are carved contained such memorials from some of the sacred places of Jerusalem or Bethlehem, as that carved with the martyrdom of St. Menas no doubt contained some similar objects from the shrine near Alexandria, where he was buried.

The earliest in date of these circular boxes is, judging from its excellence of style, that in the museum at Berlin. This is cut from a portion of a very large tusk, measuring about five inches and a half in diameter at the base and five at the top, the height being also about five inches. The subjects carved on it are the intended sacrifice of Isaac, and Christ teaching in the Temple. Our Lord is represented as youthful and beardless, and neither He nor any others have nimbi surrounding their heads. The style is extremely good, not inferior to that of the best sarcophagi with Christian subjects, and the box may be with reason referred to a date as early as the 4th century. The exceptional example of these circular boxes is that figured and described in the Archaeologia (vol. xliv. p. 322), upon which are two subjects—one, the martyrdom of St. Menas, an Egyptian who suffered under Maximilus Galerius or Maximianus; the other, the saint in a glorified condition after death, standing before a gateway, which, no doubt, represents the very celebrated sanctuary where he was buried, about nine miles from Alexandria. This box no doubt once contained some relic of the saint from whose shrine, as will be mentioned hereafter, earthen bottles containing oil were sent in large quantities. The box may be confidently ascribed to the earlier part of the 6th century. The circular part, which is all that remains, measures four inches and a half in width and three and a quarter in height.

No finer example of a reliquary dating from before A.D. 800 has been preserved than the casket of carved ivory in the public library at Brescia. It has been taken to pieces, but evidently once formed a box about nine inches in height and breadth, and thirteen in length, the pieces having been united by a mounting, or at least by hinges, and bands of gold or silver. It is covered with carvings representing about thirty-five subjects; the larger and more important, both as regards size and number, being taken from the Gospels, and representing some of the more important miracles and scenes in the history of our Lord. Thus, on the front, the central group represents our Lord teaching in the temple, while on the right, He is shewn as the Shepherd guarding the fold from the wolf, and on the left, with Mary Magdalene in the garden. On one side the principal subject is Christ raising the daughter of Jairus; on the other, restoring sight to the blind man, and raising Lazarus; on the back are the transfiguration, and the story of Ananias and Sapphira; on the lid are Christ in the garden of olives, Christ taken in the garden, and the denial of St. Peter; while above are two subjects—Christ brought before Herod (two persons are, however, shewn, each seated in a curule chair), and Christ brought before Pilate, who is in the act of washing his hands. The lesser subjects, two ranges of which surround the box, are taken partly from the Old Testament, partly from the New: the history of Jonah, scenes from that of Moses, of Susannah, of Jacob, and others, occur. Besides these are two scenes of agapes, or possibly heavenly banquets, and some symbols, as a tower, a lamp, an olive tree, a balance, &c. Above all these is a band of busts in pateras, fifteen in number; the majority are bearded, but some are youthful. In the central point of the front is a youthful head, with hair cut short over the forehead, but falling in long ringlets to the shoulders, which is intended to represent our Lord, the same type of head and hair being preserved through the whole series of subjects in which He appears. None of the figures have a nimbus: the style and execution are throughout good, quite equal to those of the best examples of sarcophagi with Christian subjects; and there can be little doubt but that this most important monument of Christian art ought to be assigned to a period not later than the 4th century. Casts are in the South Kensington Museum, and it has been described at some length in the Catalogue of Fictile Ivories in that collection, p. 34.

Very good examples of reliquaries of the next succeeding centuries are supplied by those discovered in 1871 near or under the high altar of the church of Grado, and figured and described by De Rossi (Boll. di Arch. Crist. 1872, p. 155). Both are boxes of silver, the one circular, the other elliptical. The circular box is four inches in diameter and three in height; it is divided into six compartments by a central tube and five partitions, all formed of thin silver; on the cover is a figure of the Virgin Mary, seated on a throne, and holding the infant Christ. The Virgin holds a cruciform sceptre (scettro crucugero) in her right hand, and a nimbus surrounds her head. An inscription, in two lines, is engraved on the box, and consists of the names of saints as follows:—

SANC. MARIA. SANC. VITVS. SANC. CASSANVS. SANC. PANCRATIVS. SANC. YPOLITVS. SANC. APOLLINARIVS. SANC. MARTINVS.

Within were found eleven small plates of gold, bearing names of saints; a small cylindrical box of gold, which enclosed a very small glass phial; a small golden box, of cubical form, with a Greek cross enamelled on its lid; and a disc of stucco impressed with a cross.

Greek Reliquary. (From De Rossi's 'Bull. Crist. Arch.')

The elliptic box measures five inches and three quarters in length by three and a quarter in width and height. On the cover is, in relief, a gemmed cross, standing on a mouticule, with a sheep on either side. The side of the box is encircled by two bands of inscriptions, which run as follows; the upper:—

SANCTVSCANTIVSSANTIANVSSANCTACANTIANILLA SANTVSQVIRINVSSANTVSLATINV

The lower:—

SLAVRENTIVSVSIOANNISVSNICEFORVSSANTISREDDIDID BOTVM

The first s of the latter inscription should be added to the former, and the lower one read: "Laurentius vs (i.e. vir spectabilis), Joannis vs, Niceforus vs, Santis reddidid botum (i.e. reddiderunt votum)."

Between these inscriptions is a band of eight circles (clypei or paterœ) enclosing busts, and at each end a palm tree. One of the busts, the central on one side, appears to represent our Lord; the hair is long, and the face beardless. Those to the right and left probably represent St. Peter and St. Paul. On the opposite side, in the centre, the bust is that of a young woman richly dressed; the others all represent men, beardless, and with rather short hair. This casket contained another smaller box, of silver, without ornament.

Both caskets were found full of water; and nothing remained of the relics which they doubtless once contained, but some black matter like mud.

Herr Kandler, Conservator of the Monuments at Trieste, is stated to have expressed an opinion that the circular box might date from about A.D. 452, and the elliptical from about A.D. 568; but these ascriptions of date are perhaps open to doubt.

To the 7th century may be assigned the very remarkable coffer of ivory which formed part of the Meyrick collection. It is eighteen inches in length, eight in breadth, and five and a quarter in height. It is entirely covered with ornament, consisting of bands of foliage enclosing half-length figures of (on the lid in the middle) our Lord; on His right, the Virgin Mary, St. Barnabas, and St. Julia; on His left, St. John the Baptist, St. Alexander, and St. Crisantus; on the front, SS. Philip, Thomas, John, Peter, Paul, Andrew, Bartholomew, and James; on the back, SS. Stephen the proto-martyr, Mark, Thaddeus, Matthew, James (the Less?), Simon, Matthias, and Luke; on one end, SS. Nereus, Gregory (the priest), and Achilleus; on the other, SS. Justus Martyr, and Pancratius. The names are, in all cases, given in inscriptions.

The figures are executed in a very poor and feeble style; the bands of foliage are rather elegant. It greatly resembles, both as regards style and execution, the diptych sent by Gregory the Great to queen Theodelinda, which bears effigies of himself and king David, and was the cover of a responsorium graduale.

It is noteworthy that, while we find in the Liber Pontif. almost innumerable gifts of chalices, patens, and other vessels and articles made by various popes for use in, or decoration of, churches, very few notices occur of reliquaries, and these only commence in the 7th century. The explanation probably is, that at the time when the cultus of relics became more fully established, every Roman church possessed entire bodies of saints, transported thither, in most cases, from their original places of deposit in the catacombs, and the popes naturally took comparatively little account of such lesser relics as were then procurable. The Greeks, as has been shewn above, seem to have been the first to dismember bodies; and it is therefore not surprising that one of the first mentions which we find in the Liber Pontificalis of a portion of a holy body enclosed in a reliquary, is that where we are told that pope Gregory III. (731–752) found in the Lateran the head of St. George in a "capsa," with a label on which was a Greek inscription, testifying to its identity.

Many reliquaries were made at this period, both in the East and in the West, and mention of them frequently occurs in chronicles and other documents, but examples are rare. The art of the period was extremely bad; and when a precious metal was the material, they have probably been broken up. Some may, however, still exist without having been noticed by any one possessed of antiquarian knowledge; for it is not always easy to obtain a sight of all the contents of a church treasury. One fine example, which may very possibly date from the 8th century, though some are disposed to give it an earlier date, is preserved in the treasury of the abbey of St. Maurice, in the Valais; it is about seven inches and a quarter long, two and a half deep, and five and a quarter high; the lower part is rectangular; the upper, or lid, sloped in front and at the back, and gabled at the ends. On the front is a large antique cameo and several precious stones, pearls, sardonyxes, and other stones with antique intaglios, are placed at regular intervals; lines of pearls run from one stone to another, and the whole of the compartments thus formed are filled with small pieces of garnet and of green and blue glass, each piece being surrounded by a little partition (cloison) of gold, precisely in the manner in which similar ornament is applied in the brooches frequently found in the Saxon graves in Kent, on the sword of Childeric, and other objects, dating from the 5th to the 8th century. The date at which this sort of work ceased to be made has not been ascertained, but it seems quite possible that it was still in use as late as the 8th century, and the form of this reliquary is rather in favour of a somewhat late than a very early date. The ends are ornamented in a similar manner. The back is covered with a plate of gold, divided into rhomboidal compartments by corded lines; in these compartments are letters engraved on the gold, in most cases one letter in a compartment: the inscription, which reads diagonally, beginning at the right hand corner, runs as follows: "Teudericus Presbiter in honore sci Mauricii fieri jussit. Amen. Nordvalaus et Rihlindis ordenarunt fabricare Undiho et Ello ficerunt."

Reliquary at Monza.
(From Labarte's 'Histoire des Arts Industriels.')

M. Aubert, who has figured and described this object in his Trésor de l'Abbaye de St. Maurice d'Agaune, p. 141, and pl. xi. xii. observes, on this inscription, that the names clearly point to the Merovingian period; and he supposes that it may have been fabricated by a Frank or Burgundian artist, about A.D. 600.

Two remarkable examples should now be mentioned, though their real date has not been very clearly ascertained. One is preserved at Monza, the other in the treasury of the Burg at Vienna, the former being said to contain hair and a tooth of St. John the Baptist; the latter, some earth mixed with the blood of St. Stephen.

The first of these is a box about ten inches high, and eight wide, but of little depth; it is rectangular below, but the upper part is diminished in curved lines, so that only a narrow ridge is left on the top. It is covered with gold, on which are set precious stones, so disposed as to radiate from a centre. The back is covered with a plate of gold, on which are delineated, by the use of a very small punch, our Saviour on the cross, with the Virgin on one side, St. John on the other, and two figures, one piercing his side, and the other offering the sponge of vinegar. Above the arms of the cross are medallions, enclosing busts which represent the sun and moon. The drawing is tolerably correct and good, though the execution, by reason of the process employed, is rather rough.

The reliquary at Vienna is of almost exactly the same form as that just described, but smaller, being only about eight inches high. The front is covered with precious stones; some of the larger ones are disposed in a sort of cruciform arrangement, the others rather irregularly; all are very simply set. The back has lost its primitive covering, but the sides are covered with thin gold plate, divided by circles of pearls into compartments, in which are figures in relief; among these can be distinguished a man fishing with a hook, one mounted on horseback, and an avenging angel armed with a bow and dart, with a legend, "Malis Vidicta." The style of these figures, according to Dr. Bock (Kleinodien des Heil. Römischen Reiches, &c., p. 53, app.), shews a reminiscence of the classical period.

These two reliquaries correspond so nearly in character that they can hardly be far distant in point of date; that of Vienna is probably rather the older of the two. Dr. Bock is disposed to think that this last perhaps dates from a period earlier than the Carolingian; but the style and character of the representation of the Crucifixion on the back of the Monza reliquary seem to approach very closely to those of ivory carvings, and other works of art, which have been clearly proved to date from periods subsequent to 800.

Two similar reliquaries are said to exist, one in the church of St. Willibrord, at Emmerich, the other in that of St. Servatius, at Maestricht.

A very remarkable reliquary of kindred form has been preserved at Sion, in the Valois, the date of which can be accurately fixed, as it bears the name of the donor, Altheus, bishop of Sion about A.D. 780. It is six inches high, six and a half wide, and two inches and two-eighths deep at the base; at three inches from the base it begins to diminish on all four sides, and no doubt was finished at the top by a crest, now lost. It is covered with thin silver; on the front, in the upper part, are the stalk, leaves, and large flower of a plant in relief; in the centre of the flower a medallion, with a half-length figure of a female saint in cloisonné enamel; below are two compartments, in each of which are two half-length figures of saints, also in cloisonné enamel; on the back, on the upper part, are two figures in relief, St. Mary and St. John; below are two plant-like ornaments, perhaps lilies; on the sides are lily-like ornaments on the upper part, and half-length figures of saints below. On the under side is the inscription, "Hanc capsam dicata in honore sce Mariae Altheus Eps. fieri rogavit." The style both of the enamels and the reliefs is extremely bad—in fact, barbarous. This reliquary has been engraved by Blavignac, Hist. de l'Architecture sacrée, Pl. XI. and Atlas Pl. XXIII.*

The last four examples which have been mentioned have a certain similarity in form, viz. that they have a rectangular lower portion, and a sloping upper portion. This form afterwards became that adopted in all the larger reliquaries, and, indeed, in many of the smaller. It has been variously supposed to have been borrowed from a tomb, a house, or a chapel. The truth would seem to be, that tombs were often made in the form of churches or chapels [see BASILICA], and tombs again served as models for reliquaries, the tomb-like form being a very natural one when the intention was to enshrine bones, or other portions of the bodies of deceased saints. The change to this form from the earlier box or pyx-like form, appears to have in some degree coincided with the increase of the practice of dividing the mortal remains of the departed. A further development of the idea of forming reliquaries in imitation of buildings is to be found in that given by Charles the Bald to the abbey of St. Denis, and which was said to have belonged to his grandfather. It is said to have represented the façade of a building of three stories with arcades in each, embellished with precious stones and fine pearls, and crowned by a magnificent antique cameo, and was estimated to contain nineteen marks of gold, and seven marks weight of stones. It was known by the name of the "Ecrin de Charlemagne." An engraving of it has been given by Félibien, in his Histoire de l'Abbaye de St. Denis.

Reliquaries in the form of heads, arms, legs, or other parts of the human frame, made during the middle ages, are frequently to be found in the treasuries of churches, but no example of a date as early as 800 would appear to have been noticed. Perhaps the earliest now existing is that in the treasury of St. Maurice in the Valais containing the head of St. Candidus. This is probably of the 11th century, though Dr. Lübke attributes it to the 9th, and calls it erroneously the head of St. Maurice. It is engraved by Blavignac, Hist. de l'Architecture sacrée, &c., and by Aubert, Trésor de St. Maurice.

A few words must be said on the vessels used to contain liquids which were held in veneration, for these are virtually reliquaries, though perhaps it may be held that the word can scarcely be with propriety applied to them. One class of these consists of the small bottles which have been frequently found imbedded in cement against the tiles or slabs with which the "loculi" of the catacombs near Rome were closed. There has been some difference of opinion as to whether the contents of these bottles was really blood, or whether it was not wine which had been, if not actually consecrated, blessed at the time of the celebration of the eucharist, or at least presented at an agape. Martigny (Dict. des Antiq. chrét., art. Sang des Martyrs) states that in several instances particularized by him analysis has shewn that the contents had actually been blood, and that fragments of sponge and of linen have been found within them. The bottles are usually of glass, sometimes of terra cotta, and are generally globular, with short necks.

Another class is that of the flasks used to contain oil, which contained some admixture of that which burnt in the lamps lit before celebrated shrines. Among the most notable examples remaining are those preserved at Monza, which some suppose to have been sent to Queen Theodelinda by pope Gregory the Great. These AMPULLA] are made of lead or pewter, and bear various subjects in low relief: on one is our Lord in glory, enclosed by an oval aureole, which is supported by angels; while below He is shewn standing in the attitude of prayer, with the apostles grouped, six on either side. On another, a cross between two candlesticks (?) is surrounded by heads of the apostles enclosed in circles. On another, an edifice surmounted by a cross occupies the centre, while around are heads of Christ and the apostles. Another has almost the same subjects as that first mentioned, surrounded by the inscription:—

ΕΜΜΑΝΟΥΗΛ ΜΕΤ ΗΜΩΝ ΘΕΩϹ.

On others is the inscription—

ΕΛΑΙΟΝ ΞΥΛΟΥ ΖΩΗϹ ΤΩΝ ΑΓΙΩΝ ΧΡΙϹΤΟΥ ΤΟΠΩΝ.

These may very probably be of the time of Queen Theodelinda, but they are not those mentioned in the contemporary list on papyrus still preserved at Monza, which refers exclusively to oils from shrines in Rome. These last are, it would seem, those in glass vessels (v. Frisi. Mon. della Chiesa Monzese, p. 66), some of which still preserve labels corresponding with the list. The leaden ampullae probably contained oil from various holy places in Palestine. [OIL, HOLY, p. 1453.]

Other examples worth notice are the earthen flasks which contained oil from the shrine of St Menas. [POTTERY, p. 1679.] Many of these have been found—nineteen are in the British Museum; and they have occurred in almost every country which borders on the Mediterranean. They are usually about four inches high, and from two and three-quarters to four inches wide. They usually bear effigies of St. Menas, with his attribute of two camels, and inscriptions, containing either the name of the saint only, or coupling with it the word "eulogia," i.e., blessings. The style of the figures is bad and rude, and they may perhaps be attributed to the 6th and early part of the 7th centuries.

The last-mentioned objects were evidently made for the purposes to which they have been applied; those which remain to be mentioned, on the contrary, are vessels originally intended for other uses. It will suffice to mention two very remarkable examples, which have been preserved in the treasury of the abbey of St. Maurice, in the Valais, from a period probably as early as that embraced in this work. One of these is known as the Vase of St. Martin, the tradition being that St. Martin of Tours, visiting Agaunum, filled this vessel with earth from the place of the massacre of the Theban legion, mixed with the blood of the sufferers, which miraculously issued from the ground. It is an antique vase of sardonyx, measuring about four and a half inches in diameter, and about six in height, on which is sculptured in excellent style a subject believed to represent Achilles betraying his sex at the sight of weapons (v. Aubert, Trésor de l'Abbaye de St. Maurice, p. 181, pl. xvi.). This vase has a foot and neck of gold set with precious stones, and plates of garnet in fillets of gold, precisely in the same manner as the reliquary belonging to the same treasury which has been mentioned above.

The other vessel is a ewer of massive gold, nearly a foot in height, adorned with uncut sapphires and large plates of cloisonné enamel, the colours of which are extraordinarily rich and fine. According to tradition, this was sent by Haroun el Rashid to Charles the Great, and by him presented to the abbey. Whatever the value of the tradition may be, the vase may well date from a period sufficiently early to allow of its truth; it is more probably of Byzantine, than of oriental origin. It has, like the last-mentioned vase, been engraved and described by Aubert. This ewer is said to contain blood of the Theban martyrs. Both vessels have their mouths enveloped in some kind of string, and masses of wax, on which are impressions of episcopal seals, the legends of which are undecipherable.

As great an antiquity may no doubt be claimed for the second class of reliquaries, viz., that of those which were intended to be worn on the person, as for the first. Prudentius alludes to the practice of wearing RELICS, which of course implies cases to contain them, in the hymn celebrating Fructuosus and his fellow martyrs, Eulogius and Augurius (Peristeph. vi. v. 131):

> "Tum de corporibus sacras favillas
> Et perfusa mero leguntur ossa
> Quae raptim sibi quisque vindicabat
> Fratrum tantus amor domum referre
> Sanctorum cinerum dicata dona
> Aut gestare sinu fidele pignus."

Many instances of the practice of wearing a "capsella," or "capsula," with relics, are to be found in succeeding centuries (v. De Rossi, Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1872, p. 17), and several examples have been found which may be confidently referred to the earlier centuries of Christianity. Two of these are given by De Rossi (Bull. 1872, Tav. 11, fig. 1, 3). The one bearing the labarum (see woodcut, p. 611) is of gold, and was found in 1571 in a tomb of the Vatican cemetery. It is not now known to exist, but the design has been preserved by a drawing by Alfarano, and it has been published by Bosio. On the reverse was a figure of a dove. De Rossi is of opinion that it contained either a relic or some portion of the Gospel (v. Bull. 1872, p. 12, 1869, p. 63, as regards the practice; Bingham, Orig. Eccles. c. xi. chap. v. sect. 8, and b. xvi. chap. v. sect. 6), "parvula Evangelia," as they were termed: Martigny confidently asserts that this is of the 4th century. It may indeed be so, but all that can be said with certainty as to its date is, that it is not older.

Reliquary. (From De Rossi's 'Bull. di Arch. Crist.')

The other example (see woodcut) is no doubt more recent. De Rossi gives it to the 5th century. It was purchased in Rome in 1872, and is made of thin plates of bronze, the space between them being not more than sufficient to contain a piece of parchment or of cloth. The subject on one side is clearly our Lord changing the water into wine, that on the other would seem to represent the martyrdom of St. Vitalis, who was placed in a pit or hole, at a place called ad Palmam, near Ravenna, and then crushed under a heap of stones (v. Bull. 1872, p. 10). The object contained in this encolpium was probably a fragment of cloth, perhaps dipped in the blood of the martyr; or perhaps a morsel of a brandeum which had been placed on his tomb.

Another and frequent form for a pendant reliquary was a cross. The oldest of these (if we can believe the tradition concerning it to be well-founded) now existing, is probably that preserved in the treasury of St. Peter's at Rome, under the name of "Encolpium Constantini Magni" (v. Bock, Kleinodien des Heil. Römischen Reiches, pl. xx. fig. 28, p. 115). Of this, only the cross which occupies the centre can have any pretensions to belong to the period of Constantine, the tablet in which it is enclosed being obviously Byzantine work of the 11th or some later century.

The cross itself has arms of equal length, and measures about one and a half inches in height and width. It contains a cross reputed to be of the real cross of our Lord, the receptacle containing which is surrounded by a border of blue and white enamel. Two very remarkable examples of such pectoral crosses exist in the treasury of the church of Monza. The earlier is that which has always been regarded as that which St. Gregory the Great sent to Queen Theodelinda, in A.D. 603, with a letter (Epp. lib. xiv. ep. 12), in which this passage occurs, "Excellentissimo autem filio nostro Adulouvaldo Regi transmittere phylacteria curavimus, id est crucem cum ligno sanctae crucis Domini et lectionem sancti evangelii theca persica inclusam." An engraving of this will be found under CRUCIFIX, p. 512; and it is only necessary here to say, that it is formed of gold, the figures and inscriptions being in niello, and covered by a piece of rock crystal; it measures three inches in height, by two and a half in breadth. In the interior is said to be a piece or pieces of the true cross. The best representation of this object which has been given, is that in Bock's Kleinodien, &c., app. p. 25. As the inscriptions on this cross are in Greek, it has generally been assumed that it was of Byzantine origin. But this is hardly probable: Byzantine work of that period would have had a better and rather more classical character. On the other hand, it corresponds very closely in many points with the drawing of the Crucifixion in the famous manuscript Syriac Gospels, in the Medicean library at Florence, dated A.D. 586 [v. woodcut under CRUCIFIX], and it most probably came from Syria, or some adjoining country. Pope Gregory sent to Recared, king of the Visigoths, a cross, very probably of like fashion. It is mentioned in one of his Epistles (Ep. cxxii. lib. ix.) in these terms: "Crucem . . . in qua lignum Dominicae crucis inest et capilli beati Johannis Baptistae."

The other cross at Monza containing relics is that called the "Crux Regni," which belonged to Berengarius, king of Italy (ob. 924). It is perhaps beyond the period of this work, but a few words may be admitted, as it serves as an example of crosses of like character which come within it, and indeed may really be earlier in date than its possessor. It is of gold, thickly covered with precious stones, sapphires and others, chiefly cut en cabochon, and measures nearly nine and a half inches in height and breadth; the height is a little greater than the breadth. In the centre is a repository for a relic. Dr. Bock, who has given an engraving of it (pl. xxxiii.) is of opinion that although it has been used as a pectoral cross at coronations, it was originally attached to a votive crown, as were those of Agilulfus and of Reccesvinthus.

At Aix la Chapelle is preserved, within a crucifix of the 12th century, a small cross measuring two inches and three-eighths in height by one and a-half in width. On the upper limb of this is fastened a piece of wood, which, according to a respectable tradition, is a portion of the pectoral cross found on the body of Charles the Great, when his tomb was opened A.D. 1000. It is engraved in Dr. Bock's Der Reliquienschatz des Liebfrauen-Münsters zu Aachen, p. 36.

The cross engraved under ENCOLPION in this work, and by Martigny, is asserted by the latter to have been that of a bishop, and to be the oldest monument of the kind known to exist. De Rossi has given in his Bulletino (May, 1863) a long and careful dissertation on the question of its age, and arrives at the conclusion that it probably belongs to the 5th or 6th century. His reasonings appear well founded, but on one consideration he does not dwell, viz. that it was found in a tomb within the church of S. Lorenzo-fuor-le-Mura, near the repository of the martyr. Pelagius II. (A.D. 572–590) is stated in the Liber Pontif. to have built that portion of the church from its foundations. This is, perhaps, too strongly expressed, but no doubt he executed considerable works there; and as the first pope who was buried in a church was Leo I. in 462, and he only in the vestibule of the sacristy of St. Peter's, we can hardly suppose that any one would have been placed in such proximity to a martyr so venerated as St. Laurence until long after the time of Leo I. It may, therefore, seem probable, that although the cross may be of earlier date, the interment did not take place much before A.D. 600. There is no indication that the wearer had been a bishop, as Martigny asserts. On the sides monograms are engraved, and De Rossi makes several suggestions as to the name they contain, but declines to give a positive opinion. [A. N.]

REQUIEM. The Roman service for the dead has acquired this name from its proper anthem beginning with the words, "Requiem aeternam dona eis, Domine" (see 2 Esdr. Vulg. 4 E. ii. 34). The versicle was not put to quite the same use within our period, but it appears as one of several little chapters ("capitula," Murat. Lit. Rom. ii. 213; "versuum capitella," Opp. Greg. M. v. 23, ed. 1615) said after the prayers and psalms, "in Agenda Mortuorum, quando Anima egreditur de Corpore" (Mur. u. s.). In this use it is probably ante-Gregorian. In the Gelasian sacramentary only one capitulum is indicated, thus: "Die Cap. In memoria aeterna" (Mur. u. s. i. 749); but as the offices were then committed to memory, several well-known versicles may be understood under this brief reference. In the later Gregorian antiphonary, "Requiem," &c., already appears as the introit of the Mass for the departed (Antiph. Greg. in Pamel. Liturgica, ii. 175). [W. E. S.]

REREDOS (Fr. retable; Span. retablo). It is shewn by Viollet-le-Duc that the altars of the primitive church had no reredos (Dictionnaire raisonné de l'Architecture, vol. ii. p. 34). So long in fact as the bishop's seat was at the back of the altar, it was unlikely that he and the people should have been separated by such a screen. The rise of the reredos dates only from the period when the episcopal seats, and with them the choirs, were established in front of the altars. Towards the end of the 11th century, says the same writer, they had not in the West yet begun to push the altar back against a wall, but they erected upon it a reredos, which was most frequently a movable erection, and was made in metal or in wood. In France none is known earlier than the beginning of the 12th century. France, indeed, was slower to introduce these "parasite ornaments" than other parts of Europe. And Thiers (Dissert. sur les principaux Autels des Églises) eulogizes the devotion of antiquity, which was content to do without "ces nouvelles inventions." It appears from the pages of Viollet-le-Duc (Dict. rais. art. Autel) that in France the cathedrals were the last to admit the reredos, and the longest preserved the ancient traditions of the altar.

In Spanish it appears that the term retablo was applied to the altar itself. The council of Elvira (A.D. 305) by its thirty-sixth canon enacted that pictures ought not to be in a church. Ferdinand de Mendoza writes a treatise on the canons of this council to Clement VIII. In the third book of it (upon the canon in question) he has the following: "Hinc fit probabile antiquitatem et originem eorum altarium (quae Hispani Retablos vocant) Hispaniae deberi, cum tabulis potius quam parietibus episcopi nostri sacras imagines religionis ergo pingi voluisse hoc ipso decreto videantur" (ap. Labbe, i. 1239c, ed. Par. 1671). [H. T. A.]

RESERVATION OF THE EUCHARIST.

Our earliest extra-scriptural account of the celebration of the Lord's Supper says: "The deacons communicate each of those present, and carry away to the absent of the blest bread and wine and water" (Justin Martyr, A.D. 140, Apol. i. 65). This liberty was necessary during the persecutions of that age. From other writers we infer that those to whom the Eucharist was taken at home were not bound to consume it immediately, or all at once, but might reserve a part, or all, for future occasions. In the course of time this liberty was extended, and we find persons present at the celebration themselves taking away and reserving of the sacred elements. Tertullian, at Carthage, 192, advises some who feared to break their fast by communicating, to "take the Lord's body and reserve it," until the fast was over (De Orat. 19). The same writer speaks of a Christian woman as partaking of the sacrament at home, "secretly before all food" (ad Ux. ii. 5). This seems to imply a frequent, perhaps daily, reception of the reserved Eucharist. St. Cyprian, bishop of the same city, A.D. 251, tells the story of a woman who, "attempting to open with unworthy hands her casket in which the holy of the Lord was stored, was deterred by a fire rising out of it" (De Lapsis, 132, ed. Brem.). The murderers of Tharsicius, a deacon of Rome, 257, found him "carrying about him the sacraments of the Lord's body" (Damasus, Carm. 35; Surius, Aug. 2, Acta Stephani, p. 13). So some Christians in danger at sea have with them "the divine sacrament of the faithful" (Ambr. de Excess. Fratr. i. 43). The sister of Gregory of Nazianzum, praying for restoration to health, mingled with her tears "whatever her hand had treasured of the antitypes of the precious body and blood" (Greg. Naz. Or. viii. 18). St. Jerome, A.D. 398, speaks of a poor bishop as "carrying the Lord's body in a wicker basket, His blood in a vessel of glass" (Epist. 125 ad Rust. § 20); and of some who, deeming themselves for a special reason unfit to go to church, inconsistently communicated in private on the same day, obviously of reserved elements (Ep. 48 ad Pammach. § 15). St. Basil tells us that "at Alexandria and in Egypt the laity for the most part had every one the communion in their own houses" (Ep. 93 ad Caes. Patric.). It was thus that provision was made for the communions of monks, nuns, and hermits: "All those who dwell alone in the desert, where there is no priest, keep the communion at home, and receive it at their own hands" (ibid.). We might gather as much from an instance in Palladius, 401 (Hist. Laus. 61). In 527, a law of Justinian orders the appointment of an approved presbyter or deacon to "carry the holy communion" to monks and nuns (Novell. cxxiii. 36).

Abuse.—Reservation in private houses naturally led to abuse, especially when persecution had ceased. St. Augustine, in 430, mentions a case in which "a poultice was made of the Eucharist" (Cont. Julian. iii. 162). Some heretics pretended to communicate publicly, but took all away with them from one wrong motive or another (Conc. Caesaraug. A.D. 380, can. 3; Conc. Tolet. 400, can. 14). Later, the Eucharist was abused to witchcraft (Caesar. Heisterb. Dial. Mirac. ix. 6, 9; Conc. Later. iv. can. 20, &c.).

Prohibition.—Abuse led to suppression. The earliest prohibition, if it be assigned to the right age, is that of an Armenian canon of the 4th century, which generally forbids presbyters to "take the Eucharist from the church to the houses of laymen, and there impart to them the sacred bread" (Canones Isaaci, in Mai, Script. Vet. Nov. Coll. x. 280). The council of Saragossa, 380: "If any one is proved not to have taken the grace of the Eucharist in church after receiving it, let him be anathema for ever" (can. 3). By the council of Toledo (above) it was decreed that for this offence a person should be "expelled as one guilty of sacrilege."

The only certain instance of reservation by a lay person with which I meet after the 5th century, occurs in the Pratum Spirituale (79) of John Moschus, 630. He mentions, however, that the sacrament had been laid up in the house "according to the custom of the country" (Seleucia); from which we should infer that it was at least almost extinct elsewhere. But bishops, priests, and monks continued to reserve. Thus we read of a bishop, Birinus, of Dorchester, who carried the Eucharist wrapped in his pall (Vita, Surius, Dec. 3), and of priests who, as was "then the custom of many, carried it as a safeguard by the way" (Acta Laurentii, 7, Sur. Nov. 14), and of a monk who was able to send it to another at a distance (Joan. Mosch. Pr. Spir. 29). Greek monks (Arcudius de Concord. Eccl. Oc. et Or. iii. 59), and the bishops of Rome (Lorinus, Comm. in Ps. lvii. 2), have retained to modern times the custom of carrying it on a journey.

Various Uses.—The reserved sacrament was used in communions of the PRESANCTIFIED (p. 1696), as a token of inter-communion [EULOGIA, Vol. I. p. 628], as FERMENTUM for other celebrations (I. 668), for the communion of newly ordained priests (669), for deposition in tombs [OBSEQUIES, § xix., p. 1434], for the consecration of churches and altars, and for the communion of the sick. The two last-named uses we propose to consider here.

Deposition in Altars.—It was probably in the 7th century that the church of Rome introduced the practice of depositing, at the dedication of a church, portions of the consecrated bread under or in a cavity made in the mensa of the altar. Owing to the lateness of the extant MSS. only one Roman pontifical now known, viz. the Codex Ratoldi, prescribes this rite: "Ponat tres portiones corporis Domini intus et tres incensi" (Sacram. Gregor. Ménard, n. 580; Opp. Greg. M. iii. 436, ed. Ben.). In the Roman books this practice was part of the order of consecration; but when the English borrowed it, they treated it as a separate rite, to be observed after the consecration. Thus the council of Cealchythe, 816, having directed that "all be performed in order as in the service book," adds, "Afterwards, let the Eucharist which has been consecrated by the bishop at the same service be inclosed with other relics in a casket, and kept in the same basilica" (can. 2). On this principle we find the order for the inclosure of the sacrament an addition or appendix to the forms of dedication in the early English pontifical. See that of Egbert of York, 732–766 (Surtees Soc.), that formerly preserved at Lumièges, now No. 362 in the public library at Rouen (Mart. u. s. ii. 254), which is assigned to the latter part of the reign of Charlemagne, and the pontifical of St. Dunstan, 961 (ib. 257). The two latter pontificals expressly ascribe this rite to Rome in the heading, "Here begins the Order of the Deposition of the Relics in the holy Roman Church." The council of Cealchythe (u. s.) and St. Dunstan (u. s.) imply an opinion that the Eucharist was more important than the relics generally inclosed with it. The former says: "If he is not able to inclose other relics, yet may this profit more than all, because it is the body of Our Lord Jesus Christ."

Not one of the French orders which prescribe this rite is earlier than the end of the 9th century, to which period belong the pontificals of Rheims, Noyons, and Sens (Mart. ii. 260, 261, 272). It is found in many later down to the 15th century (ib. 243). It was practised also in Germany, as we learn from a Salzburg pontifical of the 11th century (Mart. u. s. 243). For its later history and suppression, see Notitia Eucharistica, 917–918, ed. 2.

For the Sick.—Among the absent to whom, as Justin Martyr tells us, the Eucharist was sent in the 2nd century would be some absent from sickness, but we cannot say when it began to be reserved by the celebrant expressly for their sake. As the primitive church had no office of private celebration for the sick, this was probably done at a very early period. Eusebius, near the beginning of the 4th century, tells us of a dying man who sent for a priest to communicate him, and the Eucharist, which must have been reserved, was taken to him by another (Hist. Eccl. vi. 44). The Armenian canon of the same century permits one exception to the prohibition already quoted, viz. "on account of sickness." When St. Ambrose was dying, 420, a priest, warned of his state, carried the Eucharist to him (Paulinus, in Vit. S. Ambr. 47). Philippicus, A.D. 597, anticipating a violent death, "sought to receive the body of the Lord." It was in the night, and the danger sudden, so that reservation is necessarily implied (Anast. Biblioth. Hist. Eccl. 83). After this period testimonies to the practice are very frequent. It is expressly ordered by a council of Tours, cited by Regino, that "the sacred oblation be laid up for the viaticum of persons departing this life" (De Discipl. Eccl. i. 70).

Reservation in both Kinds.—We read that in a tumult at Constantinople, A.D. 403, soldiers entered the place "where the holy things were stored up, and the most holy blood of Christ was spilt on the garments of the said soldiers" (Chrysost. Epist. ad Innoc. 3). Travellers by sea had "the body and blood of the Redeemer with them" (Greg. M. A.D. 590, Dial. iii. 36). St. Mary of Egypt, when dying, A.D. 629, received "in a small cup a portion of the undefiled body and precious blood" (Vita, iv. 34, in Bolland. Apr. 2). The same thing is related of SS. Odilia (Mabill. praef. i. in Saec. Bened. iii.). Chad (Vita, ii. 9, Boll. Mar. 2), and Cuthbert (Bede, Vita S. Cuth. x. 6) in the same century. Bede, 701, orders the sick to be "refreshed with the body and blood" (Regino de Disc. Eccl. i. 119). The words of delivery in every order for the communion of the sick during the 8th and two following centuries recognize the reception, and therefore the reservation, of both kinds: "The body and blood of the Lord be unto thee," &c., and the like (Capit. 2, Theodulfi, Baluze, Miscell. ii. 104, ed. 2; Book of Deer, 90; Liber de Arbuthnott, pr. xix., xxii.; Martene, u. s. i. vii. 6, n. 3; Not. Euch. 1022). Even in the 11th century we find in a Salzburg pontifical the express order: "Let the priests communicate him with the body and blood," &c. (Mart. u. s. ord. 15). Yet it would seem that in the 9th century some already neglected to reserve the wine, for the canon of Tours already cited orders the oblation reserved for the sick to be "steeped in the blood of Christ [SPOON, EUCHARISTIC], that the presbyter may be able truthfully to say to the sick, 'The body and blood,'" &c.

The reserved Eucharist is sometimes spoken of simply as "bread" (Tert. ad Ux. ii. 5), or "the body," &c. (Jerome, Ep. 48, ad Pammach. § 15), but we cannot infer from this that the body only was ever reserved at the time, for we find this language used of public as well as private communions, and all acknowledge that the former were invariably in both kinds. With Tertullian (de Orat. 14) and Jerome (u. s.) "reception of the body" is the public reception in church, the equivalent of which, in the Armenian canon before cited, is "drawing near to the bread."

In the Greek church the practice of intinction has kept up the reservation of the blood to this day. The consecrated bread being "broken into little particles [called Margaritae, or pearls], and sufficiently tinged and moistened in the consecrated wine, they take them out of the chalice, and dry them in a small dish set under a pan of coals, and then put them into a pyx or box to be reserved" (Smith, Greek Church, 162; Leo Allat. de Recent. Gr. Templ. 145). This is done on Maundy Thursday, and the particles so treated serve for the aliturgic days of Lent, and for the sick.

The Renewal of the reserved Eucharist.—Few notices of this occur within our period. The earliest is in a canon of Isaac III., an Armenian catholicus of the 7th century, by which the Eucharist is to be reserved "only from Lord's day to Lord's day, or from sacrifice to sacrifice" (can. 9, Mai, Script. V. N. Coll. x. 301). In the West the canon of Tours, preserved by Regino, 906, says: "Let it always be changed from one third day to another" (u. s.). Later rules vary from a week to a month (Not. Euch. 915).

The Vessel containing the reserved Sacrament.—When this was taken home, during the age of persecution, it was placed in a casket, which St. Cyprian (de Lapsis, 132) calls ARCA. Turris was the common name for the vessel in which the FERMENTUM was kept in churches from the 6th century downwards, at least in France, because "the Lord's sepulchre was cut in the rock into the likeness of a tower" (German. Paris. A.D. 555, Expos. Miss. Brev.). See the alleged will of Remigius, 533, in App. ad Liturg. Gall. 466; Greg. Tur. de Glor. Mart. i. 85. Venantius Fortunatus has a poem on such a turris (iii. 13). A Benedictio Calicis et Patenae et Turris occurs in the Besançon sacramentary (Mus. Ital. i. 389). In the 8th century we find this vessel called capsa at Rome (Ord. Rom. i. 8, 10). See CAPSA. Pyxis, afterwards universal, seems to have come into use in the 9th century. "Every presbyter shall have a pyx or vessel worthy of so great a sacrament, in which the Lord's body is to be carefully kept" (Conc. Turon. in Regino, De Discipl. Eccl. i. 70; see also the Articles of Visitation. p. 8, ed. Baluze; Admon. Synod. Leon.

iv.; Labb. Conc. viii. 34). Columba was another name. Perpetuus of Tours (471) in his will speaks of a peristerium (the canopy over the columba), and a silver dove for a repository" (App. Opp. Greg. Tur. 1319). See DOVE. Yet another was Chrismale (Missale Francorum in Lit. Gall. 316). See CHRISMAL. A later name, which we find in England, Ireland, and France, was cuppa (Hist. Episc. Autiss. 57, in Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. v. 3 n. 8; Instructio Decanorum, Synodi Meldensis, in Mart. et Dur. Thesaur. Anecd. iv. 930, &c. See Ducange in v.). Ciborium, originally the name of the vaulted canopy over the altar (see Vol. I. p. 66), was also used in this sense (Chron. Centul. ii. 10, iii. 3, in Dach. Spicil. iv. 467, 480, 487). The Greeks keep the consecrated bread reserved for the sick in a box which they call the ἀρτοφόριον, or bread-holder. "This box, whether of silver or wood, is put up into a silken case, the better to defend what is inclosed from cobwebs, or anything that may defile it, and is hung up usually behind the altar against the wall, with a lamp or two, for the most part, burning before it" (Smith, Greek Church, 162). [W. E. S.]

RESIDENCE (RESIDENTIA PAROCHORUM). There are many proofs both in the decrees of councils and in imperial edicts, that the evil of non-residence on the part of the parochial clergy had made itself felt from the earliest times as an evil which required to be strictly guarded against. At the council of Sardica, A.D. 347 (c. 16), complaint was made that the presbyters and deacons of the region round Thessalonica were habitually attracted by the seductions of the capital city, and induced to take up their abode there for an unreasonable length of tim . The council therefore extended to the parochial clergy the decree that had been made about bishops (c. 12), that they should not be absent from their parishes more than three Sundays. The council held in Constantinople, A.D. 692 (Conc. Quinisex. c. 80), prohibited any of the clergy or laity from being absent from their parish church for more than three Sundays, except under plea of necessity. In case of disobedience, the clergy were to be deprived of their preferment, and the laity excommunicated. Justinian (Novell. cxxiii. 9) includes all the clergy in the law which forbade bishops to be absent from their see for more than a year except on imperial business. Gregory the Great (lib. iv., Indict. 12, Ep. 13) commends a sentence of deposition which had been passed upon a presbyter who had been absent from his parish, but adds, that the presbyter asserts that he had duly obtained leave of absence from the bishop, and been unavoidably detained by illness. He therefore directs that a fresh examination should be made into the circumstances of the case. A capitulary of Charles the Great (V. c. 329), complains that bishops, priests, and deacons, from motives of gain or pleasure, were in the habit of travelling to distant parts of the country, leaving their parishes destitute of the means of grace, and neglecting the duties of hospitality, and strictly forbids the practice except in cases of inevitable necessity. The fourth council of Paris, A.D. 829 (c. 29), recites in strong terms the evils caused to country parishes by their clergy being sent from them to transact legal business for their bishops. At a council held at Rome, A.D. 853, Leo IV. complained that a certain Anastasius, a cardinal priest ("presbyter cardinis nostri") had been absent from his church for five years, although repeatedly cited to reside. The sentence of the council was that Anastasius should be deposed.

During Pestilence.—It appears to have been reckoned as shameful for the clergy to desert their posts in time of pestilence, as in time of persecution, such seasons being always regarded as especial calls to more earnest work, and favourable opportunities for making impression on the people. A few examples will suffice.

Cyprian, in his treatise De Mortalitate, written on the occasion of a terrible pestilence, recounts the reasons by which the faithful were to be persuaded to remain in the afflicted cities, adding, that this afforded them a splendid opportunity of returning good for evil, by succouring their persecutors in the hour of their necessity. Gregory Nyssen, in his Life of Gregory Thaumaturgus (p. 958 B. Migne, Patrol.) speaks of his conduct during a pestilence in the city of Neocaesarea, of the confidence which the sick reposed in his power to drive away the disease by his prayers, and the influence which he gained over the profligate and unbelievers. Eusebius (H. E. vii. 22) gives some fragments of the epistles of Dionysius of Alexandria, in which he speaks of the noble conduct of the Christians of that city during a plague, narrating how they helped in every way, not only their fellow-citizens, but even the heathen, tending the sick, burying the dead, and in many instances, especially in the case of presbyters and deacons, themselves catching the pestilence and dying. This he contrasts with the conduct of the heathen, who avoided all communication with the sick, and cast out their dead into the roads. Gregory the Great (Epist. viii. 41) urges Dominicus, bishop of Carthage, to remain at his post during a pestilence, and not only do all he could to assuage the sufferings it caused, but to make it a time for earnest exhortation while the hearts of men, made tender by fear, were open to receive his exhortations to repentance. That Gregory inculcated such conduct, not only by precept but by example, appears in his Life by John the Deacon. It is there stated (i. 39–43) that he took possession of his see while a fierce pestilence was raging, and encountered the evil with processions and public meetings for prayer; that during one of these meetings eighty people died, but that Gregory never ceased from prayer and supplication till the plague was stayed. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. viii. 2) relates that Salvius, bishop of Alby, in Narbonne, remained at his post when the city was devastated by pestilence, urging the people to repentance and prayer; and again (id. ix. 22) that Theodorus of Marseilles, on a like occasion, remained in the church of St. Victor with the few who were untouched by the pestilence in earnest prayer for its cessation. The sixteenth council of Toledo, A.D. 693, in the recital of their proceedings, affixed to their decrees (Labbe, Canon i. p. 379) notes that the bishops of Aquitaine were prevented from attending by the pestilence then raging in their country. [P. O.]

RESPONSORIA (or psalmi responsorii, or psalmi), a technical name for the psalms or portions of psalms which were said or sung between the lections in the various offices of the church. Speaking of the divine office as arranged according to the Hours in the Breviary, Radulfus said: "Sunt etiam in officio divino brevia responsoria, quae in officio Romano ad parvas horas, ut ad primam, tertiam, sextam, nonam, et completorium dicuntur, et de psalmis sumuntur excepta prima," &c. (De Can. Observ. Liber, Prop. xii.). Minute regulations as to their order and form in the Hours in the 8th century are laid down by Amalarius (de Ord. Antiphon. lib. cc. 71–80). But the term is more frequently used to denote those psalms which are interposed between the lections in the Ordo Missae, and which are represented by the Gradual, Tract, &c. in the modern missal. The title "responsorium" is employed instead of gradual throughout the antiphonary of Gregory, as printed in Pamelius (Liturg. ii. 62–176; Gerbert. Liturg. Aleman. i. 308; Hugo a S. Victore, Erudit. Theol. i. 18). It was originally a long passage from Scripture, consisting of a whole psalm or canticle, for which an extract of a few verses was substituted at a very early date. The use of a whole psalm survives in the Armenian and Coptic liturgies (Hammond, C. E. Anc. Lit. pp. 145, 199), and was exemplified in the old Gallican rite by the position of the hymn of Zecharias before the first, and of the song of the three children before the third lection.

1. The title "responsorium" is said to be due to the antiphonal form which these psalms assumed in the mode of singing, and to the form of versicle and response, "vocata hoc nomine quod uno canente chorus consonando respondeat" (Isid. Hisp. de Ecc. Offic. i. 8), "quod alio desinente id alter respondeat" (Rabanus Maur. de Institut. Cleric. i. 33), "quod quoniam alternatim cantatur, unde et nominatur responsorium" (Hugo a S. Victore, Erudit. Theol. i. 18). According to other rituals the term is derived from the responsory answering to the preceding lesson, "quod a cunte repetatur" (Alcuin de Div. Offi. ed. Hittorp. p. 69). "Dicuntur enim a respondendo; tristia namque tristibus et laeta laetis debemus succinere lectionibus" (Rupert de Div. Offic. i. 15). It was mystically interpreted to represent the active life, as the alleluia which followed it represented the contemplative life (Amalar. de Ecc. Offic. i. 35). Other mystical meanings are worked out at great length (ibid. iii. 11–14). The difference between antiphons and responsories lay in the mode of singing. "Inter responsoria et antiphonas hoc differt quod in responsoriis unus dicat versum, in antiphonis autem alternent versibus chori" (Raban. Maur. de Instit. Cleric. i. 33).

2. The date of the introduction of "responsoria" into the liturgy cannot be fixed with accuracy. They were popularly, but without sufficient evidence, said to have been invented by the Italians, as antiphons were invented by the Greeks (Raban. Maur. de Instit. Cler. lib. 1), a supposition which is perhaps based on the late Latinity of the term by which they are technically known. Allusions to them in the following authors and documents, Eastern and Western, prove their use at various early dates, and justify the placing of their introduction by Amalarius "longo ante tempore," or by Martene, "ab ipso evangelii exordio" (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. ii. 17, interpretante Rufino; Ambros. ad Marcellinam; Augustin. in Praefat. ad Psalmos 46, 99; Chrysost. Hom. 36, in 1 Cor. ad finem.; Sozomen, Hist. Ecc. v. 19; St. Benedicti Regula, c. ix.).

3. The normal portion of the "psalmus responsorius" was between the lections in the breviary offices, and between the Epistle and Gospel in the Liturgy. This was the case in the Roman liturgy passim, in the African (Augustin. Serm. x. de Verb. Apost. tom. v. p. 839; Hom. xxxiii. de Verb. Dom.), in the Gallican (Germani. Paris. Expos. Brevis. § 7); but in the Mozarabic liturgy, where, as in the Gallican, three lections occurred in each missa, the full responsory intervened between the first (lectio prophetica) and the second (apostolus).

4. The psalmus was originally sung by a single cantor, afterwards by several cantors, the response being taken up by the whole choir (Ordo Rom. i. § 10; ii. § 7; Raban. Maur. de Instit. Cler. ii. 51); but there was some variety of custom on this point. According to the ordinary rule a lector was chosen for this office. "Praecentor psalmi responsorii usitatius ex ordine erat lectorum" (Thomasius, in Praef. ad Rom. Antiphon.). In the Anglo-Saxon church it was sung by a priest (Theodore, Penitent. ii. 11) or a layman (ibid. i. 10). In the Gallican church by a deacon (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. viii. 3) or by children, "nisi tantummodo responsorium quod a parvulis canetur" (German. Paris. Expos. Brev. § 7).

5. It was sung on the step from which the epistle had been read (Ordo Rom. ii. 7), whence its more modern and familiar title of Gradual. It was said or sung originally by heart, but at a later period the responsories were collected together in a book called the Responsoriale. The arrangement of its parts differed slightly in Rome and Gaul (Amalar. Prologus de Ordine Antiphon). It was sometimes prefaced by an announcement of the passage of Scripture from which it was taken (Cassiodorus, cap. ii. Prefat. in Psalm.), and was usually followed by the Gloria Patri, according to the direction of the rule of St. Benedict (for Nocturns) and of the fourth council of Toledo (can. 15), which also alludes to its permitted omission in the case of the penitential psalms (can. 16). The cantor was vested in an alb, as we may gather from the twenty-third canon of the council of Laodicea, which forbids his wearing a stole, and from the eleventh canon of the second council of Bracara, which forbids his wearing ordinary dress. For further information the reader is referred to GRADUAL, TRACT, &c.

RESURRECTION AND LAST JUDGMENT. It is difficult to say with certainty how far representations of this tremendous subject really belong to early Christian art, that is to say to that period of it which ends with the death of Charles the Great. Though many of the great mosaics after the 6th century represent the Lord in glory, attended by saints, they do not, as at periods nearer the middle ages, set forth His sentence on the wicked or the righteous. That of the Duomo of Torcello is probably the earliest remaining instance on a mural scale. The various sketches of the condemnation of the wicked, and the very numerous hells of the Utrecht Psalter, are no doubt prior to them. The Psalter of Athelstan (late 9th century) has its concourse of saints and glorification of our Lord, which quite anticipates the crowded mediaeval-Gothic Paradises.

Lord Lindsay refers the great judgment mosaic of Torcello to the 12th century, when a reaction or renascence of Byzantine art took place under the Comneni. Its Inferno has much ghastly imagination in the representation of the sea, Amphitrite in person, giving up her dead, the worms writhing from fleshless skulls, &c. This, with the varieties of torture represented in the smaller compartments, would be almost decisive as to its late date; but Prof. Ruskin and the Marchese Selvatico appear to think it probable that this mosaic, or parts of it, may have been among the decorations of the original island-church of Torcello, built in A.D. 641. (See Appendix to Stones of Venice, vol. ii.) If the mosaics are really 7th century, they are, as far as the present writer knows, unique as to subject and treatment for that time; and their ghastly imagery would seem to indicate a later date. They certainly anticipate the imaginations of Giotto and Orgagna, as the latter influenced the works of Michel Angelo in the Sistine, by his frescoes in the Campo Santo of Pisa. There is a peculiarity noticed by Prof. Ruskin in the Torcellese artist's conception of the everlasting fire, not as a conflagration or fiery prison-house, or personified monster, as in later days, but as a red stream issuing from beneath the throne of God. It is suggested under TORMENT, PLACE OF, that the representation of an actual mouth of hell, so common in the middle ages, may be derived from the roaring mouth or passage from the infernal regions described in the vision in Plato's Republic, bk. x.; but its not being found in this mosaic may render the connexion less plausible.

The present writer remembers no representation of the Last Judgment at Mount Sinai; and the one or two at the convent of Mar Saba seem of late date. There are many at Mount Athos, but Mr. H. F. Tozer considers them entirely out of our period. In Messrs. Texier and Pullan's Byzantine Architecture, p. 41, mention is made of several last judgments, none at all early. The subject is said in this work to be entirely Byzantine, and derived from Egypt, to be in fact a repetition of the psychostasis of antiquity. The sculptures in tympana of church porches in the West during the 13th and 14th centuries are very frequently of Byzantine derivation.

A heathen painting of judgment, or presentation of the soul after death to the lower powers, has been found in the catacomb of St. Praetextatus. (See Perret, i. 73.) "Diespiter" and "Mercurius Nuntius" are named in it, as also Alcestis. See also the "Inductio Vibies" in the Gnostic catacomb (Parker, Appendix to Catacombs, p. 174; Perret, vol. i. No. 73), which certainly represents the presentation of the dead Vivia to some assembled divinities. [R. J. T.]

RESURRECTION OF OUR LORD. See CRUCIFIX. This subject forms part of several of the early crucifixions. There seems to have been a feeling on the part of scribes or their patrons that the true impression of the event of the Lord's death could only be given in one view with His victory over death. The annexed woodcut (No. 1) is a striking representation of the Resurrection from the Rabula MS. in the Laurentine Library at Florence. As subjects drawn from the passion of our Lord are very rare in early Christian art, it is not very surprising that His resurrection does not occur often. The following examples, given by Rohault de Fleury, L'Évangile, vol. ii. ppl. 92, 93, 94, will amount to a tolerable list.

In sculpture, a well-known Lateran sarcophagus of the 4th century gives the monogram, inscribed in the circle of a victor's wreath of bay or clive, and elevated on a large cross, which forms its upright P. Two soldiers resting on their shields are placed beneath its arms. Martigny mentions a lamp figured by Giorgi, de Monogrammate Christi, p. 10, of nearly the same device, with the addition of a tablet with the motto of the Labarum, ΕΝ ΤΟΥΤΩ ΝΙΚΑ; also a marble tomb at Nimes, and a sarcophagus at Soissons (Le Blant, Inscr. de la Gaule, p. 304). Rohault de Fleury speaks of a fragment of a similar sarcophagus in the Vatican, which bears the upright monogram, ornamented, and without the cross. See also Aringhi, i. 311, a drawing from a Vatican sarcophagus which belonged to a private palace in his day.

No. 2. Symbolic Resurrection, Sarcophagus in the Lateran.

The 6th century ivory of the Vatican, Rohault de Fleury, ii. pl. 92, represents the soldiers resting on their shields as supporters, with two of the Maries above them. The sepulchre is a square building, surmounted by a Lombard cupola and supported by two pillars. On one of its doors (the other is omitted in the carving—as broken), there seems to be a bas-relief of the Raising of Lazarus, treated as in the catacombs. In pl. 94 he gives two 8th century ivories, now at Munich; one of the three Maries, the other of St. Mary Magdalene alone, greeted in both cases by the angel of the resurrection. They are attached to an 11th century evangeliary, but he thinks they may probably be of the time of Charles the Great.

In mosaic, the church of S. Apollinare nella Città at Ravenna, is the only example we know of (R. de Fleury, pl. 93, 6th century). In this example the sepulchre is a regular Greek circular temple, a peristyle, with architrave and flat dome roof. The broken door leans across the entrance. An angel sits on the left, with nimbus and wings, white robe and wand. He addresses two women, the first of them clad in a violet tunic and brown robe.

Besides these, Martigny mentions two tombs containing this subject; one belonging to the crypt of St. Maximin (Monum. de Ste. Madeleine), another is from the sarcophagus of St. Celsus at Milan, (Bugati, Mem. di S. Celso, p. 242, tav. 1). He gives a woodcut of it. One is pointing to the napkin or grave-clothes, in the condition observed by St. Peter and St. John (John xx. 5, 6); the other sees the angel. On the right of the sepulchre—which is circular, has a round arched doorway, and obtusely gabled roof—the Lord appears to St. Thomas and another saint.

Finally, there is a resurrection on one of the reliquaries sent by St. Gregory the Great to Theodelinda of Lombardy (Mozzoni, Tav. di Stor. Eccl. vii. 97). St. Mary Magdalene prostrates herself before the Lord; two trees and a fountain represent the garden; and on one of St. Gregory's phials or oil vessels, sent at the same time, and now at Monza, there is an angel with two Maries. See CRUCIFIX, p. 516, vol. i.; and a medallion published by Münter, Symbolism, part i. tab. 1, No. 4; with the word ANACTACIC. The chief Christian symbolisms of the Resurrection are the universally-occurring figures of Jonah, and the less frequent one of Samson with the gates of Gaza (Buonarroti, Vetri, tav. 1, fig. 1). The Raising of Lazarus will be found s. v.; but the peacock and the ark of Noah can hardly be considered (as by De Fleury) as symbolisms specially directed to this subject.

REVENUES. [PROPERTY.]

REVERIANUS, June 1, bishop; commemorated at Autun (Mart. Usuard.; Boll. Acta SS. Jun. i. 40). [C. H.]

REVERSION (Regressus). Instances of securing the right of reversion to a bishopric are not unfrequent in the history of the early church, sometimes by desire of the people, at other times apparently by the will of the ruling bishop, but always under peculiar circumstances.

Eusebius (H. E. vi. 11) speaks of Alexander being appointed coadjutor to the aged Narcissus, bishop of Jerusalem, evidently with the right of succession, and H. E. vii. 32 says that Theotecnus, bishop of Caesarea in Palestine, ordained a certain Anatolius to the episcopate with the intention of making him his assistant and successor.

Socrates (H. E. v. 5) says that in order to heal a schism that existed in the church of Antioch (A.D. 379) in consequence of there being two bishops, Meletius and Paulinus, exercising their functions at the same time in the see, the people assembled those of the clergy who were considered worthy to be entrusted with the bishopric, and bound them by an oath that whenever either of the two bishops should die, the survivor should be permitted to retain undisputed possession of the see (compare Theodoret, H. E. v. 3, with note by Vales.); and H. E. vii. 46 relates how Paul, the Novatian bishop of Constantinople, when on his death-bed, was not only permitted, but requested by his presbyters to select his own successor.

Sozomen (H. E. ii. 20) says that Maximus, who had been ordained bishop of Diospolis by Macarius, bishop of Jerusalem, was appointed by the people coadjutor and successor to Macarius himself, and in due time succeeded to the see.

But these instances run contrary to the general intention of the church as expressed in the decrees of councils. Thus the Apostolic Canons (c. 75) forbid a bishop to ordain any of his relations, giving as a reason that the principle of hereditary succession ought not to be introduced into the church, οὐ γὰρ τὴν τοῦ θεοῦ ἐκκλησιὰν ὑπὸ κληρονόμους ὀφείλει τιθέναι. The council of Antioch, A.D. 341 (c. 23), expressly forbids any bishop to constitute (καθιστᾶν) any one as his successor, and provides that such appointment, if made, shall be void. The fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633 (c. 19), numbers among the clergy disqualified for bishoprics those who have been appointed by their predecessors in the see: and the fifth council of Paris (c. 2) forbids any bishop during his lifetime to appoint a successor unless under certain conditions. See COADJUTOR BISHOP, p. 398. [E. S.]

REVOCATUS, March 7, commemorated at Tuburbum (Mart. Usuard.); apparently the one mentioned in Mart. Hieron. Feb. 5. [C. H.]

RHEIMS, alleged Council of (Remense Concilium), A.D. 625. First mentioned in the history of the church of Rheims by Flodoard, one of its canons, in the 10th century. According to him, it was summoned by Sonnatius, bishop of Rheims, attended by forty or more bishops, and passed twenty-five canons, in which allusion is made more than once to the synod of Paris, A.D. 615. Nor is their general tone dissimilar. But, according to Burchard and others, it passed twenty-two more, which he omits, all confessedly the work of the 8th and 9th centuries. And these (coupled with the twenty-one statutes of Sonnatius, as they are called, which are no less apocryphal), must discredit everything else reported of his episcopate, for which no earlier authentic proof can be had (Mansi, x. 593–604). [E. S. Ff.]

RHENO. We learn from Isidore (Etym. xix. 23. 4) that rheno is the name of a garment covering the shoulders and chest, and reaching down to the waist, specially intended for protection against the rain. According to Sallust (Isidore, l. c.) it was worn by the Germans. The derivation is uncertain. We can hardly agree with Isidore, that it is to be found in Rhenus, the river Rhine, because of the use of the garment in the adjacent country. Another theory connects it with the name of the reindeer, from whose skin it may have been made. It is perhaps more likely that it is to be connected with ῥήν, so that it would merely mean a sheepskin. See Ducange's Glossarium, s. v. [R. S.]

RICHARIUS, Ap. 26, presbyter and confessor; commemorated at Centula (St. Riquier) (Mart. Usuard., Notker.; Boll. Acta SS. Ap. iii. 441); Oct. 9 (Mart. Hieron.). [C. H.]

RIEZ (in Provence), COUNCIL OF (Regense, or Reginense Concilium), A.D. 439. Caused by the uncanonical act of two bishops in consecrating to the see of Embrun without any reference to their metropolitan or their colleagues. It was attended by twelve bishops, of whom Hilary, bishop of Arles, in whose jurisdiction Embrun then lay, subscribed first. Its eight canons are partly directed against the offenders, and partly to prevent any similar offences in future (Mansi, v. 1189–1200). [E. S. Ff.]

RIGAE. [RUGAE.]

RIMAS or RIMNAS, Jan. 20, martyr with Innas and Pinnas, disciples of St. Andrew the apostle (Bas. Menol. ii. 124; Cal. Byzant.). [C. H.]

RIMINI, COUNCIL OF, A.D. 359 (ARIMINENSE CONCILIUM). Two councils, of which the first, that at Rimini, was entirely composed of Western prelates, and an Eastern assembling at Seleucia, the capital of Isauria, were convoked about the same time. There were more than four hundred present, of whom but eighty were Arians. The Nicene faith was accordingly received, all later formulas rejected, and four or five Arian bishops condemned. Ten deputies were sent with these decisions to Constantius. But meanwhile the Acacians proceeding to Constantinople gained over the emperor, and sent the last creed of Sirmium to Rimini to be received there. At first the council steadily refused compliance, whereupon Ursacius and Valens, two of the condemned bishops, hurried off to Nicaea, overtook and duped the deputies that had been sent from Rimini, and then returning thither themselves with count Taurus, who had orders [illegible] over they told him, revolutionized the council, forced it at a subsequent meeting to subscribe to this creed, and adopt Arianism. "Ingemuit totus orbis, et Arianum se esse miratus est," says St. Jerome, who summarizes its proceedings (Adv. Lucif. c. 17–19. Compare the documents in Mansi, iii. 293–316, and the discussion on them in Hefele, ii. 251–361, Eng. Tr.). [E. S. Ff.]

RINGS. The finger-ring used as a signet goes as far back as very early Egyptian times. It has continued to be used for the same purpose in all ages down to the present day, but in process of time has come to be employed for other purposes also. Rings may indicate official rank or the espoused or married state, or may be used as ornaments, or pressed into the service of devotion. Wealthy Christians in the times of the apostles wore gold rings (James ii. 2). The Ante-nicene and Post-nicene fathers alike find it necessary to declare against the prodigality of Christians in wearing rings and gems. (See Tertull. de Hab. Muliebr. c. 5; Apol. c. 6 Clem. Alex. Paed. lib. iii. c. 11; Cyprian de Hab. Virg. c. 14; Basil, Homil. ad Divit. c. 4; Hieron. Epist. ad Laet. c. 5). One of the earliest notices of a finger-ring in Church history occurs in the Acts of the Martyrs Perpetua and Felicitas (circa 202 A.D.), where we read that the martyr Saturus drew a ring from off the finger (anulum de digito pctiit) of Pudens, a soldier, who witnessed his sufferings, and returned it to him covered with his own blood (c. 6).

Christian Rings of Metal set with Gems.

A large number of Christian rings were made to be worn on the finger, more rarely on the thumb, and of these many bore engraved stones, which have come down to us in greater numbers than the rings themselves. The devices on such stones are described under GEMS. The few examples which have survived having but very rarely any peculiarly Christian features need not be dwelt upon at length; three very fine ones have been just alluded to under GEMS (pp. 713 b, and 722 b, note); one now in the British Museum, of massive gold of hexagonal form, is supposed to be of the early part of the third century, diameter about 1·5 inches (figured in Perret, Catacombes, vol. iv. pl. xvi. n. 4): the second (p. 722, a), perhaps a little later, is in the possession of Monseigneur de Bonald, Cardinal Archbishop of Lyons, also of massive gold, circular, increasing in thickness towards the bezel, where it is foliated; the rest is irregularly but elegantly corded at intervals, so that it bears some resemblance to a succession of pearls (diameter 1·4 inches): the bezel, from which the gem has fallen out, of an oblong quadrangular form (longer side 0·9), has on its two larger sides VIVAS IN DEO | AS SOLI, followed by a palm branch (GEMS, p. 722, figured in Le Blant, Inscr. chrét. de la Gaule, pl. 2, n. 6; Martigny, Dict. s. v. Anneau, ed. 2). The third, which is likewise of gold, bearing figures of doves embossed on the shoulders, is set with a garnet on which a female sitting between two crosses is engraved; it is of later Roman work. (GEMS, p. 716 b.)

The following gold rings remain to be mentioned, with the types of their gems or pastes, when present. A gold ring with slender flat uniform hoop of circular form with circular bezel, raised and scalloped at the margin, which is surrounded by a beaded line, holds a pale blue niccolo (a truncated cone) on which is represented a dolphin (regarded as a fish and so taken as a symbol of Christ, see De Rossi, Bull. 1870, pp. 49–73): the stone is inscribed VIVAS NOCTV[illegible]IVS (the nominative for the vocative); diameter of ring 1 inch; of chaton 0·8; of surface of gem 0·3. This curious ring, supposed to be of the third century, is described and beautifully figured (nat. size) by Prof. A. Salinas, Real Museo di Palermo, p. 59, tav. A, n. 7, and by M. de Rossi, Bull. u. s., tav. iv. n. 13 (enlarged). Probably found in Sic[illegible].

A beautiful gold finger-ring, with the hoop flat and widening towards the bezel, was found in 1857 among the ruins of the Roman houses in Tusculum, and came into the possession of the Princess Aldobrandini. It is set with a lapis lazuli bearing an anchor and a palm-tree; the symbols of hope and of final victory. These symbols occur separately on several gems (see GEMS, pp. 714 and 716); but have, hitherto, been found in conjunction only on this one gem. Not very fine work, but neither again at all rude: De Rossi is persuaded from various considerations that it is earlier than the fourth century (Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1872, p. 119, tav. vii. n. 3).

A massive plain gold ring in the British Museum has an onyx intaglio bearing the chrisma, the ☧ being crossed with the third stroke (Ⱂ). Fortnum, Arch. Journ. xxvi. (1860), p. 142.

Another very massive plain gold ring of ordinary subcircular form, bears a paste in imitation of niccolo, upon which is engraved the chrisma, the ☧ being crossed with the X and also with a horizontal line through the intersection (Ⱂ): diameter of ring 0·9 by 0·8 inch: that of the suborbicular chaton 0·7 inch: height of socket of bezel 0·2 inch; said to have been found in England (British Museum).

In the Castellani collection (now in the British Museum), No. 5 of Mr. Fortnum's catalogue, is a very fine example of a gold ring bearing the chrisma; it is an octagonal hoop swelling to the shoulders and surmounted by the monogram of the ordinary form composed of cloisons of gold, from which the stones or pastes or enamels which they once held have now fallen out.

The three preceding rings are probably of the 4th or 5th century.

For the ring of Bishop Arnulphus, see below under Episcopal Ring.

Other settings of early Christian gems are in bronze; one enclosing the Good Shepherd on a jasper (GEMS, p. 712) in the possession of Mr. Fortnum, and figured by him, of octagonal form, is by his kind permission here reproduced. Nor is this the only bronze example. See Catalogue of the Uzielli Coll. p. 66, n. 277, Lond. 1861, (Christie and Manson.) To these, others doubtless might be added.

Rings were also occasionally set in ancient times, as now, with gems on which no subject is engraved. Some of these were, in the middle ages, the badges of bishops (see under Episcopal Ring below), but whether we have any of them now remaining belonging to earlier times appears to be uncertain. In all likelihood Christians in every age may have worn such, but independently of any religious significance.

There is an office for the consecration of cardinals which mentions the delivery of the ring, Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. 8, § xi. Ord. xiv. It is probable that their rings also bore a stone without any device. In 1875, when Pope Pius IX. installed several cardinals, he presented each of them with a gold ring set with a sapphire (Jones, Finger-ring Lore, p. 216). This stone appears to have been generally used for the purpose, as in the case of bishops (Jones, u. s.).

The Ordo Romanus (p. 143, Hitt.; see Curtius, Synt. p. 411) and various mediæval offices (Maskell, Mon. Rit. vol. ii. p. 319) mention the delivery of rings to nuns at their consecration. What these were we know not, but it may be surmised that they bore plain stones.

Forms of Christian Rings made wholly of Metal, and bearing Devices.

The various forms of these rings (as Mr. Fortnum observes) do not appear to differ from the general fashion of the rings of their day,* in the world Christian and Pagan, and, so far as the figures in his and in the present paper are concerned, may be classified nearly in his own words as follows (Arch. Journ. vol. xxvi. pp. 138, 139). The numbers attached refer to the rings in his own collection, and described by himself.

* In the Dactyliotheca of Gorlaeus, may be seen figures of upwards of 200 rings, one or two of which (184, 211) are certainly, and a few others (210, 205–209 from the catacombs) probably Christian.

A large part of the others which are not figured, would probably fall under the same heads.

A. The circular hoop of convex metal swelling to the shoulders and flattened into an oval or angular chaton. Such are Nos. 8, 24 and 25, in Mr. Fortnum's collection figured below.

B. Rings formed of two, three, or more hoops springing from one, widening to the bezel,[b] and generally having beaded wire or chainwork between each hoop. This form, as the last, occurs also at an earlier period. Nos. 1, 27, 28 (Fortnum) are examples of this form.

C. Octagonal. A flat hoop of metal formed into an octagon; sometimes oval and swelling to the bezel, which has a raised table of metal; a form, as Mr. Fortnum thinks, peculiar to the 3rd and 4th centuries. No. 6 (figured above) is of the same form, but bears a gem.

D. A peculiar form, greatly varying, and, again, in the opinion of the same gentleman, only occurring during the Lower Empire; sometimes of the largest size, and of great weight of metal. The bezel is more or less raised, and the shoulders diverge in straight lines at a greater or less angle from the bezel to the side, from whence the hoop is completed by a semicircle or semi-hexagon. These rings are sometimes of extreme width. No. 11 and 12 (Fortnum) are of this class.

E. A simple hoop, generally of convex metal, more or less swelling to the shoulders, and having a circular (but little raised) bezel with flat table, on which the device is engraved; Nos. 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 19, and 33 (Fortnum) are of this abundant form. Nos. 26 and 30 (Fortnum) are varieties with a square bezel.

F. The simple hoop has a high, trumpet-shaped bezel, formed as an inverted cone of greater or less height, and sometimes octagonal laterally. Such are Nos. 20 and 22 (Fortnum). Cardinal de Bonald's ring (figured above) with raised quadrangular bezel and No. 29 (Fortnum) are variations from this type.

This form, he says, and also D, are peculiar to the period of decadence, and occasionally occur of grotesque proportions and development, the tower-like head rising sometimes to more than half an inch in height.

To the above classes of Mr. Fortnum the following must be added for the French rings of the Merovingian period, figured below after Le Blant.

G. A simple hoop, slightly swelling towards the shoulders, where it is sometimes corded; bearing a large oval or subcircular tabular chaton (not raised): the extremities of the hoop next the chaton each bear bosses varying in number, resembling pearls; and the chaton sometimes bears a border in imitation of smaller pearls. See under Cross below for two examples.

[b] Bezel is used here and in the following pages as synonymous with chaton, so as to include the whole ornamental surrounding, if any, together with the metal face or table. If the latter word were kept for the metallic face only, and bezel for its surroundings, it would be a gain. Scudo (Lat. scutum) is unambiguous.

The preceding remarks on the forms of Christian rings refer only to such as bear devices. Rings to which keys are attached, or which have the bezel in the form of a shoe (both figured below from Mr. Fortnum) are likewise not included in the above classes.

Christian Rings of various Materials, not bearing Devices, nor set with Gems.

Plain rings in abundance, with or without a bezel, both in various metals and in ivory, have been found in the Roman catacombs and in Frankish, German, and Saxon graves, and above all in the tomb of Maria, wife of the emperor Honorius, where 150 rings of different kinds were found in 1544, now dispersed and lost to knowledge (Tomus); and likewise in many other localities, where Christians have been buried, and sometimes even upon the finger of the skeleton. Some ivory rings, too small or too large to be worn on the fingers, have been found attached to the outside of sepulchral niches in the catacombs, even four or five on the same tomb, probably for the purposes of identification. One with plain cylindrical hoop, another ribbon-shaped in the oblique markings outside are figured by Perret (u. s. pl. viii. Nos. 5 and 8). Rings of ostrich bone (de struthionum ossibus ansulae in digitis) were sometimes worn as superstitious charms, and are condemned by St. Augustine accordingly (De Doctr. Christ. lib. ii. c. 20). On these various rings see Martigny, Anneaux des prem. Chrét. pp. 13–15, and his references: also Fortnum in Arch. Journ. vol. xxviii. pp. 267, 268, 284.

Materials of Christian Rings.

On the subject of material Mr. Fortnum observes that, "as a rule, early Christian rings of gold are rare. This might be expected, as the use of rich and numerous ornaments was not in accordance with the teaching of the early church." Notwithstanding this, however, a fair number of gold rings do occur. "The rule also of wearing one ring only, as a signet, instead of one on nearly every joint, as was mostly the fashion among the Pagans, would account for the comparative rarity of rings with early Christian symbols." (Arch. Journ. vol. xxvi. p. 139.)

Authentic early Christian rings in silver are perhaps even still more rare. A few are mentioned below. The most common material is, without doubt, bronze. A few of iron still survive, but, as might be expected, in a more or less damaged condition: two from Mr. Fortnum's collection are figured (Nos. 22 and 25). The writer has seen but one in lead, and that a miserable production in all respects, whose Christianity also is not entirely above suspicion (Waterton collection: see under Cross below).

It is but very rarely that the entire ring is made of a gem. A green jasper with uniform flattened hoop and oval flat bezel, bearing a boat, a bird (cock ?), and palm-branch, as well as a cornelian of similar form bearing a dove and branch, have been already mentioned under GEMS, p. 715. Mr. Fortnum's figure (No. 2) of the former is now subjoined.

A few rings in bone or ivory, in addition to those mentioned above, are described below.

Authorities for the following Enumeration of Christian Rings.

The general enumeration of Christian rings which follows has been derived partly from the writers on the Catacombs, Aringhi, Boldetti, and Perret, also from the more critical works of MM. Martigny, Hübner, Le Blant, Salinas, De Rossi, and above all from the notices by Mr. Fortnum of those which are contained in various public collections, and in his own;[a] viz. in the Vatican Museum of Christian Antiquities, in the Museum at Naples, in the Castellani collection now in the British Museum, and in the Waterton collection which is now for the most part contained in the South Kensington Museum (Arch. Journ. xviii. 1871, pp. 278–283). His own collection as described partly in vol. xxvi. (1869), pp. 137–147, and partly in vol. xxviii. pp. 268–277, and the later additions to it, pp. 284–291. The references to the numbers are as he gives them, and the descriptions of the gems in these collections are nearly in his own words.[b] Several other rings mentioned by him, whether in his own or in other collections, are also omitted, as possessing either no Christian characteristics or very doubtful ones. The same remark must be made of some of those figured by Perret and others.

Principal Types of Christian Rings.

Clement of Alexandria enumerates the fish, the anchor, the ship, the dove, the lyre, and the fisherman as fitting objects to be employed on Christian seals. All these occur on gems and pastes (see GEMS, GLASS), and all except the lyre and the fisherman are also found upon rings of metal or of bone. These shall now be mentioned first; some remarks on the significance of the symbols may be seen under GEMS, and in Mr. Fortnum's two papers mentioned above. The arrangement of the other types is substantially that which has been followed in GEMS.

1. ORDINARY FINGER-RINGS.

(1.) Fish.—This type, so frequently found in gems, is found also on various metal rings. One of the earlier and more important examples has been recently described and figured by De Rossi. It is a plain uniform hoop of gold, the breadth rather more than ¼ inch, diameter about 1 inch, in which a rude slender fish is depicted in white enamel placed between the second and third letters of ΟΥΘΟΧ (for ΙΧΘΥϹ retrograde). Found near Rome; in the collection of Count Stroganoff. Referred to the third rather than the fourth century by M. de Rossi, who thinks that the sublinear form of the fish itself stands for the missing Ι (De Rossi, Bull. Arch. Crist. 1873, pp. 76, 77, tav. iv. n. 6).

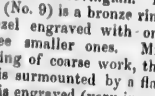
In the Naples Museum is contained a gold ring of simple form engraved with a fish. (No. 2 in Fortnum's enumeration.) A fine gold ring which seems to be more correctly referred by M. de Rossi to the 4th century (Bull. Arch. Crist. 1870, p. 63), than to the Merovingian period to which it has been assigned by M. Le Blant (Inscr. chrét. de la Gaule, tom. ii. p. 427, n. 608, with figure), was found in 1851 beside the Roman road at Montbazin, near Montpellier, now preserved in the Museum of the Archæological Society of that place, has a small fish, with a very forked tail, engraved upon the square elevated chaton; the hoop is slightly angular, swelling towards the shoulders with two cords, each terminating in a snake's head. The fabric appears to be Roman, and not Merovingian. In the Castellani collection (No. 9) is a bronze ring of coarse work, the bezel engraved with one large fish between three smaller ones. Mr. Fortnum has a bronze ring of coarse work, the circular hoop of which is surmounted by a flat circular bezel, on which is engraved (very incorrectly) an ear of corn between two fishes, which he regards as an "emblem of the bread of life, and of those who live in faith upon it" (No. 17).



(Fortnum, No. 17.)

(2.) Anchor.— The following are considered to be Christian by Mr. Fortnum: a gold ring, its flat band swelling towards the bezel, on which is a raised oval engraved with a simply formed anchor, Castellani collection, No. 1; now in the British Museum. (The genuineness of this ring seems somewhat doubtful: the work is rude.) A ring of duplex form, also of gold, engraved with an anchor and a palm (Naples Museum, No. 1). Bronze ring with circular bezel, on which an anchor and a ship are engraved (Vatican Museum, No. 2). Boldetti (Cimit. p. 502, No. 26) figures a ring with two bezels, one of which is an anchor, on another a ship. (Reproduced in Martigny, Dict. s. v. Anneaux.) The following bronze rings have two anchors in conjunction: two are in Mr. Fortnum's collection. One (No. 13) is "formed as a circle of half-round metal, swelling on the shoulders, and having a circular raised chaton, on which is engraved a double fluked anchor, crossed by one of a single fluke and surrounded by a pearled border. From the catacombs at Rome." Another with the same types, less well preserved, obtained in London from a dealer, is in the possession of the writer. Mr. Fortnum notes that this emblem was in use previous to A.D. 312. Another (No. 21) has the face of the bezel

(Fortnum, No. 13.)

[a] Those only are here given which bear some probable outward sign of their Christianity. Thus the ring found in Rome reading ΧΡΩΜΑΤΙ may have belonged to a Christian whose name was Chromatius, this being known to be a Christian family name there, but as there is nothing Christian about the ring itself, it is omitted. See Fortnum, Arch. Journ. vol. xxvi. p. 141.

[b] Those in the British Museum, in the Waterton collection in the South Kensington Museum, and in Mr. Fortnum's collection, have been in most cases examined by the writer, and he has occasionally added remarks upon them. He desires to express his thanks to Mr. Franks, Mr. R. Soden Smith, and to Mr. Fortnum for facilities kindly given to inspect them.

similarly engraved, but the socket is inversely truncato-conical (nearly as No. 20), the cone being encircled by three projecting mouldings. Probably of the 4th century. Obtained in London; place of finding unknown.

(3.) Ship.—Mr. Fortnum has a bronze ring with plain wire hoop (No. 14), on the circular chaton of which is rudely engraved a ship without sails; X and P (for XPICTOC) are engraved on either side of the mast. Obtained in Rome. The following in the Castellani Collection are also of bronze. One with corded hoop and circular bezel, engraved with a ship propelled with oars, the mast and yard of which form a cross (No. 6). Another of similar form, and of similar device; but the mast supports the reversed chrisma enclosed in a circle. (No. 7.) In the Waterton collection was formerly "a massive bronze signet ring, with ship in full sail, having the sacred monogram on the sail, while round it are the names STEPÆNVS HELENAE." Fortnum in Arch. Journ. vol. xxviii. (1871), pp. 274, 282.)

(Fortnum, No. 10.)

[See also Anchor and Cross.]

(4.) Dove.—This type occurs by itself, and also in various combinations. A massive bronze ring found in Rome, with scalloped bezel, bears on its face simply a dove (Boldetti, Cimit. p. 502, n. 27). "A heavy bronze signet ring with massive hoop and projecting bezel, upon which is the figure of a dove; the hoop is modelled as a wreath, having the bezel as a central ornament," is in the Waterton collection, No. 3. (No. 605 in S. Kens. Mus. Inv.) In the Vatican Museum (No. 15) is a "bronze ring with large oblong square bezel," engraved with the chrisma and the dove standing on an olive-branch; beneath, a star or perhaps double cross. See Cross. A nearly similar ring is engraved and described by Aringhi, Roma Subt. t. ii. p. 708, reproduced by De Corte, Synt. p. 121. In Mr. Fortnum's collection (No. 11) is a bronze ring of coarse work and hexagonal form externally, circular internally; the shoulders are "splayed from the chaton to the centre of either side." On the raised circular chaton "two doves and a fish" (rather three doves) are engraved. A gold ring found at Talavera de la Reina in Spain has a hexagonal bezel, bearing two birds, probably doves, on its face. "Intra hexagonum ab utraque parte avis est; in circuitu anticae inscriptio EMANVEL, posticae RECCAREΔO (sic)," the word Reccaredo being followed by a cross of four dots, evidently of the Visigothic period, possibly belonging to King Recaredo (585–601 A.D.). A ring (metal not named) found at Cordova in 1768, now in the public library of Madrid, bears a bird (dove?) on the chaton around which is inscribed A (Aurelii) VINCENTI (Hübner, Inscr. Hisp. Christ. Nos. 206, 207).

The above-named ring in the Vatican Museum is the most important, but not the only bronze example therein contained which is engraved with a dove. See under No. 18 of that collection. (Fortnum.)

See also below under Human Figures.

(5.) Palm.—The palm-branch occurs without doubt on Christian rings, but when alone it is not easy to be sure that the work is Christian. There are several gold rings in the Naples Museum, one of duplex form (No. 4), with a palm on each bezel, also a heavy plain gold ring, in the Castellani collection, round, with flattened bezel, coarsely engraved with the palm (No. 4), which is counted by Mr. Fortnum to be Christian, though with expression of doubt. A gold ring, half an inch in diameter, with thin flat hoop, and the bezel no wider, in which a palm-branch of poor Roman work in the Waterton collection (No. 467 Inv. S. Kensington Mus.) may probably be Christian. (See GEMS, Vol. I. p. 716.) There are other rings in Mr. Fortnum's collection (Nos. 8, 9 (both gold) and 12 (bronze), all from Rome), about which he now feels less confidence as respects their Christianity than formerly (Arch. Journ. vol. xxviii. p. 276). The former, found in a child's tomb, seems of the 3rd or 4th century; it is small, of a common form, viz., a simple hoop flattened out on the bezel. In the writer's opinion it is probably Christian; the palm, the symbol of victory, is less likely to be given to a pagan than to a Christian child by its parents. So very possibly is also No. 12, with bezel raised on four stages, and palm-branches on the shoulders, which seems rather later, perhaps about the beginning of the 5th century, when paganism was dying out and monograms were coming into fashion on rings and seals. (This monogram may be EVE and stand for Evenus or some other proper name, doubtless that of the owner.) But a less doubtful example is a bronze ring, also in Mr. Fortnum's collection (No. 16), on the bezel of which is engraved a palm-branch and a monogram, having also palms in panels on the hoop. See Acclamations below. Other bronze rings in the Vatican Museum, of less importance (Nos. 18–25), are engraved with the palm. It should be added that a silver ring with a palm-branch, which may be Christian, exists in the British Museum (Fortnum, u. s. vol. xxviii. p. 276). This material is but rarely employed for Christian rings. There is however another ring of the same metal in Mr. Fortnum's collection (No. 28) of duplex form with united pointed bezels, on one of which is engraved the name of the possessor FAVSTVS, and on the other a palm-branch. Weight, 4 dwt. 4 gr. Discovered in 1865 at Porto, near the Tiber's mouth, in the ruins of a house believed to be that of Pammachius, the friend of St. Jerome, among many other objects the greater part of which were adorned with Christian symbols. The excavations were made by Prince Torlonia, who presented most of the objects found there to the Christian museum of the Vatican.

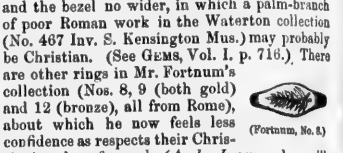
(Fortnum, No. 8.)



(Fortnum, No. 12.)

(Fortnum, No. 28.)

But it is only when the palm is combined with Christian adjuncts upon rings that we can securely affirm them to be Christian.

(Fortnum, No. 8.)

There is a bronze hoop-ring in the Vatican collection (No. 14) engraved with a branch of palm, a cross potent (⊢┼⊣), and the word VIVAS. It occurs also in connexion with the chrisma, or more rarely with the anchor. See Chrisma and Anchor.

(6.) Cross.—This subject occurs under several different forms, and is either alone or in connexion with others. It was engraved as early as the fourth century on the iron ring of St. Macrina, which contained a piece of the true (?) cross; see below at the end of § 18.

(A.) Not accompanied by Inscriptions or Monograms.

A bronze ring gilt with high inversely conical-truncate bezel (cf. No. 20 and 21 of Fortnum) is in the Vatican Museum (No. 17) engraved with a Maltese cross. (See also below, under Lamb.) A cross potent (i.e. having each limb formed as a T) in connexion with a palm, has been mentioned under Palm. (See also under Saints.)

The Greek cross is found on many rings under (B): also by itself on a very rude ring of lead in the Waterton collection (No. 1 being No. 607, 71 Inv. S. Kens. Mus.), supposed to be of the Roman period.

A Greek cross, crossed by another in form of St. Andrew's cross or the letter X, so as to resemble a star of eight points, is found upon the circular bezel of a coarse bronze ring in the Castellani collection (No. 11). (See also under Dove.) A similar figure occurs on a foot-shaped ring mentioned below.

The Latin cross, having the lowest limb longest, occurs on a ring supposed to be a marriage ring, mentioned below.

(B.) Accompanied by Names or Monograms.

Of this class of rings we have the following Gaulish examples. A gold ring of the Merovingian type; on the bezel is a Greek cross at the head of the owner's name, BERTEILDIS retrograde (so that it would read naturally in a wax impression) and in the centre a monogram similar to one on a coin of Childeric II. (670–691) struck at Marseilles, and perhaps reading MAR for Marsilia (the low Latin form for Massilia). Probably found at Laon. (Le Blant, u. s. n. 678 A. pl. 91, n. 547.) A similar gold ring with similar cross prefixed to ABBONESO (retrograde); in the centre of the bezel is a rude head to the left. The diameter of the subcircular bezel of this and the foregoing is about half an inch. Found in Deuxième Aquitaine. (Le Blant, u. s. n. 575 A. pl. 79, n. 476.) A similar gold ring, with corded hoop, and somewhat larger pearled bezel, has a similar cross prefixed to RACNETHRAMNUS (retrograde): in the centre a rude Merovingian head as before, but accompanied by six pellets. Found at Blois in the sands of the Loire; now in the Bibliothèque Impériale (Nationale). (Le Blant, u. s. n. 164, pl. 22, n. 137.) A silver ring also of the Merovingian type, is supposed by M. Le Blant to be of the 7th century, having St. Andrew's cross (X) prefixed to WABVETVSVS, the last letter occupying the centre of the circular chaton. Found in the ancient cemetery of Haulchin (Hainaut), in Deuxième Belgique. Preserved in the Museum at Brussels. (Le Blant, u. s. n. 321, D. pl. 35, n. 216.) A bronze ring of this type, found in a sarcophagus at Allonnes (in Troisième Lyonnaise), has a cross approaching in form to the Maltese prefixed to LAVNOBERSA (not retrograde); within the centre of the circular minutely beaded chaton is a monogram enclosed in a circle; it is like the head of a trident, with two pellets above the cross-bar and two others below, possibly reading ET or TE. (Le Blant, u. s. n. 609 A. pl. 90, n. 535.) But the most interesting, because the most perplexing ring of this class, is a fine gold ring of Merovingian type with corded hoop, found buried at a slight depth near Airvault, in Deuxième Aquitaine, now in the possession of M. Benjamin Fillon.

(Le Blant.)

On the chaton is a small Greek cross, and above it an almost inextricable monogram which has been read RADEGONDIS, but which may equally well be read into several other names as Andregondis, Gondegardis, &c. The Abbé Auber regards it as the ring of the famous Rhadegonde, Queen of France, and afterwards foundress of the monastery of the Holy Cross at Poitiers, about the middle of the 6th century. But this is at any rate very uncertain, not to say improbable. Her body, resting at Poitiers, is said to have been taken up by the Huguenots in 1562, and her ring to have fallen into the possession of a soldier, on whose finger it was found seven years afterwards upon the field of battle. Unless this be the ring, it seems to be unknown where it is now. (Le Blant, u. s. n. 575 B, who has many observations worthy to be read, pl. 75, n. 452; Butler, Lives of the Saints, Aug. 13.) A silver ring found at Hohberg, near Soleure in Switzerland, with broad angular hoop, has on the rectangular chatons (forming one of its sides), a monogram which apparently reads VERANI accompanied by a Latin cross. (Id. n. 362 A. pl. 42, n. 247.) Other rings, also found in Switzerland, bear monograms on the chaton, and may probably be Christian, but they bear no Christian symbols. (Id. Nos. 364, 365, pl. 42, 249, 250.)

Examples occur also in Italy and elsewhere. In the Castellani collection (No. 2) is a heavy duplex ring of gold, found at Orvieto; on the oval bezel of one of the united hoops is incised the name BLITHIA, and on the other a cross potent above $\frac{L-B}{A}$, which is apparently an abbreviation of a proper name, probably of the same name, as Mr. Fortnum is inclined to suppose. In the Vatican Museum (No. 7–10) are three bronze hoop-rings, each engraved with a cross potent and with an inscription which Mr. Fortnum could not decipher; probably they were owners' names, and possibly expressed in monograms. In the British Museum is a silver ring on whose oval chaton (half an inch by about a quarter of an inch) is a cross pommé (i.e. having a globule at the extremity of each of the limbs, which are united in a Latin cross), followed by EVCE, below which is a B and an I above, probably for EVCEBIOY. The shoulders of the hoop are slightly foliated, as Roman rings often are.

Mr. Fortnum purchased in Constantinople a gold ring of excellent Byzantine work (No. 24), probably of the 5th or 6th century. It is a circular convex hoop widening to the shoulders, and flattened to form an oval bezel, on which is engraved a monogram between two Greek crosses. The Waterton collection (S. Kens. Mus. Inv. No. 621) has a somewhat later example of Byzantine work. A gold ring the hoop of which is nielloed on the outside with a Latin cross, and the proper name of its possessor, BARINOTA (i.e. probably Varinotarii); the bezel is formed of a gold solidus of Constantine Pogonatus (668–688), and the ring also may very well be of the 7th century.

In the Royal Museum of Palermo (Salinas, Real. Mus. di Pal. p. 57, tav. A. n. 12) is a plain oval massive gold ring with small flat bezel, on which is engraved a Latin cross and below it, in four lines, ΕΥΦΥΜΗΟΥ ΥΠΤ, apparently for Εὐφημίου ὑπάτου. It is doubtless, as Salinas observes, of a base epoch, but may well be within our limits. The Hypati (viri consulares) and Notarii (secretaries) were high officers of the Byzantine court.

(7.) Chrisma or Monogram of Christ or Initial Letters of Christ.—The common form of this ( ), and also the form having the P reversed ( ), sometimes occurs by itself, as on bronze rings found in Rome. See Vatican collection (Nos. 15–25); Fortnum collection (Nos. 18, 19).* See also Boldetti, Cimit. p. 502, tav. 3, Nos. 29 and 31. It occurs likewise in other metals. For the Castellani ring with cloisons of gold, see above. A ring of massive silver, or rather mixed metal, in the collection of Lady Londesborough (No. 183 of Mr. Crofton Croker's catalogue) bears on its ovato-acuminate bezel the ordinary form of the chrisma. (Fortnum, u. s. p. 283; figured in Jones's Finger-ring Lore, p. 47.)

(Fortnum, No. 19.)

The separate letters P and X occur on a bronze ring in the Vatican collection (No. 5). The chrisma is also frequently found along with the Alpha and Omega. In Mr. Fortnum's collection (No. 10) the chrisma occurs between those letters on a bronze ring, which is a "circular hoop of convex metal, swelling to the scudo, which is of lozenge shape," upon which the letters are engraved; "the shoulders are ornamented with lozenge-shaped panelling." From Rome, of the 4th or 5th century. (Arch. Journ. vol. xxvi. p. 143; vol. xxviii. p. 273.) Also on another bronze ring from Rome, in the Vatican collection (No. 16), as well as on a bone or ivory ring, having an oval bezel, in the same collection (No. 26).

The same combination is found on a bronze ring, whose figure is given, brought to Mr. Fortnum from Rome (No. 30); the loop of the P is reversed, and a sheet is standing on either side of the base of the monogram, the limbs of which are slightly wedge-shaped. The hoop, swelling to the shoulders, ornamented with palm-branches, is incised, traces of niello apparently remaining in the incisions, as well as in the incised types of the square chaton; these indicate that the ring was not intended for sealing.

The palm branch is placed on either side of the chrisma on more than one massive bronze ring found in the Catacombs of Rome (Boldetti, Cimit. p. 502, Nos. 30 and 33). The chrisma is also found, though very rarely, with a date expressed by the name of the reigning emperor. There is an ivory ring, recently found at Lyons, of large size, on the circular bezel of which a chrisma with long stem and open loop is surrounded by VICTORE AVG. (he was associated as emperor in Gaul with Maximus, his father, A.D. 383–388). In the possession of Canon Martigny, who figures it (Dict. des Ant. chrét. ed. 2, s. v. Anneaux).

The chrisma whose stem ends in a star is found on a bronze ring in the Vatican Museum (No. 11), placed between two stars, a word of six letters (illegible) being underneath. The chrisma is also found in combination with Alpha and Omega, and with a Ship, with Human Figures, and with Acclamations (see under those headings). Mr. Fortnum remarks that this symbol alone or in combination is found more frequently on Christian rings than any other, but it cannot be considered as one of the earlier symbols.

The initials also of Jesus Christ (I X), or the first two letters of Christ (X P), occur alone or in combination with some other symbol. Mr. Fortnum has a gold triplex ring, found in Rome, and probably of the 3rd or 4th century (No. 1). The three hoops spring from one, and widen towards the bezel, between which a beaded wire nearly fills the open space, and is formed upon the bezel into X crossed by the I. The same form occurs on GEMS (p. 722), and appears to be of very early date, according to some before A.D. 312. (Fortnum, u. s. vol. xxviii. p. 269.)

The P X or X Ϙ, being the two first letters of XPICTOC likewise occur; P X alone on a bronze ring in the Vatican Museum (No. 5), and X Ϙ in conjunction with a ship. See Ship.

Mr. Fortnum figures a (so-called) legionary ring (No. 23, repeated in Jones's Finger-ring Lore, p. 47) on which we have the letters XIIXX preceded and followed by an M apparently; also the letters IXP, at some distance from these, which he interprets as "Christian," i.e. as the initials of Jesus Christ. It is rather to be suspected, however, that it is a numerical indication of some sort; whether P has any connexion with the principes or pilani or praetoria cohors, or be something altogether different, is not very easy to say. Perhaps an inspection of other legionary rings might help in the interpretation.

(8.) Alpha and Omega. This most ancient conjunction of Christian symbols occurs on a bronze ring, the hoop widening towards the bezel of which the margin is fluted; Catacombs of Rome (Boldetti, Cimit. p. 502, tav. 3, n. 32; repeated by Martigny, Dict. s. v. Anneaux). The letters are more frequently accompanied by the Chrisma (see Chrisma).

(9.) Abraxas. This famous word, also written Abrasax, is said to have been the invention of Basilides, a Christian gnostic, but is very rarely found on any monuments where the Christianity is certain. We have, however, the following: "A large ivory ring, found at Arles," says Mr. King, "bears the monogram of Christ, between α and ω, as it appears on the coins of the Gallic princes of the 4th century, Magnentius and Decentius, but accompanied by the title ABPACAZ, a sufficient proof of the identity of the two personages in the estimation of its owner." (Antique Gems, p. 358.) He informs the writer that it was formerly in the Mertens-Schaffhausen collection.

(10.) The Lamb.—This occurs as the symbol of the Saviour and of the Church; it is sometimes in a manifestly Christian connexion; sometimes more doubtfully so. A silver ring with octagonal bezel, diameter 1 inch, engraved with Agnus Dei. The lamb looks back at a cross, of which the upper part only is visible; seemingly of late work, but probably not too late for this work (Waterton's collection, No. 602, Inv. Kens. Mus., where it is called Roman early Christian, not mentioned by Fortnum). See also above under Alpha and Omega (Fortnum, No. 30), where the lambs or sheep at the foot of the chrisma signify the Church. There is a bronze signet ring in the Waterton collection (No. 4 being No. 604 Inv. Kens. Mus.), having the hoop formed as a wreath of palms, with oval bezel for the central ornament, bearing a lamb incised thereon. Above and in front of the lamb are two rude branches; Roman work but poor, considered both in the inventory and by Mr. Fortnum to be Christian.

(11.) Lion, as the Evangelistic Symbol of St. Mark.—On a small iron ring, with circular hoop, swelling to the chaton in Mr. Fortnum's collection (No. 25) is engraved a lion to the left in a crouching position. This ring, which he considers to be probably of the 6th century, was found in a Coptic village near the temple of Medinet Aboo, Thebes, whence the Christians were expelled by the Arabs in the 7th century. He plausibly regards the lion as referring to St. Mark's church at Alexandria. (See GEMS, p. 717, b).

(12.) Saints and Human Figures (busts or full length) with Christian Emblems. — Under this section those rings which have heads only are not included. Most of the following seem to be representations of saints. In the Waterton collection (No. 6, Inv. No. 606) is a massive bronze ring, 1·2 inches in diameter, of rude work, perhaps Byzantine: the hoop is surmounted by a flat circular bezel, on which is engraved an orante with subcircular nimbus, a palm branch on either side; on the opposite side of the hoop is a smaller "tabular sigillum" engraved with a Greek cross.[f] In the same collection (Inv. No. 619) is a bronze ring, whose hoop does not swell towards the curved circular bezel: upon this is engraved in very poor style a rude bust of a saint, with an oval nimbus round the head. The labels announce it to be Byzantine work of about the 6th century. Diameter 0·9 inch. Another and rather smaller ring in the same collection (Inv. 608) of gold, with slender hoop not swelling at the shoulders, has the circular bezel engraved with the bust of a saint, with oval nimbus. On either side the head are the letters M A (for Maria?). The style resembles the last; but the ring is probably at least as late as the 6th century; perhaps even too late for the present work. Mr. Fortnum has a bronze ring (No. 26), "a simple hoop, holding a square tabular chaton," on which is engraved a draped male figure with subcircular nimbus standing before a cross potent, which springs from what seems to be a cup with bosses, such as occur of glass in the catacombs. "Possibly Byzantine

(Fortnum, No. 26.)

[f] Mr. Fortnum mentions in the same place that the British Museum has a remarkable gold ring of analogous form, on one face of which are three interlaced triangles, and on the other intertwined circular lines leaving the form of a cross in the centre. These lines and others on work of the 6th or 7th century; obtained in Athens." In the same collection is an iron ring (No. 22), of which metal very few rings have survived in tolerable condition; on the flat raised octagonal bezel are engraved two figures, very probably intended, as Mr. Fortnum suggests, for SS. Peter and Paul (PETER AND PAUL, and MEDALS), the chrisma between their heads, while on the eight sides of the inversely truncato-conical socket or stem of bezel are engraved eight figures imperfectly preserved, probably saints. Perhaps of the 4th or 5th century (Mr. Fortnum assigns no date). Obtained in London, but probably of Italian work. The same collection in fine contains a bronze ring (No. 15), with rounded hoop slightly swelling to the shoulders, bearing a plain circular bezel, on which is engraved a female draped quite to the feet, having the chrisma (with loop reversed) on each side of the head, and a bird, probably a dove, on either side of her feet. Possibly an emblem of the church feeding her Jew and Gentile children. Found in the catacombs, probably that of St. Calixtus, and presented by Padre Garrucci to Mr. Fortnum: they assign it to the 4th century.

(Fortnum, No. 15.)

There are a few others of this class which seem rather too late for the present work. One in the Waterton collection (Inv. No. 629), gold with full-faced bust on the circular bezel, with a Greek cross and legend AVFRET, seemingly Anglo-Saxon work: it bears some resemblance to the unique aureus of Bishop Wulfred in the British Museum.

(13.) Imperial Personages in connexion with Christianity.—As in the analogous case of gems, these occur but rarely on rings. There is, however, a most important example in the Museum at Palermo, which has been well, though not fully, described and illustrated by Salinas and Ugdulena; and reproduced by a beautiful figure in gold and colours. It is, as the former observes, a veritable prodigy for the minuteness of the work in niello with which it is ornamented. The date and principal subject appear to be satisfactorily made out: viz., the espousals and coronation of the emperor Heraclius and his wife Eudocia (A.D. 610). It was found at Syracuse, along with coins of Constans II., the grandson of Eudocia, who transported the seat of empire thither, and died there in 668. The gold hoop is slender and octagonal, and bears upon seven of its flat sides as many scriptural subjects. Salinas interprets only the first and last. They appear to be as follows:—(1.) The Annunciation. The Virgin in dark dress holds a basket (calathus) and . . . . ?; the angel on the right in white (silver). (2.) The Salutation. Mary, as before, and Elizabeth, in a paler dress, kiss each other; they stand between two Greek crosses supported by a white (silver) pedestal. (3.) The Infant Saviour at Bethlehem. A cave? (darkish): the infant stretched out above: the Virgin on the left; heads of two oxen (?) in the distance. (4.) Adoration of the Magi. Virgin, with circular nimbus, seated, bearing the infant on her lap, on the left: the three Magi in truncated caps (like modern cylindrical hats, not Phrygian caps as on MEDALS), advance towards her. (5.) The Baptism. The Baptist, with nimb[illegible] places his hands over the head of Jesus, w[illegible] nimbus (?), who stands in the Jordan up to the middle; on the opposite bank two figures, apparently angels (mostly in silver). (6.) Uncertain, perhaps Jesus brought before Pilate. A figure with helmet and cuirass (?), is on the left; a figure with nimbus in the centre; another figure, not fully draped, on the left. (7.) The Visit to the Sepulchre. A subcylindrical structure with dome, on the summit of which is a cross; two female figures on the left, one in dark, one in pale dress: opposite on the other side of the tomb an angel in white (silver). The length occupied by these seven subjects is about three and a half inches; the breadth rather more than a quarter of an inch. The bezel is elevated about a quarter of an inch above the hoop; the socket is keeled, bearing on the upper part the following barbarously spelt legend, to which a Greek cross is prefixed: ΟC ΩΠΛΟΝ ΕΥΔΟΚΙΑC ΕCΤΕΦΑΝΟCΑC ΗΜΑC, nearly as Ps. v. 12 (LXX) where we have ὡς ὅπλῳ εὐδοκίας ἐστεφάνωσας ἡμᾶς. There is every likelihood that the Empress Eudocia is here enigmatically described; who, together with her husband Heraclius, are represented in white (silver) on the subcircular chaton, whose diameter is nearly half an inch; a dark figure with subcircular nimbus standing between them, which is doubtless intended for the Saviour, who occupies a similar position on coins of Romanus IV. and his wife Eudocia[a] (1067–1070), described and figured by Sabatier, Mon. Byz. vol. ii. p. 169, pl. l. n. 11. The espousal and coronation of Heraclius took place on the same day, so that this ring may be considered to commemorate both events (Salinas, u. s. pp. 57–59, tav. A. No. 1).

(14.) Acclamations sometimes accompanied by Names and Portraits of the Owners.—Several rings of bronze are engraved with the inscription VIVAS or IN DEO VIVAS, either at length (with slight variations) or in monogram, the chrisma being the hoop are in niello. It is to be feared that this curious ring falls below our period; the simple triangle, however, occurs on various early monuments as an emblem of the Trinity. See TRIANGLE; TRINITY. Prebendary Walcott, however, observes that three interlacing triangles do occur in the 9th century (Sacred Arch. p. 254).

[a] The writer must confess to having had a misgiving that this is the Eudocia of the ring; the nimbus of the Saviour, however, is different in the two cases; on the ring it seems to be simply subcircular; on the coin it is cruciform. The circumstances of the finding point strongly to Eudocia, wife of Heraclius.

sometimes added. One, in Mr. Fortnum's collection, finely preserved, found in one of the catacombs in the Via Appia at Rome, bears the chrisma and COSME VIVAS on the circular face of an inversely conical bezel (No. 20). Another in the Vatican has a square bezel inscribed VIVAS / IN DEO (No. 6). A similar one in the Waterton collection (No. 31). Another with ribbon hoop, with sessile square bezel and retrograde legend, mentioned by De Rossi as belonging to Sig. Castellani, has VIVAI / IN DEO (Bull. Arch. Crist. 1874, pp. 76–79, tav. ii., where the two following will also be found). The same inscription, but with DIO, on a similar ring, found at Chiusi: VIVAI is considered by De Rossi to stand for vivat. A label found near Modena has the face[a] inscribed with the same words in different order IN DEO / VIVAS

A more interesting ring of octangular form in the Museum of the University of Perugia, reads round the right sides as follows: ☧ | SF | ES | IN | DE | OV | IV | AS. Spes, in Deo vivas, where Spes appears to be a proper name, as it certainly is in some other inscriptions. Mr. Fortnum has other bronze octagonal flat-banded rings (Nos. 3, 4) reading DONATE BIBAS (i.e. vivas) IN DEO, and V. I. V. I. N. D. E. O, both from Rome; probably of the 4th century. Mr. Fortnum has also a bronze ring with flat circular bezel and circular hoop, which is decorated with palm branches in lozenge-shaped panels; the monogram, deeply cut on the bezel, is rendered by the Chev. de Rossi, Deus-Dona vivas in Deo; Deus-dona, like Deusdedit, &c., being a proper name (that of the owner) and still surviving in the French Dieudonné, as Mr. Fortnum observes. Good work of the 4th century, found in Rome. The device on this ring (No. 16) figured above, and on another in the same collection (No. 20) described above, is reversed, as the rings are intended for signets.

There are also a few of gold bearing the same acclamation, the most important of these being found in 1860 near Masignano, in the archdeaconry of Fermo in central Italy in a tomb made of large slabs of stone, containing some bones of the deceased and fragments of gold. This splendid ring is of gold of duplex form, the united bezels being acutely ovate. On one is engraved the name FILINANDA (the two last letters each in a line by itself), and on the other are two lines VIVAS IN DEO followed by a star. Six beads meet the juncture of the bezels on each side; the hoop (rounded externally, plane internally) diminishes in width from the bezel. Weight, five and a-half pennyweights. Probably of the latter part of the 3rd or of the beginning of the 4th century. Formerly in the possession of Don Antonio Donati, late librarian of the college of the Sapienza at Rome, now in the collection of Mr. Fortnum (No. 27). See also Palm, where the inscription is simply VIVAS. A gold ring found at Castobriga (Troye ?) in Lusitania, in the cabinet of the king of Portugal, of octagonal form, has on seven of the sides AL | OI | OS | AE | VI | VA | SIN, the eighth side being a monogram probably intended for κυριω (hardly for Christo) Hübner, Insc. Hisp. Christ. n. 204. A gold ring found at Silchester about 1780 has the hoop formed into ten squares, in one of which is a rude head inscribed VENVS, and in the other SENECIANE VIVAS, followed by IINDE for In Deo; a pagan ring Christianized, see GEMS, p. 714, b. (Archæologia, vol. viii. (1787), p. 449; Hübner, Inscr. Brit. p. 234, n. 1305.)[1] Other acclamations are more rarely met with. On the circular-oval bezel of a bronze ring in the Vatican (No. 12) are inscribed two words separated by a transverse line, which Mr. Soden Smith suggests may be read Κυριε Σωτερ. The Abbé Cochet has published a bronze ring, reading IN DI | NVMI | NE A, seemingly for In Dei nomine. Amen (Le Blant, Inscr. chrét. de la Gaule, tom. ii. p. 73). On an angular (semi-hexagonal) silver ring, with broad ribbon-hoop, we have on one side the name of the owner Leubacius in two lines LEVBA / CIVS and on part of the semicircular ribbon opposite a monogram with an I on each side of it, which has been supposed to read In nomine Dei (Le Blant, u. s. p. 561, n. 672 A, pl. 90, n. 538). A brass ring, found in Egypt, now preserved in the museum at Leyden, bears an inscription in two lines, ΕΙCΘ ✝ ΕΟC (εἷς θεός). The chrisma certifies the Christianity of the ring, which is doubtless of tolerably early date (Böckh, Corp. Inscr. Græc. n. 9059).

(15.) With Legends containing Profession of Faith by the Owners.—A Roman gold thumb ring supposed by Hübner to be of the Christian period, found in 1823 near Castor in Norfolk, bears the legend CONSTANI (sic) FIDES, apparently for Constanti fides (Archæol. vol. xxiii. (1831) p. 366, and vol. xxi. p. 547, with figure; Hübner, Inscr. Brit. n. 1301, who observes, "Similia etiam alibi reperta sunt"). The legend seems clearly intended to shew that its possessor was a Christian. This fact which is more fully expressed on the gold Saxon ring, now to be described, whose workmanship, to judge from the figure, bears considerable resemblance to the coins of Offa, and may therefore probably be of or about the 8th century. The ring is of considerable thickness, the hoop being composed of beautiful chain or rather plait-work which encloses an oval-headed bezel nearly 1 inch by three-quarters, in the centre of which is a small bust with jewelled head-band or diadem, the collar being similarly ornamented; around it in letters evidently of early date, NOMEN EHLLA FID IN XPO (Fides in Christo). Found in a meadow at Bosington, Hants. Now in the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford. (Journ. Archaeol. Assoc. vol. i. (1846) p. 341 (with fig.); Jones's Finger-ring Lore, p. 63 (same fig.).

[a] It is called 'sigillo in bronzo,' and though about 3 inches long, seems to have been intended for the bezel of a ring.

[1] Two gold rings have been found in England, which Hübner and others regard as Christian or as "aevi Christiani;" one in Suffolk, reading OAVMΠEI ZHCAIC (figured in Jones's Finger-ring Lore, p. 256), another found at Corbridge of beautiful pierced work, the letters being cut à jour, reading AEMILIA ZESES (described and figured in Arch. Journ. vii. p. 192; but see Mr. Fortnum's remarks on its age in vol. xxvi. p. 148). For these and other rings found in England which may probably be Christian, but which do not give clear signs of their Christianity, see Hübner, Inscr. Brit. p. 234.

To the above distinctly Christian subjects is to be added one taken from the Old Testament, which, however, was regarded as a typical representation of the great sacrifice of the death of Jesus Christ and of his resurrection following thereon.

(16.) Sacrifice of Abraham.—This subject; though found on various other works of Christian antiquity, is so rare upon metal rings that only a single example seems hitherto to have occurred. In Mr. Fortnum's collection (No. 29) is a bronze ring with highly projecting bezel of square form; the hoop is a simple circle of angular projection externally. On the square face the subject is deeply engraved. In the centre is Abraham, holding a knife with point upwards in his right hand, and the head of Isaac, who kneels before the altar of piled wood, with his left. He seems suddenly to have caught sight of the ram, which stands below a tree. Between Abraham's head and the knife appears an uncertain object, which Mr. Fortnum with great probability explains to be the angel, but which Padre Garrucci suggests may be rays of light, symbol of the Divine voice restraining Abraham, and which the Chev. de Rossi thinks may be the volume of the prophetic Scriptures tied with a ribbon proclaiming to all generations that Abraham should be blessed in his posterity; but these explanations seem less probable.

Apart from these had better be described two other forms of rings: one in the shape of a foot the other of the common circular form, but in combination with a key.

(17.) Foot-shaped Rings.—The bezel sometimes assumes the form of the sole of the foot, or rather of the shoe; and the rings of this form appear to have been in most cases, if not all, used as signet-rings to indicate the possession of the things so sealed. Bronze rings of this form have been found in the Roman catacombs, either bearing the name of the owner, e.g. a massive ring, labelled IVSTVS accompanied by a star or double cross (Curt. Synt. de Ant. p. 398, from Aringhi, R. S. ii. 698), or having the chrisma with horizontal stroke at the top, and two pellets above and below, as one in the Kircherian Museum (Perret, u. s. pl. xi. n. 6), or as a larger one in the same Museum which reads SPES IN DEO (retrograde). (Perret, u.s. pl. xi. n. 5.)[j] See also De Rossi (Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1874, p. 77, tav. ii. n. 5) for a fine similar example from Capena; and one in Mommsen, Inscr. Reg. Neap. n. 6310, § 290, now at Naples (apparently not retrograde). There is a foot-shaped ring in the Vatican Museum (No. 25); also another in the same Museum (No. 13), engraved with SAVIV, i.e. vivas (reversed), evidently intended for stamping. Mr. Fortnum has one "the bezel of which surmounts the swelling shoulders of a hoop of half-round wire, and is shaped as the sole of a shoe upon which is coarsely incised IN DEO with a continuous border-line of punctuations" (No. 31). He thinks that "this ring could hardly have been used for stamping or sealing, as the lettering reads rightly on the ring and would of course be inverted in the impression."

Mr. Fortnum observes that this is a form of ring previously and contemporaneously used by pagans, and that similar rings bearing names and words that cannot be assumed as Christian[k] are preserved in the Castellani, the Waterton, British Museum, and other collections.

The form of the foot is in allusion to the ancient adage of the jurists, "Quicquid pes tuus calcaverit tuum erit," on which Paul de Castro (lib. i. De acq. vel. amitt. poss.) writes: "Nota quod pedes sunt instrumentum aptum ad acquirendam possessionem naturalem:" see Pellicia, de Eccl. Polit. tom. iii. p. 227, quoted by Martigny, Anneaux des prem. Chrét. p. 38, also Dict. s. v. Anneaux. It is, however, just possible that such rings of this form as were not intended for sealing or stamping may have been symbolical of walking with God (IN DEO), and having attained the end of the pilgrimage in safety, as among the pagans votive images of feet expressed a safe return from a journey. See Martigny, Dict. s. v. Plantes de Pied.

(18.) Rings with Key attached.—This class of rings is by no means exclusively Christian: several without any emblems, and one having rudder between two ears of corn on the onyx chaton (see pp. 34, 35), are figured by Licetus (de Anulis Ant.) in the plate at the beginning of his work. (Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.) They have been called by him and others anuli ad claves (s. c. xxix.), but whether this expression occurs in any ancient authors the writer cannot say. Some of these found in Holland as Lipsius observes, are of iron, and must, therefore, have been worn by slaves or common soldiers. (Excurs. B. ad Tac. Ann. ii.) Others, however, have been found in the catacombs, some of which Boldetti figures. (Cimit. p. 506, Nos. 36, 37.) Most of these have no Christian symbols; but Mr. Fortnum possesses a bronze finger-ring with key attached, of which a figure is given. "It is a simple hoop, the bezel of which is slightly raised and flattened, and from the side of which projects a small neck, attaching a circular table flattened towards the ring. This is pierced with a cross which is surrounded with a circular depression or bordering." The key opened the lock by lifting a latch. The cross he regards as a Christian emblem: but this can hardly be looked upon as certain. Obtained in Rome, and regarded by its possessor "as perhaps of the 4th century." (No. 32.) In the Vatican Museum is a similar ring, believed to have been found in the Catacombs. (No. 1.) Speaking of this kind of ring, Possidius (Vit. Aug. c. 24, in fine operum ejus), says that St. Augustine never wore them himself. "Domus ecclesiae curam omnemque substantiam ad vices clericis delegabat et credebat. Nunquam clavem, nunquam anulum in manu habens, sed ab eisdem domus praepositis cuncta et accepta et erogata notabantur." His signet ring (with profile portrait) mentioned below, he most probably did wear. Gregory the Great (see the references in Boldetti, Cimit. p. 507) gave golden key-rings of this kind, which had touched the body of St. Peter, or in which a tiling of his chain was inlaid, to princes as a species of relic, accompanied by his benediction. A beautiful gold key-ring, found near Bologna, may very possibly have been one of these. (Fortnum in Arch. Journ. vol. xxxiii. pp. 110–112 with fig.). Rings had indeed been already used as reliquaries.

[j] In the Vatican Museum there is a stamp, formed as the sole of a shoe, of larger size than the rings of that form, which has the same legend, with letters reversed and incised. Fortnum in Arch. Journ. XXVIII. (1871) p. 280. It may have been made for a ring.

[k] The large bronze ring engraved FORTVNIVS accompanied by an ivy leaf, figured by Boldetti (Cimit. p. 505 n. 38), and by Perret and Martigny after him, is in all likelihood Christian, having been found in the catacombs, but, like several others of the same class, has been omitted here.

(Fortnum, No. 32.)

Before this time Macrina, the sister of St. Gregory of Nyssa, had obtained a piece of the true cross, lately discovered by Helena, and had it inclosed beneath the bezel of an iron ring, on which a cross was also engraved: she wore it next her heart. (Greg. Nyss. in Vita Macr. in Migne, Patrol. Gr. vol. xlvi. p. 990.)

Another fine gold key-ring, with wards formed of nine Greek crosses, reading ACCIPE DVLCIS on the chaton, and MVLTIS ANNIS on the hoop, may have been meant for a new year's gift. (Arch. Journ. vol. xxix. p. 305.)

2. Royal Rings.

It is certain that official rings were in use from an early period among the Christian sovereigns of France. There were signet rings entrusted to the keeping of a high official, who in Merovingian times was called Referendarius, sometimes an ecclesiastic. Thus Sigebert the Second, king of Austasia (638–670), appointed St. Bonitus, bishop of Clermont, his referendarius, "anulo ex manu regis accepto" (Vita S. Boniti, 15 Jan.). Audoenus or Dado was the referendarius of Dagobert the Great, father of the above-named Sigebert, so called, as Aimo tells (Eccl. Hist. iv. 14), "quod ad eum omnes publicae deferrentur conscriptiones, ipseque eas annulo regis sive sigillo ab eo sibi commisso muniret seu formaret.' Audoenus was at this time probably a layman, but he became archbishop of Rouen in 640. [See SEALS.][1]

3. Episcopal Rings in General; also Rings of Investiture and the Ring of the Fisherman.

That bishops, in common with other Christians, possessed rings in very early times, is easy to prove; but when the ring was first employed as a badge of their office it is more difficult to say. The earliest example now known of the possession of a ring by a bishop is probably that of Caius, bishop of Rome, 283–296. When his tomb was opened in the year 1622 there were found therein three coins of Diocletian, in whose reign he suffered martyrdom, and also his ring ("sanctissimi pontificis anulus adinventus est"), see Aringhi, Rom. Subt. lib. iv. c. 48, vol. ii. p. 426; Boldetti, Cimit. pp. 102, 103. It does not appear what has become of it. Eusebius, bishop of Rome, A.D. 310, is said to have borne the monogram of Christ on one side of the seal of his ring and that of his own name on the other. (Du Saussay, Panopl. Episc. p. 215.) In the Kensington Museum a ring (No. 7442 amongst the Waterton collection) is thus described:—"Ring, silver gilt. An episcopal ring, fluted shank, from which rises a long stem and collet, set with an antique paste. Third or fourth century. Found in Lombardy. Diameter 1⅞ inch by ¾. Given by Sir James Hudson, K.C.B." It does not appear why the ring is even regarded as Christian, much less as episcopal. Possibly the circumstances of the discovery might throw light on this matter. The pale ground of paste is inlaid with eight red and blue triangular tessellae, also apparently of paste: they are not quite united, but resemble a star of eight rays.

[1] It does not appear that kings received rings at their coronation till after the time of Charlemagne. Nothing is said of the ring in the earliest coronation service known, that of Egbert, archbishop of York (732–767). See Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. ii. c. 10, Ordo I. But in Ordo iv. Ad benedicendum regem Francorum, a form is given for the delivery of the ring. This is described as Ex MS. codice Ratoldi abbatis Corbeiensis,' who may perhaps be the same as a writer of that name mentioned by Fabricius, supposed to be of the 10th century (Bibl. Med. et Inf. Latin.). It runs thus: "Accipe anulum signaculum videlicet sanctae fidei, soliditatem regni, augmentum potentiae per quae scias triumphali potentia hostes repellere, haereses destruere, subditos coadunare, et catholicae fidei perseverabilitate connecti. Per &c." The earliest French king who received episcopal coronation at all was Pepin, according to Martene; but we do not find that either he or Charlemagne received a ring thereat. The earliest (real or pretended) example of an English king receiving a ring at his consecration known to the writer is given in a Vita et Passio S. Edmundi Regis, printed in the Appendix to Batteley's Antiq. S. Edmundi Burgi, p. 119 sqq. where it is recorded of Offa, king of the East Angles (rather of the East Saxons), that he designated in 855 Edmund as his successor, "jussitque ut anulum suum sibi deferrent, quem acceperit ab episcopo in regni Estanglorum promotione." But the whole story seems to be apocryphal. See Butler, Lives of the Saints, Nov. 20.

St. Augustine had a signet-ring (anulus), "qui exprimit faciem hominis attendentis in latus," meaning apparently a head seen in profile. [GEMS, p. 719.] A letter of Clovis is addressed to the Gallican bishops, circa A.D. 511, in which he promises to recognise their letters as authentic, provided they were signed with their ring ("vestro anulo signatas"). (Greg. Turon. Op. Append. p. 1327, ed. Bened.; col. 1158, ed. Migne, Patrol. t. lxxi). The seals probably bore their names or monograms.

About the same time Avitus bishop of Vienne writes to his brother, Apollinaris bishop of Valentia, how he would wish his signet-ring to be made. The ring was to be of iron, not massive, formed of two dolphins, with their heads on the side opposite to the bezel, and their forked tails meeting each other around a double seal turning on two pivots; on one face, which was to be electrum (pale gold), his own name was to be engraved in monogram ("latitabunda"); on the other side, a bright green stone ("vernans lapillus"), his name was to be written in full ("publica"). Such at least appears to be the meaning of his directions, which are given as he says "paullo hilarius," but which might have been better described as "paullo obscurius."[m] Such monograms had become fashionable about this time, both in metal and in stone, on seals or on coins; and the passage of Symmachus, relating to the intricacy of his own monogram on his seal is sufficiently well known (lib. ii., epist. 12). Arnulphus, bishop of Metz, in A.D. 614, took for his seal a milk-white cornelian, bearing a fish with its head above the basket in which it is contained, on either side of which is a smaller fish, which was set in his (gold?) ring, a plain hoop widening towards the bezel, first figured in Martigny, Dict. s.v. Anneau episcopal (2nd ed.). It is now preserved in the cathedral at Metz. [GEMS, p. 714.] Ebresgilaus, bishop of Meaux in 660, wore in his ring an intaglio representing St. Paul the hermit (ibid. p. 719, b). Agilbert, bishop of Paris (666–680), was buried with a very large ring (thumb-ring?) set with an opaque figure, on which was represented St. Jerome beating his breast before a crucifix (ibid. p. 718).[n] The ring of Leodegar, bishop of Autun about A.D. 685, is mentioned by Du Saussay as existing in 1636 in the Royal Monastery of St. Victor in Paris. Unfortunately the Martyrologium Gallicanum which mentions it under his day (Oct. 2), as being in the monastery aforesaid, says nothing of its material or style, but only of its miraculous qualities: "cujus in aquam immersione miracula fere perennia eduntur; nam oculorum infirmitate laborantes consecratae aquae ipsius perfusione recuperant passim sanitatem."[o]

In our own country also rings have been found in the tomb of Birinus, bishop of Dorchester, who died 640 ("inventus quoque [in sepulchro] est anulus," Vit. S. Birini, incerto auctore in Surius de Vitis Sanctorum, Dec. 3, vol. vi. p. 220, Venet. 1681), and in that of St. John of Beverley who died in 721, when he was translated into a new shrine, circa A.D. 1037 (Dugdale, Hist. of Coll. Ch. of Beverley, p. 55 in Appendix to Hist. of St. Paul's Cathedral; R. C. Neville, Lecture on Antiq. of Finger-rings, p. 15, Saffr. Walden, 1856; Waterton in Arch. Journ. vol. xx. (1863), p. 225.[p]

[m] The text of this most difficult passage is:—"Signatorium igitur, quod pietas vestra non tam promittere quam offerre dignata est, in hunc modum fieri volo. Anulo ferreo et admodum tenui, velut concurrentibus in se delphinulis concludendo, sigilli duplicis forma geminis cardinulis inseratur. Quae ut libuerit vicissim, seu latitabunda, seu publica, obtutibus intuentium alterna vernantis lapilli vel electri pallentis fronte nutetur. Nec tamen talis electri, quale nuper, ut egomet hausi, in sancto ac sincerissimo impolitutae manus nitore sordebat cui corruptam potius quam confectam, auri nondum fornace decocti crediderim inesse mixturam; vel illam certe, quam nuperrime rex Getarum (he is explained to be Alaricus, à Clodoveo prostratus), secuturae praesagam ruinae, monetis publicis adulterium firmantem mandaverat. Sed sit ejusmodi color, quem aequaliter ac modeste, ruborem ab auro, ab argento candorem, pretiositatem ab utroque, a ceteris rapientem fulgorem, artificiosa siquidem medioxima viroris commendat amoenitas. Si quaeras quid inscripendum sigillo; signum monogrammatis mei per gyrum scripti nominis legatur indicio. Medium porro annuli, ab ea parte qua volae clausae vicinabitur, delphinorum quorum superius capita describimus, caudae tenebunt. Quibus lapisculus ob hoc ipsum quaesitus, oblongus scilicet et acutis capitibus formatus, inditur. Ecce habes quoddam tantummodo speculum dogmatis exsequendi. Nec tamen amplitudinem elegantiae tuae sic ad memoratum exemplar coacto (leg. coarcto?), quasi liberum non sit addere quod videtur." Aviti Viennensis Epist. lxxviii. Apollinari episcopo (Migne, Patrol. Lat. t. lix. pp. 280, 281). M. Le Blant (Inscr. chrét. de la Gaule, tom. ii. p. 50) has ventured upon a translation or paraphrase, adding reference, to Sirmond and Canciani, and mentioning a Merovingian ring on which the name Aster is engraved in monogram and also in full.

[o] De Corte, Syntagm. de Anulis, pp. 168–78 has various notices of miraculous rings. Many will agree with him when he writes: "Et quis singulas salutarium annulorum virtutes caelitus adeptas in numerum coget ni lectori suo taedium parere gestiat? Abstineo igitur si unicum insuper . . . recensuero."

[p] There is a very early Saxon ring which may perhaps be the ring of Alhstan, bishop of Sherborne A.D. 824–867. If so it is just too late for this work, but the attribution is uncertain, the name being a common one. It reads ALHSTAN having a cross prefixed, on four round sides of a ring alternating with four lozenge-shaped sides on which fabulous animals are depicted. It is of gold and nielloed. It is now in the S. Kensington Museum, formerly in the Waterton collection. Figured in Arch. Journ. vol. xx. p. 226, the same figure being used for Jones's Finger-ring Lore, p. 62. It had been previously described and figured by the Rev. Dr. Pegge in Archaeologia, vol. iv. p. 47. Perhaps it should be added that when the tomb of bishop Cuthbert (died 686) was opened in 1537, a "massive gold ring, set with a sapphire en cabochon, was found on one of his fingers." But although the authentication of its discovery is undoubted, it is considered to be certain that it could never have been worn by St. Cuthbert, being apparently not older than the 14th century. Mr. Waterton thinks that it had probably belonged to one of the bishops of Durham, and had been placed where it was found on some occasion when the shrine was opened. He observes that it has been figured in the Archaeol. Aeliana, vol. ii. (N. S.), p. 66, and is now preserved in St. Cuthbert's College, Ushaw, near Durham.

It cannot be concluded from these literary notices that episcopal rings were of an ecclesiastical character properly so called, or different in any way from those which might have been used by persons who were not ecclesiastics. Nor does there appear to be any clear proof that such rings existed at all until the latter half of the 6th century.[1] From about that time forwards bishops at their consecration received a staff (baculus) and also a ring, symbolical of their office as bridegrooms of the church (annulus), and also as a mark of honour; but whether these were in all cases capable of being used as signet rings or not, it is difficult if not impossible to decide, from the imperfect nature of the evidence. In later times they certainly could not be so used. The earliest ecclesiastical writer who makes mention of such a ring seems to be St. Isidore of Seville,[2] who was bishop of that see from A.D. 595–633. In his second book of Ecclesiastical Offices, supposed to have been written about A.D. 610, he says: "Datur (episcopo dum consecratur) et anulus propter signum pontificalis honoris vel signaculum secretorum" (c. 5). The last words might appear to imply that this was a signet-ring.[3] David, bishop of Benevento in the time of Charlemagne, concludes a mandate as follows: "anulo sanctae nostrae ecclesiae firmavimus roborandum" (quoted from Ughelli in Mab. de re Dipl. ii. xv.), from which it would appear probable that the bishop's official ring went with the see. And upon the whole it seems most natural to conclude with Mr. Waterton that most if not all the episcopal rings earlier than the 11th century were also used as signets (Arch. Journ. vol. xx. p. 225). They would not only be employed for sealing a letter or an official document, of which instances have been given: but they were also used to seal up a box containing relics, when an altar was consecrated and the box placed thereon. (See Baronius s. a. 627 for the seal on the box containing, as it was supposed, the wood of the true cross, which was found unbroken, when Syroes, son of Chosroes, king of Persia, restored this relic to the Christians.) In some churches of Gaul and Spain the not uncommon but far from universal prohibition to baptise in Lent was enforced in the 7th century by the application of the bishop's seal (anulus, signaculum) to the gates of the baptistery, from the beginning of Lent till Easter, when baptisms were often celebrated in great numbers (Concil. Tolet. xvii. (694), De rect. fid. c. ii.; Sarnelli, Di varie Sorte di Anelli, Lett. Eccles. t. iii. p. 84, referred to in Martigny, Dict. s. v. Anneaux; Bingham, Ant. xi. 6, § 7, xxi. i. § 12).[4]

There are also other allusions to the official episcopal ring in the early part of the 7th century, which seem to carry it somewhat further back than themselves, probably into the preceding century. A letter of pope Boniface IV. read in the council of Rome (A.D. 610) says that "monachus nequaquam anulo pontificali subarrharentur," i.e. be elevated (as Augustine and Martin had been) to the episcopal rank, if the monastic life was an utter disqualification for the office (Coleti, Concil. t. vi. p. 1356). In the twenty-eighth canon of the fourth council of Toledo, held under the presidency of Isidore of Seville, A.D. 633) we read that "if a bishop, presbyter, or deacon be unjustly deposed, and in a subsequent synod be found innocent, he cannot be what he had previously been, unless he receive again the rank which he had lost from the hand of a bishop before the altar. If he have been a bishop, he must receive the stole (orarium), ring, and staff . . . and so the other minor

Arch. Journ. xx. 237, where much more information may be seen; see also A. Butler, Lives of the Saints, March 20. The stone bears no device, in conformity with the injunction of pope Innocent III. in 1194: "Anulus (episcopi) ex auro puro solide confectus palam habeat cum gemma in qua nihil sculpti esse debet" (Merati, ed. Gavanti, p. 1341). Durandi makes a similar remark (de Rit. Eccl. ii. 9, § 37). Accordingly many episcopal rings of the 13th century "were of very rude fashion . . . .; the stone set just as it was found, merely having the surface polished, and the shape of the bezel was adapted to the gem." Waterton, u. s. p. 227.

[2] Mr. O. Morgan (Archaeologia, vol. xxxvi. p. 393) argues from the silence of the Apostolical Constitutions which give minute directions for the consecration of bishops, that the ring was unknown (as a symbol of the episcopal office) at the time when they were written. This time, variously estimated, is most probably about the 4th century.—Apostolical Constitutions.

[3] The Abbé (now Canon) Martigny, both in his Anneaux chez les premiers Chrétiens (pp. 44–46), and in both the editions of his Dict. des Antiq. chrét. (s. v. Anneau épiscopal) has laboured to prove that St. Optatus, an African father of the latter part of the 4th century, distinctly mentions the episcopal ring, as belonging to the bishop's office. He so interprets the words of his first book, c. 10 (p. 37, ed. Albasp.) where he says that heretics have not the keys, which St. Peter alone received, nor the ring whereby it is written that the fountain is sealed (nec anulum quo legitur fontis esse signatus). This passage has much perplexed the commentators, as may be seen in the various notes in the editions of Albaspinaeus p. 118, and of Migne (Patrol. t. xi. p. 902). But there is little doubt that Meric Casaubon has rightly judged that there is an allusion here to Cant. iv. 12, "A garden enclosed is my sister, my spouse; a spring shut up, a fountain sealed." If so the ring is no more a material ring than the keys; the passage is rather to be understood mystically of the gifts of the church (de dotibus ecclesiae) of which the episcopate is the custodian. Others, as Sarnelli (quoted by Martigny), understand Optatus to allude to the custom of sealing up the baptismal fonts with the bishop's seal in Lent (see below). "Mais de telles difficultés s'évanouissent devant cet autre texte du même docteur et du même livre: Le pontife porte l'anneau, afin qu'il connaisse qu'il est l'époux de son église, et que pour elle, à l'exemple du Christ, il sacrifie sa vie, s'il le faut" (Dict. u. s.) In his special work on Christian rings he quotes the original at length, understanding the last words to refer to the discipline of the secret. "Pontifex ergo anulum portat ut se sponsum ecclesiae agnoscat, et pro illa animam, si necesse fuerit, ponat; mysteria Scripturae à perfidis sigillet, secreta ecclesiae resignet." But no such passage occurs anywhere in Optatus, nor any passage at all like it. It is found verbatim in Honorius Augustodunensis, a writer of the 12th century, in his Gemma animae, lib. i. c. 216 (Migne, Patrol. t. clxxii. p. 609; Marriott, Vest. Christ. pp. 139–140).

[4] This inference however is made less certain by the allegorical expressions which follow. "Nam multa sunt quae carnalium minusque intelligentium sensibus occultantes sacerdotes quasi sub signaculo abscondunt, ne indignis quibusque sacramenta Dei aperiantur."

[1] The practice is earlier than the date of the council: "ecclesiasticae consuetudinis ordo deposcit, ut ostia baptisterii in eodem die pontificali manu anulo assignata claudantur." Mr. Waterton (u. s.) appears to be in error in thinking that all this was in conformity with a decree of Pope Sergius I.: the council was held merely during his Pontificate (687–701).

orders are to receive, with a view to their restoration, what at the time of ordination they originally received. (Bruns, Canon. Apost. et Concil. Vet. vol. i. p. 231. Marriott's rendering is here followed, Vest. Christ. p. 75.) From these passages it is plain that before they were written bishops received a ring at their ordination. We have several ancient ordination services in which the delivery of the ring to the bishop is mentioned; and of these one, if not more, is probably somewhat earlier than the 7th century. The sacramentary of Gregory the Great, circa A.D. 590, as it stands in Muratori's edition, gives the following formula: Ad anulum digito imponendum. Accipe anulum fidei, scilicet signaculum, quatenus sponsam Dei, videlicet sanctam ecclesiam, intemerata fide ornatus illibate custodias. (Sacramentarium Gregorianum de Officio Episcopi, in Muratori, Liturg. Rom. Vet. t. ii. p. 442, Venet. 1748.) But in the edition of Angelo Rocca (quoted by Du Saussaye, Panopl. Episcop. p. 181) we read: "memor sponsionis et desponsationis ecclesiasticae, ut dilectionis Domini Dei tui, in die qua assecutus es hunc honorem cave ne obliviscaris illius. Accipe ergo anulum discretionis et honoris, fidei signum, ut quae signanda sint signes, et quae aperienda sunt prodas, quae liganda sunt liges, quae solvenda sunt solvas: utque credentibus per fidem baptismatis, lapsis autem sed poenitentibus per mysterium reconciliationis januas regni caelestis aperias; cunctis vero de thesauro Dominico, nova et vetera proferas, ut ad aeternam salutem omnibus consulas gratia Domini nostri Jesu Christi, cui cum Patre et Spiritu Sancto est honor et gloria in saecula saeculorum. Amen." This last appears to be a later form or adaptation of the sacramentary which gave rise to the Ordo Romanus,[u] where a portion of the same words occurs (Martigny, Anneaux chez les prem. Chrét. p. 41). From these flowed a variety of formulae, one of the earliest being found in the pontifical of Ecgbert, Archbishop of York (732–766), where we read, "Cum anulus datur haec oratio dicitur: Accipe anulum pontificalis honoris, ut sis fidei integritate munitus. Pontif. Egberti Eboracensis Episcopi in Mart. de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. viii. art. xi. Ordo ii. We have also repetitions or variations thereof in several early mediaeval services for ordination, which in all cases appear, and in some instances are declared, to be derived from the Ordo Romanus. (See Martene de Ant. Rit. Eccl. lib. i. c. viii. art. xi.; Ordo iii., Ordo v., Ordo viii., Ordo ix., &c., Bassan. 1788.) Of the age of these rituals it is not easy to speak; but inasmuch as the manuscript of more than one of them is as early as the 10th or 11th century, it is not improbable that some of them may be as early as the time of Charlemagne. (See Waterton in Arch. Journ. xx. 1863, pp. 229, 230.) In the Missa Pontificalis (Ordo xviii.) of Illyricus, which he thought to have been in use in the West about the time of Gregory the Great, occurs this prayer: "Ad anulum; circumda Domine digitos meos virtute et decora sacrificatione." (Gerbert, Vet. Liturg. Alaman. tom. i. pp. 76, 255, 256, s. l. 1776. See also Martene, u. s. lib. i. c. iv. Art. xii. Ordo iv.) It is impossible to conjecture from these liturgical forms the material of the ring, and whether the ring had a gem or not, and if it had, whether the stone bore any device or not. These matters may for some time have been left indefinite; afterwards, as is well known, they were all definitely fixed. The Ordo Romanus and general usage in the Roman church afterwards places the ring on the fourth finger of the bishop's right hand. "Anulos ipsos non in sinistra poni oportet," says pope Gregory IV. (elected to the papal throne in 827), "nullius venae cordialis habita ratione, quae gentilitatem capere videretur; sed omnino in dextra tanquam digniore, qua sacrae benedictiones impenduntur; maxime quia ipsi pontifices, dum sacrificant, non nimium exercitas manus habent; et sic ipsorum tam summorum quam ceterorum pontificum consecrationibus dexterae signanter anulus imponitur" (De Cultu Pontificum, quoted in Martigny, Anneaux, &c. p. 40).

The earlier stages (if any) through which the episcopal ring, with its concomitant staff, passed before it was placed on the hands of the bishop-elect by the consecrating prelate, appear to be unknown before the time of Charlemagne. Perhaps it was not received at all before consecration.

A few words must now be said upon the history of episcopal investiture by the ring, the source of such deadly feuds between the popes and emperors in the 11th and 12th centuries.

The Ring of Investiture.—In the reign of Charlemagne commenced, according to the common story, the investiture by the ring and staff, an act of the civil power which entitled the bishop-elect to the possession of the temporalities of his see.[v] This privilege (among others with which we are not now concerned) was granted to him by pope Hadrian I. in gratitude for the services which Charles has rendered to the Holy See by expelling the Lombards from Italy. This fact is distinctly asserted not only by two of the best historians of the 12th century, Sigebert (Chron. s. a. mcxi.; see also Grat. Dist. lxxiii. c. 22, quoted in INVESTITURE), and by William of Malmesbury (Gest. Reg. Angl. lib. ii. § 202, p. 348, ed. Hardy), who puts the declaration to that effect, with express mention of the anulus et baculus, into the mouth of pope Gregory VI., but also by a bull of pope Leo VIII.

[u] Probably a compilation of the 8th century. See ORDO. A critical edition of these early liturgical compositions, which differ much in different MSS., would be a great boon. See Palmer, Orig. Liturg. § vi. (Liturgy of Rome).

[v] Such is the conclusion of Kirchmann (de Anulis, c. 20, p. 211, Slesv. 1657), who has carefully investigated the subject. "Verum age, dicamus etiam," are his words, "de usu anulorum in episcoporum investituris; cujus moris ante Caroli M. tempora nullum reperio apud scriptores vestigium." De Corte accepts his conclusion, and indeed his very words. (Curtius, Syntagma de Anulis, pp. 372, 373, Antv. 1706.) So does also Mr. O. Morgan in Archaeologia, vol. xxxvi. p. 395. Kirchmann quotes several writers later than those mentioned in the text, who agree in the view that investitures originated in the time of Charlemagne. Mosheim, Ch. Hist. cent. xi. part ii. c. 2, § 15 (note), says, "What king or emperor first introduced this custom of appointing prelates by delivery of staff and ring is very uncertain.' Adam of Bremen ascribes it to Louis le Débonnaire, the son of Charlemagne (814–840); Humbert to Otho the Great (936–973), to which latter view Mosheim is much inclined. Both writers are of the 11th century.

(963-965), written only about a century and a half after the death of Charlemagne, when Otho the Great, his patron, was on the throne. "Ad exemplum B. Hadriani apostolicae sedis antistitis, qui domino Carolo victoriosissimo regi Francorum et Longobardorum patriciatus dignitatem ac ordinationem apostolicae sedis et investituram episcoporum concessit, ego quoque Leo episcopus servus servorum Dei . . . concedimus atque largimur Othoni primo regi Teutonicorum," &c. (Grat. Decr. P. i. c. In Synodo Distinct. lxiii., whence Kirchmann de Anulis, pp. 212, 213; but the text is a little different in Pertz, Mon. Germ. Leg. tom. ii. B. p. 166 q. v.) It is only fair to say that attempts have been made recently to throw doubts on the genuineness of this bull. Dr. Pertz thinks that the document "seems to betray a later origin," but that the emperors at the time "really had the power here described" (Robertson, Hist. Christ. Church, book v. ch. v.). But the bull of a pope, reckoned by the ultra-Roman party as an anti-pope, offers no very tempting subject for a forger in the interest of the see of Rome.

Notwithstanding these and other respectable authorities, some distinguished writers have lately called in question the whole story as having been fabricated in the interest of Rome, and as being unknown in the age of Charlemagne.[w] The reader must of course form his own conclusion on this obscure matter, which could not properly have been passed over in the present article.

It must be added, in concluding this division of the subject, that the episcopal ring is unknown to the Greek and Oriental churches.

The Fisherman's Ring.—The ring of the fisherman, now made of gold, and having a representation of St. Peter in a boat fishing, with the name of the reigning pope around it, which (says Mr. Waterton) "may be called the papal ring of investiture, being placed on the newly elected pope's finger by the Cardinal Camerlengo immediately after a successful counting of votes has been arrived at by the conclave," belongs, as it would seem, to rather a late mediaeval period. It has been stated, indeed, by Rebuffus, quoted by Longi de Anulis, p. 93) and by Bongratia, quoted by Heineccius (de Sigillis, p. 28), that St. Peter himself made use of this ring; but who believes this, asks Heineccius, but Bongratia and the like of him? Mabillon (de Re Dipl. lib. ii. c. 14, § 11) did not know of any evidence that this ring was employed before the 15th century. Mr. Waterton, in his valuable memoir "On the Ring of the Fisherman" (Archaeologia, vol. xi. p. 138, 1856), believes that the first mention of it occurs in a letter of Pope Clement IV. to his nephew Peter Grossi, in 1265, in which he says "Saluta matrem et fratres; non scribimus tibi neque familiaribus nostris sub bulla, sed sub Piscatoris sigillo, quo Romani pontifices in suis secretis utuntur" (Masson, in Vita).[x] Hence," he says, "it may be inferred that the popes had already, and for some time past, used this device as a seal, but only for their private letters. Martin V. elected in 1417, issued three briefs, all sub anulo Piscatoris, in the year 1426. For further information on this matter down to our own times, see Waterton (u. s. pp. 138-142); and O. Morgan (u. s. p. 398).

[w] See Robertson, Hist. Chr. Church, book iv. c. vi. (in fine), and INVESTITURE in this Dictionary. The alleged silence of the Caroline Capitularies, it has been said, "seems conclusive" against it. The silence, however, of Alcuin, Amalarius, and Rabanus Maurus has been similarly urged, according to Martigny, as throwing doubt on the existence of the episcopal ring in the 9th century, which has been clearly shown to have been in use for some time earlier. (See Martigny, Dict. s. v. Anneau épiscopal.)

[x] This is the earliest passage quoted by Mabillon for its use (u. s.); and from him it is doubtless derived by Mr. Waterton. See also Heineccius, u. s. p. 148.

4. ESPOUSAL AND MARRIAGE RINGS.

The early Christians employed the ring in espousals, but seemingly [illegible] as now, in the solemnity of marriage. "This was an innocent ceremony," [illegible]am, who refers to Selden, Uxor Hebr. lib. ii. c. 14 and c. 25, "used by the Romans before the times of Christianity, and in some measure admitted by the Jews, whence it was adopted among the Christian rites of espousal without any opposition or contradiction" (Antiq. of Christian Church, book xxii. c. 3, § 5). Tertullian speaks of its use among the heathen as harmless, at which Christians could take no offence, and might therefore be present at the ceremonial of espousals as well as at some others. But it would rather seem from his language that it had not yet been adopted by the Christians of Carthage: "eas (solemnitates) mundas esse opinor per semetipsas: quia neque vestitus virilis, neque anulus (sponsalium sc.; see the words preceding), aut conjunctio nuptialis de alicujus idoli honore descendit" (De Idolol. c. 16). He commends the ancient Romans for teaching women modesty and sobriety, to whom no other wearing of gold was permitted save on the finger, on which the "anulus pronubus" had been placed (Apol. c. 6). The espousal ring, however, was not always of gold, nor did it always bear a device. "Etiam nunc sponsae anulus ferreus mittitur, isque sine gemma" (Plin. N. H. xxxiii. 1). Yet pagan rings sometimes bore joined hands as a device (Pignor. Epist. 19); such were also common in Italy in the 16th century, and called una fede, but became obsolete shortly afterwards. "Id genus anulorum vulgo nuncupatum est fides," says Licetus de Anulis, p. 48: but he mentions no such Christian rings before the time of pope Nicolas I. It is evident, however, from the words of Clement of Alexandria that Christian women, while they were bound to keep the wearing of gold within reasonable limits, were permitted, or rather enjoined, to wear one gold ring, as a seal upon their husband's goods, seeing that upon them the care and safe keeping of the house devolved. This also proves that the wife's ring bore a device. The use of a ring as a signet for safety is the only one of which this father approves; all other rings, he says, are to be eschewed (Paed. lib. iii. c. xi. p. 243 and p. 246, Sylb.). Whether this ring had been given her as "anulus pronubus" does not clearly appear. But it would seem probable that the ring of espousals was employed in Christian rites in the time of St. Agnes, who suffered martyrdom soon after the beginning of the persecution of Diocletian,

A.D. 303. When solicited in marriage by a noble youth, she replied that she was already pre-occupied by another lover (i.e. Jesus Christ), "qui . . . anulo fidei suae subarrhavit me, longe te nobilior et genere et dignitate" (Pseudo-Ambros. Epist. 1). The same thing is rendered more evident still from the expressions of St. Peter Chrysologus (made bishop of Ravenna in 433), who, alluding to the father's putting a ring on the finger of the returning prodigal, not only calls it "anulum honoris . . . insigne Spiritus pignus, signaculum fidei" (these and like expressions occur also in other writers, see De Corte, Synt. p. 79), but "arrham coelestium nuptiarum" (Serm. v.) Asterius, bishop of Amasia in Pontus, who flourished about the year 400, makes direct allusions to the pre-nuptial ceremonies among Christians, and although he does not directly mention the ring, there is little doubt that it was employed, in accordance with Roman usage, when the dowry was agreed upon. "Wilt thou make void (he asks) the agreements (ἐπὶ τῷ γάμῳ) which thou settedst down with a view to marriage . . . . I mean the dowry which was there covenanted (τῆς προικὸς τῆς συγγραφείσης ἐνταῦθα)?" (Aster. Homil. in Matth. xix. 3, ed. Combef. p. 81 D, Paris, 1648). We have an actual example of the giving of the espousal ring recorded by Gregory of Tours, in a work written between 590 and 595, referring to somewhat earlier times than his own. Speaking of St. Leobardus (who afterwards retired to a monastery) he says: "Denique dato sponsae anulo, porrigit osculum, praebet calceamentum, celebrat sponsalium diem fastum" (Vit. Patr. c. 20). Yet it is not easy to name any author earlier than Isidore of Seville, who succeeded to the archbishopric of that place in 595, from whom we can obtain a distinct attestation that the ring was regularly used in Christian espousals. "The ring (says he) is given by the espouser to the espoused (à sponso sponsae) either for a sign of mutual fidelity or still more to join their hearts by this pledge; and therefore the ring is placed on the fourth finger because a certain vein, it is said (see Aul. Gell. Noct. Att. x. 10), flows thence to the heart" (Isid. Hisp. de Eccles. Off. ii. 20). During the whole period with which we are concerned the ring seems to have been used in espousals only, and never in the actual marriage ceremony itself. For pope Nicolas I., writing so late as 860 in reply to the Bulgarians, says: "We will try to shew you the usage, which the holy Roman church received anciently, and which the church holds up to this time in unions of this kind. . . . After the espousals, which are the promised covenants of future marriage, made by mutual consent . . . and after the espouser has engaged to himself by a pledge (arrhis) his espoused by decorating her finger with a ring of fidelity . . . both are led shortly afterwards or at some convenient time to the performance of the marriage covenant. And first they are placed in the church, bringing offerings which they ought to offer to God by the hands of his priest, and then they receive the benediction and the heavenly veil" (Nicol. I. Respons. ad Consult. Bulg. c. 3; in Coleti, Concil. t. ix. pp. 1535, 6).[7]

Examples of Espousal or Marriage Rings.—The following rings bear every appearance of having served matrimonial purposes. In Spon's Recherches curieuses d'Antiquité, Lyon, 1683, the Dixième Dissertation is a letter from de Peiresc to Holstenius in 1619. De Peiresc bought at Arles a gold ring, weighing about an ounce, recently disinterred, on which was engraved a face of rather rude execution with the inscription around: "+ TECLA SEGELLA, le tout dans une plaque d'or environnée de quelques enrichissements de feuillages et godrons; dans le vuide desquels est écrit + TECLA VIVAT DEO CVM MARITO SEO (sic); à l'opposite du cercle de cette bague, on y voit un petit ovale avec les lettres dedans RA'TE" (p. 169).

Peiresc observes that the cross and the diction shew the ring to be Christian: SEO for SVO he notes as a not uncommon form in the 4th and 5th centuries; and more common still in later ones. He regards it as an anulus pronubus. He does not explain SEGELLA: and proposes very doubtfully arra genialis as the explanation of RA'TE. The former may possibly be for Teclae (i.e. Theclae?) sigillum. Other rings have been found in France which appear to be Christian and to have been used in espousals; e.g. a gold ring, duplex, hoop-wire of light fabric swelling towards the united oval bezels, which have a line of beads from them on either side: one of them bears the name BAVBVLFVS, the last three letters written in a line above; the other has HARICVDA, the last letter written above. It is regarded as a Christian marriage ring by M. Le Blant who figures it (Inscr. chrét. de la Gaule, n. 337, pl. 36, n. 221), and by Canon Martigny (Anneaux chez les prem. Chrét. p. 12). There is, however,

[7] Riddle (Christ. Ant. p. 714 note) says that Calvoer (Rituale Eccl.) traces the origin of the marriage ring to the 10th century. He supposes it to have been introduced in imitation of the ring worn by bishops. Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. (lib. i. c. ix. art. 5) gives several ordines for marriage. The ring is not mentioned in the earliest (Ordo i.) the Missale Gelasianum, printed from a MS. of the end of the 8th or beginning of the 9th century; it occurs, however, in a Missale Redonense (Ordo ii.), printed from a MS. about 200 years later, where we have Benedictio super anulum in these words: Creator et conservator humani generis, dator aeternae salutis, omnipotens Deus, tu permitte Spiritum Sanctum Paraclitum super hunc anulum. Per, &c. Also in another form (idem Ordo) thus: Benedic, Domine, anulum istum, ut in ejus figura pudicitiam custodiant. Per, &c. We likewise find the ring, which is sometimes said to be a silver and sometimes a gold ring, in almost all the marriage services taken from still later MSS. (Ordo iii. iv. vi. vii. viii. ix. x. xi. xii. &c.). There are two rings mentioned in the Euchologia of the Greeks; the priest gives a gold ring to the bridegroom and a silver ring to the bride with various ceremonies and a long prayer afterwards (Ordo xvi.) See also Pellicia, De Eccl. Pol. vi. 1, 3. It is needless to do more than allude to the assertion or tradition that Joseph gave the Virgin Mary first an espousal ring and afterwards a marriage ring (Martene, l. c.). J. B. Lauri published in 1622 a work entitled De Anulo pronubo Deiparae Virginis, and from this work is derived the account given in Dr. John Patrick's Reflections upon the Devotions of the Roman Church, pp. 45 60, Lond. 1686 (ed. 2 without his name); see also G. Longi de anulis, p. 7, Lugd. Bat. 1672. This ring, on a well-known type of later Roman times, is preserved at Perugia. There is, however, another which passes under the same name in the church of St. Ann at Rome (De Saussay, Panopl. episc. p. 192). See Martigny, Dict. s. v. Anneaux, and Fortnum in Academy, vol. x. p. 505 (1876).

nc external sign of its Christianity, but it is very similar in structure to Fortnum, No. 27, which is certainly Christian. Probably rather of the 4th century than of the Merovingian age, to which M. Le Blant refers it: said to have been found at Vitry-le-François, now in the Cabinet des Médailles. Another gold ring, also considered to be Christian, is figured and described by Le Blant (u. s. n. 669 B, pl. 90, Nos. 534, 536). It was found near Mulsane, and is of late work; two sides of its raised oblong chaton are inscribed with the names DROMACI | VS BETTA in niello, while on the face are engraved a man and a woman standing; the flattened wire-like hoop is corded at intervals. Probably too late to be Pagan.[a] But Mr. Fortnum possesses a gold ring (No. 33), undoubtedly Christian, which he regards as matrimonial, of Byzantine character, like the coins of the 5th century The hoop, flat inside, angular externally, bears a circular button-like bezel, on the face of which a male and female bust are opposed, above them there is a Latin cross, the limbs being slightly wedge-shaped. Weight 3¾ dwts. Obtained from Athens. Another similar, but finer example, octagonal, with decorated panels, is given in Arch. Journ. (vol. xxi. p. 311). See Arch. Journ. (vol. vii. p. 191), for a Roman ring found in Durham with similar types, but without any Christian emblem. There are in fine certain gems, set in rings, bearing an anchor from whose arms hang two fishes (GEMS, p. 714, b; see also Gorl. Dactyl. ii. n. 564, ed. Gronov.); and Canon Martigny, who has received and figured an example bought from Alexandria (Dict. s. v. Anneaux, 2nd ed.) regards these "anneaux et pierres annulaires" as "bagues nuptiales." They appear to be of the 4th and 5th centuries. His speculation, if uncertain, is at least ingenious.

The last named gentleman has most liberally placed at the disposal of the writer the engravings used in illustration of his valuable papers on Early Christian Finger-rings, published in the Archaeological Journal for 1869 and 1871. Some of them are also reproduced in Jones's Finger-ring Lore, pp. 47–49, 268–273 (Lond. 1877). [C. B.]

RITUALE. This word is commonly applied to the collection of ritual directions for the various offices drawn up, in accordance with the directions of the council of Trent, by pope Paul V. in 1614. It has sometimes been supposed that the "Libellus officialis" of iv. Tolet. c. 26, was a ritual book, but this does not seem probable. [OFFICIALIS LIBER; ORDO.] [C.]

ROGATION DAYS. The procession on the three days before Ascension Day was instituted by Mamertus, bishop of Vienne in Dauphiné, A.D. 452, when that city was greatly injured by earthquakes, and the royal palace destroyed by lightning. It became an annual observance, and other bishops, moved by the visible blessing which attended it, followed the example of Vienne (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii. 34; Avit. Hom. de Rogat.; Migne, Patr. Lat. lix. 201; Sidonius, Epist. v. 14). Whether his procession was really earlier than the Roman rite of April 25 [PROCESSIONS], it is impossible to decide. Mamertus, at all events, instituted "orandi modum, edendi seriem, erogandi hilarem dispensationem" (Greg. Tur.), which suited the temper of his countrymen, and became a widely spread and enduring observance. In 511 it was enforced by the council of Orleans: "Ab omnibus ecclesiis placuit celebrari" (can. 27). In England the council of Cloveshoo, 747, orders the observance of these rogation days, "secundem morem priorum nostrorum" (can. 16). The council of Mayence in 813 made the following decree, which can hardly refer to any other rogations than those before Holy Thursday: "It hath seemed good to us that the greater litany be observed by all Christians on three days, as we find in our reading to have been done, and as our holy fathers instituted, not on horseback, nor in costly garments, but with bare feet, and in sackcloth and ashes, unless sickness shall hinder" (can. 33; comp. Sidonius, Ep. v. 7, "Incedunt . . . castorinati ad laetanias"). Herard, 858: "De diebus rogationum, ut reverenter ac studiose absque turpibus jocis et verbis celebrentur" (Capit. 94). These rogations were not received at Rome until the time of Leo III. (A.D. 795), who ordered that on the Monday "the pontiff, with all the clergy and all the people, should go forth from the church of the Mother of God, and proceed to the manger at the Church of the Saviour, which is called the Constantinian, with hymns and spiritual songs;" on Tuesday from St. Sabina to St. Paul, and Wednesday from the Church of Jerusalem to St. Lawrence without the walls (Liber Pontif. n. 98).

Gregory of Tours, as above cited, does not tell us that the "orandi modus" instituted by Mamertus included a procession, but we learn that it did from an incidental notice of the rogation days by the same author in Hist. Franc. ix. 6: "In these days the public rogations were celebrated, which are wont to be performed before the holy day of the Lord's Ascension. But it came to pass that while Raguemodus, the bishop (of Paris) was in procession with his people, and perambulating the holy places," &c. So Fortunatus in his Life of Germanus, who died in 576, some thirty years before his biographer, telling the story of a blind woman, "not able to go with the people at the time of the Litanies," says that "hearing the choir of the psalm-singers she implores the help of the lord Germanus with tears." After a vision she recovers her sight; and when the day dawns she "goes forth to mass with the people in the procession" (c. 33).

The Luxeuil lectionary gives proper lessons for these days at matins, terce, sext, and none (Lit. Gall. 149). One prophecy and three gospels are also appointed, "in letanias legenda," in the sacramentary of Besançon (Mus. Ital. i. 334). "Collectiones in rogationibus per diversa loca sanctorum," i.e. to be said at the several churches or shrines at which the procession stopped, occur in the Gothico-Gallican Missal (Lit. Gall. 266), and the Missale Gallicanum Vetus (376). The former also gives proper missae for each day (263–266); the latter part of a missa, headed "Incipit missa in Rogationibus" (377), which breaks off in the middle of the contestation. The heading implies that there was only one. There is only one in the Besançon rite (Mus. Ital. i. 335). Several early sermons preached on these occasions are extant, viz. two by Caesarius of Arles, A.D. 502 (De Letania, I. ii. in Append. ad Opp. Augustin. SS. 173, 174, ed. Ben.), one by an unknown bishop (ibid. Serm. 135), two entire by Avitus of Vienne, A.D. 490 (Opp. Av. 291, 296, Migne, lix.), and several fragments by the same author (303, 306, 310, 319, 322, &c.). [W. E. S.]

ROME, COUNCILS OF. Some preliminary remarks on these councils are necessary, from the prominent, yet constantly changing, position occupied by the see of Rome, from early times downwards, in the affairs of the church. First, whether from design or accident, their records have been about the worst preserved of any, the only voucher for the earliest being the Lib. Synodicus or Synodicon, by a Greek writer with Latin sympathies, in the 9th century, which, even if it can be trusted, is full of mistakes; and but incidental references in St. Cyprian, Eusebius, Rufinus, St. Jerome, or St. Augustine for the next early. Was it that their proceedings were so trivial, or of so little interest to the world in general, as to be not worth recording? or was it that they witnessed to a state of things which a later age may have wished forgotten? Secondly —whether from design or accident—there have been more synods alleged to have been held at Rome confessedly or probably spurious, than in all the rest of the world put together, their characteristic being that they have been forged in the papal interest directly, which is also the characteristic of a good many more fabled to have been held elsewhere. It may suffice to instance the three Roman synods under pope Silvester, as they are called (Mansi, ii. 551–4, 615–34, and 1081–4) of the first kind; the alleged canons and synodical letter of the genuine (ibid. 469–77), with the canons of the spurious (called 1 and 2 in the Pseudo-Isid. collection, where they may all be read and compared; Migne's Patrol. cxxx. 375–382) councils of Arles, all three betraying their late origin, of the second. How so patent a forgery can have deceived the learned so long is a marvel. The acts of the pretended council of Sinuessa (Mansi, i. 1249–60), damaging as they may seem to pope Marcellinus personally, were conceived in the interests of his see. Centuries upon centuries have to elapse before we come upon a really genuine Roman synod, with tolerably full details from Roman archives. One thing they all testify to beyond doubt, whether true or false, viz. that according to tradition of those days the bishop of Rome could decide nothing of importance without a synod, any more than his brother bishops. Let us now inquire into their composition. This we shall find varied with the actual extent of jurisdiction of their presiding bishop. It was at one time commensurate with that of the city praefect, and was limited to the suburban churches; at another, it extended over the ten provinces of central and south Italy governed by the city vicar, but went no further, which was its position about the time of the Nicene council and for some time later [see that Art.]. Every now and then, indeed, it had a wider appearance; but this is at once seen to have been exceptional. All the earliest Roman synods are stated, in the Lib. Synodicus before-named, to have been synods of from 10 to 15 bishops, to which the "Concilium quindecim finitimorum episcoporum," in a rescript of Gratian and Valentinian to the then city vicar, may point (Mansi, iii. 629; comp. the letter of the Roman council immediately preceding, p. 624). Then, for a considerable period, their numbers increased, but seldom exceeded 70, which is about the number of sees stated in the old Vatican MS. printed by Baronius (A.D. 1057, n. 19–23; comp. De Marca, Concord. Sac. et Imp. i. 3, 12) to be dependent on Rome as their metropole; and also the number usually fixed upon for mythic synods. Every now and then higher numbers are reported, as has been said; and bishops outside those limits are found to have been present, but present exceptionally. There were three bishops, for instance, from France, named by Constantine, present at the synod which pope Miltiades or Melchiades, and Merocles (not Mark, see S. Opt. de Schism. Don. i. 23), bishop of Milan, held at his instance (Mansi, ii. 433–40). There was a large gathering under pope Damasus, A.D. 372, when Auxentius, bishop of Milan, was deposed. Its synodical letter, accordingly, runs in the names of Damasus and Valerian; the latter being bishop of Aquileia (ibid. iii. 455). The Sardican fathers had before this requested pope Julius to transmit their decisions to "the bishops of Italy, Sicily, and Sardinia" (ibid. 40). And he himself tells the Orientals that he speaks in the name of the Italian, and all the bishops of the "regions" (as the Latin has it) in which his see lay, as well as his own (ibid. ii. 1219). In both passages it is, of course, possible that the bishops of the seven provinces of north Italy may be included; but if so, this was exceptional, as the bishops of Aquileia, Milan, and Ravenna were still independent centres in those provinces, and proud of their independence. Nevertheless, in process of time not only they, but France, Spain, Great Britain, and Germany threw themselves one after another into the arms of the encroaching power, or else had to submit, till metropolitan boundaries, by widening their circle, became patriarchal, and synods, from being Roman or Italian, European (De Marca, ibid. c. vi. 4, and c. vii. 3–8, but with some corrections). We may now pass to the synods themselves.

Passing over three synods of the 2nd century reported in a work of no credit (Hefele, i. 83, Eng. tr.), we may start with the first given in Mansi from the Libellus Synodicus:—

1. A.D. 140, described as of twelve bishops under pope Telesphorus, when Theodotus the tanner was condemned. This is, however, a misstatement, for he was really condemned by pope Victor, A.D. 194–8, as Mansi points out (i. 662).

2. A.D. 165, of ten bishops under pope Anicetus and St. Polycarp, against those who kept Easter with the Jews (ibid. 686).

3. A.D. 197, under pope Victor; on the question of keeping Easter also (ibid. 725). There is a passing reference to this, indeed, in Euseb. E. H. v. 23; and perhaps 24 too.

4. Another, of fourteen bishops, under the same; condemning Theodotus, Ebion, and Artemon (ibid. 728).

5. Another under the same, condemning the errors of Sabellius and Noetus (ib d.), but which had not then arisen. Hence Mansi transfers it to the pontificate of Sixtus II., A.D. 258 (ibid. 1002).

6. A.D. 237, under pope Fabian, condemning Origen. For this, Rufinus and St. Jerome, besides Eusebius (H. E. vi. 36), are quoted; but their expressions are vague (ibid. 787).

7. A.D. 250, during a vacancy; being inferred from St. Cyprian, Ep. 31 (ibid. 805).

8. A.D. 251, under pope Cornelius, respecting the lapsed; inferred from St. Cyprian, Ep. lii. (ibid. 866), and at which Novatian was condemned. Some make two councils of this, but Mansi seems right (ibid. note) in considering it one and the same. True, the Lib. Synodicus says that it was attended by eighteen bishops (ibid. 871); on the other hand, Eusebius (E. H. vi. 43) expressly states there were sixty bishops present, and presbyters and deacons in still greater abundance. He states further, that at the end of the letter of Cornelius to Fabius of Antioch, now unfortunately lost, from which he was then quoting, the number of bishops attending it, with their names and sees, was set down. This agrees perfectly with what St. Cyprian says of it, and accounts for St. Jerome calling it an Italian council. But then St. Jerome speaks of a Roman synod as well (Mansi, ibid. 867–8). Probably, therefore, the Roman synod, composed of eighteen bishops, was joined by forty-two more from other parts of Italy before it separated. Cave begins his list (Hist. Lit. i. 157) with this synod, and it is certainly the most numerous and the best authenticated, as yet, of any synod of Rome.

9. A.D. 257, under pope Stephen; when the Africans, who had decided on re-baptizing heretics, were excommunicated (ibid. 931).

10. A.D. 260, under pope Dionysius; inferred from what St. Athanasius (de Sent. Dionys. § 13) says about his namesake of Alexandria being accused to him of Sabellianism (ibid. 1015).

11. A.D. 313, by order of the emperor Constantine, whose letter to Miltiades (or Melchiades), bishop of Rome, and Merocles, as we shall see presently, giving his reasons for it, is extant in Greek and Latin. Its Latin heading, according to one version, is "Constant. Aug. Melchiadi episcopo Romano hierarchae;" in another, for "hierarchae," we read "et Marco sanctissimo," taken evidently from the Lib. Synodicus. In Euseb. (E. H. x. 5), it is Μιλτιάδῃ ἐπισκόπῳ Ῥωμαίων καὶ Μάρκῳ, where the true reading is unquestionably Μερόκλει, for the reason supplied by Optatus. He tells them—using the plural number—that Caecilian is to set sail for Rome, with ten bishops from among his foes, and ten from among his friends. Further, that three bishops of France—Reticius, Maternus, and Marinus—have orders to be there likewise, to assist them in hearing their case, as the law directs. The Donatists, we learn from St. Optatus, had petitioned that their case might be tried by bishops selected from France. St. Optatus continues, "So there were judges given them in the persons of Maternus of Cologne, Reticius of Autun, and Marinus of Arles. These three bishops came from France, with fifteen more from Italy. They met in the house of Fausta, at the Lateran, in the fourth consulship of Constantine, and the third of Licinius, on Friday, Oct. 2; when there were present—Miltiades bishop of Rome, Reticius and Maternus and Marinus from France, and Merocles from Milan, Florian from Cesena, Zoticus from Kintzen, Stennius from Rimini, Felix from Florence, Gaudentius from Pisa, Constantius from Faenza, Proterius from Capua, Theophilus from Benevento, Sabinus from Terracina, Secundus from Praeneste, Felix from Cisterna, Maximus from Ostia, Evandrus from Urbino, Donatian from Cales. Before these nineteen bishops, when they had taken their seats, was the cause of Donatus and Caecilian laid. Those sentences were given against Donatus by each: 'That he had confessed to having re-baptized, to having imposed hands on lapsed bishops, which is not the wont of the church.' Witnesses produced by Donatus having confessed that they had nothing to say against Caecilian, he was pronounced innocent by the sentences of all the above-named, not excepting even Miltiades, whose sentence, delivered in these words, closed the trial. 'Whereas it has appeared that Caecilian is not accused, on their own shewing, by those who came with Donatus, nor has been convicted on any count by Donatus himself, I am of opinion he fully deserves to be retained in the communion of his church, and in his own proper grade.' Yet, notwithstanding his own condemnation by so many voices, and the acquittal of his rival by a tribunal so grave," continues the bishop of Milevis, "Donatus appealed from these bishops" (De Schism. D. i. 23). Finally, that this led to the summoning of the council of Arles by Constantine two years later, we learn from himself (Euseb. ibid. Ep. ad Chrest.; comp. St. Aug. Ep. 43 and 88, ed. Ben.).

These details deserve to be recorded at length for their decisive character, and the unimpeachable testimony on which they rest. We learn from them (1) that it was Merocles, bishop of Milan, to whom Constantine wrote jointly with Miltiades; (2) that this synod was due to their joint action, under orders from him, which accounts for bishops from north as well as central Italy being there; (3) that if bishops from Africa and France were present, it was because they had been sent thither by him; (4) that each of the bishops present delivered his sentence; and if proceedings are said to have been closed on the bishop of Rome delivering his last of all, like St. James at Jerusalem—the council being held in his see—it is also true that Donatus appealed, and was allowed to appeal, from his sentence. Vales. (de Schism. Don. c. 7) confirms this, instead of disproving it by his quotations; but the authorities are best seen in Galland. (Bibl. Vet. Pat. v. 461–675); and in none of them is there the least countenance for the statement in Mansi (ii. 434), that Constantine appointed judges, "eâ lege, ut citra scitum, consensum, et auctoritatem Romani Pontificis constituti judices nihil definiant;" or for Hefele's (i. 179) that "the decision of this synod was proclaimed by its president the bishop of Rome, and communicated to the emperor."

The three spurious synods under pope Silvester are omitted here; but the acts attributed to them may be studied, as curiosities, in Mansi (ii. 551–4, 600–618, and 1081–4). The earliest references to them being in the reign of Charlemagne, they could not have been forged much, if at all, earlier.

12. A.D. 342, commonly called the third under Julius. But the first and second, given by Mansi (ii. 1269 and 1351), are fictitious. At this, St. Athanasius, having been heard in his defence by fifty or more bishops with pope Julius at their head, was, with Marcellus and other exiled bishops, admitted to communion. The letter of Julius, written at the request of the council to announce this to the Easterns, is extant in Greek and Latin (Mansi, ibid. 1359; comp. St. Athan. Apol. c. Arian. §§ 20–36, and Sozom. iii. 8; and Vales. Observ. in Soc. et Soz. i. 4, 5).

13. A.D. 349, when Ursacius and Valens embraced the communion of St. Athanasius, and were themselves admitted to communion by Julius, having satisfied the council of Milan, two years before, of their faith and sincerity (Mansi, iii. 163–70).

14. A.D. 352, under Liberius, on becoming pope; when he declared for or against St. Athanasius. The common account that he declared for him is mainly based on his letter to the emperor Constantius, extant in the 5th fragment of St. Hilary, and admitted on all hands to have been written A.D. 354. But if the letter ascribed to him in the preceding fragment is genuine and rightly placed, he renounced his communion some time before. Then, in that case, the reference contained in it to a letter written by those he was then addressing to his predecessor, Julius, and not to himself, would point manifestly to its having been written soon after his accession; and this, again, would explain its apparent inconsistency with the other. For if there was a difference of two years between them in those exciting days, there was abundance of time for all the further correspondence mentioned in his letter to the emperor to have taken place, and also for Liberius to have changed his mind again and again in the interval. Lastly, from the character of the comments appended to this letter of the 4th fragment, we can hardly doubt its having been placed there by St. Hilary; and if so, cadit quaestio, Liberius must have signalised his accession, as well as his restoration, by condemning St. Athanasius. Mansi (iii. 208 and 229) shrinks from committing himself on either side.

15. A.D. 358, on the restoration of Liberius, if at all, the account given of it by Baluze being inconsistent with all we know of Felix and his retirement from other sources. (1) St. Athanasius, it is well known, likens his ordination to the deeds of Antichrist (Hist. ad Monach. 775). (2) It is admitted on all hands that, at the time of his appointment, Acacius of Caesarea was his friend; and that, whether orthodox or not, himself, he held communion with those who were not (Soc. ii. 37; Soz. iv. 11; Theodor. ii. 17). (3) It is nowhere stated that he was ejected by Constantius. He remained there by all accounts, on the contrary, till the return of Liberius, when, Socrates says, he was turned out of the church, in spite of the emperor, by the people (ib.); Theodoret and Philostorgius, that he removed elsewhere (ib. and iv. 3); Sozomen, that he shortly died (iv. 15). In short, the story reported by Baluze (Mansi, iii. 290) finds its best pendant in the story reported by Mansi farther on (ibid. 339–44).

16. A.D. 364, occasioned by the arrival of deputies from various Macedonian synods, professing the Nicene faith; when the synodical letter of Liberius and the Western bishops, extolling the Nicene faith and their adherence to it, preserved by Socrates (iv. 12), was penned in reply. There is no mention, however, in either document of St. Athanasius (Mansi, iii. 377–80). The letter addressed by Liberius to the bishops of Italy, with theirs to the Illyrians, wrongly supposed by Pagi to have emanated from a Roman synod under Damasus (ad Baron. A.D. 369, n. 5), would seem from expressions in this synodical to have been sent earlier (St. Hilar. Fragm. xii. ed. Ben., with the note).

17. A.D. 366, called the first under Damasus, who was elected this year; and in it with 28 bishops is said to have condemned Valens and Ursacius, and if the biographer of Eusebius, the presbyter who withstood Liberius, is to be believed, Liberius also (Mansi, iii. 447).

18. A.D. 367 (al. 369), called the second under Damasus; who was, according to his biographer, acquitted in it by 44 bishops of a charge of adultery brought against him by two deacons, Concordius and Callistus, his accusers being condemned.

19. A.D. 372 (al. 369), or the third under Damasus; in which Auxentius, bishop of Milan, was deposed. As Mansi points out, the synods of Antioch and Rome, with their dates, are much confused about this time (iii. 463-8). This, he thinks with Pagi, took place A.D. 372. It was attended by 90 bishops from Italy and France, as Theodoret (ii. 22), or by bishops of many nations, as Sozomen says (vi. 23). But according to the letter of Valentinian, Valens, and Gratian, to be mentioned presently, two synods really met on this occasion, one in Rome and the other in France. Thus, the probability would be that the bishops present from France were deputies from their own synod. Again, its synodical letter, addressed to the bishops of Illyria, runs in the name, not of Damasus alone, but of Valerian as well; the latter being bishop of Aquileia. Further, the person sent with this same letter to the Easterns was a deacon, not of the church of Rome, but of Milan, and the title given to it in the copy which is thus addressed, "Exemplum synodi habitae Romae episcoporum xciii. ex rescripto imperiali" (ap. Luc. Holsten. Coll. Rom. p. 165), suggests its having been convened by the emperor, like that of A.D. 313. It was in every way, therefore, more of an Italian than of a Roman council; yet not more so than the gravity of the case would explain, the accused being no less a personage than the bishop of Milan. The subject also to which its synodical letter is devoted is the consubstantiality of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, as affirmed by the Nicene fathers. Attention had been forcibly directed to this subject, in the well-known letter of the Alexandrian synod under St. Athanasius, ten years before; but it was revived now, as Sozomen says, with special reference to the Holy Ghost (vi. 22). The letter of this council, addressed, in the first instance, to the bishops of Illyria, was conveyed to them by Elpidius, and elicited an energetic appeal on their part to the Eastern bishops, to which the rescript already noticed, running in the name of the three emperors, lent additional force (both misplaced in Mansi, iii. 385-92). But the same letter was also carried into the East direct from Rome by the Milanese deacon Sabinus, as has been said. And there, Mansi thinks, a synod at Antioch under Meletius replied to it at once; but Antioch was tight in the grasp of Valens at that moment, and for the next six years, as has been shewn elsewhere (CONSTANTINOPLE, COUNCILS OF, 4), and Meletius in exile, so that no synod under Meletius was then possible. Yet for all that, the mission of Sabinus was even then, probably, not lost upon Antioch; but, on the contrary, seems to have just helped to decide the movement, which resulted in the additions, afterwards accepted at Constantinople, to the Nicene creed (ibid.).

20. A.D. 374, or the fourth under Damasus; at which, says Mansi (iii. 467), Lucius, the rival of Peter, bishop of Alexandria (Soc. iv. 21-2), was condemned.

21. A.D. 378-9 (al. 373-5), or the fifth under Damasus; attended also by Peter of Alexandria, when Apollinarianism was condemned (Mansi, iii. 477). The circular of Damasus announcing this is given by Theodoret (v. 10; comp. Sozom. vi. 25). There was another, and vastly more dogmatic as well as important, letter addressed by him to Paulinus of Antioch (Pagi thinks at a council distinct from this—Mansi, ibid. 501-4) about the same time; perhaps owing to the continued banishment of Meletius, in which we are told particularly by Sozomen (vi. 7 and vii. 3) Paulinus was not involved; though Theodoret, in inserting it, says Paulinus was himself then at Thessalonica (v. 11). But whether he was or was not there, this letter found its way to Antioch at last, where it was accepted in full council by Meletius and 146 bishops, A.D. 379-80, on his return from exile; and is, in all probability, "the Western tome" classed with the rulings of that council in the fifth Constantinopolitan canon (misplaced by Mansi, iii. 461-2, but restored afterwards, 511-12). Meletius and his colleagues, in their answer to it, evidently refer to the mission of Sabinus at the commencement of his exile, A.D. 372 (ibid.). Lastly, the curious letter purporting to have been addressed by a Roman council to the emperors Gratian and Valentinian, without any mention of Valens, on the subject of the continued intrigues of Ursinus and his party, may have emanated also from this council (ibid. 624, with the imperial rescript, 627).

22. A.D. 381, the sixth under Damasus, and subsequently to the Aquileian council of that year, as Mansi says (ibid. 633); when the invitation to the Eastern bishops, mentioned by them in their synodical of the year following, was despatched [CONSTANTINOPLE, COUNCILS OF, (4) p. 436].

23. A.D. 383, or the seventh and last under Damasus; at which the synodical letter of the Easterns just mentioned was received, and the faith of the council of Constantinople confirmed, and at which deputies from the East assisted (Mansi, ibid. 639-42).

24. A.D. 386, under pope Siricius (comp. Synod of Telepte); when nine canons were passed, says Pagi (ibid. 678), there being a synodical letter extant, as from that pope, to the bishops of Africa, containing nine canons, and dated "Rome in a council of 80 bishops, Jan. 6 (sub die octavâ Idus Januarii, post), after the consulship of Arcadius and Bauton" (ibid. 669-71). But this, and several other expressions contained in it, and in more than one of its canons, go far to establish its fictitious character; so that its ninth canon (on clerical continence), instead of having dictated the second canon of the council of Carthage, A.D. 390 (ib. 692), as Mansi thinks (ib. 687), may rather have been borrowed from it or made to suit it. [See arts. COUNCIL OF SARDICA and COUNCIL OF TELEPTE.]

25. A.D. 390, when Siricius with his clergy condemned Jovinian and his followers, as he says himself (Mansi, ibid. 563-4; comp. 687).

26. A.D. 400, when pope Anastasius addressed the letter to the African bishops, mentioned in canon 65 of their code (ibid. 1019; comp. 770).

27. A.D. 417, under pope Zosimus, on his accession, in the church of St. Clement, as he tells us himself in his letter to the African bishops, recommending to their favourable consideration the profession which Celestius the Pelagian had then submitted to his (Mansi, iv. 350 and 371).

28. A.D. 418, if at all; at which, according to Mansi, pope Zosimus issued his encyclic, called "Tractatoria" by Mercator, condemning Celestius and Pelagius (ibid. p. 375).

29. A.D. 430, under pope Celestine; on receipt of letters from Nestorius respecting some Pelagian bishops who had come to Constantinople, complaining that they had been deprived of their sees. But his own orthodoxy being impeached in communications arriving about the same time from St. Cyril, his opinions were scrutinised and condemned; and he himself was threatened with excommunication by the pope, unless he retracted his errors within ten days of receiving this sentence, which was to be communicated simultaneously to St. Cyril (Mansi, ibid. pp. 545–52 and 1021–36).

30. A.D. 431, under the same; on receipt of the summons of the emperors Theodosius Junior and Valentinian III. to the council of Ephesus convened by them, when bishops Arcadius and Projectus and a presbyter named Philip were sent thither to represent the pope. In the paper of instructions they received from him, they are told to look to St. Cyril for guidance, and to follow his lead. But of his representing the pope conjointly with them there is not a word (Mansi, ibid. pp. 555–6). In the communications that passed between themselves on the subject the pope certainly delegated his own full powers to St. Cyril (ibid. p. 1301); but this was exceptional, no such delegation ever occurring before or since, and it is explained, probably, by the accused having been bishop of new Rome (comp. EPHESUS, COUNCIL OF).

31. A.D. 433, under pope Sixtus III., "le 31 juillet, pour l'anniversaire de son ordination," say the authors of L'Art de vérif. les Dates: "Il y reçut la nouvelle de la paix entre St. Cyrille et les Orientaux." Thus much, indeed, we learn from his own letters to John of Antioch and St. Cyril (ap. Baron. A.D. 433, n. 13 and 18). But how comes it that nothing further is added of a synod of this same year? whose acts, said to have been collected by Sixtus himself, fill seventeen columns in Mansi (v. 1161–78), but whose true character Pagi describes as follows:—"Acta synodi Romanæ de causâ Sixti III. Pontificis Romani stupro accusati . . . . falsâ consulum notâ consignantur, et anachronismis scatent . . . ejusdem farinæ sunt acta de synodali accusatione et expurgatione Polychronis episcopi Hierosolymitani, quæ sub pontificatu Sixti III. Romæ dicuntur habita. . . . Refertur quidem accusatio et purgatio Sixti III. in libro Anastasii, sed cum in eo aliæ fabulæ recitentur, utraque historia suspectæ fidei haberi debet" (ad Baron. ibid. n. 31).

32. A.D. 444, under pope Leo I., who gives more than one account of it himself, against the Manichees. (Mansi, vi. 459.)

33. A.D. 445, under the same, at which Celidonius, bishop of Besançon, was restored, and St. Hilary, metropolitan of Arles, who had deposed him, deprived of all jurisdiction over the province of Vienne for the future. A special edict was obtained subsequently by the pope from Valentinian III., confirming this sentence. (Mansi, ib. p. 463; comp. v. 1243–54.)

34. A.D. 447, under the same, at which it was ordained, with reference to some complaints which had reached him from Sicily, that no bishop should alienate the goods of his church in future without the full consent of his clergy. (Mansi, ib. p. 493; comp. v. 1313–16.)

35. A.D. 449, under the same, at which the acts of the robber-council of Ephesus, as it was called (Latrocinium), were rejected. (Mansi, ib. p. 509.)

36. A.D. 450, when the same pope besought Valentinian III., then present in Rome, to write to Theodosius Junior, and get a general council convened, at which the late proceedings of the robber-council might be reversed. (Mansi, ib. p. 511.) This, in all probability, was the council to which the Liber Synodicus refers, though Mansi thinks otherwise (ib.).

37. A.D. 451, at which, probably, the synodical letter of the Chalcedon was received, informing the pope of all that had been done there (the date assigned to it is Nov. 1; see Mansi, vi 145). That he confirmed or accepted it all is a pure fiction of the Liber Synodicus (Mansi, vi. 869–72), flatly contradicted by his persistent opposition to the 28th canon; and it is even doubtful whether the second form of the creed (that of Constantinople), authorised there, was ever regarded by him with the same favour as the first (that of Nicæa). Mansi considers two canons were passed here to which the pope refers, as having been discussed at a late synod, in one of his many letters; but it is by no means clear when that letter was written, or to whom (ib. comp. vi. 385–92). The authors of L'Art de vérif. les Dates make the year of the synod to which he refers A.D. 458.

38. A.D. 465, under pope Hilary, to consider a dutiful address from the metropolitan and bishops of Tarragona, relative to two bishops of that province; one whom they wanted to ordain, and the other to depose. No doubt the thing most intended to be gathered from their proceedings was the glorification of their metropolitan and of the pope. But neither the submissive tone of their letters, nor the shouts of applause that interrupted them, as they were read out; nor yet the shouts of applause with which the five canons proposed by the pope for regulating their case were received; nor, again, the character of the five canons which he grounded on them in his reply,—make for anything half so much, as against the genuineness of this synod, which was evidently concocted to serve a purpose; nor can its standing first of the papal decrees, added to the collection of Dionysius Exiguus by a later hand, be considered much of a presumption in its favour. (Migne, Patrol. lxvii. 315–20, where all the documents are given in succession, which they are not in Mansi, vii. 959–68; and then 924–29.)

39. A.D. 478, under pope Simplicius, when Timothy (the Weasel) of Alexandria, Peter (the Fuller) of Antioch, and others were condemned. Inferred by Pagi from the words of Felix III. his successor. (Mansi, vii. 1017–22.)

40. A.D. 483, under Felix III., at which a letter of remonstrance was sent to the emperor

Zeno for taking heretics under his protection and ill-treating the orthodox; and a citation to Acacius, bishop of Constantinople, for similar conduct to appear at Rome. (Ib. pp. 1105–10.)

41. A.D. 484, under the same, at which bishops Vitalis and Misenus, who had been sent to Constantinople with the despatches of the previous synod, and inveigled by Acacius on their arrival there, were excommunicated and deposed, and Acacius himself condemned. A synodical letter, giving an account of what had been done, was addressed, in the name of the synod, to the orthodox presbyters and archimandrites of Constantinople; but it must have been written by the pope himself. Forty-three bishops are stated at the end to have subscribed to it; but, if so, where were the rest of the sixty-seven or seventy-seven bishops who are stated to have met on this occasion? (Ib. pp. 1137–42.) Probably, the letter, as it stands now, is both mutilated and interpolated, and should be assigned with Pagi to the next synod.

42. A.D. 485, under the same: Peter the Fuller having been restored at Antioch, and Calendio driven out by the emperor Zeno at the instigation of Acacius, who was thereupon condemned a second time, and with him Peter the Fuller also, and Peter Mongus, who had been forced upon Alexandria. (Ib. pp. 1165–70.)

43. A.D. 487, or, as Mansi thinks, 488; under the same, to consider the case of the Africans who had lapsed under persecution. Six resolutions were passed, and are contained in the encyclic of Felix III. (Ib. pp. 1171–74. and 1056–59) of that date.

44. A.D. 494 (al. 496), under pope Gelasius, and attended by seventy bishops, whence the well-known decree, de libris recipiendis et non recipiendis, as it is called in some MSS., attributing it to him (e.g. the catalogue made, A.D. 831, for the abbey of St. Requier, in Dach. Spicel. ii. 31, ed. Baluze), is said to have issued; being in others attributed to pope Damasus, a predecessor, or Hormisdas, a successor of Gelasius. But by Pearson (Vind. Ign. c. 4), and Cave (Hist. Lit. s. v. Gelasius), it has been pronounced spurious, and doubtful by Beveridge (Cod. can. Eccl. prim. c. 9). Yet the strongest arguments against its genuineness have not been so fully developed as they might have been. (1) Its upholders are not agreed in what year or under what pope it was held, as Pagi confesses (ad Baron. A.D. 494, n. 19). (2) It is not included among the decrees of Gelasius by Dionysius Exiguus, who only just missed seeing him, and expresses great personal veneration for him in his preface (ap. Migne, Patrol. lxvii. 231). (3) Neither is it included in the later appendix to his collection, which ends with Gregory II., or A.D. 731, and supplements the decrees of three popes, anterior to Gelasius, that are not found in Dionysius. (4) Neither is it placed in any MSS. among the decrees of Gelasius, but always either last of all, or in a distant corner by itself. (5) Neither is it quoted or mentioned by any writer before Charlemagne, who disputes the sanction given in it to the acts of pope Silvester with the pope of his own day, Adrian I. (Lib. Carol. ii. 13; ap. Migne, Patrol. xcviii. 1078; comp. art. SECOND NICENE CREED). (6) MSS. are divided on some points of importance, as to what it contains, e.g. whether its list of apocryphal works included the Apostolical Canons, or not. As far back as the 9th century, there were men who denied this, Dionysius having included them in his collection, and popes cited them approvingly before and since. Nevertheless, they are found in some MSS. on that list still. (Beveridge, as above.) Another point is, whether among its general councils, that of Constantinople was included or not. In most MSS. it is left out, but it is included in some. To this conflict of MSS Mansi considered at first he need make no reference; but in his Supplement he admits his readers to full view (viii. 151–72). (7) The omissions and commissions of its acknowledged contents alone should have condemned it long since. It classes writings under three heads i. Biblical; ii. Patristic; iii. Apocryphal. Under the first head, as Cave says: "Autor decreti se S. Hieronymum in omnibus sequi profitetur. . . . Jam verò Hieronymo in definiendo S. Scripturae librorum canone e diametro repugnat." The second head opens with a declaration (taken in substance from the third decretal of Anacletus, and the preface to the Nicene Council, in the Pseudo-Isidorian collection) on the prerogatives of the sees of Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch, and the precedence belonging to each, making no mention of Constantinople among sees, nor, according to most MSS., of the council of Constantinople among general councils, on which it descants next. After them, a list of the fathers follows, whose works are to be received; and from this, to say nothing of other subsequent omissions, the apostolical fathers, one and all, are left out, though midway in it we read: "Item actus beati Silvestri, apostolicae sedis praesulis; licet ejus qui conscripsit nomen ignoretur;" and this is preceded and followed by other documents of the same stamp. Finally, the third head of apocryphal and rejected works includes the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius, the works of Tertullian, Lactantius, Africanus, St. Clement of Alexandria, Victorinus, and others—names which speak for themselves. To give pope Gelasius his due, we may fairly say that if only the letters assigned to him in the Dionysian collection are genuine, this decree could not have been, by any possibility, dictated or penned by him. All the evidence of his connexion with it is comprised in the twofold circumstance, that most MSS. containing it have his name prefixed to it; and all the last name figuring in it, that of Acacius of Constantinople. But Acacius died three years before Gelasius became pope, and was only condemned by him as having been condemned, and never absolved, by his predecessors. Perhaps those turgid expressions of pope Hormisdas on which Pagi relies, may have suggested its composition, to somebody who could find no work of that kind extant, but thought there should be. (Mansi, viii. 145–76, part of which has been antiquated.)

45. A.D. 495, under the same, when Misenus, one of the two bishops who had been sent to Constantinople by Felix III., and been excommunicated for misconduct there, is said to have been absolved (Mansi, viii. 177–86). This, again, has no place given to it among the genuine decrees or letters of Gelasius, even in Mansi; neither is it found in the Pseudo-Isidorian collection. As far as form is concerned, it is an exact counterpart of the reputed synod under pope Hilary, A.D. 465, described above.

46–51. A.D. 499–505, under pope Symmachus. There are no less than six synods attributed in Mansi to this pope; but their dates, number, and acts are both hopelessly confused and variously assigned. Not one of them is given by Dionysius Exiguus, who might have witnessed them all; only the first three are given in the appendix to his collection; for the remainder our sole voucher is the Pseudo-Isidore. Theodore, the reader, a Greek and contemporary, mentions but one, viz. the second; the author of the Lives of the Popes but two, viz. the second and the fourth. To understand them properly, we must recall the facts. Laurence, one deacon, was consecrated pope on the same day by his party, that Symmachus, another deacon, was by his; and Theodoric the Arian as well as Gothic king, resident at Ravenna, was invoked by each more than once to decide between them, so that of turbulent gatherings on both sides there was probably no lack; and Symmachus gaining the day, embellished accounts would be written of his subsequently, to enhance their importance and to swell their number. There is a strong family likeness between them all and the last under Gelasius, in point of form. In Mansi they stand as follows:—

(1) A.D. 499, when five canons respecting papal elections are said to have been decreed, amid repeated plaudits (viii. 229–38).

(2) A.D. 501, at which Theodore, says Theodoric, Anastasius says Symmachus, constituted his rival Laurence bishop of Nuceria (ib. 245–9).

(3) A.D. 502, at which a late edict of king Odoacer, approved by pope Simplicius, ordaining that no episcopal elections should be held in future without concurrence of the civil magistrate, and that all alienations of church property by the bishop of the diocese should be void, was annulled (ib. 261–72).

(4) A.D. 503, called, from a door in the church of St. Peter of that name, palmaris; and occasioned by a reaction in favour of Laurence; when 115 bishops declared Symmachus innocent of the crimes laid to his charge, and condemned Peter, bishop of Altino, whom Theodoric had appointed arbitrator in the renewed schism, together with Laurence himself. Ennodius, bishop of Ticino, drew up a lengthened apology for the acts of this synod, which is still extant (ib. 271–94; and for the rest, 247–62).

(5) A.D. 504, confirming the acts of the previous synod, and commending the apology for it by Ennodius in high terms (ib. 295–303).

(6) A.D. 505, at which all who had possessed themselves of any goods belonging to the church, were to be anathematised unless they restored them (ib. 309–16).

52. A.D. 518, under pope Hormisdas; for ending the schism between the churches of Rome and Constantinople, which began with Felix III. and Acacius, and had lasted thirty-five years (Mansi, ib. p. 579). The negotiations and terms at last agreed upon may be read among the letters of pope Hormisdas (ib. pp. 434–52).

53–55. All said to have been held A.D. 531, under pope Boniface II., yet there is a suspicious character about them all. (1) No decrees of this pope are given in the appendix to Dionysius Exiguus; and but one by the Pseudo-Isidore, which proves its own spuriousness (Mansi, ib. pp. 731–35). (2) The sole authority for the first and second of these synods is Anastasius, or whoever wrote the Life of this pope; and the reason given for them is, that at the first he constituted a deacon named Vigilius his successor; at the second he annulled his own act, as contrary to the canons (comp. the alleged letter of pope Silverius on the subject; Mansi, ix. 6, and another alleged synod under Boniface III. below). (3) For the third, which was only brought to light in modern times, there is no authority whatever, apart from the MS. containing it, any more than there is for a synod of Constantinople, which is there said to have led to it. The heading given it in Mansi, which was made for it by the discoverer of the MS. as he owns himself—Lucas Holstenius, prefect of the Vatican—and explains fully the interest attached by him to its discovery, runs as follows: —"Concilium Romanum III., quo lecti sunt libelli a Stephano Larissae metropolitano transmissi, atque prolatae e scrinio sedis apostolicae complures epistolae, quibus constat, quamvis in toto mundo sedes apostolica ecclesiarum sibi jure vindicet principatum, specialem tamen in ecclesias Illyrici gubernationem sibi vindicasse" (ib. pp. 739–84). Not one of the papal epistles given in it occurs in Dionysius Exiguus; and the first in his collection to bear them out is one addressed to Anastasius, bishop of Thessalonica, by Leo I. (Migne, Patrol. lxvii. 291–6), whose letters come last here.

56. A.D. 534, under pope John II., where the proposition—"Unus e Trinitate passus est in carne" — was approved, notwithstanding its previous rejection by pope Hormisdas, and the opposition made to it by the monks called acoemeti by the Greeks. (Mansi, ib. p. 815.)

57. A.D. 589, under pope Pelagius II., unless the genuineness of his letter, in which he speaks of it, is to be given up. But the only reason for questioning it is the interesting information it contains, about the prefaces then used in his church. Particulars of them having been asked of him by the German and French bishops, he says, after consultation with his synod, in reply: "Invenimus has novem praefationes in sacro catalogo tantummodo recipiendas, quas longa retro veritas in Romanâ ecclesiâ hactenus servavit:" viz. one for the first Sunday after Easter—no doubt, that of Easter repeated; one for the Ascension; one for Pentecost; one for Christmas; one for the Transfiguration; one for festivals of the Apostles; one for holy Trinity; one for holy Cross; and one for Lent. The grounds on which Pagi and Bona would discredit this statement are far from conclusive. (Mansi, ix. 1021.)

58–61. Four synods appear to have met under pope Gregory I.; at least Mansi gives four.

(1) A.D. 590, at the request of the emperor Maurice, to end the schism that had ensued on the condemnation of the three chapters at the fifth council. (Mansi, x. 453.)

(2) A.D. 595, to hear a complaint made by John, presbyter of Chalcedon, against John, bishop of Constantinople, who had condemned him for heresy; he was pronounced innocent. (Ib. pp. 475–8.)

(3) A.D. 601, when a decree was passed interdicting episcopal interference with monasteries. It is signed by twenty-one bishops, fourteen presbyters, and four deacons. (Ib. pp. 485–90.)

(4) A.D. 601, when Andrew, a Greek monk, was condemned; and Probus, abbat of a monastery built and dedicated to St. Andrew by the reigning pope, received permission to make a will. (Ib. p. 489.)

62. A.D. 606, said to have been attended by seventy-two bishops, thirty-four presbyters, all the deacons and minor orders, under pope Boniface III., when a decree was made that no steps for the appointment of a successor in the see of Rome should ever in future be taken, till the previous pope had been buried three days. There is only the same authority for this synod that there was for two similar synods under Boniface II., which see (Mansi, x. 501).

63. A.D. 610, under pope Boniface IV., at which Mellitus, bishop of London, was accidentally present, and from which he returned with its decrees, as well as letters to king Ethelbert and archbishop Laurence, as we learn from Bede. But the genuineness of all now extant, purporting to be such, has been questioned on solid grounds by the learned editors of Spelman and Wilkins (Councils and Documents, iii. 62–9; comp. Mansi, x. 503–8).

64. A.D. 640, under pope Severinus, when the Ecthesis of the emperor Heraclius was condemned, as appears from a profession in the Liber Diurnus of the popes, where this pope is mentioned by name. (Mansi, ib. 679.)

65. A.D. 641, under pope John IV., at which the Monothelite heresy was condemned. (Ib. pp. 697–700.)

66. A.D. 648, under pope Theodore, when Pyrrhus, patriarch of Constantinople, was condemned as a relapsed Monothelite. (Mansi, x. 783–4.)

67. A.D. 667, under pope Vitalian, when John, bishop of Lappa in Crete, who had been deposed by Paul, his metropolitan, was restored. (Ib. xi. 101; comp. p. 16.)

68–70. A.D. 679–80, under pope Agatho. Three such are distinguished by Mr. Haddan and Professor Stubbs (Councils and Documents, iii. 131–41), the first of which consisted of seventeen bishops and thirty-five presbyters, and discussed questions relating to the English church, but without reference to Wilfrid; at the second, which consisted of fifty bishops and presbyters, the restoration of Wilfrid to his see was decreed, subject to its division among bishops of his own choice; at the third, which consisted of 125 bishops, and was held, in preparation for the sixth general council, against the Monothelites, Wilfrid took part as bishop of York, and signed on behalf of the British, Scottish, and Irish churches. The account of these councils in Mansi needs revising (xi. 179–88).

71. A.D. 685, under pope John V., but Anastasius alone records it; when the consecration of a bishop in Sardinia was annulled, as having taken place without leave from the pope. (Mansi, xi. 1092.)

72. A.D. 704, under pope John VI., at which Wilfrid was accused and acquitted a second time. The pieces relating to it are best seen in the new edition of Spelman and Wilkins (Councils and Documents, iii. 256–64; comp. Mansi, xii. 165–8).

73. A.D. 706, under pope John VII.—at least so says Anastasius—on receipt of a communication from the emperor Justinian II., requesting a decision on the quini-sext or Trullan canons, which this pope was too timid to give, and, according to his biographer, died soon after declining. Mansi makes no distinction between this synod and the previous one; but in that year Justinian had not been restored, nor John VII. become pope. (Ib.)

74. A.D. 710, if at all, for Mansi doubts it; the only document on record attributed to it being a speech of Benedict, archbishop of Milan, complaining of an uncanonical invasion of his metropolitan rights by pope Constantine. (Mansi, xii. 219–24.)

75–77. Three synods, according to Mansi, met under pope Gregory II.

(1) A.D. 721, when seventeen canons against illicit marriages and consulting of wizards were passed under anathema, and subscribed by twenty-three bishops, including the pope, fourteen presbyters, and four deacons. (Ib. pp. 261–8.)

(2) A.D. 724, when Corbinianus, bishop of Freisingen, who had petitioned the pope to be allowed to resign his see, was ordered to return to it. (Ib. pp. 267–8.)

3. A.D. 726, where the destruction of images ordered by the emperor Leo III., surnamed the Isaurian, was resisted and condemned (ib. pp. 268–70). The two letters of Gregory to this monarch best explain his own attitude (ib. pp. 959–82).

78, 79. Two synods under pope Gregory III. are given in Mansi, and this time not from Anastasius alone, his account being confirmed by two marble tablets in the Vatican crypts inscribed with their acts, though in a defaced state. The first of these sat in judgment, A.D. 731, on a presbyter named Gregory, who had been sent to Constantinople with an expostulatory letter from the pope to the emperor, which he had failed to deliver. At the request of the synod he was pardoned, and sent back with it. At the second, attended by ninety-three bishops and a large concourse, lay and clerical, a constitution was published, setting forth what had been the immemorial custom of the church hitherto respecting images, and excommunicating all who contravened it. A fresh remonstrance was despatched to the emperor, but with no better success. (Mansi, xii. 297–300.)

80, 81. Two synods under pope Zachariah are likewise given by Mansi. The first is dated the third year of the usurper Artabasdus, and the thirty-second of Luitprand the Lombard king (A.D. 743), both indicating the dawn of a new style. It passed fifteen creditable canons on discipline, but the subscriptions to it are not trustworthy (ib. 381–90; but a mistake runs here through the pagination). At the second, A.D. 745, two priests named Adalbert and Clement, having been condemned for heresy by St. Boniface in France, were deposed and anathematised. The proceedings against them are spread over three sessions, and the subscriptions to it include seven bishops, besides the pope, and seventeen presbyters. (Ib. pp. 373–82; it should be, 393–402.)

82. A.D. 753, under pope Stephen II., but it is marked doubtful by Mansi, and deals only with grants to monasteries (Mansi, xii. 567–70). Another, which he sees less reason to doubt, relating to a quarrel between Sergius, archbishop of Ravenna, and, according to Mansi, this pope, is placed by him four years later (ib. p. 655).

83. A.D. 761, under pope Paul I., granting privileges and exemptions to certain monasteries and churches built by him, as appears by his letter. (Ib. p. 660; comp. p. 646.)

84. A.D. 769, said to have been held at the Lateran, under pope Stephen III., when judgment was given against the late occupant of his see, Constantine, and the old traditions of the church respecting images upheld. Mansi makes much of what he considers the recovered acts of this council. The authors of L'Art de vérif. les Dates observe pithily: "La date en est singulière." It runs as follows: "In nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritûs Sancti; regnante unâ et eadem sancta Trinitate . . . mense Aprili, die 12mo, indictione 7ma;" and the acts which follow are commensurate (ib. pp. 703–22). Another, also said to have been held at the Lateran under pope Adrian I., A.D. 774 (which Mansi feels he has no option but to pronounce spurious, yet, "ne quid desit ad plenam de re conciliari notitiam," prints at full length), has this heading —epitomised from Sigebert—"in quâ Carolo Magno jus datum fertur a pontifice, ut pontificem ipsum Romanum et episcopos eligeret et investituram concederet." This and the "Sicilian monarchy" of a later pope may deserve comparison (ib. pp. 883–8). Another, A.D. 792, under the same, is reported by Mansi, when Felix, bishop of Urgel, the Adoptionist, abjured his heresy; but it is nowhere said that he did this in a synod, as Frobenius points out (Diss. de Haer. Elip. et Fel. § 22; ap. Migne, Patrol. c. 1, 312; comp. Mansi, xiii. 857).

85. A.D. 794, under the same, confirming the condemnation of Elipandus and Felix at the council of Frankfort. (Mansi, ib. p. 859; Froben. ib. § 39.)

86. A.D. 799, under pope Leo III., when a tract of Felix against Alcuin was condemned. (Mansi, ib. pp. 1029–32; Froben. ib. § 43.)

A new era was opened in church and state, as well for the West as for Rome, by the next synod, A.D. 800, when Charlemagne was solemnly crowned emperor on Christmas Day, in the church of St. Peter, by the reigning pope; but our limits forbid any further details of this synod. ROOD. There seems no satisfactory evidence that what is commonly understood by a rood, that is, a cross fixed aloft upon a beam or gallery in the middle of a church, is to be found within the period embraced in this work. It is, indeed, affirmed by Pugin (Glossary of Ecclesiastical Ornaments) that these crosses between the nave and choir of large churches, or the nave and chancel of small ones, are of great antiquity. The same is affirmed by the abbé Migne. But it will be found upon comparison that he has simply translated Pugin's remarks, and therefore cannot be accepted as independent authority.

The current statements on the subject may be conveniently taken from Migne (Encycl. Théolog.). It is affirmed by him that Georgius Codinus, one of the Byzantine historians of the 15th century, describes an ancient cross over a screen in the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople. He says that it was of gold, enriched with precious stones, and furnished with chandeliers. Migne quotes this writer in proof of the assertion that such crosses are "d'une haute antiquité," and assigns him, probably by a typographical error, to the 5th century, whereas he was really of the 15th century. But what is more serious, he gives no reference, and the present writer has been unable to verify the quotation. Yet it may be said with confidence that in his work Περὶ τῆς οἰκοδομῆς τοῦ ναοῦ τῆς Ἁγίας Σοφίας, Codinus certainly describes no such cross. The only cross which he there describes is the cross of the ciborium—a cross, it may be added, which corresponds with the one described above, both in its being of gold and in its adornment with jewels.

But all these quotations, whether in English or French works, are ultimately traceable to the great work of Goar (In Ord. Sacri Ministerii Notae, p. 19), who says, "Illum [sc. ambonem] qui in magnâ fuit ecclesiâ describit MS. Regium Codini verbis vulgaribus, τὸν δὲ ἄμβωνα μὲ [sic] τὴν σωλέαν ἐποίησεν μὲ σαρδονύχων et infra, ἐποίησε τὴν τροῦλλαν εἰς τ. ἄμβωνα μετὰ μαργαριταριων [sic, without accent] καὶ λυχνιταρίων. ὁ δὲ σταυρὸς τοῦ ἄμβωνος ἴστα λίτρας ρ', εἶχε δὲ κατὰ στυχνὰ λυχνιτάρια, καὶ μαργαριτάρια ἀπίδοτα· ἀντὶ δὲ στηθέων ὁ ἄμβων εἶχεν ἀνωθεν ὁλόχρυσα πετάσια." If this passage is correct, and if the information of Codinus, a comparatively late author, is to be relied upon, this citation obviously concludes the whole question.

But one or two observations must be advanced upon it. Goar quotes from a MS. copy of Codinus, without saying from which of his works the quotation is taken; but the passage is not to be found in the printed edition of Codinus, de S. Sophia, which is where it would naturally be expected (Corpus Scriptorum Historiae Byzantinae, Bonnae, 1849). There is, indeed (p. 142), a description of the ambo, which in some degree resembles the citation of Goar, but there is no account of a cross upon it (the cross described in that page is the cross of the ciborium), nor is there any notice of a variant in the reading amongst the critical notes of Meursius and Lambecius.

It may of course be some other work of Codinus, which Goar quotes; but the present writer has attempted in vain to find anything like it in any of the works of Codinus in the printed collection above referred to.

It may be added that there is no mention of the cross in the metrical description of the ambo of St. Sophia, which is given by Paul the Silentiary, though Ducange, in his commentary upon it, says that Codinus adds a mention of the cross

The classical work on the subject of rood-lofts is somewhat rare. (Thiers, Dissertations ecclésiastiques, Paris, 1688.) The only passage which this writer quotes is that from Goar, to which accordingly it seems that all the statements of the subsequent writers are to be traced.

The earliest notice of a crucifix set up in the middle of a church is sometimes said to be the account of the silver figure which pope Leo III. (A.D. 795) set up in the middle of St. Peter's at Rome. The account is thus given by Anastasius: "Ipse autem a Deo protectus venerabilis et almificus pontifex fecit in basilicâ beati Petri Apostoli nutritoris sui, in medio basilicæ crucifixum ex argento purissimo, pensan. libras septuaginta et duas." (Vitæ Pontif. Leo III. § 384, p. 1222, ed. Migne.) There is, however, nothing in the account given by Anastasius which leads to the conclusion that this crucifix was a rood in the sense that it was raised aloft upon a beam or gallery.

These two examples—the alleged description of Codinus and the remark of Anastasius—are the only two facts that are adduced to support the "great antiquity" of the rood. But it thus appears that neither of them is altogether free from taint; and the present writer has not succeeded in finding any evidence which would prove indisputably that ancient churches within our period had either cross or crucifix raised aloft upon a beam or gallery.

Migne states that every screen between nave and choir was anciently surmounted by a rich cross, but without image of our Saviour; that such screens existed both in Greek and Latin churches; that down to a comparatively modern epoch churches were never constructed without them, either in France, Germany, or Flanders; and that every church in England had a rood-screen down to the reign of Edward (VI.), when these crosses were destroyed by Act of Parliament. In all this, however, he is but adopting, and, in some respects, misunderstanding and spoiling, the previous remarks of Pugin.

Pugin (and after him Migne) observes that the cross over the screen was often suspended from the upper arcade of the church by three chains, which were often of very rich construction. But neither in this branch of the subject is there anything which brings it within the period traversed in this work.

There is abundant evidence that a gallery corresponding to the rood-loft or jubé existed in the early church. (See Prudentius, "Hymn of St. Hippolytus;" Gregory of Tours, who describes the jubé of the church of St. Cyprian; and pope Martin I., who had the canons of the Lateran council read from the rood-loft of that church.) Viollet-le-Duc, however, takes it for certain that the ambons of both Greek and Latin church up to the 14th century were not at all like what we understand by a rood-loft or jubé (Dictionnaire raisonné de l'Architecture, s. v. "Jubé"). But whatever may have been the precise form of the structures in question, there seems to be no satisfactory evidence that in the early centuries they were surmounted by a rood. Indeed, the earliest example which Viollet-le-Duc is able to adduce of a cross or crucifix placed above a trabes is one in the museum of Cluny, which dates from the 12th century.

[H. T. A.]

ROSARY (capellina, paternoster, preculae, psalterium), a device for numbering prayers. The early Eastern, and probably pre-Christian, custom might suggest a great antiquity. "The Kurân enjoins prayers five times a day, and good Muslims are very particular in going through certain prescribed forms morning, noon, and evening. It cannot, therefore, be matter of wonder that the use of rosaries (called tasbîh, 'praise,' and furnished with tassels called shonsa) is common among Indian Mohammedans. In all probability they were common among Hindus and Buddhists long before the Christian era" (Prof. Monier Williams in the Athenæum, Feb. 9, 1878). A rosary is called in Sanscrit Japamâlâ, "muttering chaplet," and sometimes smarani, "remembrance" (ibid.). Nevertheless, the rosary of the church of Rome is comparatively modern. Pius V., in a bull (1596), ascribes to St. Dominic the invention of "the rosary or psalter of the blessed Virgin," and this has been understood of the string of beads so called; but he seems rather to be speaking, under that name, of the method of devotion invented by St. Dominic (150 Ave Marias and 15 Paternosters). The beads are, however, described by Polydore Vergil 1499; but we should infer from his silence that they were not yet called a "rosary." "Est modus orandi postremo inventus per calculos ('globulos precatorios,' Transl. S. Norberti, xvii. 149, in Bolland. June, i. 911) ut ita dicam, ligneos, quos vulgus modo preculas, modo paternostros appellat." These he describes as pierced and threaded, ten smaller calculi for the Ave Marias being throughout followed by one larger for the paternoster, to the number of fifty-five altogether (De Invent. Rer. v. 9). The invention of this instrument he assigns to Peter the Hermit, who flourished in 1090. The number of beads may be due to Peter, but earlier in the same century we meet with a similar contrivance. Godiva, who, with her husband Leofric, founded the monastery of Coventry in 1040, possessed "circulum gemmarum quem filo insuerat, ut singularum contactu singulas orationes incipiens numerum non praetermitteret" (Gulielm. Malmesb. Script. post Bedam, 165, ed. 1596). The council of Cealchythe, A.D. 816, directs that on the death of a bishop "septem beltidum paternoster pro eo cantetur" (can. 10). This has been understood of a rosary for counting prayers; but Car. Macri (Hierolexicon, in v.) suggests that "beltides = vueltas" (Span. rounds, or returns), and the Bollandists accept his explanation (De S. Dominico, Aug. i. 432, 433). Another error ascribes the invention of rosaries to Bede, who died in 735; but apparently this is only a conjecture built upon his name (Boll. u. s.). Within our period, indeed, I meet with but one instance of a contrivance at all similar. Paul of Pherma, an Egyptian ascetic of the 4th century, "having prescribed him by rule 300 prayers, collected as many pebbles, which he kept in his bosom, and threw out one by one at every prayer" (Hist. Laus. Pallad. 23; Sozom. Hist. Eccl. v. 29; Cassiod. Hist. Tripart. viii. 1).

The origin and history of the "rosary" in both senses of the word are discussed at length in Acta Sanctorum, Bolland. de S. Domin. Conf. Praef. in V. Sæc. Bened. 125–128; and Conr. Schultingius, Bibliotheca Ecclesiastica, II. i. 64, Colon. Agripp. 1599. The latter (I. ii. 205) gives a list of earlier writers on the subject.

ROUND TOWERS. The round towers of Ireland have a character and literature of their own, and the many questions regarding them are still unsettled, though the ascription of the towers to Christian times and purposes now appears to be the more generally accepted. There are upwards of a hundred known to antiquaries, and of these about twenty are perfect. Two in Scotland, of which one (Brechin) is perfect and the other (Abernethy) a ruin, together with that attached to the gable of the old church at Egilshay in Orkney, are the only examples outside the ancient Scotia. All are built upon the same general plan, with little variety of detail: the complete tower at Devenish, in Lough Erne, may be accepted as the type. (See woodcut.)

(i.) The tower is a hollow circular column, from fifty to one hundred and fifty feet high, usually capped by a short pointed roof of stone. From the base, which is frequently of cyclopean masonry, and measures from forty to sixty feet in circumference, the tower is externally of ashlar or spawled rubble work, and tapers upwards towards the summit. Occasionally, as at Ardmore, it is belted with stringcourses, which are, however, entirely ornamental, and not connected with the internal floors. The wall is pierced for a single door, which is never constructed on the level of the ground, but from eight to fifteen feet above, and for windows, which are unfixed in position and number; the jambs of both the door and the windows always incline inwards towards the top. At a very short distance from the conical roof there are usually four, but sometimes more or fewer, windows, and all the windows in the tower have round, pointed, or square heads, but never a built arch.

Internally the tower is divided into stories, in number according to the height. The lowest is usually filled up with mould or masonry to or near the door-sill; the rest, usually on joisted floors and about twelve feet high, occupy the whole interior to the top. The rooms or stories could have been but dimly lighted, there being but one small window to each.

(ii.) For what purpose could towers of this kind have been built, and that in such numbers? This has been answered by many suggestions; e.g. that they were the temples of a primeval religion among the Cuthites (Keane, O'Brien), the pyreia of Phoenician, Persian, or other Eastern nations (Vallancey), bell-towers (Lynch), sepulchral monuments (Windele), Danish forts (Walsh, Molyneux, Ledwich), eremitic pillars (Harris), anchoret or penitential cells (Smyth), bell-towers, secondarily monastic strongholds (Petrie). There can be no doubt but that in the Irish Annals (as in the present day) the common name of the tower is Cloictheach, literally bell-house, and in some of them up to the present time the bells are hung. Yet the whole structure denotes a place of temporary refuge and defence in cases of sudden attack. In this view there is a propriety in both the general outline and the several details: the tall, compact, round pillar, with strong, often enlarged, base of solid building, or of great thickness in the wall, and with the door small and several yards above the foundation; the smooth external facing of stone, and the storied accommodation within; the small windows for ventilation and, at the top, also for observation, and the strongly-defended doorway. Into such a house of defence, which is always found among or near ecclesiastical buildings, or their known site, the monks could easily retreat for safety to themselves and the valuable goods of the church till the enemy had left, or other succour had come to the inmates' relief. The whole building is such as bespeaks a stern but passive resistance, and when the cloictheach was burned it was only the inner flooring that was destroyed. Its use as a bell-tower appears to be secondary, though some in later times may have been specially built for a Campanile, as they may also have been for other purposes.

(iii.) As to the age to which they belong, we may lay aside the ante-Christian views of Cuthite civilisation, of Eastern fire-worship and phallic symbolism, of Druidical rites, and celestial observations: so far as we can see, they were wholly unfitted for these purposes. They belong to the Christian period, and their erection is more or less traceable from the 6th (Reeves, St. Adamnan, 215, 216 n.) to the 13th century, especially from the 10th to the 12th. There appears to be no reason for our tracing either the work or the design to the Danes, who have given no proof of having possessed either elsewhere in northern Europe, although their ravages in Ireland may account for such means being so long retained for defence and safety. The clue seems all but lost to the origin of such erections. It may be that they are the remains of a British architecture which was banished from Britain by the entrance of the Saxons, and Petrie (Round Towers, 367) notices their resemblance to "the most ancient military towers subsequent to Roman times found in the British isles." Waring (Stone Monuments, &c.) would trace them to types still met with in Sardinia and Southern Europe. As originally built, or as subsequently renewed, they uniformly preserve the same general features, and are singularly unlike the oldest round tower on the Continent—that at St. Apollinare ad Classem, Ravenna, belonging to the 6th century. They are sufficiently accounted for as at first an Irish development which suited the monastic position in the midst of turbulent tribes and piratical invaders, and were persevered in, after their special need was past, as sacred and time-honoured forms of ecclesiastical architecture, possibly also of monastic precedence. The examples in Scotland are no doubt owing to the close connexion between the Christianity of new and ancient Scotia, yet, strange to say, the towers there are not in the country of the Scots proper, but in that of the Picts. Compare TOWERS.

RUBRIC. Literally, a direction or remark written in red letters. The word is borrowed from the phraseology of old Roman law-books, in which the titles, remarks, and sometimes leading decisions were written in red ink.

In the same way the regulations for the manner of performing the sacred offices of the church were called rubrics, and were commonly written in red characters to make them easily distinguishable from the text of the office itself. Anciently these rubrics were collected together, and only written in books compiled for that purpose, and known under various titles—Directory, Ceremonial (q. v.), Ritual, Ordo (q. v.). The oldest MSS. missals and early service-books are either entirely or almost destitute of rubrics. The Sacramentary of Leo (483) contains no rubrics. The first book of the Gelasian Sacramentary (494) contains sixty-seven, some of them very short; the second book has none; the third book has nine. The Gregorian Sacramentary, omitting those portions which are confessedly of a much later date, has twenty-six. Of the ancient offices printed in the second volume of Mabillon's Museum Italicum, a Gothic Missal of the 9th century has seven rubrics; a Frankish Missal of the 6th century has eight, the Canon having no rubrics at all; an uncial Gallican Missal, of uncertain antiquity, has six; a Gallican Sacramentary of the 7th century has eleven. The Stowe Missal (Irish, 9th cent.) has two rubrics in the vernacular.

Burcard, Master of the Ceremonies under Innocent VIII. and Alexander VI., at the close of the 15th century, was the first person who published together the order and the ceremonial directions of the Mass, in a Pontifical printed at Rome, 1485, and in a Sacerdotale published a few years later under Leo X. The obvious convenience of such a course outweighed the scruples which were felt in certain quarters about publishing before the laity, directions which it was only necessary for the clergy to know. Such books therefore multiplied rapidly; but it is beyond the scope of this work to trace their various editions, together with the changes and modifications which the Rubrics have from time to time passed through. RUGAE, a word of frequent occurrence in the Ordo Romanus, as well as in the Lives of the Popes under the name of Anastasius, as to the meaning of which there has been some considerable difference of opinion. Caesar Bullinger, looking at the supposed etymology of the word and not at the passages in which it is found, defined "rugae" to be streaks in marble or metal, or pipes or furrows ("canaliculos et sulcos") like wrinkles, or wrinkled and streaked plates of precious metals. Ducange, with an equal neglect of the actual use of the word, strangely connects it with the French rue, and explains it as the sacred path before the presbytery, "via in aede sacra ante presbyterium," by which the pope enters when about to celebrate Mass (Descr. Aed. Sophian. no. 73; Gloss. sub voc.). Mabillon, by a comparison of the places where the word occurs (Mus. Ital. tom. ii.; Comment. in Ord. Rom. pp. xxi. cxxxv.), has clearly demonstrated that by "rugae" are meant the metal "cancelli" or screens of the more sacred parts of a church, with their doors and gratings, and sometimes the lattice-work doors alone. In the larger and more sumptuous churches they were often made of silver or even of gold. The presbytery at St. Peter's was fenced in with silver "rugae," and the "confessio" with "rugae" of gold (Anastas. Steph. IV. § 284; Leo III. § 363). Sergius II. set up six pairs of aurichalchum (ibid. § 492). There were greater and lesser "rugae." Leo III. erected twelve "rugae majores" before the "secretarium" at St. Peter's (ibid. § 382). The larger were of very considerable weight. Those of silver placed by Paschal I. before the vestibule of the altar weighed 78 lbs. (ibid. § 447); those erected by the same pope at St. Maria in Domnica 60 lbs.; and by Leo III. at St. Andrew's 80 lbs. (ibid. § 368). The smaller ones were called "rugulae." The "rugulae," the "confessio" at St. Mary Major's set up by Paschal I., were of pure gold (ibid. § 447); those of Leo IV. at the entrance of the presbytery and "confessio" at St. Peter's, with the "cancelli," of silver; "rugulas de argento fusiles cum cancellis" (ibid. § 546). According to Mabillon, "rugulae" also signified the grated or latticed window-openings of the "confessio,"—"fenestellae," or "cataractae,"—by which the sacred tomb might be seen, and handkerchiefs or napkins [BRANDEA] pushed through to touch it [TRANSENNA].

The entrance of the "rugae" was kept by acoiytes ("acolythi qui rugam conservant," Ord. Roman.). At ordinations the person to be ordained deacon stood "ante rugas altaris" (ibid. viii. 3), and when ordained priest was taken outside the "rugae," "foras ruga saltaris" (ibid. 4). (Mabillon, u. s. p. cxxxvii. p. 85.) On Ash-Wednesday the pope's chamberlain left the chancel and passed through the "rugae" to distribute the ashes, and on Candlemas Day the pope went to them to distribute the tapers. On Palm Sunday the branches and leaves were thrown to the people through the apertures, "per foramina rugarum" (Mabillon, u. s. p. cxxxvii.; Ciampini, c. xiv. de Azymo). [E. V.

SABALLUM, SABHALL, SAUL, SAVAL (ZABULLUM), Irish name for a church of peculiar orientation, usually north and south. It originated in the tradition (as presented in an ancient Life of St. Patrick quoted by Ussher, Brit. Eccl. Ant. c. 17, Works vi. 406, and in the Lives of the same prelate published by Colgan, Tr. Thaum. pp. 23, 72, 124), that the barn of Dichu, his first disciple in Down, was the model of his first church, built in the field with which Dichu presented him, or perhaps was the church itself. It gave its name to the parish of Saul, co. Down, and, standing north and south, was adopted as the epynomus of all churches which deviated to a marked extent from the usual Eastern orientation. SABBATH. It will be the object of this article to give a brief sketch of the views taken in the earlier ages of Christianity of the Sabbath of the Jewish law, and of the degree and character of observance which has been attached to it in different ages and different branches of the Christian church—in fact, to take up the subject very much where it is left by the article SABBATH in the Dictionary of the Bible.

In relation to modern ideas, ascribing a sabbatical character to the Lord's Day, it is only necessary to refer here very briefly to what has been more fully shewn elsewhere, that the notion of a formal substitution by apostolic authority of the Lord's Day for the Jewish Sabbath, and the transference to it, perhaps in a spiritualized form, of the sabbatical obligation established by the promulgation of the Fourth Commandment, has no basis whatever, either in Holy Scripture or in Christian antiquity.

The Sabbath is invariably regarded as representative of the rigid Law, which has passed away; the Lord's Day of the freedom of the Gospel, which remains for ever. The ideas symbolized by the two days are constantly distinguished, not unfrequently contrasted. It is true that the Lord's Day, becoming the great weekly festival of Christianity, assumed something like the place of the Sabbath in the Jewish system, and demanded for its higher purposes of worship, joy, and thanksgiving, some measure of that rest from work so emphatically characteristic of the Sabbath. But the idea afterwards embodied in the title of the "Christian Sabbath," and carried out in ordinances of Judaic rigour, was, so far as we can see, entirely unknown in the early centuries of Christianity.

For the proofs of this assertion see LORD'S DAY. In the present article the reference is throughout to the true Sabbath (or Saturday) as distinguished from the Lord's Day; and to the extent of its survival in the observance of the Christian church.

(I.) It is of course clear from the New Testament that—as from the nature of the case we might have expected—the obligation to observe the Sabbath according to the Jewish law was never in any sense binding on Christians as Christians. St. Paul's words are absolutely decisive (Col. ii. 16, 17), "Let no man judge you in meat or in drink; or in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days: which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ." These words, written to the Colossians, in reference to the strange half-Gnostic (and perhaps Essenic) development which was the last form of Judaism, are, indeed, simply a clearer and more definite enforcement of the rebuke of the observation of "days and months and times and years," addressed to the earlier Pharisaic Judaism of Galatia (Gal. iv. 10).

How they were understood in the early church (in opposition to such Judaism as that of Cerinthus, who is expressly declared to have enforced the observation of the Sabbath) is shewn by the celebrated antithesis, μηκέτι σαββατίζοντες ἀλλὰ κατὰ κυριακὴν ζῶντες ("no longer keeping the Sabbath, but living in the spirit of the Lord's Day"), in Ignatius (ad Magn. ix.). If there was no transference of the sabbatical obligation to the Lord's Day—which, perhaps, might have been not unnatural, provided that Our Lord's teaching as to its nature was taken as a guide—much less could the Jewish Sabbath, as such, be considered as having any claim on the universal observance of Christians. St. Augustine's remarks on this matter may be taken as a fair type of the general teaching of the early church. He expressly distinguishes the Fourth Commandment from the rest, as being observed figuratively or in idea, not literally or in formal rule. For the Christian he recognises two kinds of sabbatical rest: first, a rest from the "old works" in this life; next, an eternal rest in heaven—the σαββατισμός which, according to the Epistle to the Hebrews (Heb. iv. 9), "remaineth for the people of God."* See Augustine, de Genesi ad Litteram, book iv. (vol. iii. 208), and Epist. ad Januarium (vol. ii. 203). The Sabbath, whatever may be decided on the controversy as to the existence of a patriarchal Sabbath, had become part and parcel of the Jewish law. Like circumcision and distinctions of meats, it had served its purpose as typical and preparatory. Now it had passed away.

(II.) But while the Jewish Sabbath could form no part of Christianity as such, yet, like other parts of the Mosaic law, it would endure in the actual practice of the Jewish Christians; in accordance with the apostolic principle, "Is any man called being circumcised? let him not become uncircumcised" (1 Cor. vii. 18), and the apostolic practice of St. Paul in his own case (Acts xix. 18, xxi. 24) and in the case of Timothy (Acts xvi. 3). We can hardly doubt that in the earliest days of the church the Christians, just as they were "daily in the Temple," so also kept the Sabbath with their Jewish brethren; while at the same time "they broke the bread at home," and, in this most solemn way as in others, kept the Lord's Day among their fellow-Christians. So long as Jewish Christianity lasted as a distinct phase, co-existing rather than coincident with the Christianity of the Gentiles, it would indeed view the Sabbath obligation under the light of Our Lord's teaching, in the spirit as distinguished from the letter, and with the limitations and mitigations which He assigned to it. But still it would preserve substantially the old sabbatical observance; while, at the same time, the new and greater sacredness of the peculiarly Christian ordinance of the Lord's Day would, in the first instance, coexist with it, and afterwards in all probability throw it into the shade. Now after no long period of existence Jewish Christianity, as such, gradually died out, especially after the fall of Jerusalem, destroying with the Temple the system of Judaic observance; when even the church of the holy city itself became in great degree a Gentile church, and a growing antagonism established itself between Judaism and Christianity. Henceforward, so far as sabbatical observance retained its strict Judaic form, and imposed itself as of universal obligation, it would be looked upon with suspicion. The Ebionites are spoken of by Eusebius (Eccl. Hist. iii. 27) as being half Jewish in the observance of the Sabbath, while they were half Christian in the observance of the Lord's Day. The council of Laodicea (A.D. 363) anathematizes as Judaizers "those who abstain from labour on the Sabbath," bidding them "honour rather the Lord's Day, and, if possible, abstain from labour on it as Christians" (οὐ δεῖ Χριστιανοὺς Ἰουδαΐζειν καὶ ἐν τῷ σαββάτῳ σχολάζειν . . . . τὴν δὲ κυριακὴν προτιμῶντας εἴ γε δύναιντο σχολάζειν ὡς Χριστιανοί). The enactment is important, not only in its attachment of the obligation of rest to the Lord's Day, but as shewing a formal antagonism to strict observance of the Sabbath as a day of rest, on the ground of its essentially Judaistic significance. Whatever the Sabbath was in the church, it was to be something wholly unlike this. Much in the same spirit the Pseudo-Ignatius (ad Magn. 9) distinguishes between the Jewish and Christian idea of sabbatical observance. "Let us not keep the Sabbath day after the Jewish manner, rejoicing in idleness, ... but spiritually, rejoicing in the meditation of the law, not in the rest of the body, admiring the workmanship of God;" and moreover infers that the keeping of the Sabbath was a preparation for the greater sacredness of "the Lord's Day, the day of the Resurrection, the royal festival, the highest of all days" (μετὰ δὲ τὸ σαββατίσαι ἐυρταζέτω πᾶς φιλόχριστος τὴν κυριακὴν, τὴν ἀναστάσιμον, τὴν βασιλίδα, τὴν ὑπάτην τῶν πασῶν ἡμερῶν). But while the formal sabbatical obligation was thus repudiated, as purely Judaistic, we find that in the Eastern church a distinct observance of the Sabbath remained, and remained so far in accordance with the old Jewish idea that (with one notable exception) it was always a festal observance.

* It is hardly necessary to refer to the extraordinary interpretation, noticed in the article SABBATH in the Dictionary of the Bible, which, against the whole context (as, indeed, against the whole tone of New Testament teaching), actually transforms this passage into an authority for quasi-sabbatical observance, as a law of the Christian church.

This is brought out most strikingly in the Apostolical Constitutions, in which the Sabbath and the Lord's Day are treated almost as coordinate. Thus (in ii. 59, 1) Christians are exhorted "on the Sabbath Day, and the day of the Lord's Resurrection, the Lord's Day, to gather together with special earnestness, sending up praise to God, Who made all things by Jesus Christ, and Who sent Him to us, and delivered Him to suffer, and raised Him from the dead." The different consecrations of the two days are still more clearly marked in vii. 23, 2: "Keep the Sabbath and the Lord's Day as feasts; for the one is the memorial of the Creation, the other of the Resurrection" (τὸ μὲν δημιουργίας ἐστὶν ὑπόμνημα, ἡ δὲ ἀναστάσεως). In vii. 36, 1, 2, there is an elaborate and beautiful prayer, bringing out the sacredness of the Sabbath: "O Almighty Lord, who didst create the world through Christ, and didst ordain the Sabbath as a memorial of creation, because in it Thou didst rest from Thy work . . . . Thou, O Lord, didst bring our fathers out of Egypt . . . . and didst give them the Law or Decalogue, spoken with Thy voice and written with Thy hand. . . . Thou didst command them to keep the Sabbath, not giving in this an excuse for idleness, but an occasion for godliness" (οὐ πρόφασιν ἀργίας διδούς, ἀλλ' ἀφορμὴν εὐσεβείας). . . . . "For the Sabbath is the rest from creation, the completion of the world, the seeking out of Law, the praise of thanksgiving to God for all that He gave to men." The same passage goes on to speak also of the peculiar and yet higher consecration of the Lord's Day. In viii. 33, 1, we have a command (in the names of St. Peter and St. Paul): "Let the servants work five days; on the Sabbath and the Lord's Day let them be free from labour in the church, with a view to the teaching of godliness." Whatever opinion we may form as to the genuineness and authority of these Constitutions (on which see APOSTOLICAL CONSTITUTIONS), it is at least clear that they represent to a very considerable extent the traditions of the Eastern church in the 3rd and 4th centuries. Thus the very Council of Laodicea, so sternly condemnatory of Judaizing sabbatarianism, yet in its forty-ninth and fifty-first canons marks out "the Sabbath and the Lord's Day" as days to be observed festally even during the fast of Lent. Everywhere the festal observance is very strikingly marked, and we note that the consecration of the Sabbath by the rest of the Creator is brought home to Christians by a constant reference to the creation as having been wrought "through Jesus Christ." From a canon (No. 16) of the Council of Laodicea, and from a passage in Socrates' Ecclesiastical History (vi. 8), it appears that on the Sabbath as well as the Lord's Day there were solemn assemblies for worship; and Gregory of Nyssa, upbraiding those who neglected the Sabbath assembly, asks, "With what face wilt thou dare to behold the Lord's Day, if thou hast despised the Sabbath?" "for" (he adds) "they are sister days." Accordingly in the Apostolical Canons (Canon 66) it is laid down, that "if any cleric be found fasting on the Lord's Day or the Sabbath, except the one (Easter Eve) alone, let him be deposed; if any laic, let him be excommunicated." The prohibition of this canon is illustrated by the extravagant declaration of the Pseudo-Ignatius, that "if any one fasts on the Lord's Day or the Sabbath, he is a murderer of Christ" (Χριστοκτόνος ἐστί). We may notice that this canon is appealed to in the "Trullan" (or "Quinisextine") Council, held at Constantinople in A.D. 685, in opposition to a custom at Rome of fasting on the Sabbaths in Lent, and it is decreed that over the Roman church also it should "most firmly prevail" (ἀπαρασαλεύτως κρατεῖν). From a well-known passage in Epiphanius (adv. Haer. Book I. Tom. III. vol. i. p. 304), we may conjecture that a special emphasis was given to the festal observance of the Sabbath by opposition to the heresy of Marcion, who is said to have bidden his followers fast on the Sabbath to signify their "repudiation of the God of the Jews" (ἵνα μὴ τὸ καθῆκον τοῦ Θεοῦ τῶν Ἰουδαίων ἐργαζώμεθα). But, however this may be, it is clear that a reverence was paid in the Eastern church to the Sabbath festival, only second, though of course markedly second, to the higher sacredness of the Lord's Day.

Nor was this festal observance confined to the Eastern church. The practice of fasting on the Sabbath in the Roman church is noticed by Tertullian, and condemned on the ground that only on the Great Sabbath should men fast (De Jejuniis, c. xiv.); but he seems to indicate that the practice was not invariable, and that it arose from a continuation of the Friday's fast ("cur jejuniis paraseveen dicamus? quanquam vos etiam Sabbatum, si quando continuatis—nunquam nisi in pascha jejunandum, secundum rationem alibi redditam"). The Montanists (he says) excepted both the Sabbath and the Lord's Day from their solemn fast weeks (c. xv.), in this respect distinctly following the ancient Eastern usage. In another place, speaking of our Lord's defence of His disciples for plucking and eating the ears of corn on the Sabbath, he declares that "He remembered the privilege—of exemption from fasting—assigned to the Sabbath from the beginning;" alludes to the double gift of manna on the Friday to preserve the Sabbath from the necessity of fasting; and finally declares, with characteristic vehemence, that "it would have destroyed the Sabbath, and even the Creator Himself, if He had commanded His disciples to fast, against the declaration of Scripture and the will of the Creator" (Adv. Marc. Book iv. c. 12). It is true that he is throughout speaking of Jewish observance; but such language would hardly have been used without qualification, had he not held strong opinions as to the continuance of this festal character of the Sabbath. This conflict of usage continued long in the Western church: for from the well-known Epistle of St. Augustine to Casulanus, we find that the sabbatical fast was observed in his time only in the church of Rome, and a few other Western churches, the majority of Western churches in this point still agreeing with the East. Even at Milan, in the days of St. Ambrose, the Eastern usage prevailed; and when St. Augustine, at the request of his mother Monica, put the question of the method of observance of the day as a case of conscience to St. Ambrose, he treated it simply as a matter of the ordinance of this or that church, and added, that while he never fasted on the Sabbath day in Milan, he did fast if he was at Rome. So entirely was this principle carried out, that, even in Africa in St. Augustine's time, some churches fasted on the Sabbath while others feasted. (See Epist. to Casulanus, vol. ii. pp. 101-121, Ben. ed. Paris 1836: and for a similar statement of the variety of practice and of the intrinsic indifference of the question at issue, compare Epist. to St. Jerome, sect. 14, vol. ii. p. 291.)

(III.) The origin of the fasting observance was probably to be traced (as Tertullian hints) to a continuation of the fast of the Friday. Victorinus (A.D. 270–303) confirms Tertullian's statement on this point with a significant addition. Speaking of the Saturday, he says (De Fabricâ Mundi), "Hoc die solemus superponere: idcirco ut die dominico cum gratiarum actione ad panem exeamus . . . . ne quid cum Judaeis Sabbatum observare videamur" (see Probst, sect. 54, p. 261). As this festal observance of the Sabbath was natural in the Christian church, wherever Jewish influence had at any time induced a survival of the old Jewish feast, so, on the other hand, where no such associations had power, and where the Saturday was regarded either from a purely Christian point of view, or in antagonism to Jewish practice, the contrary observance of it as a fast might very naturally arise. The Lord's Day was the great Christian festival; the Saturday would be treated, in continuity with the Friday, as a vigil of preparation, and to such vigils fasting was appropriate. But there was a far more powerful reason for this fasting usage in the special hallowing of what was called the "Great Sabbath"—i.e. the Easter Eve. Even in the Eastern church, where the Sabbath was observed festally, this was regarded as a strict fast, in some sense the most solemn fast of the year. Thus in the Apostolical Constitutions we are told, that whereas other Sabbaths were festal, so marking the rest from Creation, this is to be a fast, because on it "the Creator was still beneath the earth" (v. 15, 1); and that as a fast it is to be regarded as of stricter obligation than Good Friday itself. "The Friday and the Sabbath keep as an absolute fast, so far as strength allows; . . . but if anyone is unable to keep the two days continuously, let him at any rate keep the Sabbath. For in a certain place the Lord, speaking of Himself, says, 'When the bridegroom shall have been taken from them, then shall they fast in those days'" (v. 18, 2). The nature of the observation of this sacred fast day is emphatically described: "From evening till cock-crow gather together in the church and watch, praying with all supplication to God in your night-long vigil, reading the law, the prophets, and the psalms, till the crowing of the cocks; and then, having baptized your catechumens, and read the gospel in fear and trembling, and spoken to the people the things concerning salvation, cease from your mourning and pray God that Israel may be converted, and find a place for repentance and remission of their ungodliness." In the Eastern church, indeed, this usage was confined to Easter Eve; but in the church of Rome, and some other churches of the East and West, just as all Fridays in the year took the colour of their observance from Good Friday, so all the Sabbaths of the year might reasonably be kept as fasts, in imitation of the fast of the Great Sabbath of Easter Eve.

To this natural inference would be added also the effect of antagonism to Jewish observance as such. We find that both in the East and the West, the Jewish Sabbath was, or was thought to be, kept as a day of violent excess; from which was derived the common phrase of the luxus Sabbatarius, and (as some think) even the use of the word "Sabbat" for the unholy revelry of witches and evil spirits. Bingham (Book xx. c. ii. 4) quotes passages to this effect from St. Chrysostom, St. Augustine, and others. St. Chrysostom (Hom. i. de Lazaro) declares that the Jews used their release from secular work not "for spiritual things, sobriety and modesty, and the hearing the word of God," but in serving their bellies and drunkenness, gorging, and revelry (γαστριζόμενοι, μεθύοντες, διαρρηγνύμενοι, τρυφῶντες). St. Augustine (Ps. xci. sect. 2, vol. iv. p. 1403) similarly accuses the Jews of "keeping the Sabbath with a mere bodily rest, lazy, dissolute, luxurious." "Our rest" (he adds) "is for evil works, theirs for good works. It is better to plough than to dance. . . . Many rest in body, and are turbulent in soul. . . . That which is hymned in the Psalm is the condition of the Christian in the Sabbath of the heart, in the rest, the tranquillity, the serenity of conscience." Such Sabbaths were (as Theodoret and Cyril of Alexandria insist in commenting upon Amos vi. 3) the σάββατα ψευδῆ of the prophets, against which every Christian man should protest. What would be more natural than that such a protest should be made by the sobriety and mournfulness of a fast?

We gather from the Epistle of St. Augustine to Casulanus, quoted above, that in his days the Roman church, with characteristic imperiousness and intolerance, urged the Sabbath fast in marked antagonism to all Jewish observance, as a matter of absolute obligation; insisting that they who neglect it "are still in the flesh, and cannot please God; . . . lovers of their belly, preferring Judaism to the church, and becoming children of the bondwoman." "If" (says the champion of their cause) "the Jew by keeping the Sabbath denies the Lord's Day, how shall a Christian keep the Sabbath? Either let us be Christians and keep the Lord's Day, or let us be Jews and keep the Sabbath." St. Augustine, indignantly rejecting this imperious intolerance, and laying down the principle of simple accordance on this matter to the custom of each church, has a curious passage on "the Great Sabbath" and its effect on the general observance of the Sabbaths of the year. "On that day" (he says) "the flesh of Christ rested in the grave, as God rested on that day from all the works of His creation. Hence arose that variety . . . that some, as especially the peoples of the East, on account of His rest prefer to relax the fast; others, like the Roman church and some other churches of the West, on account of the humiliation of the death of the Lord," and (as he adds below) "the grief of the disciples," "prefer to fast" (sect. 31). But looking at the question in the abstract, without recognising any survival of the old Jewish feast, it would certainly seem that the Roman practice might be better supported in argument; and when to its reasonableness was added the effect of a strong anti-Judaic feeling, and the influence of the Roman church, which was soon to become far greater and more imperious than in St. Augustine's time, it is not surprising that it should have prevailed over the more ancient practice.

At a later period we find Gregory the Great laying it down with authority, that to "cause the Sabbath to be kept from work" is a mark of Judaizing and a "sign of Antichrist;" and we note that in his whole treatment of a tendency to sabbatize the Lord's Day (see LORD'S DAY, p. 1051), he seems to ignore altogether any special celebration of the Saturday as a Sabbath, whether as fast or festival. This silence is probably significant of a change passing over Western usage altogether: for, so far as we can judge, the special observance of the Sabbath there gradually died out. The fasting observance having prevailed against the festal, was itself naturally overshadowed by the Friday fast. At present, while all Fridays in the year (except Christmas Day) are fasts, there is no trace of the Saturday fast, except in the vigils of Easter Day and Whitsun Day, and the Saturdays of the Ember weeks.

In the Eastern church the festal observance remained far longer, and, indeed, is distinctly traceable at the present day. The canonists Zonaras, Balsamon, and Aristenus, representing the tradition of the 12th century, all speak of the Apostolic Canon as still observed and binding. We have a consultation of Nicolaus of Constantinople, about the same time, as to the question of standing in prayer on the Sabbath, as well as the Lord's Day; and his answer is that "to bend the knee on the Sabbath is not forbidden by the canon; but that men generally (οἱ πολλοί), because they do not follow the practice of fasting on the Sabbath, refrain also from bending the knee." Of this significant Eastern usage we have again a slight trace in the West in the Montanist body. Tertullian (de Oratione, c. 18) speaks of a variety of usage introduced by a very few who on the Sabbath abstain from kneeling ("per pauculos quosdam, qui Sabbato abstinent genubus"). The practice, however, he disapproves; he would have it given up, or so retained as to avoid offence; for the abstinence from kneeling (he thinks) properly belongs only to the Lord's Day. It never seems to have taken any hold in the West; but in the East it is still preserved in the present practice of the Greek, though not of the Russian church. It is also held that Saturday is so entirely a day of joy that it is unfit for fasting (excepting always the Great Sabbath), and accordingly, if a vigil chance to fall upon it, it is transposed to the Friday. Even on Easter Eve, though it is a strict fast, yet the black of Lent is changed to the white of Easter in all church vestments and furniture. It is curious also that in later times a new and specially festal consecration was given to the Sabbath in the Eastern church, by considering the Great Sabbath of Easter Eve as the day of our Lord's triumph in Hades, giving rest to the spirits in prison, and accordingly looking on all Sabbaths in the year as especially days of commemoration of those who rest in the Lord. Still here also the greater festal sacredness of the Lord's Day has rightly overshadowed it; and in present thought and usage there is nothing like the quasi co-ordination of the days, which we have seen in the Apostolical Constitutions.[b]

Thus the Sabbath, placed between the two great days of distinctively Christian observance, may be considered as parting with its observance as fast and festival to the one and the other.

In the later ages of the Western church, as we have seen (see LORD'S DAY), a distinctly sabbatical observance gathered round the Lord's Day itself,—partly by natural attraction to the great day of worship and rest, partly by enactments civil and ecclesiastical, ultimately by a formal transference to it of the obligation of the Fourth Commandment. But it is notable that when the Lord's Day was thus considered to be "the Christian Sabbath," it began to be observed with a certain austerity and rigour, differing entirely from the festal character of the Sabbath of the Jews. We are almost tempted to trace in this change a survival of the ancient Western usage, which observed the true Sabbath as a fast.

Special Ritual of the Sabbath. (1) Lessons.—During the first ritual period proper eucharistic lessons were provided for Sundays, and a few feasts and fasts only, as in the body of the old Gallican Lectionary. At the end of this, however, are two sets of prophecies, epistles, and gospels for choice on the week days; or there may have been three or four, for the MS. breaks off here (Liturg. Gall. Mabill. 172). The next step, in the Roman books at least, was to appoint proper lessons for the Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays in Lent and the Ember weeks. See the Capitula Lectionum Evangelii, not later than the beginning of the 5th century, in the [b] For information on this subject I have to thank the Rev. Archimandrite Myriantheus, the chief priest of the Greek church in London.

Thesaurus Anecdotorum of Martene and Durand (v. 66). There was, however, it would seem, an ebb as well as flow, for the later Comes Hieronymi in its earlier form (Pamelius, Liturgica, ii. 1–61) gives (out of Lent) Saturday lessons only for the Ember weeks (13, 34, 49, 58), and that before Pentecost (31), though it provides for Wednesdays and Thursdays throughout the year, and for every day in Lent. Later on lessons were assigned to the Saturdays after the Epiphany and a few others (Kalendarium Romanum, ed. J. Fronto, Paris, 1652, and in Epist. et Diss. 139–144, Veron. 1733). The Saturday lessons have been ascribed to Innocent I., apparently on no better ground than is the Sabbath fast at Rome (Anastas. Biblioth. in Vitae Pont. Labbe, Conc. ii. 1243), viz. that Pseudo-Innocent, as we must call him, in the Epistle to Decentius (§ 4) insists on the observance of the latter rite, with which the lessons were associated.

(2) Ordinations.—Leo I. in 459 desired that all ordinations should take place "post diem Sabbati ejusque noctis quae in prima Sabbati lucescit," that all might be fasting (see (1) above), "quod ejusdem observantiae erit, si mane ipso dominico die, continuato Sabbati jejunio, celebretur" (Epist. 81 ad Dioscor. Alex. 1). Gelasius, 494, fixed them "quarti mensis jejunio, septimi, et decimi, sed et etiam quadragesimalis initii, ac mediana quadragesimae die, Sabbati jejunio circa vesperam" (Ep. 9 ad Luc. et Brut. Episc. 11; comp. Gregor. II. Ep. 4 ad Thuring.; Conc. Rom. A.D. 743, can. 11). It was owing to the prolongation of the ceremony, so that the actual ordination took place on Sunday morning, according to Leo's hint, that no proper office was provided for the Sunday after an Ember week. SABBATIUS (1), July 4. [SEBASTIA.]

(2) Sept. 19, martyr at Antioch with Trophimus and Dorymedon in the reign of Probus (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.). [C. H.]

SABBATUM. (1) Sabbatum in Albis, the Saturday in Easter week, on which day the neophytes laid aside their white dress (Sacramentarium Gregorianum in Pamel. Liturgica, ii. 378; Miss. Ambros. ibid. i. 363; Pseudo-Alcuin, de Div. Off. 18; &c.).

(2) Sabbatum Duodecim Lectionum, in XII. Lectiones, in XII. Lectionibus.—The Saturdays of the ember weeks were so called from the twelve lessons read in the office or mass of those days ("haud enim duo haec dividebantur;" Fronto, note in Kalend. Rom. in Ep. et Diss. 175, Veron. 1733). That twelve were actually read can hardly be doubted, and it was in all probability for the sake of the candidates for orders, as twelve were read "secundum Romanos" for the sake of the catechumens on Easter eve (Honorius Augustod. Gemma Animae, iii. 108; iv. 117; Comes Hieronymi in Baluz. Capit. Reg. Franc. ii. 1324 (the copy in Pamel. Liturg. ii. 23, and the Sacram. Gelas. Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. i. 43, give only eleven); Sacr. Greg. Mur. ii. 147, &c.), but it was soon reduced to six (Sacr. Gel. i. nn. 19, 6; Greg. u. s. 33, 94, 122, 136), or to five (Comes Hier. Baluz. cc. 111, 179, 222; comp. the number of the prayers in Gelas. i. nn. 83, 85). The retention of the old name after this change perplexed the early ritualists, some of whom said that each of the six lessons which they found in their books had been read twice, once in Greek and once in Latin (Amalarius, de Eccl. Off. ii. 1; Pseudo-Alc. de Div. Off. 26; Gemma, u. s. iii. 154, &c.), others that the psalms said with them were counted as lessons (Raban. Maur. de Instit. Clerr. ii. 24). An Ordo Romanus for the use of Salzburg, belonging to the 11th century, orders twelve lessons to be said on these days in a church [COLLECT, i. p. 403], in which the people were to assemble before they went to Mass. This appears to Martene (de Ant. Eccl. Rit. I. viii. 5, § 9) to account for the name; but it is impossible that so many early ritualists should have missed this explanation if the materials for it had existed in their day, and we must rather regard the Salzburg rite as local, probably not older than the 11th century. At first there were only three ember seasons (Capitulare Lect. Evang. in Martene, Thesaur. Anecd. v. 78, 79, 81, 82; Sacram. Gelas. i. 82; Conc. Clovesh. A.D. 747, can. 18), but when the Jejunium Primi Mensis was added, the new ember Saturday received the name common to the rest (Sacram. Gelas. i. 19; Greg. Murat. ii. 33), though probably twelve lessons had ceased to be read on any of them. There is no trace of such a rite in the Gallican Sacramentaries, nor in the Mozarabic Missal.

(3) Sabbatum Sanctum.—The common name for Easter eve in the Latin church (Sacram. Greg. in Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. ii. 65; in Cod. Eliz. Opp. Greg. iii. 70, ed. Ben., &c.). See EASTER EVE, p. 595.

(4) Sabbatum Requiei Dominici Corporis.—A Gallican name for Easter eve (Missale Gallicanum Vetus, in Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. ii. 730).

(5) Sabbatum in Traditione Symboli.—The day before Palm Sunday. It was so called at Milan because the solemn delivery of the creed to the catechumens took place on it (Ambr. Miss. in Pamelii Liturgica, i. 326). Some ritualists have supposed that this was not the original custom of Milan, because St. Ambrose (Epist. 20, ad Marcellinam, § 4), speaks of a "traditio symboli" on Palm Sunday. His words, however, do not afford sufficient ground for the inference. He says, "Sequenti die, erat autem Dominica, post lectiones atque tractatum, dimissis catechumenis, symbolum aliquibus competentibus in baptisteriis tradebam basilicae." He would not have said "to some competentes," if he referred to the great mass of those who received the creed at this season. They were probably some who from one cause or another had not been present on the previous day. [W. E. S.]

SABEL, June 17, with Manuel and Ismael, Persian martyrs at Constantinople under Julian (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.). [C. H.]

SABINA (1), Jan. 24, virgin martyr, sister of St. Sabinianus, commemorated at Troyes (Mart. Bed., Flor.); Jan. 29 (Boll. Acta SS.

Jan. ii. 944, from an ancient MS. of Treves); Aug. 29 (Mart. Usuard.; Mart. Roman.).

(2) Jan. 30, also called Savina, widow of Lodi in the 4th century, commemorated at Milan (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 1029, from the office of the church at Milan).

(3) Aug. 29, virgin martyr at Rome under Hadrian (Mart. bed., Usuard., Adon., Hieron., Vet. Rom., Rom., Notker., Wand.); mentioned in the Super Oblata and the Ad Complendum for this day in the Gregorian Sacramentary The Liber Antiphonarius of Gregory has an office for her natale. There was a church named from her on the Aventine in the time of Symmachus (Mansi, viii. 236 B) and Eugenius II. (Anast. Lib. Pontif. num. ci.).

(4) Oct. 27, martyr at Avila in Spain under Dacianus, with Vincentius and Christeta (Mart. Usuard., Vet. Rom., Wand.). [C. H.]

(2) Dec. 31, bishop, martyr with Potentianus, commemorated at Sens (Mart. Usuard.). [C. H.]

SABINUS (1), Mar. 16, martyr in Egypt with Papas in the Diocletian persecution (Cal. Byzant.).

(2) July 11, confessor, commemorated in Poitou (Mart. Usuard.).

(3) July 20, martyr, commemorated with Maximus and others at Damascus (Mart. Usuard., Hieron., Notker.).

(4) Aug. 23, martyr with Silvanus and Pantherius, Thracians, in the Diocletian persecution (Basil. Menol.).

(5) Sept. 29, martyr, commemorated at Perinthus (Syr. Mart.).

(6) Dec. 30, bishop, martyr under Maximian, commemorated at Spoleto (Mart. Usuard., Vet. Rom.). [C. H.]

SACCUS (σάκκος). (1) The Saccus, which may be considered as the Eastern representative of the Western DALMATIC, is a tight-fitting vestment worn by metropolitans (except those of the Armenian church), and in the Russian church at the present day by all bishops, instead of the phenolion. See Goar's Euchologion, p. 113. (2) [SACKCLOTH.] [R. S.]

SACELLARIUS. The word sacellum designates a casket or shrine for receiving relics; hence the sacellarius is the person who has the custody of such a casket or shrine. It more commonly however designates the keeper of a money-chest, or treasurer (Ducange's Glossary, s.v.) [C.]

SACERDOS. [BISHOP, p. 210; PRIEST, p. 1699.]

SACERDOTALIS LIBER. A name sometimes given to a book containing the offices to be said by priests, as Pontificalis Liber is given to that containing the offices to be recited by bishops (Macri, Hierolexicon, s. v.). [C.]

SACKCLOTH (saccus, cilicium). 1. We find the rough HAIRCLOTH [p. 756]—generally of camel's hair—which was used in the East for sacks and tents, worn as a sign of mourning, humiliation, and penitence by Syrians (1 Kings xx. 32) and Ninevites (Jonah iii. 5), as well as by Israelites. Among the latter, sackcloth was an almost invariable accompaniment of mourning (2 Sam. iii. 31; 1 Kings xxi. 27; 2 Kings xix. 1, &c.). It was of a dark colour, as we see in Apocal. vi. 12; "The sun became black as sackcloth of hair (ὡς σάκκος τρίχινος)," and was probably associated with mourning from its sad appearance, as well as its roughness and inconvenience, for it does not appear to have been by any means invariably, or even commonly, worn next the skin.

2. Tertullian (de Poenit. c. 9), treating of penitence, does not speak of wearing sackcloth, but of lying on sackcloth (sacco) and ashes; and similarly Cyprian (de Lapsis, c. 35, p. 262, Hartel) speaks of the lapsed proving their penitence by grovelling on sackcloth (cilicium), dust, and ashes. "Sackcloth and ashes" became the signs of a penitent. Ambrose (ad Virg. Lapsam, c. 8) would have the penitent's whole body emaciated with fasting, sprinkled with ashes, and covered with sackcloth; and Pachomius (Reg. art. 121) desires one who has been convicted of theft to appear in sackcloth and ashes at every assembly for prayer.

3. In the course of time, probably from the 3rd century, it became usual with ascetics of remarkable rigour to wear a hair-shirt next the skin for the purpose of producing discomfort. Such men as Anthony the hermit, Hilarion, and other patriarchs of monasticism are said to have worn the hair-shirt constantly (Athanasius, Vita S. Ant. c. 59; Hieron. Vita S. Hilarii, c. 38).

4. The eighty original monks of St. Martin are said (Sulpicius Severus, Vita S. Mart. c. 7) to have worn, for the most part, clothes of camel's hair. It does not appear, however, that the rough vestment of the monks was worn next the skin. Ascetics in the East very commonly wore cloth of camel's hair—after the example of some of the prophets, and perhaps of John the Baptist—as their ordinary clothing. Compare MAFORS, MELOTES.

5. When Martin of Tours was on his death-bed he would not permit his disciples to put anything between his body and the sackcloth on which he lay; on sackcloth and ashes he held that a Christian should die (Sulp. Sever. Epist. 3, de obitu S. Martini). So Anthony and Hilarion died wrapped in their haircloth, and Paula, according to Jerome, died on the slip of sackcloth (ciliciola) on the hard ground, which had served for her bed during life (Hieron. Epist. 108, ad Eustoch. p. 706, ed. Vallarsi). In the Middle Ages the practice became common. Peter the Venerable (de Mirac. i. 4) speaks of dying on sackcloth and ashes as a custom of Christians, and especially of monks (O. Zöckler, Geschichte der Askese, p. 82 ff.). [C.]

SACRAMENTARY. The Western books of offices were first called Libri Sacramentorum; but after the 8th century Sacramentarium is more frequent; though at Milan, so late as 1024, we find the treasurer of the chapter perplexed when asked for an "Ambrosian sacramentary" (Epist. Martini ad Paul. et Gebert. in Mus. Ital. i. 96). Either name was appropriate, because the book contained, not the Eucharistic prayers only, but also the prayers, benedictions, and prefaces used at the performance of every sacramental rite, as baptism, confirmation, ordination, the blessing of nuns, widows, oil, salt, water, the dedication of churches, &c.

We do not know when or by whom such a volume was first compiled. For a period of uncertain duration and varying in different churches the public prayers and other formularies were committed to memory. [ORDO, § 1.] A trace of this practice is still found in the Gallican sacramentaries, which merely indicate the words of consecration by the first words, as "Qui pridie quam pat." or the like (Liturg. Gall. Mabill. 192, 195, 198, 202, &c.), or omit them altogether (ibid. 227, 230). In the West attempts were made to enforce the rule, even below our period. "Orationes quoque missarum et praefationes et canonem bene intelligant presbyteri; et si non, saltem distincte et memoriter proferre valeant." This occurs in one of those episcopal addresses which were read at visitations from the 9th century downwards (Admon. Synod. in App. ad Reginonis Libr. de Disc. Eccl. 504, ed. Baluz. Comp. Inquisitio 82, ibid. p. 15). Bishops even inquired if the parish priest "had by heart" the exorcisms and benedictions of salt and water (Inquis. 90, u. s. 17), if he could repeat the Psalms from memory (Ib. 84, p. 16), and the Athanasian Creed (Ib. 85; see also Admon. Synod. 504; Nova, 506; Noviss. 509; Ahyto Basil. Capit. 4; Hincmar, Capit. an. 852, cc. 3, 4; Walter of Orleans, Capit. 21).

It is evident that when this rule was in full force, a complete sacramentary would not be needed for public use in church. If the memory required assistance, a small book (libellus) containing the prayers for the season, or the occasion, would be more convenient, and such were used. See Gregor. Turon. Hist. Franc. ii. 22; Vitae Patrum, xvi. 2. Another thing worthy of note is that, even when all the offices were thus collected into one volume, it would at first consist of prayers only, because those who compiled it, or procured its compilation, for their own use, required no directions for familiar practices. Hence the older MSS. contain the fewer rubrics. The so-called Leonian or Veronese Sacramentary, assigned by Morinus to about 488, contains no directions whatever, only a few brief headings to the missae, the several members of which are (except in one single instance, Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. i. 410), undistinguished by the proper titles, Super Oblata, Praefatio, &c. which occur passim in the Gelasian and Gregorian. The growth of a sacramentary in this respect deserves further illustration. E. g. the "Leonian" has a prayer to be said at the blessing of fruits on Ascension Day (ibid. 313); but there is no hint of its purpose except in the words of the prayer itself. In the Gelasian we find the rubric, "Inde vero modicum ante expletum canonem benedicis fruges novas" (Murat. u. s. 508; Thomasius, Libri III. Sacrarn. 100). Again, the Leonian (318) supposes baptisms on Whitsun Eve, but gives no directions about them; in the Gelasian the officinnt is guided by several rubrics of some length (Murat. u. s. 592–596; Thomas. 102–108). Compare with the same view the earlier copies of the Gregorian Sacramentary, as that of Pamelius (Liturgica, ii. 296, 7), the Vatican or Othobonian (Murat. ii.) with the Codex Eligianus from which Ménard (Sacram. Liber a Greg. M. compos. Paris, 1642), and the Benedictines after him (Opp. S. Greg. iii.) have printed; or the ancient Gallican books (Murat u. s. ii.; Mabill. Liturg. Gall.; Thomasius, u. s. &c.), with the kindred Mozarabic, which was in common use three or four centuries later. Two obvious sources of these accretions may be indicated. In the 8th century every priest was required to draw up and present to the bishop for approbation his own code of ritual (Capit. Karlom. A.D. 742). Such notes when approved, would naturally be entered in his book of prayers, and become a rule to his successors also. About the same time was compiled the Ordo Romanus for the guidance of the bishops of Rome, and of the suburbicarian dioceses. This soon became, as we infer from the commentaries on it by the German Amalarius, an authority with other bishops and priests, and many of its ceremonial directions were copied into the sacramentaries with more or less literal exactness. To give an example. In a direction of the Codex Elig. respecting the baptisms of Easter Eve we have (Greg. Opp. iii. 73, ed. Ben.), "Sunt (Ord. Rom. I. 44, Mus. Ital. ii. 27; Ordo Scrutinii, ib. 83; Or. Rom. Bernoldi in Hittorp. de Off. Cath. Eccl. 75, ed. 1568; sint) parati qui eos suscepturi sunt cum linteis in manibus eorum et accipiunt (Ordd. u.s.: accipiant) ipsos a presbyteris (Ordo R. I.: a presbyteris, vel diaconibus; Ordo Scr.: a pontifice vel diaconibus; Bern.: a pontifice, presbyteris, vel diaconibus), qui eos baptizant." The Ordo frequently refers to the Sacramentary for the prayers to which its directions apply. E. g. "Dicit orationes solemnes sicut in Sacramentorum (Libro, supplied by Bernold, u.s. 49, 66) continetur" (O. R. in Mus. Ital. ii. 19, 32 bis; see also pp. 21, 25, 31). When this order is copied in the Eligian codex, the mention of the sacramentary itself is properly omitted (Greg. Opp. iii. 62); but in one passage (69) a similar reference is inadvertently retained — "ordine quo in Sacramentario." We find again that the episcopal addresses and inquiries already mentioned contain many directions which at a later period appear in the sacramentaries, as e. g. with reference to the mixed cup (Inquis. 64, Regin. 13), the disposal of the remainder of the elements (65), the eucharistic vestments (Leo IV. de Cura Past. Labbe, Conc. viii. 36; Admon. Syn. u. s. 503), &c.

The Roman Sacramentaries. — See LITURGY, p. 1032 ff. We may mention here that some critics, judging from internal evidence, think many of the prayers in the "Leonian" or Veronese Sacramentary not later than Sylvester and Julius I. (Morinus de Sacram. Poenit. ix. 30, R. 2; Gerbert. Vet. Lit. Alem. Praef. xv.–xviii.), or than Sixtus III. and Felix II. (Murat. Diss. iv.; i. 41); while others, also judging from style and matter, see much in all the Roman books that belongs to Leo I. (Thomas. Praef. in Libr. iii. Sacram. p. 3; Quesnel, not. in Leonis Serm. xcvi.; Murat. Diss. i. 20). [illegible] ancient author ascribes to Leo the compilat[illegible] a sacramentary, but there are traditions preserved by later writers, which shew that he was believed to have enlarged at least the missal part of the Roman Liber Sacramentorum. Thus Anastasius Bibl. Vitae Pontif. in some copies (Labbe, Conc. iii. 1291; Bolland, Apr. 11, ii. 21); Gemma Animae, i. 90; Rupert. de Div. Off. ii. 21, &c. Assemani inclines to the opinion of Orsi, "qui purum putumque Gelasianum Sacramentarium in Veronensi codice contineri censuit" (Cod. Liturg. vi. P. 3, p. ix.); though he admits that "multae orationes Leonis saplunt stylum et forte aetatem," and "in hoc sacramentario, velut in aerarium quoddam illatas, contineri preces liturgicas Romanae ecclesiae quae prioribus saeculis fuere praescriptae" (viii.).

Our earliest authority for assigning such a work to Gelasius is Gennadius of Marseilles. "Scripsit et tractatus diversarum Scripturarum et sacramentorum" (De Vir. Illustr. 94). Walafrid who is later: "Tam a se quam ab aliis compositas preces dicitur ordinasse" (De Reb. Eccl. 22). The sacramentary ascribed to him is, unlike any other, in three books; (1) Ordo Anni Circuli; (2) Natalitia Sanctorum; (3) Orationes et Preces cum Canone. It was this recension which Gregory I. undertook to simplify; "Gelasianum Codicem de Missarum solemnitatibus multa subtrahens, pauca convertens, nonnulla adjiciens, pro exponendis evangelicis lectionibus in unius libri volumine coarctavit" (Joan. Diac. Vita Greg. ii. 17. Comp. Wal. Strab. u. s.) All the extant copies, however different in other respects, consist of a single book.

The Gelasian and Gregorian books were for some centuries in use at the same time; and were even combined. In the library of Centule in 831, beside three Gregorian and nineteen Gelasian missals, there was "Missalis Gregorianus et Gelasianus modernis temporibus ab Albino (Alcuino) ordinatus" (Chron. Centul. 3, in Dacher. Spicil. ii. 311, ed. 2). Another collection ascribed to Alcuin (to which Micrologus [c. 60] probably refers) is printed by Pamelius (Rituale SS. Patrum II.) with a second by Grimoldus. On these, and on a third by Rodradus, see Gerbert. Vet. Lit. Alem. Disq. II. i. 21. Yet more remarkable than the twofold sacramentary ascribed to Alcuin is a volume "olim S. Gallense, nunc Turicense, saec. circ. X. ad triplicem ritum Gelasianum, Gregorianum, et Ambrosianum concinnatum," which has been printed by Gerbert (Monum. Lit. Alem. P. I.).

The Milanese Sacramentary.—The predominance of Rome did not suffice to commend her offices even to the rest of Italy itself. Paulinus of Nola, for example, "fecit et sacramentarium et hymnarium" (Gennad. Vir. Ill. 48); but that of Milan, from its real or supposed connexion with St. Ambrose, acquired an authority which has given an enduring vitality to the proper use of that church. In 1024 two canons of Ratisbon ask the treasurer of Milan for the "sacramentarium Ambrosii," "cum solis orationibus et praefationibus Ambrosianis" (Paul et Geb. ad Mart. Epp. i. iii. Mus. Ital. i. 95, 97). Two centuries earlier Walafrid Strabo says, "Ambrosius . . . tam missae quam caeterorum dispositionem officiorum suae ecclesiae et aliis Liguribus ordinavit" (De Reb. Eccl. 22). It is not improbable that St. Ambrose did re-arrange the materials left by his predecessors, among whom tradition placed St. Barnabas, not only as the author of a "Missae Ordo" also (Vicecomes, de Rit. Miss. ii. 12). At the instance of a Roman council, by which the pope Hadrian also declared himself constrained, Charlemagne attempted to destroy all the Ambrosian rites which Gregory had respected, "Ambrosianum mysterium videns esse factum divino magisterio" (Landulphus Sen. Mediolan. Hist. ii. 4, 10, in Murat. Script. Rer. Ital. iv. 72); but the pope moved by the remonstrances of a French bishop, Eugenius, reassembled the council, which was induced by the latter to reconsider its decree, and the Milanese Sacramentary was restored (ib. 12). The Ambrosian rite in the threefold use published by Gerbert (see above) gives the benediction of ashes (p. 48), of olive branches on Palm Sunday (at Milan, "Dom. in Ramis Olivarum" (64), of the oils (75), the order of baptism (88), &c.; and the two last-named rites, with the benediction of the new fire, have a place in the "Missae Ambrosianae," almost a new missal, of Pamelius (Liturg. i. 340, 344, 348–351).

The Gallican Sacramentaries.—These were various, and it would seem that several authors contributed in one way or another to their formation. "Liber hymnorum et alius mysteriorum" (= sacramentorum) are ascribed by Jerome (de Script. Eccl. 100) to Hilary of Poitiers, A.D. 354. Salvian of Marseilles, 440, composed many "homilias sacramentorum," i.e. prefaces in the Gallican sense [PREFACE] (Gennad. u. s. 67). Musaeus also of Marseilles, 460, at the request of his bishop "composuit sacramentorum egregium et non parvum volumen per membra quidem pro opportunitate officiorum et temporum, pro lectionum textu, psalmorumque serie et cantatione discretum, sed supplicandi Deo et contestandi beneficiorum ejus soliditate sui consentaneum" (the Gallican preface or contestation, Gennad. 79). Again, Sidonius, bishop of Auvergne, 472, composed a book of masses (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii. 22). Chilperic I., A.D. 561, wrote masses, but was unable to impose them on the church (ibid. vi. in fine). The Gallican sacramentaries were suppressed by Pepin and Charlemagne [LITURGY, 51]. The Roman sacramentary which the latter obtained from Hadrian (Epist. Adr. ad Car. M. in Opp. Greg. M. iii. 618, ed. Ben.), as a standard for his empire is identified by Lambecius with a codex at Vienna entitled, "Liber Sacramentorum de circulo anni expositus a Sto. Gregorio Papa Romano," &c. (Biblioth. Caesar. ii. 5, p. 14). The Gallican "Missals" mentioned in LITURGY, § 54, were true sacramentaries; e. g. even in their present state they contain the order for baptism (Miss. Goth. in Murat. u.s. ii. 589; Miss. Gall. Vet. 708–720, 736–742), ordination (Miss. Franc. 661–671), benediction of persons (Miss. Fr. 673, 5; Miss. Gall. V. 701), of things (M. Goth. 582; M. Fr. 675, 7, &c.; M. G. V. 732). The Sacramentarium Gallicanum [LITURGY, § 54 (f)], besides the rites of baptism (Mur. 828–835, 847–852) and benediction 845, 953–961), gives the lessons for every Mass.

The Mozarabic.—See LITURGY, §§ 46–49. The Council of Toledo, 633, ordered that throughout Spain and Gallia Narbonensis (also under the Goths) the same mode of celebrating masses and other offices should be observed (can. 2). As Isidore of Seville was then living, and the Hispano-Gothic missal is by its title ascribed to him ("a sancto Isidoro ordinatum"), we infer probably that the redaction was committed to him by the council (Baron. Annal. ad an. 633, n. 70). Among the materials before him were doubtless some supplied by his own brother Leander, of whom he says, "In ecclesiasticis officiis idem non parvo elaboravit studio. . . . In sacrificiis quoque, laudibus atque psalmis multa dulcisonè composuit" (De Script. Eccles. 28). A later contributor was Hildefonse of Toledo, the author "missarum, hymnorum atque sermonum." So Julian of Toledo, 680 (App. ad Ildef. de Script. Eccl. in Biblioth. Eccl. J. A. Fabricii, 66). Of Julian himself we also read, "Librum missarum de toto circulo anni in quatuor partes divisum, in quibus aliquas vetustatis incuria vitiatas ac semiplenas emendavit ac complevit, aliquas vero, ex toto composuit" (ibid.) The Mozarabic missal, which was in use till the 12th century, retains few traces of the special character of a Liber Sacramentorum. But such are the "blessing of the flowers or branches" on Palm Sunday (Leslie, 148), of the new fire, &c. (174), and a brief notice of baptism on Easter Eve (189).

The African Rites.—See LITURGY, §§ 38–42. Tradition has preserved the name of only one composer or compiler, Vocontius, bishop of Castellanum in Mauritania, in A.D. 460, to whom is ascribed "Sacramentorum egregium volumen" (Gennad. u. s. 78). [W. E. S.]

SACRAMENTS. There was within our period no tendency to restrict the application of the word sacramentum to Christian rites, much less to any fixed number of rites. Only, when used of a religious observance at all, it meant that some sacred meaning lay under a visible sign: "Sacramentum est in aliqua celebratione, cum res gesta ita fit, ut aliquid significare intelligatur quod sancte accipiendum est" (Isid. Hisp. Origines, vi. 19).

Being a purely Latin word, sacramentum could have no ecclesiastical use in the Apostolic and sub-Apostolic ages, during which the language of the church was exclusively Greek (Milman, Latin Christianity, l. 1, vol. i. p. 27). After that period it came into common use from the current Latin versions of the New Testament, in which it was frequently employed as an equivalent to the Greek μυστήριον, mystery. Thus, in the version most common before the Vulgate, which we shall denote by S. (Sabatier, Bibl. Sacr. Lat. Vers. Ant. Rem. 1743), in Rom. xvi. 25, we have "revelatione sacramenti." Quoting 1 Cor. ii. 7, St. Hilary (De Trin. x. 1076) reads "in sacramento." For other examples see 1 Cor. xiii. 2 ("omnia sacramenta"), as cited by St. Augustine (Tract. vi. in S. Joh. Ev. § 21, vii. § 3; ix. § 8, &c.); Eph. i. 9, iii. 3, 4. 9 in S. and the Vulgate; Eph. vi. 19 in S.; Col. i. 26 in St. Hilary (Comm. in Ps. 138, 518); Col. i. 27 in V.; 1 Tim. iii. 9, 16 in S. and V.; Rev. i. 20 in S. V.; x. 7, xvii. 5 in S.; xvii. 7 in S.V.

Hence, whatever could in any sense be called a mystery, was with the Latin Christians a "sacramentum." Revealed truths, and even pious opinions, are "mysteriorum sacramenta" (Isid. Hisp. de Scrip. Eccl. 27), the nature of the Godhead is "sacramentum Trinitatis" (Idem, C. Judæos, i. 4, § 6). We have also "sacramentum incarnationis" (Leo M. Serm. xxiv. 4; Euseb. Mediol. Epist. Hard. Conc. i. 1781; comp. Missale Gallic. Vet. in Mab. Lit. Gallic. MSS.), "s. Dominicæ passionis et resurrectionis" (Leo, Serm. lxi. 1; comp. liii. 4, liv. 3), "s. salutis nostræ" (Ib. lvii. 5), "s. Scripturarum" (lxii. 1; De Vocat. Gent. [auct. inc.] 21), "s. Paschale" (liii. 5); and so the feast of the Nativity is "sacramenti solemnitas" (Cassian, Collat. x. 2). The touching of the catechumen with spittle [EARS, p. 586] was a "sacrament" (Rabanus Maurus, de Institt. Clerici, i. 27). So was the salt given to catechumens: e.g. the Council of Carthage 397 (followed in Capit. Reg. Franc. vii. 263 and Addit. iv. 63, 76) ordered that at Eastertide no "sacrament" should be ministered to the catechumens "nisi solitum sal" (can. 5). Comp. Theodulf (u. s. 5): "Salem in Sacramento recipiunt." [SALT, § 3.] Again, the creed taught to catechumens is "sacramentum religionis" (Expos. Symboli in Sacram. Gall. (of Besançon), Mus. Ital. i. 312); comp. Missale Gall. Vet. in Liturg. Gall. Mabill. 339, 347), "in quo quidem pauca sunt verba sed omnia continentur sacramenta" (Raban. M. de Instit. Clerici, ii. 56). When one is baptized, "sub Trinitatis tingitur sacramento" (Isid. Hispal. de Offic. Eccl. ii. 25); while of the HONEY AND MILK given after baptism, John the Deacon says, "baptizatis . . . . hoc genus sacramenti offertur" (Epist. ad Senar. 12). Baptism itself is "sacramentum aquæ" (Hildefonsus de Cognit. Bapt. ii. 28; Ambros. Expos. Ev. Luc. x. 48, &c.), and "s. regenerationis" (Willibald, Vita S. Bonif. vii. 19); confirmation was "sacramentum olei" (ib. 26; comp. Aug. Serm. 227; "oleum est Spiritus Sancti sacramentum), or "chrismatis" (Isid. Orig. vi. 19; Rabanus de Universo, v. 16; Conc. Arel. vi. can. 18), or "unctionis" (Origenis Hom. v. in Levit. Vers. Lat. Vet. § 2; Aug. in Ep. S. Joan. c. 2, Tract. iii. 12). St. Augustine thus speaks of all the rites of the catechumenate: "Omnia sacramenta quæ acta sunt et aguntur in vobis per ministerium servorum Dei, exorcismis, orationibus, canticis spiritualibus, insufflationibus, cilicio, inclinatione cervicum, humilitate pedum," &c. (De Symbolo, Serm. ii. 1, § 1); while Hildefonse includes all these, the baptism itself, the confirmation and first communion under the same term: "Præmissis . . . sacramentis expletis" (u. s. i. 139; comp. Magnus Senonensis, de Myst. Bapt. in Martene, de Antiq. Eccl. Rit. I. i. 18; Cæsarius Arel. Serm. de Dedic. Eccl. 4; Miss. Gall. Vet. in Mabill. Lit. Gall. 362). So Walter of Orleans speaks of the "sacramenta" of catechumens, of the sick, and of the dead (Capitula 20). The Eucharist was called "sacramentum altaris" (Aug. Serm. 59, § 6, De Civ. Dei, x. 6), or "sacramenta altaris" (Id. Serm. 226), "mensæ Dominicæ s." (Id. Serm. 127), "s. panis" Hildef. u. s. 27), "eucharistiæ s." (Tertull. de Cor. Mil. 3), "s. Dominici corporis et sanguinis" (Gaudent. Serm. 2; comp. Aug. Ep. 98. § 9), "s. carnis et sanguinis" (Hilar. de Trin. viii. 17), &c. St. Augustine has "sacramentum exorcismi" (Serm. 227; comp. the Gelasian exorcism of oil, "Fiat hæc unctio . . . sacramentis purificata;" Murat. u. s. i. 559), and terms the sign of the cross a sacrament also (Enarr. in Ps. cxli. 4, § 9; comp.

Leo M. Serm. lib. 3; Ambros. Exp. Ps. 118, [illegible] 6).

Many other "sacraments" might be enumerated, if it were necessary; but ancient usage will be sufficiently illustrated, if we mention one other application of the word. By "sacramentum" was commonly understood an oath, especially a military oath (e.g. Codex Theodos. vi. 168). Hence there was naturally sometimes an allusion under this word to the obligation which a Christian takes on himself as a soldier of Christ. Thus Leo (Serm. xxi. 5): "Si coelestis militiae sacramenta servaveris, non dubites te in castris triumphalibus Regis aeterni pro victoria coronandum." Compare Tertullian, Ad Martyres, 3; Adv. Gentes, 2, prope init. [W. E. S.]

SACRARIUM. (1) A Christian church, or consecrated building generally; e.g. "confugit ad ritus Christiani sacrarium" (Ammian. Marcellin. lib. xxvi.). Cf. Sidonius Apollinaris, lib. viii. ep. 4; Salvian, lib. iii.

(2) More properly the most sacred part of the church, the place of the altar and "confessio"; in the Greek church τὸ ἅγιον, τὸ ἱερατεῖον, from which the laity were excluded. The thirty-first canon of the first council of Braga ordains "ingredi sacrarium ad communicandum non liceat laicis nisi tantum clericis;" and the third canon of the council of Vaison speaks of the minister, "cujus officium est sacrarium disponere et sacramenta suscipere." Here the offerings of the people were received. The ninety-third canon of the fourth council of Carthage forbids the reception of the oblations of brothers at variance either in the sacrarium or treasury, "oblationes dissidentium fratrum neque in sacrario neque in gazophylacio recipiantur."

(3) The sacristy, or vestry. "Sacrarium dicitur quia ibi sacra reponuntur et servantur" (Walafrid Strabo, de Reb. Eccl. c. 6). This use of the word was inherited from pagan terminology. Ulpian (Dig. lib. i. tit. 8, leg. 9) defines "sacrarium" as "proprie locus in quo sacrae res ponuntur et servantur; quod etiam in aede privata esse potest." Servius (ad Aen. xii. 199) similarly says, "sacrarium proprie locus est in templo in quo sacra reponuntur, sicut donarium est in quo ponuntur oblata." We learn from Festus (in Sescspitam) that the holy things were exhibited in the "sacraria" behind a metal lattice work, as afterwards through the "transennae" of the "confessio:" "sacraria in templis repagulo seu reticulo aeneo olim sepiebantur; in quo tubi relinquebantur per quos sacra manibus tangere licebat." We find it used repeatedly in this sense in Ordo Romanus, e.g. "processionem coram ep[illegible]o feturis a custode ecclesiae in sacraric orn[illegible] p[illegible]raebenda sunt;" and in Anastasius [illegible] portion of the true cross is recorded to have [illegible] by pope Sergius "in sacrario beati Petri [illegible]apostoli," § 162. [E. V.]

SACRIFICATI. The name applied to those Christians who in times of persecution took part in a heathen sacrifice. They were not strictly apostates, but to escape confiscation of goods, or torture or death, they performed a distinct act of idolatry. The act was generally made to consist in sharing either in the actual sacrifice or in the sacrificial feast, that is, they openly "eat things offered to idols," and so in the language of Cyprian (Ep. xx. 1) they defiled both their hands and life with sacrilegious contact. Cyprian regarded such connivance with idolatry as a far more grievous lapse than that of which the LIBELLATICI were guilty; at the same time he drew a broad distinction between the degrees of guilt among the sacrificati themselves. "We should not," he says (Ep. lv. 10), "put on a par one who forthwith and willingly sprung forward to the dreadful sacrifice, and one who, having struggled and long resisted, came by compulsion to this fatal work; one who betrayed both himself and all his, and one who of himself approaching to the danger, protected wife and children and his whole house by exposing himself to peril; one who compelled inmates or friends to the deed, and one who sheltered under his own roof very many brethren who withdrew to banishment." The testimony which he gives in other epistles of the conduct of multitudes of Christians in Africa in the Decian persecution goes far to justify the severity of the church towards those who sacrificed. Men did not wait (Cyp. de Lapsis, c. 6) to be summoned to the trial, they went spontaneously, they mutually encouraged one another to submit, they took their children with them, they even entreated, when the magistrate postponed the ordeal on the approach of night, that their downfall might not be delayed. "Why bring an offering, wretched man," he continues, "why present a victim for slaughter? You are yourself an offering for the altar, you are yourself come as a victim; you have slaughtered there your own salvation, your hope; your faith was burnt in those funeral flames."

The penalties of sacrificing varied with the circumstances of the guilt. If the lapser was compelled to make an offering, yet did it in a festive robe and with a glad countenance, then the council of Ancyra (c. 4) decrees that he was to do penance six years,; if in a mourning robe and with a sad heart, then the penance was reduced (c. 5) to four years; if he did not actually partake of the sacrificial victim, it was further reduced to three. Should the sacrifice be repeated a second or third time, the penalty (c. 8) was seven years' exclusion, and should a Christian compel or entice others to succumb, he was to be excommunicated for ten years (c. 9). The Council of Nice further decreed (c. 11) that if a Christian sacrificed when there was no danger [illegible] from compulsion, he was to be [illegible] twelve years; a sentence cited and made more severe by 1 Conc. Valentin. c 3, but modified by 2 Conc. Arelat. c. 10. The Conc. Eliber. (c. 1) decided that one who after baptism and of full age participated in the worship of an idol temple, was guilty of a crime for which reconciliation was to be given "nec (nisi ?) in fine." With the close of the persecutions the crime to a great extent passed away. [G. M.]

SACRIFICE. This term was applied by early Christian writers to any act or offering of devotion. St. Jerome calls private prayers at night "an evening sacrifice" (Ep. vii. ad Luctam). St. Hilary uses "sacrificium" of the performance of the corporal works of mercy (in Ps. cxl.). St. Augustine says that the whole congregation of saints form the Christian sacrifice (de Civ. Dei, x. 6) in words which are suggestive of the oblation in the first Postcom. Collect in the Anglican Liturgy. The incense offered at the Benedictio Cerei on Easter Eve is called a "vespertinum sacrificium" (Sacram. Greg.). The offering of bread and wine by Melchizedek is described in the Gelasian Sacramentary as "a holy sacrifice, a spotless victim." These words "sanctum sacrificium immaculatam hostiam" are said by Wal. Strabo to have been added to the canon by Leo I. (de Reb. Eccles. c. 22). They are difficult to explain, but all that ingenuity can advance in their favour is put together by Le Brun (Explication, &c., tom. i. p. 500; Hoppe, L. A., Die Epiklesis, p. 119).

But by far the most common use of the term "sacrificium," together with such wholly or partially equivalent terms as θυσία, προσφορά, ἀναφορά, hostia, oblatio, is to denote the Holy Eucharist. The sacrificial character of that rite has been based on the use by our Lord at its institution of the words ποιεῖτε and ἀνάμνησις; but it does not fall within the scope of this article to enter into the merits of the controversy which has been raised in mediæval and recent rather than in primitive times over the exact significance of those terms.

The reader is referred to Smith's Dict. of the Bible for the theory and history of Jewish sacrifices. They all foreshadowed the sacrifice of Christ on Calvary, since which time St. Augustine says that "in lieu of all these sacrifices and oblations Christ's body is offered and ministered to the partakers" (de Civ. Dei, xvii. 20), that "the mysteries of the Jews were succeeded by the sacrifice which He afterwards willed to be celebrated in the church in the stead of them all, because by all of them He was prefigured." (De Bapt. cont. Don. iii. 27; adv. Leg. i. 37; c. Faust. xx. 13, 21; Enar. in Psalm. xxxix. 12; Euseb. Demonstr. Evang. ii. 10; Apost. Const. vi. 23; Leo I. Serm. lvii. de Pass. § 7; Theodoret in Heb. xiii. 10; Cyril, adv. Nest. iv. 5.) The same and other writers frequently dwell on the offering of Melchizedek as prefiguring the eucharistic sacrifice (Aug. de Civ. Dei, xvi. 22, xvii. 17, xviii. 35; c. Adv. Leg. i. 38, 39; Cyprian, Ep. 63, § 4; Clement of Alex. Strom. iv. § 25; Euseb. Dem. Ev. v. 3; Jerome, Ep. ad Marcellam, &c.). Other writers, especially St. Chrysostom, dwell on the identity of the eucharistic sacrifice with that which Christ offered (Hom. 2, in 2 ad Tim. Hom. 50 in Matt. vii.; Hom. 17 in Heb. ix. 38, in eos qui Pascha jejunant iii. § 4, &c.).

We append a list of the various sacrificial titles applied to the Eucharist in early documents Eastern and Western.

The sacrifice, sacrificium (Ambros. in Ps. 38, Sacram. Leon and frequent.), θυσία (Lit. S. Jas. Hammond, edit. pp. 25, 39, &c.; Apost. Const. ii. 57). The holy sacrifice, sacrificium unde dispensatur victima sancta (Aug. Conf. ix. 13), ἡ ἱερὰ θυσία, Chrys. (Hom. de Bapt. Chr. tom. ii. p. 375). The new sacrifice, novum sacrificium (Bede, in Hom. S. Pentecost. bk. vii. p. 59, edit. 1563). The Lord's sacrifice, sacrificium Dominium (Cyprian, Ep. lxiii. 9). The awful sacrifice, ἡ φρικτὴ θυσία (Chrys. Hom. iii. § 4, in Philipp.; De S. Pentecost. Hom. i. p. 493, &c.). The pure sacrifice, sacrificium purum (Iren. iv. 17, 5; v. 25, 4). The inexhaustible sacrifice, ἡ ἀνάλωτος θυσία (Chrys. Ep. ad Hebr. Hom. xvii. 3). The daily sacrifice, sacrificium quotidianum (Sacr. Leon. Mens. Jul. xliv. iv. Conc. Tolet. can. 5, Greg. Mag. Dial. iv. 58, &c.), θυσία καθημερινή (Chrys. iii. Hom. in Eph. in. 4). The daily sacrifice of the church (Aug. de Civ. Dei, x. 20). The perpetual sacrifice, sacrificium perenne (Miss. Goth. edit. Mab. p. 297). The sacrifice of salvation, sacrificium salutis (Wal. Strabo, Vit. S. Galli, i. 19). The sacrifice of Christians, sacrificium Christianorum (Aug. c. Faust. xx. 18). The sacrifice of Christ, sacrificium Christi (Cyprian, de Unit. Eccles. c. 17). The sacrifice of Christ's Body, sacrificium corporis Christi (Fulgentius, Epist. xiv.; Resp. ad Quæst. 5, Ferrand. Aug. Ep. ad Honorat.). The sacrifice of bread and wine, sacrificium panis et vini (Fulgentius de Fide ad Petr. § 60). The sacrifice of praise, sacrificium laudis (Sacr. Gel. Miss. Goth. edit. Mab. p. 191; Aug. c. Adv. Leg. i. 39, &c.), θυσία αἰνέσεως (Lit. of S. Jas. Gk. in Orat. Veli). The sacrifice of thanksgiving, sacrificium gratiarum actionis (Ethiop. Lit.). The unbloody sacrifice, ἀναίμακτος θυσία (Euseb. de Vit. Const. iv. 45; Athenag. Leg. pro Christo, § 13, &c. frequent.). The most pure and unbloody sacrifice; καθαρωτάτη καὶ ἀναίμακτος θυσία (Greg. Naz. Orat. v. c. Jul. xxix.). The reasonable and unbloody and mystical sacrifice, θυσία λογικὴ καὶ ἀναίμακτος καὶ μυστική (Apost. Constitt. vi. 23). The tremendous and unbloody sacrifice, ἡ φοβερὰ καὶ ἀναιμακτὸς θυσία (Lit. S. Jas. in Orat. Veli). The spiritual sacrifice, sacrificium spirituale (Stowe Missal. Syr. Lit. of S. Jas.), ἡ πνευματικὴ θυσία (Apost. Constitt. viii. 46; Cyril. Jer. Orat. xxiii. Mystag. v. 8). The intellectual sacrifice, λογικὴ θυσία (Euseb. Dem. Evang. i. 10). So Christ is said to be intellectually sacrificed (νοητῶς), Cyril. Alex. in Zeph. iii. 8, 10. The true and full sacrifice, sacrificium verum et plenum (Cyprian, Ep. lxiii.). The holy and most awful sacrifice, ἁγία καὶ φρικωδεστάτη θυσία (Cyril. Jer. v. Myst. Cat. 9). The honouring and saving sacrifice, honorificentiae et sacrificii salutaris obsequium (Fulgentius, ad Monim. ii. 2–5). The most true and single sacrifice of the new law, verissimum et singulare sacrificium novae legis (Aug. Lib. de Spiritu, xi.). The oblation of the church, ecclesiae sacrificium (Fulgent. ad Monim. lib. ii. c. vi.); Ecclesiae oblatio (Iren. iv. 18, 1). The oblation of the Body and Blood of Christ, oblatio corporis et sanguinis Christi (Fulgent. Respons. ad Quæst. 5, Ferrand. Epist. xiv.). The reasonable offering, ἡ λογικὴ λατρεία (Anaph. of St. Basil), oblatio rationalis (Ethiop. Lit.). The tremendous and life-giving offering, προσφορὰ φρικτὴ καὶ σωτήριος (Chrys. in eos qui Pasch. jejun. iii. § 4).

It would be impossible to present the reader with a complete catena of the passages in early liturgies, councils, and writings in which the eucharistic sacrifice is mentioned. The following list of sacrificial phrases from the earliest western sacramentary will afford an idea of the extent to which the thought and language of the early church were saturated with the conception of sacrifice. The same phrases, with many variations and additions, abound in all early service books, Roman, Gallican, and Mozarabic. The writings of Eastern saints and the Eastern liturgies abound equally in the use of θυσία and προσφορά, with many cognate and compound phrases.

In the sacramentary of Leo—"Divinum sacrificium (Mense Aprili, xii.); sacrificium placationis et laudis (ib. xiii.); laudis tuae domine hostias immolamus (Mens. April. xiv. Jul. xli.); hostia placationis et laudis; spiritualis hostia quae miro ineffabilique mysterio et immolatur semper et eadem semper offertur (Muratori, de Reb. Lit. 198); sacrificium singulare quod majestati tuae et semper redditur et debetur (Mens. Jul.), Prec. Diurn. xxxv. xxxviii.; hostias tibi domine deferimus immolandas (ib.); hostias tibi, domine, suppliciter immolamus (ib.); sacrificium nostrum (*in Natal. The following are among the various titles applied to the Eucharist in the ancient Celtic church of Great Britain and Ireland:

Hostia; (Syn. Hibernens. ii. 21) oblatio; (Reg. Columbani, c. iv.) ᚑᚃᚏᚏᚓᚅᚅ; (Senchus Mor. i. 126, ii. 344) ᚏᚐᚌᚑᚃᚏᚐᚌᚌ; (Book of Deer) sacrificium; (Gildas, Praefat. de Poeniten. §§ 6, 7, 8; Hibernens. xli. 4; Reg. S. Colum. cxii.) sacrificale mysterium; (Cuminius, Vit. S. Colum. p. 29)." To celebrate the Holy Eucharist was expressed by—"Offerre (Gildas, Praef. de Poenit. xxiv.; Hibernens. xviii. 6); sacra offerre (Gildas, ib. xxiii.); offerre sacrificium (Liber Davidis, can. xii.; Patricii, Confessio, xiv.); sacra oblationis mysteria ministrare (Adamnan, Vit. S. Colum. i. 40); sacram oblationem consecrare (ib. iii. 17); immolare hostiam (Secundini Hymnus, Irish Hymnary, p. 17)."

The word "sacrificium" was used equally for that which was offered to God, and for that which was given to and received by the communicant. St. Gall told his scholar Magnoaldus, "My master Columbanus is accustomed to offer unto the Lord the sacrifice of salvation in brazen vessels" (Wal. Strabo, Vit. S. Galli, i. 19). The twelfth canon of the synod of St. Patrick runs thus; "He who deserveth not to receive the sacrifice in his life, how can it benefit him after his death?" (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, ii. 2, 335). St. Patrick said to the newly-baptized virgin daughters of Laoghaire, "Ye cannot see the face of Christ except ye taste of death, and except ye receive the sacrifice." And they answered, "Give us the sacrifice that we may behold the Son our Spouse," and they received the Eucharist of God, and they slept in death (Book of Armagh, fol. 12a). The two words communion and sacrifice are frequently used together in one phrase in the Leabhar Breac. "Thereafter Patrick sent forth his spirit, and he received communion and sacrifice from bishop Tassach's hand" (fol. 29 b; see also fols. 65 a, 66 a).

The use of the word "sacrificium" for Eucharist is frequent in the service books and ecclesiastical documents of the Anglo-Saxon church. This is natural in a church which accepted through its founder the Roman liturgy in the shape of the Gregorian Sacramentary, modified by the introduction of several Gallican and perhaps of a few Celtic features. Illustrations might be drawn from almost any page of the Anglo-Saxon missals or other service books (Surtees, Soc. vol. lxi. p. ix.), and from the regulations concerning the Eucharist laid down in the penitentials of Theodore, cap. xii. (7th century); of Bede, cap. viii. (8th century); of Egbert, cap. xii. (8th century), &c. (Lingard J. Anglo-Saxon Church, edit. 1858, vol. i. p. 265).

SACRIFICIUM. The anthem commonly called the offertory ("quod in honore sacrificium canitur;" see Isidore, de Eccl. Off. i. 14) was so called among the Goths of Spain, as by Isidore of Seville, A.D. 595 (Epist. ad Leudefr. § 5).

Sacrificium is the invariable heading of the offertories in the Mozarabic Missal. Ex. (the offertory for Easter): "Sacrificium. Ecce Agnus (John i. 29). V. Dicunt qui (Ps. cvi. 1-3). P. Qui tollit. V. Gloria et honor Patri. P. Qui tollit peccatum." [W. E. S.]

SACRILEGE. Amongst the acts which are specifically classed as sacrilege, we may enumerate—

(α) The act of one who "acceptam a sacerdote Eucharistiam non sumpserit" (Conc. Tolet. i. cap. 14).

(β) The seizure of sacred or ecclesiastical property (Conc. Vas. ii. c. 4, A.D. 529, citing St. Jerome's letter to Nepotianus). In this category we find the seizure of the goods of a bishop at his death by the clergy (Conc. Chalc. can. 22), especially the plunder of the palace and the licence that prevailed through the whole of Rome and its suburbs on the death of the supreme pontiffs (Ravennat. sub Joan. iv. c. 11, ob. A.D. 685). Akin to this is the removal of anything from the episcopal residence during the vacancy of the see (Conc. Herd. can. 16, A.D. 524). [VACANCY.]

At a later period we find traces of the seizure of the goods of deceased presbyters or clerics.

(γ) A bishop's delivering over a monastery to spoliation (Conc. Hispal. ii. c. 10, A.D. 619).

(δ) The sale of any of the vessels of the church on the part of a presbyter or deacon (Capitula Martini Brac. c. 17, cent. 6).

St. Ambrose melted the sacramental plate at Milan to redeem some captives, and the Arians branded that as sacrilege. But St. Ambrose justified himself, arguing that it is better to have preserved the vessels of living men than lifeless vessels. A similar thing was done by St. Augustine, by Acacius, bishop of Amida, by St. Cyril at Jerusalem, and by Deogratias of Carthage. Bingham shews that in the Code of Justinian a special provision was made for selling the church plate in these exceptional cases. A similar provision in the canon law was made by the council of Rheims (Can. 22).

(e) Offences against the person and rights of the sovereign (Cod. Theod. lib. 6, tit. 5). See PRINCES, ALLEGIANCE TO.

(ζ) Plundering the graves of the dead. (Cod. Theod. ix. 17 says that this act was always esteemed "proximum sacrilegio.")

(η) Impeding a clergyman in the performance of his office by imposing upon him other duties (Cod. Theod. 16, 2).

(θ) Allied to this is the disturbance of divine service and affronting its ministers (Cod. Theod. 16, 2).

(ι) Bingham quotes the words of pope Gelasius in proof of the position that the abstaining from the cup in Holy Communion is sacrilege: ". . . quidam sumpta tantummodo corporis sacri portione a calice sacri cruoris abstinent . . . divisio unius ejusdemque mysterii sine grandi sacrilegio non potest provenire."

(κ) The name of sacrilege is given even to a neglect of ignorant or careless teachers in preaching the word of God to the people: "qui divinae legis sanctitatem aut nesciendo confundunt aut negligendo violant et offendunt sacrilegium committunt" (Cod. Theod. ap. Bingham, xvi. 6, 27).

There are many acts which are classed as sacrilege by the canonists without being actually called by that name in conciliar decrees; for example:—

(1) Wrapping a corpse in the altar-pall (palla altaris). (Clem. Ep. ii.)

(2) A deacon using the same as a covering for his shoulders (ibid.).

(3) The act of one who "ad sepulcra martyrum adjungit corpora praecipitatorum insanorum."

(4) Not consuming the Eucharist in church (Caesar. c. 3).

(5) Giving the Eucharist to the dead.

(6) Offering anything but bread and the cup with mingled wine and water.

(7) A layman undertaking publicly to teach the word of God (Trull. c. 64).

(8) Destroying or mutilating books of Scripture, or delivering them to booksellers or perfumers (unguentarii) to be destroyed (Trull. c. 68).

(9) Profanation of churches by traffic (Trull. c. 76); or introducing cattle (Trull. c. 88); or impropriety (Trull. c. 97).

(10) Giving or receiving the Communion (communionem) in any vessel (Trull. c. 101).

(11) Drawing figures of the cross upon the ground, thus causing the emblem of our salvation to be trodden upon (Trull. c. 73).

(12) Offering improper bread for consecration in the Eucharist (Conc. Tolet. c. 6, A.D. 693).

(13) Misuse of the sacred chrism for medicinal or other purposes (Conc. Arelat. iv. cap. 18, A.D. 813).

(14) The act of the traditores in delivering up the Scriptures and sacred vessels to heathen authorities for destruction.

(15) A cleric of any rank consulting augurs, soothsayers, fortune-tellers, or magicians (Conc. Tol. iv. c. 28).

With regard to the punishment enacted against sacrilege, it appears from the 16th canon of the council of Lerida (Ilerd.) already quoted that conviction was followed by "prolixius anathema." The guilty were disqualified for accusation ("nullatenus ad accusationem sunt admittendi," Eutychian Epist. 2).

The mode of inflicting the punishment is described at length in the 24th canon of the second council of Tours (A.D. 567). The occasion was the seizure of church property. The offender was to be admonished by the presbyter of the church that had suffered. If he would not make restitution, he was to be addressed as a son in letters by all the brethren. But if he was finally recalcitrant after a third admonition, abbats and presbyters assembled to pronounce the solemn anathema. The clergy were shut in choir, Christ being their helper. The 109th Psalm (Vulg. 108) was said to the murderer of the poor, that "upon him might come the curse that came upon Judas." The effect of the denunciation is declared to be that he should die not only excommunicate, but anathematized, and should be smitten with the sword of heaven. [MALEDICTION.]

The fourth council of Toledo speaks of the sacrilege of grave-robbing as having been punishable by death under the public laws, and enacts, accordingly, that a cleric who is guilty of the crime be deposed from his orders, and do three years' penance (c. 45). In the excerpts of archbishop Egbert (quoting Jerome) sacrilegious persons are ranked with murderers. The infliction of punishment (presumably capital punishment) is there pronounced to be not "effusio sanguinis." Elsewhere they are catalogued with "heretics, suspected, excommunicated, felons, thieves, resorters to fortune-tellers and wizards" (Eutych. Epist. 2, ap. Antonii Augustini Juris Pontif. Epitome, Lib. 34, tit. ix. pars ii. cap. 8).

Legend, as usual, is not backward in depicting the horrors of sacrilege. See, for instance, Gregory of Tours de Gloria Martyrum, cap. 17; de Miraculis S. Martini, lib. i. [H. T. A.]

SACRISTA, SACRISTANUS. The minister to whom the care of the sacred vessels, vestments, and furniture was committed. "Sacrorum custos; idem qui Thesaurarius" (Durand. Rational. lib. ii. c. 1, n. 14). [SCEUOPHYLAX.] [E. V.]

SACRISTY. [DIACONICUM; SCEUOPHYLACIUM; SECRETARIUM.]

SADOC, Feb. 20, bishop, martyr in Persia under Sapor (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.). [C. H.]

SADOTH, Oct. 19, martyr in Persia under Sapor (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.). [C. H.]

SAGAR, Oct. 6, bishop of Laodicea, reputed disciple of St. Paul (Mart. Usuard., Vet. Rom., Notker.). [C. H.]

SAGUM. This word is properly applied to a cloak worn by the inferior ranks of the Roman soldiery. We gather from Isidore that it was of Gallican origin and rectangular in form (Etymol. xix. 24. 13). With its military use we have no concern here, but it is necessary to remark that in the 8th century we find several prohibitions against the use of the sagum by clerics. Thus a council held in A.D. 742 under the presidency of Boniface, either at Ratisbon or Augsburg, orders that "priests and deacons shall not wear saga like laymen, but casulae" (can. 7; Labbe, vi. 1535). The rules of this council were confirmed by a capitulary put forth by Carloman at Liptinae in the following year (Baluzius, Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 149). Again, in a letter of Boniface to Cuthbert (A.D. 745), we find a reference to his prohibition to the "servants of God" of the use of saga or weapons. In the Theodosian Code, sagum is the name applied to the cloak or outer covering used by those who looked after the horses used for public conveyance. These are not to be taken away or torn by those employing the horses (lib. viii. tit. 5, ll. 37, 48, 50; and see Gothofredus's note). For further references see Ducange's Glossarium, s. v. [R. SAINTES, COUNCIL OF (SANTONENSE CONCILIUM), A.D. 562, when Heraclius, a presbyter, was nominated to that see in lieu of Emerius, appointed to it uncanonically by king Clotaire I. But the bishops were fined for this act by Chérebert, the son of Clotaire, and Emerius was maintained in his office. (Mansi, ix. 783–786.) [E. S. Ff.]

SAINTS (Sancti, ἅγιοι). (1) The people of God, as holy by election and profession, have been so called under both dispensations (Deut. xxx. 3; Ps. l. 5; cxlix. 1, 5, 9; &c., and N. T. Rom. i. 7; 1 Cor. i. 2; Eph. i. 1, iv. 12; Col. i. 2; Jude 3; &c.). This scriptural use of the word was common for more than three centuries after Christ. With Constantine the visible church is ὁ ἁγίων σύλλογος, the assembly of the saints (Tit. Orat. ad SS. Coetum). In several passages in which St. Chrysostom speaks of the intercession of "the saints," the context shews that he means our living brethren (Hom. 44 in Gen. § 2; Hom. 5 in Matth. Ev. § 4; Hom. 5 in Ep. 2, ad Eph. § 1). "Grex sanctorum" is the church in the language of Victor Vitensis (de Persec. Afric. 5). Caesarius of Arles, referring to the precept (St. James v. 16), "Confess your faults one to another," says that "Scripture advises us to confess our sins, not only to God, but also to the saints and those who fear God" (Serm. lvi. § 7).

But several conventional restrictions of the meaning of this term were at the same time growing up. Thus it was sometimes limited to those who lived up to their holy profession, the true saints in the visible kingdom of saints; as when some persons, condemned by the council of Milevi, A.D. 416 (cans. 7, 8), attempted to explain away the use of the petition, "Forgive us our trespasses," by "the saints." Again it sometimes meant those who were especially devoted to holy offices or to a holy life, as the clergy and monks and nuns. Thus Cyril of Jerusalem calls a certain rite in baptism "the insufflations of the saints" (Catech. Myst. ii. 3). Salvian, complaining of the oppressions of his day; "Viduarum et pupillorum viscera devorantur, et cum his ferme sanctorum omnium" (de Gubern. Dei, 5). In the East again the writers of holy Scripture were especially so called. See examples in the Festal Epistles of St. Athanasius, pp. 14, 20, 25, 39 (Engl. Tr. Oxf.). St. Basil of Caesarea asks, "Which of the saints has left in writing the words of invocation at the consecration of the bread of Eucharist and the wine of blessing? For we are not content with those things which the apostle or the gospel has mentioned, but we say other things" (de Spir. Sanct. 27, § 66).

(2) Saints in the Calendar.—The use of the title "saint" to denote a "martyr designatus" (Tertull. Ad Mart. 1) or "vindicatus" (Optatus, de Schism. Donat. i. 16), or a confessor raised to the same rank, is not earlier than the 5th century. [Compare CALENDAR; MARTYROLOGY.] We find it, however, in a Roman table of gospels, "Capitula Lectionum Evangelii ann. circ. ad missam," which Martene thinks not later than the beginning of that period, almost every name being preceded by the title "sanctus" (Martene and Durand, Thesaur. v. 66). Another calendar of the 5th century is headed, "Hic continentur dies natalicium rum martyrum et depositiones episcoporum, quos ecclesia Carthagenis anniversaria celebrant" (sic) (Analecta Vet. Mab. 163, ed. 2, Ruinart, u. s. 693). Here the title of saint is given to nearly all; but the custom does not seem to have been quite familiar to the compiler; for the first six in the list are without it; though four of them are described as martyrs. The rest, above 80 in number, with three apparently accidental exceptions, are all called saints. The Calendar of Polemeus Silvius, or rather P. Annaeus Silvius, was written for the year 448. Beside heathen festivals, birthdays of emperors, &c., prognostications of weather, and some of the greater Christian festivals, it notes "Natalis S. Vincentii Martyris, Depositio sancti Petri et Pauli, Natalis S. Laurentii Martiris, Natalis S. Hippoliti Mart., Natalis S. Stephani Mart." (Boll. u. s. 176; Mai, Script. Vet. Nov. Coll. v. i. 54). Certain Fasti Consulares, which end at the year 493, contain memoranda of nine martyrdoms, and of the translation of SS. Andrew and Luke to C. P.; but in only two instances (St. Laurence, St. Euphemia) is the title of saint employed (Boll. u. s. 186). A fragment of a Gothic calendar found in the library at Milan names six martyrs, but styles none of them saints. It was compiled before 553, but when does not appear. It is therefore uncertain whether the omission is a mark of great antiquity or a peculiarity of the Gothic church (Mai, u. s. 66). In the Calendarium Romanum of the 8th century, printed by J. Fronto (Epist. et Dissert. 133, Veron. 1733), the title is scrupulously prefixed to every name; as it is also to those found on a marble calendar of the ninth given by Mai (u. s. 58).

(3) Commemoration in the Liturgy.—The one privilege accorded at the earliest period to the recognised saints of any church, was annual mention in its liturgy. Thus St. Cyprian, speaking of two martyrs, says, "As ye remember, we always offer sacrifices for them, whenever we celebrate the passion and days of martyrs by a yearly commemoration" (Epist. 34, ad Cler. ed. Ben.). [NATALE.] He ordered the deaths of persons under persecution to be notified to him, that they might be thus commemorated (Epist. 37). It was in fact a part of the bishop's duty to control the services of the church in this as well as other respects. Even at the later period, when martyrs became objects of worship, it was the bishop who exercised the right of admission or exclusion: "De . . . . sanctis noviter inventis, nisi episcopo probante, minime venerentur" (Capit. Car. Mag. A.D. 805, c. 17; comp. Conc. Francof. 794, can. 42; Capit. Reg. Franc. v. 257; vi. 283). Before long persons not martyrs, but sufferers for the truth and eminent for holiness (see the earlier limitations in Hermas Pastor, i. vis. 3, § 1; iii. Simil. § 28; relaxed in Cyprian Epist. 37 ad Cler.), received the same honour under the title of confessors. One such, viz. Sylvester, but only one, appears in the Roman calendar of the beginning of the 5th century, printed by Martene (Thesaurus Anecd. v. 66). At length such commemoration, whether annual or by request more frequent, became an object of ambition, and was purchased by gifts or bequests. E.g., a matron named Theodilana in the 6th century (Mabill. Anal. Vet. 160, ed. 2) made a donation, and Remigius of Rheims (Labb. Biblioth. MSS. i. 806), and Bertram of Mans (Mab. u. s. 257) made bequests to churches on condition that their names should be "inscribed in the book of life (the diptychs) and recited on every festival."

The names of the Virgin, apostles, and other chief saints were recited from the diptychs with the rest, in some churches even down to the 8th century (Salig, de Dipt. Vet. iii. 34, Halae Magdeb. 1731); but a distinction was felt to be desirable even before that period, and in the West the more eminent names had for some time occupied a permanent place in the liturgy itself. Hence within our period there were prayers for the blessed Virgin and others by name, certainly in most of, presumptively in all the liturgies, except the Clementine, which was modelled on the earlier rite, and the Nestorian of Theodore and Nestorius which were derived from the primitive liturgies of Mopsuestia and Constantinople. At first these intercessions were said by the priest at the altar, and after the consecration (Notitia Eucharistica, 421, ed. 2); but after a while, obviously for the sake of greater distinction, they were generally removed to an earlier part of the service. A surviving witness to the earlier arrangement is found in the Armenian liturgy: "The Priest: We pray that the mother of God, the holy Virgin Mary, John the Baptist, the first confessor and archdeacon St. Stephen, and all saints, be commemorated in this holy liturgy. Choir. Remember them, O Lord, and have mercy upon them" (Neale's Introd. to Hist. of East. Church, 594). Other names follow. In the original text of St. James after the consecration God is simply besought to remember all the orthodox "from righteous Abel unto this day," but the later adds, "that we may find mercy and peace with all the saints, ... especially our most holy . . . . lady," &c. (Assemani Codex Liturg. iv. P. 2, 45). The Sicilian St. James, not only commemorates the Blessed Virgin, archangels, the baptists, the apostles, prophets and martyrs in general terms, and St. Stephen and James by name (ibid. 68) before the consecration, but also prays for "the memory, pardon, and repose" of all the archbishops of Jerusalem after James, naming some of them (76). After the consecration (p. 86) it commemorates a great number of the saints of Scripture, and many martyrs and others by name, "not that we are worthy to commemorate their blessedness, but that they, standing before Thy dread and awful throne, O Lord, may remember our piteous state."

In the West the Roman use commemorates by name (in the Communicantes) the Blessed Virgin, eleven of the twelve apostles, St. Paul (associated with St. Peter), Linus, Cletus, Clement, Xystus, Cornelius, Cyprian, Lawrence, Chrysogonus, John and Paul, Cosmas and Damian; to which the local churches added names at will (Martene, de Ant. Rit. Eccl. l. iv. 8, n. 16). This was before the consecration. After, it prays for part and lot with "the holy Apostles and martyrs John, Stephen, Matthias (omitted before), Barnabas, Ignatius," and ten others. In both formularies it avoids prayer for them. The Mozarabic now merely commemorates (before the consecration) the B. V. the apostles, &c.; but still "offers on behalf of the spirits of those at rest, of Hilary, Athanasius, Martin, Ambrose, Augustine, Fulgentius," &c.—In all sixty-five names are mentioned (Leslie, Missale Mozar. 4, 225).

When the system of Missae was formed in the West the several collects composed for a saint's day mentioned him by name. The reference to him was various; but in one of them at least a prayer was offered for his repose. Such prayers, however, were so contrary to the feeling of the early mediaeval church that only two examples have come down to us in the sacramentaries of Rome; viz. the secretae in the Missae for St. Leo and St. Gregory. Until altered, not long before the time of Innocent III., A.D. 1198 (Decr. Const. iii. 130, in Opp. ii. 764, Colon. 1575), they began thus, "Grant unto us, O Lord, that this oblation may profit the soul of Thy servant" (Sacram. Gregor. in Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. ii. 25, 102).

It was an early rule that no saint's day should be kept in Lent (Conc. Laodic. can. 51; Conc. Tolet. A.D. 656, cap. 1), and none are set down for that season in the earliest Roman table of gospels (Martene, Thesaur. v. 66), nor could there have been any in the old Gallican lectionary found at Luxeuil (Lit. Gall. 124).

Litanies of the Saints.—Originally the ectenes of the Greek and Oriental churches seem to have contained no reference to the departed (Notitia Eucharistica, 422). Now they have a commemoration of the Virgin and other saints introduced somewhat awkwardly (Goar, Euchol. Graec. 66, 74; Renaudot, Lit. Orient. i. 9, 139, 149, 506, 514; Raulin, Liturg. Malab. 298).

Nor were they commemorated, except very generally, in any of the corresponding Western forms, the Missal litanies, as said in the Missa Catechumenorum (in the Ambrosian rite immediately after the ingressa [INTROIT]) from a very early period. In the Missal litany preserved at Fulda (Bona, Rer. Liturg. i. 4, n. 3), the only allusion to the saints is in the clause "Sanctorum Apostolorum et Martyrum memores sumus, ut orantibus eis pro nobis veniam mereamur." There is no reference to them whatever in the two litanies retained in the Ambrosian Missal (Pamelius, Liturgica, i. 328, 331), or in the Mozarabic and Gallican PRECES, the last form of the eucharistic litany in Spain and France. But when litanies disappeared from the liturgy, they were still used in PROCESSIONS, and in the visitation of the sick. As so used, however, we find them enlarged by direct invocations to saints; as "Sancta Maria, ora pro nobis," &c.—Above 150 are thus addressed by name in an old litany of English use ascribed to the 8th century, printed by Mabillon (Anal. Vet. 168). Another of the same character, and also English of the 9th century, is given by Mr. Proctor (Hist. of B. C. P. 230) from a MS. (H. i. 23) in the Cambridge University Library. An Anglo-Saxon litany printed by Mai (Script. Vet. Nova Coll. v. i. 66) from a MS. of Bury St. Edmund's, now in the Vatican, contains thirty names, all purely national; except that of St. Helena. One of Gallican use, and of the age of Charlemagne (Mabill. Anal. 171), gives about 200 names, among which we find those of Oriel, Raguel, Tobiel, which Zachary, in a council held at Rome in 745 (act. 3), declared to be "the names not of angels, but of devils" (Labb. Conc. vi. 1561). Later litanies of this kind may be seen in Bona u. s. App. (Codex Chisian.), and Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. I. vii. 4, (ordo 6 (above 280 names), ordd. 11, 13, 15, 17, 25).—See litanies as used at the dedication of a church [PROCESSION, ii. B. 15] in the Ordo Romanus, Bernoldi (in Hittorp. Eccl. Off. 108, ed. 1); and Martene (de Ant. Eccl. Rit. ii. 13, ord. 4). They contain each about fifty names. For similar litanies sung at the coronation of an emperor, see Mart. u. s. ii. 9, ord. 5 (at Milan), and ii. 23, ord. 9 (at Rome) in ed. 2; at that of a king of France, ii. 10, ord. 7 (58 names). SALARIA or SALARIUM. A saltcellar, generally of some precious metal, for holding the salt used in consecrating holy water, or in the sacrament of baptism, was a usual piece of church furniture towards the end of our period. Flodoardus (Hist. S. Remig. lib. ii. c. 5) mentions "cochlearia duodecim et salarium argenteum." Bernard. Mon. (in Ord. Cluniac. part i. c. 27) speaks of the "salaria" of the refectory, into which what remained over of the salt, when the holy water was consecrated, was put. At a later period, among the church furniture of York Minster (Mon. Angl. iii. 171), was a silver saltcellar, gilt inside, "pro sale in dominicis diebus benedicendo." [E. V.]

SALT, THE RITUAL USE OF I. Put into Holy Water.—See HOLY WATER, § iv. Prayers for the exorcism and benediction of the salt before it was mixed with the water may be seen in the Sacramentary of Gelasius (Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. i. 739–741) in that of Gregory (Murat. u. s. ii. 225; Opp. S. Greg. iii. 233, ed. Ben.), in the Romanizing rite of Besançon found by Mabillon at Bobio (Mus. Ital. i. 386), &c. Holy water was often made expressly to be sprinkled in the house of the sick, and then, as at other times, was "aspersa sale." See Ordines vi. 16, in Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. vii. 4. The origin of the custom is not known, but it is possibly connected with a heathen practice, described by Balsamon as having been observed annually at Constantinople even in Christian times, of sprinkling every house with water from the sea (Comment. in Conc. Trull. can. 65).

II. At the Dedication of a Church.—On such occasions blessed water mixed with ashes was used, and salt was added here also. It was supposed to represent divine truth; while the water was a symbol of the people; the ashes, of the sacrifice of the Lamb of God. With this mixture the bishop signed the corners of the altar, and sprinkled various parts of the church. What remained was poured out at the foot of the altar (Remigius Autiss. de Dedic. Eccl. 4–6). There are no examples earlier than the 8th century. See Martene, u. s. ii. 13; viz. the Gellone Missal Ord. 1; Egbert's Pontifical, Ord. 2; or Surtees Society, vol. xxvii. p. 34; the Anglican Pontifical found at Jumiéges, 3; Ordo Romanus Bernoldi in Hittorp. de Off. Cath. Eccles. 112, Col. 1568; &c. The same rite appears in the Gregorian Sacramentary (Murat. u. s. ii. 474; Opp. S. Greg. iii. 147, ed. Ben.), but not in the earlier Gelasian (Murat. u. s. i. 609).

III. Salt given to Catechumens.—This was a purely Latin rite, though some have supposed Origen to refer to it when commenting on Ezekiel xvi. 4 (Hom. in Ez. vi.). As no other Greek or Oriental writer even appears to allude to it, and the ritual books of their churches do not prescribe it, we must suppose that Origen is speaking figuratively, like the prophet whom he paraphrases. See a similar passage in Ambrose, Exp s. in Luc. Ev. x. 48; comp. Mark ix. 50, Luke xiv. 34, Col. iv. 6 It was, however, general, if not universal, among the Latins after the 3rd century. Thus we find the council of Carthage in 397, decreeing that "throughout the most solemn days of Easter no sacrament should be given to the catechumens, except the accustomed salt" (can. 5). St. Augustine also, in Roman Africa, says of himself: "Adhuc puer . . . . signabar jam signo crucis, et condiebar ejus sale" (Confess. i. 11, § 17). The Gelasian Sacramentary has a "Benedictio Salis dandi catechumenis," in which, after exorcising the salt, the bishop proceeds: "Proinde rogamus Te . . . . ut haec creatura salis in nomine Trinitatis efficiatur salutare sacramentum." This is followed by a "Benedictio post Salem datum" (Murat. u. s. i. 534; Codices Sacrament. Thomas. 49; Romae, 1689). All this is preserved in the Gregorian books. See Murat. u. s. ii. 60, and other examples in Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. I. i. 6, Ord. 3. The rite is not found in the old Gallican books (Thomasius, u. s.; Liturg. Gall. Mabill.; Sacram. Gall. Vet. in Mus. Ital. i.; Murat. u. s. ii.), but is recognised by the Romanizing bishops of the empire, whom Charlemagne consulted on the subject of baptism, as Leidrad. Lugd. (De Baptismo, 1), Magnus Senon. (in Martene, u. s. art. 17), Theodulf of Orleans (Epist. ad. Jomn. 5), &c. In Spain Hildefonse of Toledo (A.D. 657) had only heard of the rite as local: "Catechumenis in nonnullis locis, ut refertur, sales accipiunt. . . . . Usquequaquam non probatur" (De Cognit. Bapt. i. 26). It is, however, acknowledged by Isidore of Seville (De Offic. ii. 20): "Exorcisantur, deinde salem accipiunt." In the 9th century it was still known that this rite was not apostolic: "Alii addiderunt in baptismatis sacramento exorcismos, alii consecrationem fontis, alii salis, vel salivae infusionem" (Walafr. Strabo, de Rebus Eccl. 26).

The salt was given at every SCRUTINIUM (Ordo Scrut. 1, 8, in Mus. Ital. ii. 77, 81), and was regarded as a symbol of that divine wisdom with which the catechumen was gradually imbued during his preparation for baptism. So Smaragdus (Epist. de Sabb. Pentec.), Isidore (De Offic. ii. 20), Magnus Senon. (u. s.), Rabanus Maurus (De Instit. Cleri, i. 27), and many others. This signification was also recognised in the formula used at the ministration, "Accipe, ill., sal sapientiae, propitiatus in vitam aeternam" (Ordo Scrutinii, 1; comp. Sacram. Gelas. Murat. i. 534; Greg. ibid. ii. 60).

IV. Given to Penitents.—In the 8th century we find in France canons, founded on that of Carthage respecting catechumens, which order salt to be given to penitents also: "Quae forma etiam a publicis poenitentibus omnino sequenda est" (Additio, 4, ad Capit. Reg. Fr. c. 63; comp. Cap. R. Fr. vii. 263).

V. In the Eucharistic Bread.—The Greeks from an early period attached importance to the presence of salt in the bread. It was the mind, they said, as the leaven was the soul of the oblate, and an azyme without them was dead (Pseudo-Damasc. De Azymis, § 1, Opp. Joann. Damasc. i. 649; comp. Mich. Cerularius ap. Humbert, Adv. Graec. Calumn. 2, and Nomocanon Graec. 426). The Armenians (Isaac Cathol. Invect. Sec. adv. Armen. xii. 8; Renuntiatio Armen. in notis Cotel. ad Constit. Apost. v. 12), the Nestorians (Martene, u. s. I. iii. 8; Le Brun, Dissert. xi, 9), and Syro-Jacobites (Assemani, Biblioth. Orient. ii. 183), are equally zealous for the custom). SAMARITAN WOMAN. This subject is not very frequently represented in Christian art. Martigny mentions four examples from the catacombs; two bas-reliefs and two frescoes. In all of them our Lord is represented standing, and not sitting, as might have been expected from John iv. 5. In the first of two sculptures, from Maffei's Verona illustr. part iii. p. 54 (see woodcut), the well is represented as a narrow pit, with a stone curb or margin like the mouth of a large jar, and supplied with a wheel, rope, and pulley; which appears to have been occasionally used at all times in the East (WELL, Smith's Dict. of the Bible), though the woman's words, οὔτε ἄντλημα ἔχεις, καὶ τὸ φρέαρ ἐστὶ βαθύ, would seem to imply that there was no such convenience. But it is represented in the MS. of Rabula, where the woman is somewhat ecclesiastically vested. The figures of our Lord and the woman stand on each side of the opening, as if the words "Give me to drink" had just been uttered. She wears a tunic and pallium, which Tertullian (de Pallio, c. 1) says was a dress proper for men, and St. Jerome (Ep. vi. ad Demetrium) attributed to women of low rank. Her hair is displayed, or only bound with a riband, in one of these examples, which may indicate indifferent character (Tertull. de Virginibus velandis, vii.); but in the other (Bottari, pl. cxxxvii.) she wears a broader kind of fillet.

Woman of Samaria (from Martigny).

One of the frescoes of this subject is in the Callixtine cemetery (Bottari, tav. lxvi.). Here the woman is alone, and the well open and without windlass. She wears a short wide-sleeved tunic; but in M. Perret's Catacombes, vol. i. pl. 71, the idea and treatment of her figure are different. She is represented as tall and noble-looking, in a long flowing tunic; not as questioning our Lord, but presenting Him with a cup of water, as He raises His hand to her, apparently speaking to her of God's gift of living water.

No less than eight examples of this subject are figured by Rohault de Fleury up to the 9th century, and he gives others of the 11th (see L'Évangile, vol. i. pl. xlviii. xlix.). His fig. 5, pl. xlviii. (6th century), from the tomb of St. Jude at Verona, is identical with the first described and figured by Martigny. His first and second figures are early work from St. Praetextatus and St. Callixtus;* he also gives a 5th-century ivory from the Musée de Cluny, and another carving from that of Arles. His next plate contains an outline from St. Apollinare nella Citta in Ravenna (6th century), the woman wearing a long robe with two stripes, and a disciple standing behind our Lord; and another from a 9th-century MS. of St. Gregory Nazianzen. Our Lord wears a violet robe, the woman a red gown fronted with yellow; the bucket and rope are in gold. The latter winds around a regular drum; and all the four last examples contain the pulley fixed in uprights.

SANCTA. The FERMENTUM, or reserved Eucharist, is so called, which, having been consecrated by the bishop of Rome, was sent to the churches in the city. The word is used as a neuter plural in the most ancient recensions of the Ordo Romanus (O. R. i. 8, 17, 18; ii. 12); but in the gloss (mentioned p. 668) on the epistle of Pseudo-Innocent to Decentius we have, "de ipsa sancta" (Mabill. Iter German. 65, Hambr. 1717). [W. E. S.]

SANCTA SANCTIS. Cyril of Jerusalem in his description of the liturgy, after commenting on the Lord's Prayer which follows Consecration, proceeds (Catech. Mystag. V. 19): Then the priest says, 'Holy things to holy men' (τὰ ἅγια τοῖς ἁγίοις). Holy are the gifts on the altar, after receiving the influx of the Holy Spirit; holy also are we, to whom the Holy Spirit has been vouchsafed; the two 'holies' correspond one to the other. Then we respond, 'One is holy, One is the Lord, Jesus Christ.'" The Sancta Sanctis, which Cyril here describes, is in nearly all Eastern liturgies the prelude to Communion. See (e.g.) the Greek St. James (Hammond's Liturgies, p. 49). [C.]

SANCTIMONIALIS. The word sanctimonialis, designating a woman of distinguished piety, is applied especially to such as were members of a religious society, or NUNS. It is not, however, limited to that use (Ducange, s. v.). Compare VIRGINS; WIDOWS. [C.]

SANCTUARY (SANCTUARIUM, SACRARIUM, SECRETARIUM). As the part of the church containing the altar, the word sanctuarium first occurs in c. 13 of the first council of Bracara (563); the corresponding word, sacrarium, in the same sense is found a little earlier in c. 3 of the council of Vaison (442). Many of the Rhenish churches had two sanctuaries, one at the east and the other at the west, and the plan of the abbey of St. Gall, attributed to the abbat Eginhard, who lived in the time of Charlemagne, presents the same arrangement. [CHURCH, p. 383.] (Viollet-le-Duc, Dict. rais. de l'Architecture, s.v. SANCTUAIRE). See PRESBYTERY; SACRARIUM. [H. T. A.]

SANCTUARY, RIGHT OF (Jus asylorum). The right to take refuge in a church. Similar rights existed both in Mosaic and in pagan times, and they in some cases extended not only to altars and churches but to persons and things such as statues and standards. (Suetonius, Vita Tiberii, c. 37; Tacitus, Annal. iii. 60). The privilege of affording refuge was conceded to the church from the first ages of the emperors becoming Christian. The codes both of Theodosius and of Justinian contain imperial constitutions for the control of this privilege. In later times the right has been abolished as having led to great abuses. The church was the seat of the bishop, and though the idea of sanctuary was not new, yet Christianity very early felt that the bishop was the natural refuge of those who were in trouble. [INTERCESSION, p. 864.] It was in fact part of the bishop's duty to intercede for those in trouble; and for this reason those who (whether justly or unjustly) had occasion to fear the civil law took refuge in the church. A decree that follows the fifty-sixth canon of the fourth synod of Carthage in 399 enacts that the bishops Epigonius and Vincent should be sent to the emperor to beg for the churches the right of asylum. This seems to shew that the right of sanctuary did not inherently reside in a church, but that it was a specific concession on the part of the civil power. Legal refuge was in point of fact nothing but the intercession of the clergy for men in distress, and, pending the issue of their efforts, the right to protect them from violence. It was in no way intended to obstruct justice, although in course of time it became so abused. A law of Justinian's distinctly affirms this position: "Templorum cautela non nocentibus, sed laesis datur a lege." Sanctuary was intended to be a shelter for the innocent, the weak, and the misunderstood, and not a refuge for systematic or determined criminals.

The right of sanctuary at first attached only to the altar and nave of the church; but in 431 it was decreed by Theodosius II. that the right should be extended also to the court, the gardens, and in fact to the entire precinct of the church.

There is a lengthy edict "concerning those who take refuge in the church" issued by the emperors Theodosius and Valentinian, from which the following passage may be quoted as shewing the boundaries to which the right of sanctuary extended in early times. "Let the temples [ναοί] of the great God be open for those who are in fear, and let the common altar [βωμός] receive the suppliants who fly to it; and let no menace presume to remove the divine aid, which is offered to all alike from its abodes. . . . . .

* Apparently given in Mr. Parker's Photograph No. 1801, and if so, very dubious as to meaning.

In our times, then, we decree to grant for the safety of fugitives not only the divine sanctuaries [θυσιαστήρια] and the oratory of the people [εὐκτήριον τοῦ λαοῦ, al. ναοῦ, i.e. the nave] which is fenced with a girdle of quadrangular walls; but whatever spot there happens to be beyond these, as far as the extreme doors of the church, where those who intend to pray first enter—we determine that it be an altar of mercy to the fugitive . . . and that the precincts next to the public property about the first doors of the holy church, whether they be in houses or in gardens, or in courts or in baths, or even in porches, shelter fugitives who enter them, just as the inmost part of the church would." (Labbe, Concil. iii. 1235, ed. Paris, 1671.)

The privilege at first rested on imperial authority; but it contributed so much to the obvious advantage of the church that it was afterwards confirmed by the pope (Pegge on Asylum in Archaeologia, vol. viii. p. 13). Boniface V., who became pope in 609, enacted (Platina, Vitae Pontificum) that "criminals who fled to churches should not be taken thence by force." From one expression, "quovis crimine patrato," it appears that no crime was bad enough to exclude a fugitive from the protection of the church (Archaeologia, vol. viii. p. 10). This, however, was afterwards modified. Gaillard (Hist. de Charlemagne, tom. iii. p. 80, ap. Pegge), writes: "All churches before the time of Charlemagne were asyla and for all sorts of criminals; but he, by a capitular, A.D. 779, conformable to one of Carloman and Pepin passed about 744, decreed that churches should not be asyla for criminals who had committed such crimes as the law punished with death; and if he did not go so far as to make it lawful to force a criminal from his asylum, yet, what came to the same thing, he prohibited people from giving them any nourishment."

As to the privilege of sanctuary in Britain, the following particulars are collected by Pegge, u. s. p. 16 ff.). In Druidism certain sacred trees were held to be asyla (Evelyn, Sylva, p. 614). Suspicion attaches to the stories which have been repeated by some historians that the Christian king Lucius (A.D. 180) conferred the privilege of sanctuary upon the church of Winchester, and that Sebert, the first Christian king of Essex (A.D. 604) did the same for the church of Westminster. Ina, king of Wessex, about A.D. 690, enacts that, "if a person who has committed a capital offence shall fly to a church, he shall preserve his life and make satisfaction as right requires. If any one deserving of stripes shall fly to a church, the punishment shall be forgiven him."

The obligation on the part of the fugitive to make composition for his crime [REDEMPTION] was decreed by the council of Mentz in 813: "Reum confugientem ad ecclesiam nemo abstrahere audeat . . . . tamen legitime componat quod inique fecit."

The early centuries of Christianity furnish many interesting incidents in connexion with the right of sanctuary. A phrase of St. Ambrose's shews that the altar was the particular spot to which the right of asylum especially belonged. He uses the expression "nec altaria tenebo." It was one of the complaints against the violent Eutychian party that they had violated this right of sanctuary, and dragged their orthodox opponents from their refuge to massacre them. St. Chrysostom, in the troubles which he incurred by his championship of orthodoxy, availed himself of refuge at the altar.

In the time of Justinian a period of thirty days was allowed for sanctuary. In later times it became much less. The Code of Theodosius denies the right of sanctuary to public debtors, that is, those who defrauded the state. Private debtors were allowed the privilege. Converted Jews who pretended to be Christians in order to escape their debts or due punishment were excepted. Apostates and heretics were denied the privilege, and the same prohibition was imposed on runaway slaves and men who had been guilty of heinous crimes. King Childebert II., when inviting two men to quit their refuge in the church of Soissons, professes that "it is wicked to punish men that have been dragged from the church, even though they be guilty") S. Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. lib. ix. cap. 38). Miracle is alleged in vindication of an outrage upon the right of sanctuary. A runaway slave takes refuge in the church of St. Lupus. His master, with much profane language, would drag him out; when his tongue is rendered powerless, and he can only produce a sound like the lowing of cattle (S. Greg. Turon. Lib. de Gloria Confessorum, cap. 67). The shelter of the church made a king feel quite secure against the poniard of the assassin. Guntramn, who became one of the four kings of the Franks in 561, with his throne at Arles, thought his usual guard unnecessary in the church; and though the sanctuary of the church did not save him from attack, yet it saved his would-be assassin, for it was thought to be a violation of the right of asylum to put to death one who had been dragged from the church (S. Greg. Turon. Hist. Francorum, lib. ix. cap. 3).

The text-book on the subject is a small book by Rittershusius, 'Ασυλια, hoc est, De jure Asylorum, Argentorati, 1624. The treatise will be found in Critici Sacri, vol. viii. See the excellent tract by Rev. Sam. Pegge in Archaeologia, vol. viii., giving a history of asylum down to its abolition under James I. [H. T. A.]

SANCTUS, July 26, martyr, native of Ravenna in the reign of Marcus Antoninus (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

SANCTUS. [PREFACE.]

SANDAPILARII. [OBSEQUIES, ix. p. 1431.]

SANGARA, or ANGARA, NOVATIAN COUNCIL OF, in Bithynia (SANGARENSE CONCILIUM), A.D. 391, at which the then Novatian bishop, Marcian, called upon one of his presbyters, a converted Jew, named Sabbatius, to defend his views about keeping Easter. After hearing him, it was voted an open question, so that each might keep Easter as he would. This decision suggested to Socrates, the historian who reports it, his well-known chapter on things indifferent. (E. H. v. 21, 22; comp. Mansi, iii. 699; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 367.) [E. S. Ff.]

SANTONENSE CONCILIUM. [SAINTES].

SAPIENTIA (SOPHIA), Aug. 1, martyr with her children Fides, Spes, Caritas (Mart. Usuard.; Cal. Armen.); Sept. 17 (Cal. Byzant.); Sept. 16 (Basil. Menol.); commemorated June 23 at Nicomedia (Notker.); July 1 at Rome (Flor.). [C. H.]

SARABAITAE were such monks as lived under no settled monastic rule, but collected in little groups of two or three, generally in some populous place, where they found purchasers for their wares, which they sold at more than the market value in consequence of their supposed sanctity. They seem, according to Jerome (Epist. 22 ad Eustoch. c. 15), to have practised all the arts whereby a reputation for sanctity with the vulgar may be won, in dress, appearance, and gesture, while they disparaged those who led more regular lives. The Egyptians called them (says Jerome, u. s.) Remboth or Remoboth. Cassian also (Collat. 18, c. 7) draws an unfavourable picture of them. (Bingham, Antiq. VII. ii. 4.) [C.]

SARABALLA, SARABARA. This word, which represents some article of Persian dress, is merely the transliteration of the Chaldee סְרְבָלִין, occurring Dan. iii. 21, 27 [94 Vulg.]. The exact meaning is doubtful, but it is most probably to be explained of some kind of hose or other covering of the leg. Thus the Vulgate, in the former of the two passages, renders the word by braccae, and Symmachus by ἀναξυρίδες. A full discussion of the meaning of the Biblical word does not fall within our province—reference may be made to Gesenius, Thesaurus, s. v. The occurrences of the word in the fathers do not help us much, for either they are references to the above passages of Daniel, with the word merely reproduced, or we are distinctly told that the meaning of the word is uncertain. We find the word in Tertullian, with the spelling sarabara (de Orat. 15, de Res. Carnis 58 [of the Three Children]; de Pallio 4 [of Alexander the Great after his eastern conquests]). Jerome adopts the spelling saraballa, or sarabala, and speaks of that with an r as corrupt (Comm. in Dan., in loc.; Patrol. xxv. 508: see also Epist. ad Innoc., ib. xxii. 329). Jerome explains the word as meaning coverings for the legs, but we find a curious difference in the explanation of Isidore (Etym. xix. 23. 2), that they are "fluxa ac sinuosa vestimenta," and that in the opinion of some they are coverings of the head, "qualia videmus in capite magorum picta." (Cf. also Aug. de Majistro, c. 10; Patrol. xxxii. 1214. Reference may also be made to Ducange's Glossary, s. v.) [R. S.]

SARAGOSSA, EIGHTEEN MARTYRS OF, Apr. 16 (Mart. Usuard.; Boll. Acta SS. Apr. ii. 406); Apr. 15 (Mart. Adon., the names being somewhat different: Mart. Hieron., the names much different; Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

SARAGOSSA, COUNCILS OF (CAESARAUGUSTANA CONCILIA). Three are reported.

(1) A.D. 380, or a year earlier or later, according to some: for which Sulpitius Severus (Hist. ii. 47) vouches as having been held against the Priscillianists, and resulted in the condemnation of two bishops, Instantius and Salvianus, and two laymen, Elpidius and Priscillian himself. "Additum etiam, ut si quis damnatos in communionem recepisset, sciret in se eandem sententiam promendam." This is the only part of his statement which connects it with the eight canons that have been assigned it, as they are, virtually, the words of the fifth canon. The rest are by no means as "plainly directed against the Priscillianists" as Hefele requires his readers to believe. The preface to them makes only twelve bishops present at their passing. Sulpitius makes his synod attended also by the bishops of Aquitaine (Mansi, iii. 633–40; Hefele, ii. 292, Eng. tr.).

(2) A.D. 592, when three canons were passed, all suggested by the conversions from Arianism that were taking place, and passed in general by those who had subscribed by themselves or their representatives to the third council of Toledo, three years before. Artemius, metropolitan of Tarragona, who had been represented there by his presbyter Stephen, presided now; and most of the eleven bishops who subscribed now subscribed then. Two more who subscribed then sent their representatives (Mansi, x. 471–4).

(3) A.D. 691, by order of king Egica, as we learn from the preface. Five canons or chapters were passed, the fifth of which, referring to the fifth canon of the thirteenth council of Toledo, and confirming it, decrees further that the widows of kings shall take the veil and enter the cloister without delay. But who presided or who subscribed on this occasion, is not stated. It may be observed also that neither of these two last councils appear in the pseudo-Isidorian collection (Mansi, xii. 41–46). [E. S. Ff.]

SARAH, the wife of Abraham, Aug. 19 (Cal. Ethiop.). [C. H.]

SARAPION. [SERAPION.]

SARBELUS, Jan. 29, martyr under Trajan (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

SARCILIS. A kind of woollen garment, mentioned together with cappae and camisiles in the Rule of Chrodegang, bishop of Metz, according to the text as given by Labbe (c. 29, vol. vii. 1458). Here it is ruled that clerics of higher standing have either sarciles or wool sufficient to make them a couple for the year's use, and clerics of lower standing are to have one each. It must be stated that the text given by D'Achéry (Spicilegium, i. 235 [here the chapter on Vestments is 41]; reprinted, Patrol. lxxxix. 1075) omits the mention of the sarciles. In a capitulary of Charlemagne of A.D. 813 (c. 19, vol. i. 510, ed. Baluzius). it is ordered that female servants of the Imperial household are to receive wool and flax to make "sarciles (al. sarcillos) et camisiles." [R. S.]

SARCOPHAGUS. [SCULPTURE.]

SARDICA, COUNCIL OF. (1) Socrates (H. E. ii. 20) and Sozomen (H. E. iii. 11.) state expressly that the council of Sardica (the modern Sophia, in Bulgarian, Triaditza) was held in the eleventh year after the death of Constantine, i.e. A.D. 347. But the fragments discovered by

Scipio Maffei place the second return of Athanasius to Alexandria in the year 346, and we know from Athanasius himself that this return was two years after the council of Sardica. Mansi therefore (iii. 87 ff) places the council in the year 344. The nineteenth of the Festal Letters of Athanasius, that for the Easter of 347, was certainly written in Alexandria. On the whole, it seems necessary to accept the year 344 or the end of 343, as the true date of the council. [See ATHANASIUS in DICT. CHR. BIOG. p. 190.]

(2) That the council of Sardica was summoned by the emperors Constans and Constantius is clear from its own encyclical (in Athanasius, Apol. c. Arian. c. 44); and that it was summoned at the desire of Paulus and Athanasius is stated both by Socrates and Sozomen (u. s.). Julius, bishop of Rome, was represented by two legates, Hosius of Cordova was president. At the very outset, however, as the Western bishops insisted on giving Athanasius a seat and a voice, the Easterns separated and held a rival council at Philippopolis, where they confirmed the deposition of Athanasius, and drew up a creed in accordance with the fourth symbol of ANTIOCH [p. 93]. It is evident that after this separation the council had no claim to be called oecumenical. The Trullan council (c. 2) adopted the canons of Sardica (as it did those of Carthage and others which have no pretensions to be oecumenical), as of authority in the Eastern as well as the Western church: but they have never been formally recognised as oecumenical. Nay, the Roman censors obelised the passage of Alexander Natalis (H. E. saec. iv., tom. iv. p. 460, ed. Venet. 1778) in which he had expressly stated the council to be oecumenical. This question has been the more hotly debated, as canons 3, 4, 7 [Greek 5] gave to deposed bishops the privilege of appealing to Julius, bishop of Rome. It seems doubtful, however, whether the council intended to do more than confer on Julius a personal privilege, as an expedient for a time of trouble and division [APPEAL, p. 197; POPE, p. 1658]. The canons of Sardica in Western MSS. are commonly appended to those of Nicaea (Maassen, Geschichte der Quellen des canonischen Rechts, i. 50 ff.) [C.]

SARDINIA, COUNCIL OF (SARDINIENSE CONCILIUM), A.D. 521, composed of African bishops then in exile there. Their synodical letter, in reply to John Maxentius and his Scythian monks, on the grace of God and human freewill, is said to have been written by St. Fulgentius (Mansi, viii. 591–600). [E. S. Ff.]

SATAN. (See DEVIL, DEMON, DRAGON, SERPENT.) The evil spirit is represented in his special character, as tempter and enemy of man, in the Book of Kells, in a temptation of our Lord. (Westwood, Anglo-Saxon and Irish MSS.) He is there a black skeleton-goblin with a tail, almost according to modern fancy. In the Psalter of Utrecht (Ps. cix. 6) he is drawn, "standing at the right hand" of the wicked man, apparently in the sense of prevailing over him. Satan is seizing him by the hair from behind, and kicking him with supernatural violence and demoniacal relish in the small of the back. (See Mr. Birch's account of the Utrecht Psalter, p. 264.) Compare DEMON, p. 543, and DEVIL, p. 547. [R. St. J. T.]

SATURDAY. [SABBATH; SABBATUM; WEEK.]

SATURNINUS (1), Jan. 31, martyr with Thyrsus and Victor; commemorated at Alexandria (Mart. Usuard., Hieron., Notker., Wand.).

(2) Feb. 2, martyr with Perpetua, Felicitas, and others; commemorated at Tuburbum in Africa (Basil. Menol.); Mar. 14 (Basil. Menol., here SATURNILUS); Mar. 7 (Mart. Usuard., Hieron.).

(3) Feb. 12, presbyter, martyr with Dativus and Felix, in Africa (Mart. Usuard.).

(4) Ap. 27, one of seven bandit chiefs, said to have been converted by Jason and Sosipater, disciples of St. Paul (Basil. Menol.).

(5) May 2, martyr with Neopolis; commemorated at Alexandria (Mart. Usuard., Hieron., Notker.).

(6) July 7, martyr in the reign of Trajan (Basil. Menol., SATURNILUS; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.).

(7) Aug. 22, martyr; commemorated with Martialis, Epictetus, and others, at Portus Romanus (Mart. Usuard., Vet. Rom., Hieron.).

(8) Oct. 6, martyr; commemorated at Capua with Marcellus, Castus, and Emilius (Mart. Usuard., Hieron., Notker.).

(9) Nov. 29, martyr, under Maximian; commemorated at Rome on the Via Salaria with Sisinnius deacon (Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Wand.). The Mart. Hieron. adds as his companions Chrysanthus, Daria, Maurus, who are named with Saturninus in the Gelasian Sacramentary in all the special prayers for his commemoration. In the Gregorian Sacramentary the name of Saturninus occurs without the others in the Secreta and Super Oblata.

(10) Nov. 29, martyr at Toulouse in the reign of Decius (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Flor., Hieron.).

(11) Dec. 23, martyr in Crete with Theodulus and others in the reign of Decius (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

SATYRIANUS (SATIRIANUS), Oct. 16, martyr with Martianus in the Vandal persecution in Africa (Mart. Usuard., Vet. Rom., Notker.). [C. H.]

SATYRUS (1), Jan. 12, (SATURUS) Arabian martyr; commemorated in Achaia (Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Hieron.); in Arabia (Notker.).

(2) Feb. 2, martyr with Saturninus, Perpetus, and others [SATURNINUS (2)].

(3) Mar. 29, martyr in Africa under Genseric (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Notker.). [C. H.]

SAUCHES. A name applied (says Jerome's Epist. 22 ad Eustoch. c. 15) by the Egyptians to those monks who lived a common life [COENOBIUM; MONASTERY]. [C.]

SAULA, Oct. 20, virgin, martyr; commemorated at Cologne with Marthe and others (Mart. Usuard.). [C. H.]

SAURCI, COUNCIL OF (SAURICIACUM CONCILIUM), A.D. 589, allowing Droctégisile, bishop of Soissons, to return to his diocese, from which he had been driven by the bishops of his province for drunkenness four years before (Mansi, ix. 1009). [E. S. Ff.]

SAVINA, ST. [SABINA (2).]

SCAPULARE. A garment to cover the shoulders (scapulae), specially in use among monks. The Rule of St. Benedict provided that his monks were to have a scapulare propter opera (c. 55, Patrol. lxvi. 771). This regulation is cited in the letter written to Charlemagne by Paul the deacon, acting on behalf of Theodemar, abbot of Monte Cassino (Patrol. xcv. 1588). The writer adds that the dress in question is worn by almost all rustics in that country. It appears therefore during the hours of work to have replaced the hood or cowl, as being shorter and more convenient.

We may compare, as more or less equivalent to it in Greek, ἀνάλαβος, ἐπωμίον, ἐπωμάδιον, καταντίον. See especially Ménard's notes to the Concordia Regularum (c. 62, Patrol. ciii. 1231). [R. S.]

SCEPTRE. [CORONATION.]

SCEUOPHYLACIUM. Another name for the Diaconicum, or sacristy, as being the repository of the utensils for divine service, τὰ ἱερὰ σκεύη, and the vestments of the priests, from which they were brought by the deacons before the commencement of the rites, and to which they were carried back again by the same minister after their conclusion, or during the singing of the post-communion hymn (Chron. Alexandr. p. 892; Cotel. in Const. Apost. lib. viii. c. 12; Goar, Euchолog. p. 16; Pallad. Vit. S. Chrysost. 92). The ancient liturgies contain special prayers to be said by the ministers in this place. That of St. James gives, εὐχὴ λεγομένη ἐν τῷ σκευοφυλακίῳ μετὰ τὴν ἀπόλυσιν. In the sceuophylacia of the chief churches were deposited copies of the imperial edicts and laws (Novell. Justin. 8, Edict. 1, in Praefat.). (See Ducange, Constantinop. Christian. lib. iii. § 87.) [DIACONICUM.] [E. V.]

SCEUOPHYLAX. An ecclesiastical officer in the Eastern church corresponding to the sacrista in the Western, to whom was committed the charge of the vessels, utensils, and vestments belonging to divine service. Such an officer is spoken of as κειμηλιάρχης, φύλαξ τῶν κειμηλίων (Soz. H. E. v. 8), φύλαξ τῶν ἱερῶν κειμηλίων (Eustath. Vit. S. Eutych. § 8), or κρατῶν τὰ σκεύη τῆς ἐκκλησίας. The authorities given by Ducange (sub voc.) shew that though the care of the sacred furniture was more commonly entrusted to a deacon, it was not unusual for a presbyter to hold the office. The church of St. Sophia at Constantinople had a large number of sceuophylaces attached to it, some of whom were presbyters, some deacons, others readers, of whom the chief was called ὁ μέγας σκευοφύλαξ. These were reduced by Heraclius (610–641) to ten, four presbyters, and six deacons (Codin. de Offic. p. 112, ed. Bonn). The "great sceuophylax" was always a leading ecclesiastic. Codinus places him (ibid. c. 1) in the first rank of the officers of the church, having a seat in the holy synod with the patriarch himself. Macedonius was sceuophylax when he was elected to the see of Constantinople (Theod. Lect. H. E. ii.). When the patriarch celebrated, the great sceuophylax stood before the sceuophylacium, and supplied him with all that was needful for the service—vessels, books, candles, &c. It was also his duty to take care of the ecclesiastical utensils of churches deprived of their bishop by death, and to see that all the churches of the city had what was needful for divine service (Gretser, Annotat. ad Codin. p. 112; Suicer, sub voc.). [E. V.]

SCHOLA CANTORUM. At Rome, in early days, there was established a school for the education of youths in ecclesiastical chant and sacred learning, who should be able to sing the solemn offices at the several churches of the city on great occasions. It was governed by an officer of great dignity and consideration in the city, who was variously called primicerius, prior scholae cantorum, or simply cantor. The origin of this school has been sometimes thought to be due to Hilarus (ob. A.D. 467), the successor of Leo the Great in the see of Rome. Sometimes it is traced to pope Sylvester (Bona, Rer. Lit. I. xxv. 20). In the Life of St. Gregory the Great, however, written by John the Deacon, the creation of the school is expressly attributed to this great reformer of the church's song himself. In any case, St. Gregory endowed the school—which, if it existed before, depended on a common fund—and constructed a residence for it. His aim appears to have been to abrogate the practice which hitherto had, in some degree at least, prevailed, of the ministers and deacons themselves executing (often inefficiently, as it appears) the singers' part. (See Conc. Rom. A.D. 595; Decret. Greg. cap. i.) From Rome the institution spread to other churches, so that by the time of Charlemagne we find mention of a schola cantorum at Lyons (Ledrad. Archiepisc. Lugd. in Ep. ad Car. Mag.). In this school of Lyons several became so learned, says their archbishop, that they could even instruct others. It was Pipin, the father and predecessor of Charlemagne, who first took measures for the introduction of Roman chanters into France to instruct the Gallicans, who appear to have been far less skilled in the execution of their church music. In a letter of Paul I. to Pipin, the writer has handed to posterity even the name of the master of one singing-school thus established, as Simeon, who is described as scholae cantorum Priori. Amongst the several schools which thus came into being, that of Metz seems speedily to have acquired distinction. For in the time of Charlemagne, we find this boast of a Frank monk, that, "in proportion as the Roman chant surpassed that of Metz, so that of Metz surpassed that of the other schools of the French." Charlemagne himself ordered the establishment of such schools in suitable places throughout his empire, with the object of setting bishops and presbyters free from the necessity of attending to the music, and so enabling them to execute their offices with the greater seemliness and dignity after the Roman model ("sicut psallit Romana ecclesia"). A school of a somewhat similar character appears to have existed in Africa two hundred years before Gregory the Great. In the Arian persecutions, twelve of the children of such a school were tortured to make them renounce the orthodox faith, and were much thought of at Carthage for the strenuous resistance which they made (Bona, Rer. Lit. I. xxv. 20).

The course of instruction is described in the phrase, "pueri in cantu, lectione, et moribus sacris instituebantur," and the life of the house by "in communi vivebant" (Petr. Episc. Urb. in Schol. ad Vit. Leonis IV.). To the instruction Charlemagne adds, "computum, grammaticam" (capit. i. 72).

Persons who afterwards rose to distinction were members of the school. Sergius I., on coming to Rome as a youth, was put into the Schola Cantorum — "quia studiosus erat et capax in officio cantilenae" (Anastasius, Vit.). The same writer records a similar history of Sergius II., Gregory II., Stephen III., and Paul I.

In the time of Stephen VI. we find that the house of the Schola Cantorum "used formerly to be called Orphanotrophium." This term may perhaps indicate that the house also served as a receptacle for the destitute children who fell to the care of the church. By the time of pope Sergius II. (A.D. 844) it appears that the house of the Schola Cantorum had fallen into a state of dilapidation from its excessive age ("prae nimia vetustate paene in ruinam posita atque contracta"). Pope Sergius restored it to a better condition than ever. (Sergii Vita, ap. Labbe, vii. 1796 D, ed. Par. 1671.)

The intention was that the Schola Cantorum should absorb all gifted boys—"in quacumque schola reperti fuerint bene psallentes pueri, tolluntur inde et mittuntur in Schola Cantorum" (rubric in Salzburg pontifical. ap. Martene I. viii. xi. ordo 9). Martene infers from a decree of Gregory the Great that the school included subdeacons and other inferior ministers (De Ant. Eccl. Rit. IV. v. 15). Gregory, however, does not explicitly say so (lib. iv. ep. 44).

An imperial constitution of Louis the Pious is indirectly a witness to the influence exercised by the Schola Cantorum. It is giving directions for the reverent execution of the Psalms in divine service; and in order to secure this end, senior brethren of unexceptionable life are to be appointed "to be in turns with the Schola Cantorum at the prescribed time" (Ludovici Pii Reform. Eccl. de Regula Clericorum, cap. xxiv. ap. Melchior Goldastus, ed. Frankf. 1673, tom. iii. p. 217).

The Schola Cantorum at Rome appears not to have furnished the choir on all great occasions; for example, not at the Stations (when the regionarii did it) nor at the Lateran Church, but only when the pope officiated—"alii (subdiaconi) qui dicuntur Schola Cantorum, qui cantant tantummodo quando summus Pontifex celebrare consuevit" (Martene, de Antiq. Eccl. Rit. I. iii. 8). At ordination in the city of Rome, the schola repeated the litany and sang the Introit (Salzburg pontifical, ap. Martene, I. viii. xi. ordo 9.)

The praecentors of the responsories were in the Roman church taken from the Schola Cantorum. Thomasius quotes from a MS. antiphonary of the Vatican Library a statement that "the usage was for the master of the school to point out to each individual, the day before, what responsory he was to sing in the night office." [H. T. A.]

SCHOLASTICA, Feb. 10, virgin, sister of St. Benedict; commemorated at Castrum Cassinum (Mart. Usuard., Notker., Wand.). [C. H.]

SCHOLASTICUS. (a) The title of a class of Roman lawyers or advocates in the 4th and 5th centuries, against whose exactions and extortions from their clients provisions are enacted in the Codex Theodos. (Lib. viii. tit. 10; tom. ii. p. 598, edit. 1665).

(b) There is a passage in the writings of Gregory the Great in which the composition of the Roman canon of the mass is attributed to a certain scholasticus (Epist. ad Johan. Episc. Syracusanum, lib. ix. ep. xii. indict. 2). It is disputed whether the word as here used is the proper name of an otherwise unknown individual, or whether it refers to a member of the body of professional men called "Scholastici" (Bona, de Rebus Liturg. lib. ii. cap. xi.).

(c) The instructor of the younger members of a monastery was called "Scholasticus," or "Caput scholae." The position and duties of this office are described by Thomassinus (Vetus et Nova Eccles. Disciplina, edit. 1706, vol. i. p. 865). [F. E. W.]

SCHOOLMASTER (Magister Scholae, Scholasticus, Caput Scholae, Capischolus (in France sometimes Capiscolus). Very few Christians during the first four centuries, appeared to have belonged to the profession of the "grammatici" or the "rhetores," as teachers of the traditional pagan learning. Of this, the comparative rarity of Christian monumental inscriptions which distinguish the name recorded as that of a "grammaticus" is significant evidence. Passionei [Inscrizioni antiche (Lucca, 1763), p. 115] gives one of these rare exceptions; and Martianus, a presbyter of the sect of the Novatians, is mentioned by Socrates (H. E. iv. 9) as teaching γραμματικοὺς λόγους to the two daughters of the emperor Valens. But, in general, the necessity under which those who adopted this profession found themselves of expounding the pagan mythology and observing the pagan festivals, seems to have deterred the Christian teacher from entering upon such a career [see SCHOOLS, II.].

The appointed teacher of a school, from the 5th century onwards, whether monastic or episcopal, was generally known as the "scholasticus," or, in France, as the "capischolus," or "capiscolus." In the cathedral schools he was always selected from the body of the canons, (among whom he was known as "Caput Scholae" or "Magister Scholae"), and was generally one of the senior members, and one whose character and life were especially approved (Keuffel, Hist. Scholarum, pp. 248–249). The "Magister Scholae" is mentioned among seven officials at the church of St. Martin of Tours, known as the "hebdomadarii," who, in turn, once a week, were called upon to celebrate "majorem missam" (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Ritibus, i. 120).

[J. B. M.]

SCHOOLS. Education among Christian communities during the first eight centuries successively assumes four very distinct phases. First, as limited to instruction in the special tenets of the Christian faith, and altogether dissociated from secular education; secondly, as combined with pagan culture, and aiming at a partial reconciliation of the traditions of that culture with its own; thirdly, as altogether abandoning any such attempt, and restricting itself to religious doctrine, and to the acquirements directly subservient to the purposes of the clerical or the monastic life; fourthly, as resuming in some measure the earlier and more liberal conception, and manifesting an activity productive of important after-results.

I. Of the Christian bishop of the primitive Church it was required, not only that he should himself be "apt to teach," but also that he should provide for the spiritual instruction of his flock. For this purpose he was wont to select, after the custom of pagan philosophers, those among his disciples who by superior acquirements and the possession of the faculty of teaching seemed specially qualified for the work. The method of instruction was catechetical, and a good specimen of its character and range will be found in the Κατηχήσεις Φωτιζομένων, or lectures to catechumens, delivered in A.D. 348 by Cyril, afterwards bishop of Jerusalem, when still only a presbyter (Migne, Patr. Series Graeca, xxxiii. 356). The subjects of his discourses, such as the Second Coming of Christ, the Holy Spirit, the Incarnation, Divine Providence, &c., shew that they were designed for those who had passed beyond the elementary stage of doctrinal knowledge. Augustine, in like manner, at a somewhat later period, was accustomed to draw around him in his episcopal house the most promising of the younger clergy, and instruct them in the Scriptures, those who had been thus privileged being specially sought after to fill the different offices of the Church in Africa (Possidius, Vita Aug. c. xi.).

From this method of systematic instruction by the bishop, the school as a distinct institution was a natural development. Of their organisation and method of instruction an account will be found under CATECHUMENS; and a full description of the most celebrated of their number in ALEXANDRIA, CATECHETICAL SCHOOL OF. Origen, when driven from Alexandria, founded such a school at Caesarea in Palestine; it fell into decay, but was restored by his friend Pamphilus, who bestowed on it a valuable library (Eusebius, H. E. vii. 27 and 30). Other examples are perhaps to be recognised in a school established at Jerusalem by Clemens Alexandrinus, about the year 209, over which Cyril, above mentioned, subsequently presided; in that which Rhodon (the last teacher of the school at Alexandria[a]) founded in the reign of Theodosius the Great at Sida in Pamphylia (Guerike, Schol. Alex. i. 118); in that which it has been supposed Irenaeus founded at Lugdunum (Langemark, Hist. Catech. i. 108); and in that which Tertullian (de Baptismo, c. 18) appears to imply existed at Carthage in the 3rd century.

Of such institutions the one at Alexandria may be accepted as the type, and from that distinguished centre Christian education mainly derived its inspiration during the first three centuries. In Alexandria itself, however, the instruction soon advanced beyond the purely dogmatic character; the dangers with which the faith was menaced by Jewish and pagan opponents, and by the heresies of the Gnostics almost necessarily imposing on the Christian teacher the obligation of assuming a wider range both of culture and teaching.

With respect to the foregoing kind of instruction, it is important to observe generally that it forms a characteristic feature of early Christianity, the education of youth being confided to the ministers of religion. Among pagan communities, whether Greek or Roman, the functions of the priestly office were limited to the superintendence of religious ceremonial or the interpretation of signs and oracles; of any instruction of the people in the traditions of their faith we find no trace.

II. The views expressed by the earlier teachers of the Church with respect to the abstract value of pagan learning are somewhat vague and often conflicting in character. It is obvious, however, that the general conditions under which Christianity existed at this period were such as to render any attempt at founding separate schools of general instruction unadvisable if not impossible. Those parents, therefore, among the Christian community, who could afford the expense, sent their sons to the gymnasium, under the care of a paedagogus, to share with pagan youth the ordinary instruction of the time. This fact is one which must not be lost sight of in any endeavour to estimate the influences under which the teaching of the earlier Fathers was conceived.

In the first century, intercourse with Greece had already somewhat extended the narrow limits of Roman education both in Italy and in Gaul (Horace, Sat. I. vi. 71; Epp. II. ii. 41), and the elementary acquirements of reading, writing, and arithmetic, were followed by a certain amount of instruction in the Greek language and literature. Quintilian (I. i. 12), indeed, advises that such instruction should precede the study of the Latin tongue, inasmuch as a command of the latter could be acquired without any formal teaching whatever; and we learn from Tacitus (de Claris Orat. c. 29) that, probably with the same view, it was customary for the children of the wealthy to have a Greek nurse.

In the days of the empire schools were of two kinds—an elementary and a higher grade. At the elementary school (that of the "grammatista," "magister," or "litterator," styled by Tertullian (de Pallio, c. 5) "litterarum primus informator") the scholars were taught to read intelligently, and with correct accentuation the poets and orators (Quint. I. i. 24; I. viii. 1), and also acquired a certain knowledge of grammar (ib. I. iv. 22). A higher degree of instruction was imparted at the schools of the "grammaticus"[b] and "rhetor." The former explained difficulties, expounded the plots of plays and poems, and gave outlines of histories ("quaestiones explicet, historias exponat, poemata enarret," ib. I. ii. 14), while the scholars translated passages from Greek into Latin and then back again into Greek. Under the guidance of the rhetor they composed themes and declamations (chiefly lifeless and mechanical imitations of standard authors), the whole training of these schools being almost exclusively conceived with reference to the requirements of the forensic orator (Tacitus, de Claris Orat. c. 35; Suetonius, de Claris Rhet. c. 1; Pliny, Ep. i. 13; v. 3; vii. 17; viii. 12 and 24). The authors studied were chiefly Homer and Vergil; the lyric poets, especially Horace, Menander, and Terence; the Sentences of Publius Syrus; the orators, Demosthenes, Cicero, and Caius Gracchus; the historians, Thucydides, Cato, and Sallust. Beyond this no scheme of study has come down to us, and it is probable that the teacher selected his authors at his own discretion.

Such was the character of the education that prevailed throughout the more civilised parts of the empire during the first three centuries. Liberally aided and endowed by the state in successive enactments of Hadrian, Marcus Aurelius, Vespasian, Valentinian I., Gratian, and Theodosius, it was far too generally diffused and too essential a condition of success in social and public life to admit of its rejection by the Christians of those days. The recognition of Christianity by the state does not appear to have produced any sudden change in these conditions. The schools of the empire, as they were termed, not only continued to exist, but maintained their traditions of education unmodified. At Athens, where the two schools (one for rhetoric, the other for philosophy) founded by Marcus Aurelius represented a kind of university, were gathered many of the most aspiring intellects of the time. Diodorus of Tarsus, Gregory Nazianzen,[c] St. Basil, and the emperor Julian attended the same school, and perhaps sat together on the same bench (Baronius, iii. 687; Basil, Ep. 146). The author of the Greek Life of Gregory tells us that he and Basil culled the flower of rhetoric while avoiding the falsity of the art (Migne, Series Graeca, xxxv. 256). He also states that their studies included grammar, philosophy, music, geometry, and astronomy.

The system of instruction pursued at Athens seems to have formed the model for the higher instruction throughout the empire. A similar though less famous school at Rome, founded by the emperor Hadrian, was known as the Athenaeum. Here, in the time of the emperor Marcus Aurelius, Hadrian the sophist taught with great success, and after him, Aspasius. (Philost. Vitae Sophist. 580, 627). Milan, on account of a like culture, claimed the appellation of "Novae Athenae," and in the time of Theodoric the Great (A.D. 454–528) would appear to have still been distinguished by its forensic orators (Cassiod. Variae, viii. 19). Cremona and Bergamo enjoyed a like though inferior reputation. The whole of southern Gaul was equally famous, the schools at Marseilles, Autun, Lyons, Bordeaux, Toulouse, and Narbonne being especially celebrated. Those of Carthage were the resort of most students who aspired to distinction either as grammarians or rhetoricians. On the death of the eminent grammarian Eusanthius of Constantinople, in 362, one Chrestus was sent for from Africa to fill the vacant chair (Eusebius, Chron. ad ann.).

The office of instructor in pagan schools would appear to have been proscribed by the fathers of the church on account of its intimate connexion with the religious belief and practice of paganism: "Quaerendum autem est," says Tertullian, "etiam de ludi magistris et de caeteris professoribus litterarum, imo non dubitandum affines illos esse multimodae idololatriae" (de Idol. c. 10; Migne, Patrol. i. 673–675). The pagan schoolmaster, he goes on to say, was constantly under the necessity of referring to the gods of the pagan mythology, of explaining their genealogies and prerogatives, and observing their festivals. At the feast of Flora, it was customary to adorn the schoolroom with garlands; the first payment of a new scholar was devoted to Minerva; the new year, the feasts of the Seven Hills and the summer solstice were all made occasions for the presentation of gifts from the scholar to the "ludi magister."

When, however, it came to a question of the lawfulness of attendance at these schools on the part of the learner, even Tertullian shrank from interdicting the advantages of ordinary education to Christian youth: "Quomodo repudiamus saecularia studia, sine quibus divina esse non possunt?" (ib.). He accordingly decides that the Christian scholar may frequent these schools under the plea of necessity, and he enjoins him to take the good and to reject the bad, "even as one who knowingly receives poison from another who knows it not, but refrains from drinking it." "Hence it was," observes Dr. Newman, "that in the early ages the church allowed her children to attend the heathen schools for the acquisition of secular accomplishments, where, as no one can doubt, evils existed, at least as great evils as can attend on mixed education now. The gravest fathers recommended for Christian youth the use of pagan masters; the most saintly bishops and most authoritative doctors had been sent in their adolescence by Christian parents to pagan lecture halls" (Idea of a University, p. 9).[d]

During the first three centuries, therefore, the Christian parent justified himself in sending his sons to pagan schools on the ground of simple necessity; and while Christian doctrine was taught by Christian teachers, secular knowledge was sought in the ordinary channels (Assemann, Biblioth. Orient. III. ii. 923). But in the meantime, the far more difficult question of the desirability of studying, at any period of life, the productions of pagan genius and learning, was debated with considerable ardour, and at the time that Christianity received the recognition of the state, remained still undecided. While a Cyprian insisted on the wide distinction between Christian doctrine and pagan philosophy (ad Anton. Migne, iii. 782), a Celsus reproached his Christian antagonists with their hostility alike to learning, wisdom, and thought (Origen, adv. Cels. bk. vi.). At Alexandria, on the other hand, the study of pagan authors was warmly defended. Clemens cites in its defence the words of Christ (John xv. 1–10), which imply that the vine must be trained and pruned, and the soil cultivated, and argues, that as the physician who studies other arts is thereby better qualified for the profession of his own, so the Christian who familiarises himself with other modes of thought will be all the better able to distinguish the alloy of error from the fine gold of truth (Strom. i. 9; Migne, Series Graeca, viii. 739). These views, says Dr. Newman, were advocated in the early church, "not with the notion that the cultivation which literature gives was any substantial improvement of our moral nature, but as thereby opening the mind and rendering it susceptible of an appeal; not as if the heathen literature itself had any direct connexion with the matter of Christianity, but because it contained in it the scattered fragments of those original traditions which might be made the means of introducing a student to the Christian system, being the ore in which the true metal was found" (Arians, p. 88).

[b] It is important to remember that throughout our period the term "grammaticus" denoted something much more than a teacher of grammar in the modern sense, being really equivalent to a teacher of belles-lettres See Gräfenhan, Gesch. d. classischen Philologie im Alterthum, iv. 52, 53; Mullinger, Schools of Charles the Great, p. 72.

[c] See his poem de Vita Mea, for a description of his college career at Athens.

It appears to be beyond doubt that, notwithstanding isolated protests, the education of the clergy throughout the fourth century, and even after that time, continued to be of this more liberal character. Besides the conspicuous instances already noted, we find Jerome, in a remarkable letter to the monk Rusticus, speaking of the education of the latter as having been commenced in Gaul and completed at Rome, "so that the dignity of the Roman discourse might attemper the copiousness and elegance of the Gallic" (Migne, xxii. 935). Of Jerome himself it is to be noted that he received instruction at Rome from Donatus the grammarian (ib. xxiii. 472). Lactantius († aft. 317), Arnobius († circ. 300), Ambrose († 397), Augustine († 430), Hilary of Poitiers († 367), educated at his native city, Hilary of Arles († 449), Sidonius Apollinaris († 489), Salvian († 495), are all examples of ancient writers and ecclesiastics who, while strenuous defenders of Christian doctrine, had received their intellectual training in schools which followed the traditions of pagan culture.

In the meantime the growing importance attached by the church to the whole question of education, is attested by the language of its most eminent teachers. "Parents," says Chrysostom, "will inquire carefully when they hire a herdsman, as to his fitness for the work, but will take little trouble when engaging a tutor for their children, although there is no function of greater importance than this" (Hom. in Matt. ed. BB. vii. 605). Elsewhere (ib. xi. 159), he says that a good education is the best legacy that a parent can bequeath to a son.

This increased interest in the subject was the natural result of the fact that the task of educating the young now began to be more and more confided to the clergy. We find that Julian, when at Macellum, was instructed in the Scriptures by τοῖς ὑφηγηταῖς τῶν ἁγίων Γραφῶν (Sozomen, v. 2); and according to Socrates (H. E. iv. 9) the two daughters of the emperor Valens were instructed by Martianus, a presbyter of the sect of the Novatians, in grammar,—γραμματικοὺς λόγους.

The policy of Julian (A.D. 361–363) undoubtedly tended to precipitate the decisive struggle as well as to embitter all subsequent discussion of the question. He appears to have noted with displeasure the growing influence of the Christian teacher, and to have sought to convert the scruples of the church with respect to pagan literature into a pretext for excluding her ministers from all share in secular education. The Christian, he asserted, if really convinced that the deities whom the great writers of antiquity worshipped were unworthy of such adoration, could hardly be a fit expounder of the pagan literature. To expound Homer and at the same time denounce what Homer held to be most sacred and venerable, was malevolent and base. He accordingly advised the Christian teachers to restrict themselves to the work of the catechists,[e] or, as he expressed it, "to expounding Matthew and Luke in the churches of the Galileans" (Ep. 42; ed. Heyler, p. 81). According to Socrates (H. E. iii. 12; Migne, Series Graeca, lxvii. 412), he also enacted a law excluding Christians from the work of public instruction, and the motive he himself assigned for this enactment is especially deserving of note, namely, that by being thus prevented from acquiring dialectical skill they might be rendered incompetent to contend in argument with their pagan antagonists.

The short reign of Julian was succeeded by that of Valentinian I. (A.D. 364–367), who proclaimed general religious toleration, and that of Gratian (A.D. 367–383), who was the avowed defender of Christianity. The former, in the year 364, rescinded the prohibitory law of Julian (Cod. Theod. ed. Haenel, p. 1322); while the latter, aided by Ausonius, who was of Christian faith, and had taught both as a grammarian and a rhetorician at Bordeaux, reorganised the schools of the empire, and, as far as it lay in his power, sustained and invigorated the traditions of pagan education (ib. vi. tit. 13; Haenel, p. 545; see also pp. 1321, 1322).

A certain dislike and suspicion of the dialectic art is discernible from a very early period in the church. Irenaeus, alluding probably to the Basilidians, complains of those who oppose the faith with an Aristotelian word-chopping (minutiloquium), and excess of refinement in argument (adv. Haer. ii. xviii. 5). Tertullian styles Aristotle "miser" on account of his invention of the traditional logic (de Praescrip. c. 7). Athanasius, in his treatise on the Nicene decrees, speaks of Theognostus as advancing certain opinions with respect to the divine nature, not as his deliberate conviction, but by way of exercise in argument—ὡς ἐν γυμνασίᾳ ἐκτείνας, and implies that Origen sometimes wrote with a like design, ὡς ζητῶν καὶ γυμνάζων (Migne, Series Graeca, xxv. 181 and 183). Eusebius speaks of those who "are ignorant of Christ and adulterate the faith, seeking for that figure of the syllogism which will best support their heresy" (H. E. v. 27). Jerome contrasts the "campum rhetorici eloquii," the "tendiculae dialectorum," and the "Aristotelis spineta" with the plain and simple language of Scripture (adv. Helvid. Migne, xxiii. 185). Socrates represents Aetius, the Arian, as relying in argument on the categories of Aristotle (H. E. ii. 25; Migne, Series Graeca, lxvii. 297; see also H. E. v. 10, and Sozomen, H. E. vii. 12). "The two Gregories," says Dr. Newman (Arians, p. 30), "Basil, Ambrose, and Cyril, protest with one voice against the dialectics of their opponents: and the sum of their declarations is briefly expressed by a writer of the 4th century (Epiphanius, Haer. lxix. 69), who calls Aristotle 'the bishop of the Arians.'" Even so late as the seventh century we find Theodorus Khaituensis declaring that his opponent Severus of Antioch estimated a theologian according to his knowledge of the categories, and "of the other refinements of pagan philosophy" (de Incarn. Migne, S. G. xci. 1504).

In the East, owing to the tendency of the Greek and the Oriental mind towards subtle disquisition, this dialectical culture appears to have held its ground much longer than among the Latin races. Socrates the historian, who practised as an advocate in Constantinople, recommends the cultivation of the art as a means of defeating the enemies of the faith with their own weapons, especially, he adds, as the Scriptures themselves do not teach logic (H. E. iii. 16). Eusebius, bishop of Doryleum in the year 441, had, according to Evagrius, taught rhetoric in the public schools, and availed himself of his knowledge of the art in the refutation of Eutyches.

Among the earliest authoritative utterances marking the transition from the pagan to the Christian theory of education is that of St. Basil, who, in his treatise πρὸς τοὺς Νέους (c. 2), distinctly adopts the monastic axiom that all our actions in this life are to be conceived as preparatory to the next. He nevertheless inculcates a certain degree of attention to the best writers of antiquity as sources from whence precepts of excellent morality may be gathered; citing as a precedent the example of Moses, who was learned in all the learning of the Egyptians (cc. 3 and 4; Acts vii. 22).

The language of the Apostolical Constitutions, on the other hand, which were designed for the instruction of catechumens, is authoritative against the reading of pagan authors.[f] They enjoin the Christian disciple to "refrain from all the writings of the heathen" (Apost. Const. i. 6; Cotelerius, Pat. Apost. i. 206). [PROHIBITED BOOKS.]

The influence of Ambrose (bishop of Milan, A.D. 374–397) on the literary spirit of his age was comparatively slight, but his writings sufficiently attest his familiarity with the best Latin writers of antiquity.

With Jerome the case is altogether different, and the effect of his views on the subsequent history of Christian culture probably exceeds that of any other father, Augustine not excepted. At Rome the pupil of Donatus the grammarian and of Victorinus the African rhetorician, a scholar at the imperial school at Treves, an attendant on the lectures of Apollinaris (the eminent bishop of Laodicea) at Antioch—his early training and associations must have strongly inclined him to regard with favour the literature of pagan antiquity. His original sentiments are, indeed, clearly attested by his own writings; and during his ascetic retirement in Syria he was often wont to relieve the tedium of his vigils by the perusal of Plautus and Cicero. But the divine warning, communicated as he believed, in a dream, recalled him to a sense of his error, and determined him to abandon such studies and to restrict himself to the sacred authors (Ep. ad Eustoch. Migne, xxii. 416).[g] So far, however, as we are able to gather his more mature sentiments on this question, Jerome would appear to have held that the study of pagan literature was a necessary part of education, but that its continued and ardent pursuit by those who had embraced the monastic or clerical life was inconsistent with their profession. He condemns, for example, with severity those ecclesiastics of his day, who, while neglecting the Prophets and the Gospels, indulged in comedies and amatory poetry, "et id quod in pueris necessitatis est, crimen in se facere voluptatis" (ad Damasum, ib. xxii. 76). It is obvious from this passage that Jerome held that in youth the reading of authors like Terence and Vergil was a necessity, a concession which may fairly be interpreted as implying that it was still the practice of Christians to send their sons to schools of the kind already described. Even after his adoption of the monastic life at Bethlehem (A.D. 386), we find him instituting, in connexion with the monastery, a school for boys, whom he himself instructed in grammar, in the classical authors (especially Vergil), and even in the Latin poets (Ebert, Gesch. d. christlich-lat. Lit. p. 182). As regards his own early education, he himself tells us (ad Domnionem, Migne, xxii. 237) that he had studied the Commentaries of Alexander of Aphrodisias on Aristotle and the Introduction of Porphyry; while in his Apologia adversus Rufinum (i. 16; ib. xxiii. 472) he assumes that his former friend had read, when a boy, the Commentaries of Asper on Vergil and Sallust, those of Vulcatius on the orations of Cicero, those of Victorinus on the dialogues of the same writer and on Terence, those of Donatus on Vergil, and those of other commentators on Plautus, Lucretius, Horace, Persius, and Lucan. As this obviously implies

[f] The incongruity between these precepts and those of St. Basil, addressed to the same class in the Christian community, may perhaps afford an argument of some weight in connexion with the alleged but disputed antiquity of these writings. [See APOSTOLICAL CONSTITUTIONS.]

[g] A precisely similar experience is recorded of Caesarius of Arles by his biographers, and was followed by a like result (Migne, Patr. lxvii. 1004).

the study of the authors themselves, it is evident that at the close of the 4th century a great proportion of the classical writers were still read with considerable care.

In his letter (circ. A.D. 397) to Magnus (a Roman rhetorician who, at the instigation of Ruffinus, had ventured to ask Jerome why he so often introduced allusions to profane literature in his writings), we are presented with what may be termed the stock arguments whereby such culture on the part of the Christian clergy has been defended ever since his time. He alleges that even Moses and the prophets borrow somewhat from the "books of the Gentiles." He quotes the opening verses of the first chapter of Proverbs, Titus, i. 12, and the other Pauline quotations from Aratus and Menander as further examples. Then he brings forward the justification afforded by Cyprian, Origen, Eusebius, Apollinaris—"lege eos, et invenies nos comparatione eorum imperitissimos;" he refers to Josephus and Philo, and, finally, cites the precedents set by Quadratus, Justin Martyr, Dionysius, Tatian, Irenaeus, Clemens, Origen,[h] Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, Amphilochius, &c.—"qui omnes in tantum philosophorum doctrinis atque sententiis suos resarciunt libros, ut nescias quid in illis primum admirari debeas, eruditionem saeculi, an scientiam Scripturarum." In the Latin Church he brings forward the examples of Tertullian Minucius Felix, Arnobius, Hilary, and Juvencus, and finally forestalls the possible objection that such learning was only resorted to in controversies with pagan antagonists, by observing that it is apparent in nearly all the writings of those whom he has named (ad Magnum, Migne, xxii. 426–430).

It is questionable, however, whether, with advancing age, Jerome's views did not assume a third and yet more austere phase. We find him, for example, recording with manifest exultation the neglect into which the philosophy of paganism, Plato and Aristotle, was already falling (Migne, xxvi. 487), while in his Commentary on the Epistle to the Ephesians (vi. 4) he unsparingly rebukes those bishops and presbyters who, instead of instructing their sons in the faith, make them study pagan authors, read comedies, and sing coarse songs, and this, too, at the cost of the Christian Church, the offerings of the devout poor thus finding their way into the hands of the grammarian or rhetorician to be lavished on profane and even immoral indulgences (Migne, xxvi. 666).

The views of Augustine much resembled those of Jerome, but his literary sympathies were less ardent. He altogether condemned the lighter literature of antiquity, and in his Confessions (i. 17) he refers with penitential contrition to the pleasure which, in his youthful days, he had taken in the study of the Latin poets. The slight evidence of a certain care for letters, such as his anxiety for the formation of a library (Ep. 231, Migne, xxxiii. 1026), and the solicitude which he is said by Possidius (Vita, c. 31) to have shewn for its preservation after his death do not certainly prove anything with respect to classical authors. On the other hand, it is undeniable that the sanction of Augustine was given in very explicit terms to the study of rhetoric and to that of the graver writers of antiquity; and two passages in his De Doctrina Christiana became "loci classici" in later ages whenever it was sought to defend the study of pagan literature in the Church.[i] Of these, the first enforces the precept that the writings of the philosophers of paganism, wherever they are found enforcing what is in agreement with the faith, may safely and advantageously be adapted to the Christian use, just as the Israelites, when they went forth from Egypt, though they left behind them the idols and superstitions of their masters, took with them the gold and the raiment (ii. 40; Migne, xxxiv. 63). The second passage (iv. 2) points out the value of a knowledge of rhetoric to the Christian preacher.

III. The course of events after the death of Augustine, when Gaul, Italy and Africa alike became the prey of the barbarian, involved the overthrow of the imperial schools. From this time, at least in the two first-named countries, the profession of the grammarian and the rhetorician, as that of a distinct class, appears to have gradually died out, while the culture which they represented survived only in a few rare and isolated instances among Christian writers and scholars, who, like Claudius Marius Victor, Sedulius, Pomerius of Lyons, Prosper, Claudius Mamertus, and Avitus of Vienne, sought to give to their discourses a certain rhetorical embellishment, or still cultivated the art of original composition. Whatever of education continued to exist among the laity rarely comprised anything more than reading, writing, and ordinary computation. The work of imparting this elementary instruction was carried on chiefly in the episcopal or cathedral schools which bishops, by virtue of their office, were required to institute in the chief city of their respective dioceses, in order that youths might be educated for the priestly office and the laity receive a certain grounding in the knowledge of the faith. The considerable political power which, at the commencement of the 6th century, the episcopal order still retained in Southern Gaul enabled them effectually to protect these institutions. In the year 529, at the council of Vaison, we have evidence that it was sought to raise the standard of education among the clergy by requiring that priests in charge of parishes, according to the custom of Italy, should receive "readers" into their houses and educate them there (Sirmond, i. 226). It appears to be a legitimate inference from the foregoing canon that, prior to the Lombard invasion, the education of the clergy in Italy was carried on in a regular and systematic manner, and that an endeavour was made to introduce a corresponding system into Gaul.

The conquest of Africa by the Vandals (A.D. 429) does not appear to have been attended by [h] If the date assigned to this letter by the Benedictine editors be correct, this mention of Origen, after the dispute with Ruffinus with respect to the orthodoxy of the Alexandrine teacher, is somewhat remarkable. (See Ebert, Gesch. d. christlich-lat. Litt. p. 309.)

results equally unfavourable to letters. The Catholic party suffered cruel persecutions, but their Arian antagonists were avowedly friendly to learning, and Carthage still preserved her reputation as one of the chief schools of the empire. Salvian speaks of the city as famed both for philosophy and the cultivation of all the liberal arts (de Gub. Dei, bk. vii., Migne, liii. 161). It is uncertain whether the treatise of Martianus Capella, a rhetorician of Carthage, de Nuptiis Philologiae et Mercurii, et de Septem Artibus Liberalibus, Libri Novem, was composed before or after the Vandal invasion, but long after the author's time it continued to enjoy an extensive popularity as a manual of instruction. This fact is alone significant evidence of the permanence of a certain pagan element in education; for the treatise, owing to its speculative character, was always regarded by the Latin Church as a dangerous book (see Mullinger (J. B.) Hist. of the University of Cambridge, i. 23–26). Felicianus appears as an eminent teacher of grammar, whose school was frequented both by the sons of the Vandals and those of Roman extraction (Dracontius, Praef. ad Hylan.). Dracontius himself was a poet of no mean ability in the reign of Gundamund (A.D. 484–496); and the Christian mother of Fulgentius is said by his biographer, Ferreolus, to have caused her son to commit to memory the whole of Homer, together with large portions of Menander. After this early training in Greek, Fulgentius was initiated into Latin literature, and pursued the study with the combined advantages of home instruction and attendance at one of the grammar schools of Carthage—"domo edoctus, artis etiam grammaticae traditor auditorio" (Migne, lxv. 119).

With the advance of the 6th century, the study of pagan literature and the traditions of pagan education had become yet further circumscribed in Latin Christendom, and the oft-quoted lament of Gregory of Tours ("periit studium litterarum") may be accepted with little reservation as regards his own country. The monastic traditions of education alone survived, although, at the same time, it is evident that they were sustained with some vigour, and that schools for youth (probably of the kind that Caesarius of Arles had instituted and promoted in Aquitaine) were in existence in the time of Clotaire II. (A.D. 613–628), and of Dagobert (A.D. 628–638), which excited the emulation of other lands. We learn, for instance, on the authority of Bede, that Sigebert, king of the East Angles (A.D. 635), being anxious on his return from exile "to imitate the good institutions which he had seen in France," "set up a school for youth to be instructed in literature, and was assisted therein by bishop Felix, who came from Kent, and who provided him with masters and teachers after the manner of that country" (Baeda, E. H. iii. 18; Henry of Huntingdon, Hist. Angl. bk. iii.; Savile, Script. 332). Evidence again, hereafter to be noted, is also to be met with of the survival of a higher culture in Italy, Africa, and Spain.

After the time of the Origenistic controversy, there is to be discerned in the Western Church a growing disposition not only to look with distrust on all secular learning as tending to encourage speculations which too often ended in heterodoxy, but also to adopt a theory of Scriptural interpretation which involved a disparaging estimate of the collateral aid which such learning might supply. In the Institutiones and Collationes of the celebrated Cassian, the combination of these views is clearly to be discerned. Cassian adopted the Alexandrine theory, and taught that beyond the grammatical meaning of the Scriptures there lay hidden a succession of deeper meanings, the tropological, allegorical, and anagogical, which revealed themselves only to the sanctified and purified intellect (Inst. v. 24; Coll. viii. 3). The importance of his adoption of these views lay in the fact that he was also the author of a new rule of monastic life and education in the West, and that consequently those communities which accepted this rule (and they appear to have included the majority of the monasteries in Gaul in the 5th and 6th centuries) cannot but be looked upon as dominated by a narrow and illiberal conception of learning. For a time, indeed, under the influence of a genuine enthusiasm, they rose superior to their traditions. The monastery of St. Victor at Marseilles, founded by Cassian himself, enjoyed a high reputation as a school of education. That of St. Honorat, on one of the Lerins group of islands, was yet more celebrated, and the "Studium Insulanum," under Vincentius, was famous as a centre of semi-Pelagian doctrine in the 5th century. Eucherius, bishop of Lyons about A.D. 449, when writing to Salonius, speaks of the latter as having received instruction in this school from Hilary of Arles, Salvian, and Vincentius, in all branches of religious knowledge (Praef. ad Salonium, Migne, l. 773).

But the severe manual labour imposed by the rule of Cassian (de Coenob. Inst. ii. 3) alone almost precluded any sustained attention to letters; and the study of the sacred text, the acquirement of the arts of writing and singing, together with such a knowledge of the Computus (see CALENDAR) as would enable the learner to calculate the return of the festivals and fasts, were probably the limits, but rarely exceeded, of monastic education under this rule. At the same time, however, it is to be noted that the importance attached by Cassian to the constant study of the Scriptures, rendered a certain amount of education obligatory, where it had before been discretionary (Coll. xiv. 10; Migne, xlix. 972), and it may probably be safely assumed that wherever after Cassian's time mention occurs of any considerable monastery in the West, there existed in connexion with such monastery a school which imparted at least such an amount of elementary instruction as above described.

The provisions thus laid down were yet more distinctly enforced in the rule of Caesarius of Arles, who, in addition to his efforts above noted, for the spread of education among the clergy, required that both in the monasteries and in the convents of his diocese, certain hours of study should be strictly observed. In the monasteries this time was from the hour of rising until nine o'clock (Regula ad Monachos, reg. 14; Migne, Patr. lxvii. 1100). In the convents for women it was for two hours, from six to eight o'clock in the morning (Regula ad Virgines, reg. 14; ib. lxvii. 1110).

But while such were the tendencies of education in the West, we find a far more liberal conception maintaining its ground in many of the churches in the East. In marked contrast to the school of Alexandria, that of Antioch acquired, in the 4th century, scarcely less distinction as a centre of widely different teaching. The teachers of the school of Antioch were distinguished by the high value which they set upon pagan literature, and had their views with respect to Christian education gained the ascendancy, it is no exaggeration to say that the history of the Church, and consequently of Europe at large, throughout the middle ages would have been materially modified. That the profession of instructor in pagan learning did not necessarily involve a departure from orthodox belief is attested by the example of Malchion, a presbyter of the Church, and according to Eusebius (H. E. vii. 29), "head of the profession of the sophists in the schools of pagan learning at Antioch," but who was also distinguished as a refuter of the heresies of Paul of Samosata.

It is, however, with Lucian, presbyter and martyr (†311), that the historical exegesis of Antioch, in conjunction with a recognised school of instruction, is first to be traced with certainty. (Neander, Kirchengesch. I. iii. 825). Lucian, like Origen, was famed as a teacher, and along with Dorotheus, educated a large circle of illustrious disciples (Nicephorus, viii. 31; Theodoret, H. E. i. 5). He was also connected with the schools at Caesarea and Edessa. When Meletius was driven into exile by the Arians, his see was ably guided by Flavian (†403), and both of these bishops, according to Theodoret (E. H. iv. 22), were the instructors or advisers of Diodorus, from whom the high celebrity of the school of Antioch, which lasted from about A.D. 370–428, may be held to date. Diodorus, although described by Jerome as ignorant of secular learning (de Viris Illust. c. 119), was really a man of wide and varied culture, and the instructor of both Chrysostom and Theodore of Mopsuestia. While distinguished as an opponent of the Apollinarian heresy, he was also an able defender of the historical school of Scriptural interpretation, a feature which sufficiently accounts for the hostility of Jerome. With the deposition and condemnation of Nestorius (431) the reputation of the school at Antioch appears to have come to an end.

The doctrines taught at Antioch re-appeared, however, in Mesopotamia, and especially at those celebrated centres of theological teaching, Edessa and Nisibis. The history of these two schools is singularly intertwined and somewhat obscure. It has been supposed that Edessa was the original seat whence Antioch first derived its characteristic tradition, and it is beyond doubt that it was here that Lucian received instruction from Macarius (Socrates, H. E. ii. 9). Eusebius of Emesa was also instructed here, not only in religious knowledge but also in pagan learning (ib.). It is not until the 4th century that Nisibis appears to have acquired distinction by the teaching of Jacob, its bishop, who was the instructor of Ephraem the Syrian. Ephraem was subsequently driven from Nisibis and took refuge in Edessa, where the school which he founded or re-established became distinguished for its judicious and scholarly principles of interpretation (Assemann, i. 38; Socrates, H. E. iii. 6). After the year 431, Edessa became a centre of Nestorian doctrine, and the survival of these tenets is attributed by Theodorus Lector to the activity of this school. Its suppression in the year 489 by the emperor Zeno, on this very account (Theod. Lector, E. H. ii. 49; Assemann, i. 406) failed to bring about the extinction of the sect, for its teachers, removing to Nisibis, maintained the same traditions; and a school, in which the Commentaries of Theodore of Mopsuestia were prescribed as sources of doctrine and all divergence from his teaching was forbidden under the pain of anathema (ib. iii. 84), continued to exist until the middle ages. Junilius Africanus, writing about the year 540, speaks of it as a centre of systematic religious instruction, "ubi divina lex per magistros publicos, sicut apud nos in mundanis studiis grammatica et rhetorica, ordine et regulariter traditur" (Praef. ad de Part. Div. Leg.; Migne, lxviii. 15). The foregoing passage from Junilius, who was an African bishop, is of twofold interest, inasmuch as it attests the continued existence and activity not only of the school at Nisibis but also of schools of grammar and rhetoric in Africa in the first half of the 6th century.

Among others whose attention was attracted to the teaching of these remote schools in the East, was Cassiodorus, the eminent minister of Theodoric the Great. It was his endeavour to give to monastic education a more liberal cast than it had received from Cassian, or than it was then receiving from his contemporary, Caesarius of Arles—the latter of whom, notwithstanding his efforts to promote the education of the clergy, was altogether adverse to the study of pagan literature. Cassiodorus appears to have succeeded in carrying his designs into effect in connexion with the monastery which he founded at Viviers in Bruttium; and we learn from the preface to his treatise, de Institutione Divinarum Litterarum, that he had sought, in conjunction with pope Agapetus, to found certain chairs of Christian instruction at Rome, after the fashion, he says, "that long existed at Alexandria, and that now prevails in full force at Nisibis, so that the souls of the faithful might gain eternal salvation and their speech be adorned with chaste eloquence" (Migne, lxx. 537). The schema, "lectionis ordo," given by Cassiodorus himself, is also in evident agreement with the method and range of instruction which prevailed at Nisibis; and it is worthy of notice that among those to whom he refers as eminent promoters of Scriptural instruction ("introductores Scripturae divinae") is Junilius Africanus. Cassiodorus, however, goes on to state that the outbreak of war had compelled him to abandon the above design, and that he has accordingly put forth his treatise, which he describes as "a compend of Scriptural knowledge and profane learning." The Catholic spirit in which his precepts are conceived is evident in many points; in his advice to the monks to study geography, and in the fact that he had caused Latin translations to be made of Josephus' History of the Jews and of the writings of Theodoret (c. 8). These were placed in the library which he collected, and of which his treatise gives an account. We learn that it included, besides the canonical Scriptures and the Fathers, the encyclic of the council of Chalcedon in the version of Epiphanius, Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History, that of Sozomen together with the works of Orosius, Ammianus Marcellinus, &c. (Migne, Patr. lxx. 1119–1147). He also takes occasion warmly to defend the study of pagan literature, urging that it is often an important aid to that of the Scriptures themselves, and that it had never been the design of the fathers wholly to prohibit it (ib. lxx. 554). He quotes the language of Augustine (de Doct. Christiana, ii. 40), "See we not how richly laden with gold, and silver, and raiment, Cyprian that most sweet teacher and blessed martyr, went forth from Egypt? How also, laden in like manner, Lactantius, Victorinus, Optatus, and Hilarius went forth?"—and concludes, in his own language, "utrasque doctrinas, si possumus, legere festinemus. Quis enim audeat habere dubium, ubi virorum talium multiplex praecedit exemplum?"

In the period directly following upon the invasion of the Lombards (A.D. 568), learning in Italy ebbed to its lowest point; but in the meantime the foundation of the monastery on Monte Cassino (A.D. 529) and the rise of the Benedictine order had inaugurated a new epoch. The rule of St. Benedict was a kind of mean between that of Cassian and that of Cassiodorus. It neither enjoined nor forbade the study of secular literature, but it prescribed, like the rule of Caesarius of Arles, the setting apart of regular hours for reading. The energies of the monk were still mainly to be given to active labour, but the grey dawn of the winter day and the meridian heat of summer were allotted to study; and in the season of Lent the time assigned for this purpose was extended. With the one exception of Cassian, Benedict specified no authors, but only the books of the Old and New Testaments, together with such expositions thereon as "the most illustrious doctors of the orthodox faith and the Catholic fathers had compiled" (Reg. S. Benedicti, c. 8; ed. Waitzmann, p. 32).

The interpretation given by Gregory the Great (A.D. 544–604), the admirer and biographer of St. Benedict, to the monastic theory was probably sufficient to exclude, for a time, all attention to secular learning. Writing and teaching under an exceptionally vivid conviction of the approaching end of the world—a consummation which he held to be plainly foretold by the troubles of the times—he looked upon all studies which did not directly conduce to the purposes of the religious life as worse than useless. We find, it is true, both his biographers, Paul and John, speaking in glowing terms of the flourishing state of learning in Rome in his day. But against these doubtful and vague assertions of a later age, we must place the following facts: (1) that according to John (Vita, iii. 33), Gregory expressly forbade bishops to study pagan literature; (2) that he strongly censured Didier, the eminent bishop of Vienne, for instructing some of his clergy in classical literature, an employment of time which he declares to be becoming even in a pious layman (Ep. xi. 54); (3) that by his own admission he was himself ignorant of Greek, although he had resided some years at Constantinople (Ep. vii. 30), and, according to Paulus Diaconus (Vita, c. 2) was "second to none in Rome in polite learning." As a striking illustration of the results of this narrow conception of intellectual culture, his Magna Moralia, or Exposition of the Book of Job, claims a passing notice, as a work conceived in the most daring spirit of allegorical interpretation, to the entire exclusion of the aids that oriental or classical learning might have supplied and which could hardly have failed to restrain the unbounded extravagance which characterises these pages. "It may safely be said," observes Milman, "that according to Gregory's licence of interpretation, there is nothing which might not be found in any book ever written" (Latin Christianity, bk. iii. c. 7).

The unrivalled influence exerted by Gregory over his age is thus to be traced in a two-fold form in relation to learning: (1) as distinctly unfavourable to secular studies; (2) as favouring the allegorical method of interpreting Scripture, and thereby setting an example which operated powerfully on the whole course of mediaeval theology; for while the monastic schools which arose in England were modelled mainly on his instructions, it was from England, in turn, that the schools restored or founded by Charles the Great in the latter part of the 8th century derived their method and their traditions.

It is mainly to the efforts of Theodore and Hadrian, in the 7th century, that we must attribute that somewhat more liberal conception of Christian studies which obtained in England at this period. Both these ecclesiastics, of whom the one was from Tarsus, the other from Africa, were Greek as well as Latin scholars (Bright, Early Church History, p. 219). Of the system of education introduced by Theodore it has been said, "that it was in principle substantially the same as that which now prevails" (Hook, Lives of the Archbishops, i. 196). Theodore also augmented the library at Canterbury (Edwards, Hist. of Libraries, i. 101). Of the higher learning which characterised this movement, Aldhelm († 709) and Bede († 735) are the two most conspicuous examples. The former was educated by Hadrian at the monastery school of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, and subsequently, in order to obtain a livelihood, instituted a school at Malmesbury (William of Malmesbury, Gest. Pont. lib. v.). Aldhelm was also the founder of numerous other monastic schools in Wessex, and we still possess an account of his system of instruction (Wright, Introd. to Biog. Brit. Litt. i. 74). According to his biographer, Faricius, he was a competent Greek scholar (c. 1). He, however, so far reflected the influence of Gregory's teaching, that he discouraged the study both of the poets and philosophers of an[illegible]; in the inflated Latinity which passed for scholarship of this period, he intimates that the rude simplicity of the gospel appears to him far preferable to the slippery byways of pastoral poetry or the thorny winding paths of philosophy. (Malmesbury, Gest. Pont. ed. Hamilton, p. 342). At nearly the same time that Aldhelm was founding schools in Wessex, Felix, the first bishop of the East Angles (A.D. 680), was carrying out a similar work in his diocese, where, says the historian, "barbariem gentis sensim emitate Latina informabat" (ib. 147).

The tradition from Aldhelm was handed down by Albinus († 752), abbat of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, and the literary adviser of Bede. Albinus was instructed in Greek by Theodore, and, according to Bede, "knew the Greek tongue to no small perfection, and the Latin as thoroughly as the English, which was his native tongue" (E. H. v. 20).

The extensive learning of Bede, which was of a yet higher order, was acquired partly under the tuition of Benedict Biscop, at the monasteries at Wearmouth and Jarrow, and partly at St. Augustine's at Canterbury. Bede himself was subsequently an active founder of the famous school at York, the most distinguished centre of learning in England in the 8th and 9th centuries. It was successively presided over by Egbert, Ethelbert, and Eanbald, each of whom succeeded to the archbishopric of York; but its most distinguished teacher was Alcuin. The school appears to have been open to the secular clergy as well as to those designed to the monastic life, a fact which may to some extent account for the liberal character of the studies pursued by the scholars (Migne, Patr. c. 146; ci. 845; Stubbs, Pref. to de Inventione, p. vi.). Alcuin, who was not a monk, was for some time librarian of the cathedral library, and in his Poëma de Pontificibus Ecclesiae Eboracensis (Migne, ci. 845) has left us a glowing description of its treasures. According to his account it was a complete repository not only of patristic, but also of Greek and Latin, literature.

Such was the institution from whence the light of learning was transmitted to Frankland, and there handed down to the middle ages; but before proceeding to follow this main path, as it may be termed, of our subject, it will be necessary to devote a brief attention to the condition of letters and education in other parts of Europe during the 7th and 8th centuries.

The tradition of important Christian schools in Spain at a very early period in Church history, must stand or fall with that of the early evangelisation of the country [PAGANISM, SURVIVAL OF, sec. iii.]. It appears to have suggested to the author of the spurious Chronicon of Dexter (ann. 185 and 370),—a Jesuit forgery of the 17th century,—the statement that such schools existed in the 2nd and were restored in the 4th century; nor is it easy to believe that, under ecclesiastics like Hosius, the work of education could have failed to be carried on with vigour. Lannoy (de Scholis, &c. c. ivi.) observes, however, that the school of Bracara (now Braga in Portugal) is the only one of which we have any distinct mention prior to the 7th century. This school, where were pursued "optimarum artium studia," attained to yet greater celebrity under its abbat Fructuosus, the contemporary of Isidorus. In the time of Isidorus (A.D. 570–636) a general revival of learning throughout Spain appears to have taken place. The great school of Seville, which had been founded by his brother and predecessor in that see, Leander, exercised considerable influence over education throughout Andalusia. Isidorus himself was undoubtedly the most learned ecclesiastic of the 7th century and an active promoter of learning. He was also the founder of another school in connexion with a large monastery which he built without the walls of Seville. The discipline of this school was remarkable for its severity. The scholars were not permitted to go beyond the walls of the monastery until four years had elapsed from their first admission; and those who evinced a disposition to saunter about and neglect their studies, were compelled to wear iron fetters on their feet (Rod. Cerrat. Vita Isidori, c. xiv.;* Migne, lxxxi. 78). Discipline of this kind, however, was confined to the monastic schools, which appear to have sometimes served the purpose of the modern reformatory. We find, for example, that a decree of the fourth council of Toledo (A.D. 633), over which Isidorus presided, while enjoining the institution of schools for the clergy, directs also that refractory scholars shall be sent to the monasteries (Mansi, x. 626). The first canon of the second council of Toledo, A.D. 615, makes, likewise, express provision for schools for the clergy under the direction of the bishop.

Isidorus says (Sent. iii. 8) that both prayer and reading are duties of the religious life, though preference is to be given to the former. He discourages the perusal of pagan literature (ib. iii. 13), and affirms that the meretricious art of the grammarian must not be preferred to more simple knowledge (ib.). It is, however, a legitimate inference from his Etymologiae (or Origines, as the treatise is sometimes termed), that Isidorus did not consider these injunctions to be equally binding on the clergy. This latter treatise, along with those of Boethius, the de Artibus ac Disciplinis of Cassiodorus, and the de Septem Artibus of Martianus, may be looked upon as completing the list of the ordinary textbooks of instruction up to the 13th century.

On the whole, it may be said that Christian education as conceived by Isidorus rested on a far more liberal basis than that laid down by Gregory,—a fact in some measure attributable to the immunity from war and invasion which Spain, when compared with Italy, at this time enjoyed. As regards the interpretation of Scripture, however, Isidorus followed in the steps of Gregory, a fact of which his Allegoriae affords decisive evidence, and he thus lent the weight of his high authority to the perpetuation of the Alexandrine tradition in the Western Church.

The extant writings of Braulio clearly prove that he had profited largely by the instruction of Isidorus, and the quotations from Terence, Horace, Vergil, and Juvenal, which they contain, shew a fair knowledge of Latin literature. Among Isidorus' other pupils were Sisebut, king of the Visigoths, and the archdeacon Redemptus, author of the Life of St. Didier. Braulio, in his turn, became the founder of an important school in northern Spain, at the city of Saragossa, and among his scholars were Eugenius, third bishop of that name of Toledo (a writer whose metrical compositions are among the most favourable specimens of the literature of the period), and Taïon, Braulio's successor in the see of Saragossa (Bourret, L'École chrét. de Séville, 119–133).

The conquest of the country by the Saracens under Musa, in the year 711, probably involved the extinction of these schools, though traces of learning and culture are discernible even after this time; but throughout the 7th century, Spain may fairly be regarded as an exception to the intellectual darkness that prevailed in Western Europe and almost justifies the observation of the abbé Bourret,—"On dirait que toutes les muses se sont enfuies vers les bords hospitaliers du Bétis, car de là seulement arrivent les échos de la parole antique et les signes de la vie intellectuelle de l'humanité" (ib. p. 203).

* Perhaps one of the passages that may be accepted as genuine in this largely interpolated production.

In the East, and especially at Constantinople, the study of grammar and rhetoric received the countenance of the state long after the imperial schools of the West had ceased to exist. In the year 425, in the reign of Theodosius II., an edict was promulgated, designed apparently to restrict the function of public teaching to those who had been formally appointed to teach in the Capitol at Constantinople. Other teachers are forbidden to assemble their pupils "in publicis magistrationibus cellulisque" under pain of infamy and banishment from the city, but are allowed to teach in private dwelling houses, "intra parietes domesticos." This edict has been characterised by Finlay as a tyrannical exercise of power, but he omits to refer to the fact that the same measure makes provision for a fixed number of public instructors, as follows: in Latin, three "oratores" and ten "grammatici"; in Greek, five "sophistae" and one "grammaticus"; one teacher of philosophy; two of civil law. Each of these instructors was to have his appointed "locus," probably a fixed place, in which to assemble his class (Cod. Theod. xiv. tit. 9; ed. Haenel, p. 1389). The suppression of the schools of philosophy at Athens, by Justinian, was probably a blow aimed rather at heresy than at learning, and the grammarian and rhetorician still taught, as in Africa, unmolested, and in some instances with distinguished success. The names of Stobaeus, Theodorus Anagnostes, Agathias, and Evagrius, are sufficient proof of the continuance of a certain cultivation of letters. The schools at Constantinople, known as the oecumenical, were also celebrated, and though the circumstances under which the college of the Octagon in that city was founded are lost in obscurity, its existence in the 8th century, along with that of an extensive library, is sufficiently established. "The classical writers (ἐγκύκλιοι)" says Donaldson, "were taught with a strange mixture of Church fathers and later rhetoricians,—Libanius and Basil being placed on the same footing as Demosthenes, Plutarch and Dion Cassius being preferred to Herodotus and Thucydides, the commentators of Hermogenes and Aphthonius being substituted for the rhetoric of Aristotle, and Plato and Aristotle being seen darkly, if at all, through the clouded glasses of Proclus, Olympiodorus, and Joannes Philoponus" (Hist. of Greek Lit. iii. 373–374).

The accession of the Isaurian dynasty (A.D. 726) and the controversy respecting image worship were eminently unfavourable to letters, and the emperor Leo is accused of burning both the college of the Octagon and its library. Towards the close of the century, however, a considerable revival took place, and it is evident that no small amount of literary culture prevailed. At the commencement of the 9th century the celebrated Theodorus Studites assembled round him at the monastery of Studion a band of disciples, some of whom his biographer describes as devoted to general learning, others to Scriptural studies, and some to manual arts (Migne, Series Graeca, xcix. 168). "A proof," says Finlay, "that learning was still cultivated in the distant parts of the Byzantine empire, and that schools of some eminence existed in Greece, is to be found in the fact that Leo the mathematician, when a layman, retired to a college in the island of Andros to pursue his studies, and there laid the foundation of the scientific knowledge by which he established his reputation. After he was compelled to resign his archbishopric of Thessalonica, the general respect felt for his learning obtained for him from Bardas Caesar the presidency of the new university founded at Constantinople in the reign of Michael III. (A.D. 842–867), in which chairs of geometry and astronomy had been established, as well as the usual instruction in Greek literature." (Hist. of the Byzantine Emp. ed. Tozer, ii. 25; for Leo's attainments see Migne, Series Graeca, cix. 199.)

In northern and central Italy, where the rule of the Lombard supplanted that of the eastern emperor, the course of events could not fail to be unfavourable to learning; but it is evident that traditions of Greek culture lingered in the south long after the time of Gregory the Great. In the Life of John of Damascus there is a remarkable representation given by the monk Cosmas of his attainments and course of study. He had been captured by pirates when sailing from Calabria to the east, and as he stood exposed for sale in the market-place of Damascus, he informed the father of John (by whom he was subsequently ransomed) that his speech had been adorned by the study of rhetoric, his reason trained in dialectical methods and proofs; that he had studied ethics as taught by Aristotle and Plato; had acquired a knowledge of physical philosophy, arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy (τῶν ἀστέρων περιφορὰν); and, finally, had been initiated into the mysteries of theology, "both," he says, "as handed down by the Greeks and as the teachers of the Latin church had most clearly set them forth" (Migne, Series Graeca, xciv. 430).

In Frankland a continuous state of warfare sufficed to preclude much attention to the education of the people during the rule of Charles Martel and that of Pépin le Bref (A.D. 752–768). Guizot, however, contends that in the preceding century and a half (A.D. 600–750) there is good reason for inferring the continued existence of episcopal schools at Poitiers, Paris, Le Mans, Bourges, Clermont, Vienne, Châlons-sur-Saône, Arles, and Gap; while, besides the monastic schools of St. Médard at Soissons, and that at Lérins, he considers that others are to be traced in connexion with the foundations at Poitiers, Ligugé, Ansion, Luxeuil, Fontenelle, and Sithiu (Hist. de la Civilisat. ii. 3–4). It was reserved, however, for Charles the Great to initiate a series of efforts for the revival of learning, which were destined to be attended by marked success and long-enduring results.

Charles's regard for letters may have been derived, in the first instance, from Peter of Pisa, who appears to have taught grammar at the court of Pepin (Alcuin, Ep. 75); while Paulus Diaconus, the historian Leidradus, a Bavarian, and Theodulfus, a Spanish Goth, were scholars with whom he became acquainted during his campaign in Italy (A.D. 774). But in none of these were there combined the attainments and the energy requisite for carrying out the great work of restoration which Charles had in view. In the year 782, he is accordingly to be found applying to Alcuin of York for further assistance. Ultimately Alcuin acceded to this request, and on repairing to Frankland was installed instructor of the palace school, and also invested with a general superintendence of the work of education throughout the realm.

There can be little doubt that Alcuin was the most accomplished scholar of his time, for, besides considerable theological attainments, he was well read in the Latin classics, and also possessed a slight knowledge of Greek; but his mind was wanting in independence and originality, and his proneness to lean on precedent and authority inclined him rather to follow out the precepts of Gregory the Great than to seek to impart to the studies of his age a more liberal and catholic tone. This must always be regarded as no slight misfortune for Christian education in the middle ages, for the almost unquestioning deference and obedience which his learning, high character, and amiable disposition won for him from his scholars resulted in an influence over education in Frankland which lasted until the rise of scholasticism, and may even be traced after the Renaissance.

The palace school, which included Charles himself, his family, and the leading members of his court, is noticeable as a successful endeavour to raise the standard of lay education at that time. To Alcuin's instructions we may probably attribute the literary tastes of Lewis the Pious; while Adelhard, Wala, Einhard, and Riculfus all perceptibly reflect the same influence. The teacher supplied his class with such knowledge as was to be gathered from the manuals of Boethius, Isidorus, and Cassiodorus on the subjects of the ancient trivium and quadrivium. In connexion with logic and astronomy this was of a very meagre character, and the inquiring intellect of Charles seems, in these branches, to have decidedly outstripped the willingness or the resources of his instructor (see Alcuin, de Dialectica, Migne, ci. 951–979; also ib. c. 275; and Dümmler, Alcuiniana, Epp. 98 to 112).

Aided by the counsels and the pen of Alcuin, Charles next commenced, in the year 787, an endeavour to awaken a more systematic attention to letters in the monasteries of his realm. A copy of the Capitulary designed to promote this object (that addressed to Baugulfus, abbat of Fulda) has been preserved, and supplies us with an important illustration of the actual status of education at this period, the argument for the necessity of improvement being enforced by reference to the uncouth and illiterate diction of the letters from time to time addressed to Charles by the different monastic foundations. It is to be noted, as further illustrating Alcuin's theory of education, that the desirability of the proposed reforms is chiefly insisted on on account of the aid that students would thereby receive in understanding the Scriptures and those deeper hidden meanings which they enfold. "For as these," says the Capitulary, "contain images, tropes, and similar figures, it is impossible to doubt that the reader will arrive far more readily at the spiritual sense according as he is the better instructed in learning" (Constitutio de Scholis per singula Episcopia et Monasteria instituendis, Baluze, i. 201–204; Pertz, Legg. i. 523). Both the clerical profession and the monasteries at this period were largely recruited from the servile class; and it marks the rising estimation in which education now began to be held, that another of Charles's Capitularies, of the year 789, enjoins the clergy to seek for scholars not only among the sons of slaves but almost among the sons of freemen; it also directs that in connexion with every episcopal see and monastery there shall be a school where boys shall be taught the psalms, notation ("notas"), singing, the use of the Computus, and the Latin tongue, and that they shall be supplied with accurately transcribed text-books, "libros bene emendatos" (Capitula data missis dominicis, Baluze, i. 360).

In the year 796, Alcuin's work of reform in Frankland entered upon its third phase, consequent upon his appointment to the abbacy of St. Martin of Tours. Here he forthwith proceeded to put in practice his more austere conceptions of monastic discipline and education, while his reputation attracted scholars not only from all parts of the empire, but also from England and Ireland. The influence he thus exerted over his disciples during the eight years preceding his death constitutes probably the most enduring impress that he left upon his age; but his mistrust of pagan literature and too deferential adherence to the Gregorian traditions largely tended to cramp and fetter the intellectual energies of subsequent generations.

The movement thus initiated continued to develop itself long after Alcuin's death. In the year in which he died (A.D. 804) fresh injunctions were issued with a view to the more systematic education of the clergy (Baluze, i. 417).[1] In 813 a decree of the council of Châlons enjoined the creation of additional schools for the cultivation of learning and the study of the Scriptures (Labbé, Concilia, vii. 1272). The augmentation in the numbers of the scholars is probably indicated by a canon of the council of Aachen, in 817, requiring that only those who had already embraced the monastic life (the "oblati") should in future be admitted to the schools within the monastery walls (Pertz, Legg. i. 202). From this time the monastic schools appear to have been of two kinds: the "scholae claustrales" for the "oblati," and the "scholae canonicae" for the secular clergy. In the year 822 Lewis the Pious issued new instructions, affirming that education since his accession had not received due attention, and enjoining that every candidate for holy orders, whether young or old, should have a settled residence and a competent instructor; the parents or masters of scholars were to provide for their maintenance, and if the extent of a bishopric rendered it difficult to assemble the scholars at one centre, additional schools were to be opened (Pertz, Leges, i. 231). Among the episcopal schools in Frankland those of Orleans and Rheims were especially distinguished. The first, under the direction of Theodulfus, the archbishop, was perhaps the chief centre of clerical education up to the university era. Theodulfus was especially active in his endeavours to preserve and restore manuscripts, and those of Orleans were noted for their beauty and accuracy. He was also the author of a compendium of rules for the guidance of the clergy, which was widely circulated throughout the realm (Baunard, Théodulfe, c. 2; Migne, Patr. cv. 191–207). The school at Reims, under the patronage of the celebrated Hincmar, was not less famed, and under the successive teaching of Sigloard, archbishop Fulk, Remy of Auxerre, and Hucbald, enjoyed the proud distinction of having preserved throughout the 9th century that tradition of learning which links the episcopal schools with the university of Paris.

The monastic schools of this period, however, altogether surpassed the episcopal schools both in learning and in celebrity. Foremost in this category stands the school of the abbey at Fulda, under the rule of Rabanus Maurus, the disciple of Alcuin at Tours. He was equally distinguished by his attainments and his ability as a teacher, and his treatise on the education of the clergy, de Institutione Clericorum, contains not a few indications of his desire to set up a somewhat more liberal standard of such education than that which he had received. Among his scholars he numbered many of the most prominent characters of the 9th century, such as Walafrid Strabo, Otfried of Weissenberg, Rudolfus, Luitpertus, Hartmuat, Meginhard, &c. (Opera, ed. Colvener, 6 vols. 1626; Spengler, Leben des heiligen Rhabanus Maurus, 1856). The abbey of Hirsaugiae, an offshoot from Fulda, was also distinguished as a learned community under William, the abbat (Chron. Petershusanum, Migne, cxliii. 338). That at Seligenstadt, under Einhard the historian, was noted for the scholarly and admirable productions of its scriptorium; that at Ferrières, in the Gâtinais, could boast of its abbat, Lupus Servatus, the presence of the most distinguished classical scholar of the time (Nicolas, Étude sur les Lettres de Servat-Loup, 1861). One of his disciples, Eric, afterwards abbat of St. Germain at Auxerre, was the instructor of Lothair, the son of Charles the Bald. At Mayence, the abbey of St. Alban numbered among its scholars Rupertus, known for his Greek learning, and Probus, a devoted student of Cicero and Vergil (Chron. Hirsaugiae, ann. 892; Lupus Servatus, Epp. 20 and 34; Migne, cxix.). The monasteries of St. Germain des Prés and St. Denis at Paris already enjoyed, in the 9th century, a considerable celebrity as schools. At Corbey, near Amiens, under Adelhard and Wala, and Paschasius Radbertus, was gathered a society eminent for its learning and illustrious as a parent foundation. It fell before the Norman invasion; but its namesake, New Corbey, in Saxony, sustained the same traditions with scarcely less distinction (Walae Vita, Pertz, ii. 578–581). The great abbey of St. Riquier, under the rule of Angilbert, another of Alcuin's scholars, was noted for its devotion to letters; an inventory of its possessions, made in the year 831 by the direction of Lewis the Pious, included a library of no less than two hundred and thirty-one volumes (Léon Maître, Les Écoles, &c. p. 67). The abbey of St. Martin at Metz, under the rule of Aldricus, was scarcely less celebrated (Baluze, Miscell. i. 19); a bible presented by the community to Charles the Bald, and the missal of bishop Drogo, are still preserved, and rank among the most valued specimens of 9th-century art. The society of St. Mihiel-sur-Meuse enjoyed the instruction of Smaragdus, whose compend of Donatus frequently appears in the catalogues of the libraries of the period. St. Bertin, in the diocese of Cambrai, claimed the distinguished honour of leaving educated Grimbald, whom king Alfred invited to aid him in his efforts towards a restoration of learning in England (Bollandus, Juillet, ii. 651).

A remarkable effort on the part of the episcopal order still further to extend the influences of education was made in the year 829, when at an assembly at Paris it was resolved to petition the emperor to found three large schools at three different centres, to be open to the clergy and the monastic orders alike (Mansi, xiv. 599). The scheme appears to have been frustrated by the outbreak of war.

The principle of the gratuitous instruction of the sons of the poor appears to have been very distinctly on its trial at this period. An inscription over the portals of the monastery at Salzburg contained the verse—on the other hand, the monastery at Tours, under the rule of Fredegis, Alcuin's successor, was unenviably distinguished by its exaction of fees from the scholars. This practice was strongly denounced by Amalaric, who had formerly acted as librarian at the monastery, and had been promoted to the archbishopric of the diocese. In the year 843, he founded a fund for the purpose of providing gratuitous instruction in Tours, and the measure was subsequently sanctioned in a formal enactment by Charles the Bald (Martene, Thes. Anecd. i. ann. 843). At nearly the same time, Theodulfus issued instructions to the clergy of his diocese that they should in no case demand fees for the instruction of children, but only accept them when voluntarily offered by the parents (Mansi, xiii. 388). The Capitulary in which he embodied this proviso was subsequently widely adopted by other dioceses (Baunard, Théodulfe, p. 61).

It still remains briefly to advert to another school of thought, that of the Celtic church, and particularly the Irish monasteries, in order to complete the foregoing outline. With the name of St. Comgall there is associated the great school of Banchor[m] or Benchor in the Ards of Ulster, founded in the year 558 (Life of Columba, ed. Reeves, p. 306), and famous as a seat of learning. The yet more celebrated school at Hy or Iona is associated with the name of St. Columba; that of Lindisfarne, or Holy Island, with the labours of St. Aidan; those of Luxeuil, on the confines of Burgundy and Austrasia, and Bobbio in the north of Italy, with the missionary career of Columban. St. Gall in Switzerland, which in the 9th century possessed a library of four hundred volumes (Weidmann, Hist. de la Biblioth. de S. Gall, p. 16), still preserves the name of its founder. St. Kilian in Thuringia, and Virgilius in Carinthia, were representatives of the same great movement.

[m] This must be carefully distinguished from the monastery at Bangor (the modern Bangor-Iscoed in Flintshire) mentioned by Bede as numbering upwards of 2,000 monks (E. H. ii. 2); a foundation which possessed no school at all corresponding to its importance as a monastery (Bingham, Ant. ii. 347).

The question of the common origin of this teaching, characterised by a distinctive scholarship and a distinctive theology, in Irish foundations, would involve a more lengthened inquiry than is here admissible, but it may be observed that such evidence as we possess remarkably confirms the traditions which associate the early Irish civilisation with the East, either directly or indirectly through Massilia.

As early as the time of Jerome, there is evidence of an Irish Christian civilisation anterior to St. Patrick, and in the 6th century the "Scotti" as they were termed (Ireland being the original Scotland) were already eminent for their love of learning. An Irish scholar, Maildulf, instructed Aldhelm at Malmesbury in the 7th century; and Theodore, the archbishop, on his arrival, found himself, according to Aldhelm, surrounded by a throng of eager Irish disciples, "Hibernensium globo discipulorum stipatur" (Ussher, Syllog. Ep. p. 38).

The distinguishing features of this Celtic Christianity, so far as related to education and learning, were as follows: (1) the adoption of a text book of secular education which was condemned by the majority of the Latin clergy; (2) a superior knowledge of Greek and also of the Latin classics and of astronomy; (3) a disposition to employ dialectics in theological controversy.

(1) The treatise of Martianus Capella, to which reference has above been made (p. 1851), was a favourite text-book with those who leaned towards the cultivation of pagan learning. We find, for example, one Securus Melior Felix, a rhetorician at Clermont, editing the treatise in the year 534, and distributing copies throughout Frankland (Hist. litt. de la France, iii. 21, 173); so that in the time of Gregory of Tours, it would appear to have become the ordinary manual of all those who among his countrymen still made any profession of learning (Hist. Franc. x. 31). St. Patrick, it has been conjectured, first brought the book to Ireland, where its speculative character recommended it to the native genius. Various features, however, combined to render the volume peculiarly obnoxious to the orthodox party; it contained, for example, a remarkable anticipation of the Copernican theory in a statement that Mercury and Venus revolved round the sun; it asserted the existence of an antipodes, and finally it referred to the Triune God of Christianity in the same category with the gods of paganism (Mart. Cap. ed. Kopp, p. 856). It was from these pages that Virgilius, the Irish bishop of Salzburg, derived his theory of an antipodes, by the maintenance of which he drew down upon himself the enmity of St. Boniface and the anathema of pope Zacharias (Jaffé, Mon. Mogunt. p. 191; see also Gorini, Défense de l'Église, ii. 375–383). Prudentius of Troyes, in his controversy with John Scotus Erigena, broadly accused the latter of having "imbibed the deadly poison" of heresy from the same work (Migne, Patr. cxv. 1294).

(2) The superior scholarship and classical attainments of the Irish scholars are attested by frequent evidence. Columban beguiled his leisure with the composition of Latin verse. The affectation of Greek modes of expression is, however a serious defect in their Latinity, and adds much to the obscurity of their diction. "It is palpable," says Mr. Haddan, "in British writers, as well as in Irish and Saxon, from Gildas down to Ricemarch" (Remains, p. 280). They were often well read in the Greek fathers, and Clement the Scot, when at the court of Carloman in 742, shewed himself familiar with the writings of Origen, and declined to be bound by the dicta of Jerome, Augustine, and Gregory (ib. pp. 274, 286; Jaffé, Mon. Mogunt. p. 140). The translation of the treatises of the pseudo-Dionysius by John Scotus Erigena in the 9th century (a task to which none of the Frankish clergy had been found equal) proves his superior acquaintance with the Greek language, while we may infer from the questions which, at the suggestion of Clement of Ireland, Charles the Great propounded to Alcuin at Tours, a more than ordinary acquaintance with astronomy (Migne, Patrol. c. 266; Jaffé, Alcuiniana, p. 420).

(3) The proneness of the Irish theologians to the use of the syllogism aroused the antipathy which, as we have already seen, was traditional in the Latin church to such modes of discussing theological questions; Benedict of Aniane notes this feature to their discredit: "Apud modernos scholasticos, maxime apud Scotos, iste syllogismus delusionis" (Baluze, Misc. v. 54). The practice, probably carried to its abuse, is discernible from Pelagius down to John Scotus, the latter of whom Prudentius found it necessary to remind that the fathers of the church had enjoined that the faith should be defended, not by sophistic trickeries, but by the plain statements of the Scriptures: "Nequaquam sophisticis illusionibus, sed Scripturarum sanctarum evidentissimis allegationibus" (Migne, cxv. 1013).

But although, in the 8th and 9th centuries, the treatise of Martianus Capella and the employment of dialectics were discouraged by the church, there is sufficient evidence that neither the one nor the other fell into disuse; so that when, at the commencement of the 12th century, William of Champeaux opened his school of logic at Paris, and found both a pupil and a rival in Abelard, the ancient art was revived with new vigour, and the history of Christian education itself entered upon a new phase.

SCRIBHNEOIR, SCRIBHNIGH, the Irish scribe, was an important officer in the monastery, and probably took the place of the more ancient Seanchaidhe or historian of pagan times. He was copyist, illuminator, annalist, and in the end of the 10th century became merged in the Ferleighinn or public lecturer in the school (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 631–2). As thus associated with learning, he frequently became abbat and bishop. In the Annals of the Four Masters we find frequent obits of the scribe during the 8th, 9th, and 10th centuries, and he is often (A.D. 803, 820, 828, 871, &c.) called "bishop, scribe, and abbat," or even (A.D. 819) "scribe, bishop, anchorite, and abbat" (Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 149 sq. and St. Adamnan, 365; O'Conor, Rer. Hib. Scrip. iv. 129 sq.). By canon the mulct for the blood of a scribe was equal to that for the blood of a bishop or abbat (see the Irish canon of the 8th century, quoted from D'Achery and Martene by O'Conor, Ib. iv. 130, and Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 150 n.), and the manuscripts which still remain, both in our own libraries and in the continental, attest their skill, taste, and assiduity, and their knowledge of the principles of their art, and of the combinations of the colours and colouring matter they used. Chief of these may be enumerated the Book of Kells, the Book of Armagh, and the Book of Lecan, with their ornamentation of Runic knots and animals with elongated and interlacing extremities (O'Curry, Lect. MS. Materials of Anc. Ir. Hist. pass. ed. 1873). [J. G.]

SCRIPTURE, STUDY OF. The object proposed in this article is to throw some light upon the habitual use which was made of Holy Scripture during the early ages of the church, as the subject of the constant study, and as the guide and director of the daily life of its members.

I. As to the numerous versions made in ancient times little needs to be added to the articles which have already appeared in the Dictionary of the Bible. [VERSIONS.] Great importance was attached to the multiplication of versions into the vernacular tongues of those who received Christianity. St. Augustine (De Doctr. Christ. c. xi.) writes: "For the translations of the Scriptures from Hebrew into Greek can be counted, but the Latin translators are out of all number. For in the early days of the faith every man who happened to lay hands upon a Greek manuscript, and who thought he had any knowledge, were it ever so little, of the two languages, ventured upon the work of translation."[a] In the fifth chapter of the same work St. Augustine bears witness to the early diffusion of the Holy Scriptures in various tongues. Eusebius also says (De Praeparat. Evangel. xii. 1) that the Scriptures were translated into all languages, both of Greeks and barbarians, throughout the world; and Chrysostom (Hom. i. in Joan.) says that the Syrians, the Egyptians, the Indians, the Persians, the Ethiopians, and a multitude of other nations translated them into "their own tongues."

St. Augustine, in his letter to the people of Madaura (Letter ccxxxii. vol. ii. p. 446, Clark's ed.), says that the Divine Scriptures had "come into the hands of all."

II. Our next evidence of the actual use made of Holy Scripture in the early Church is derived from the citations both from the Old and New Testament, with which the works of early writers abound. It does not fall within our present province to discuss the import of the references made to apocryphal writings under designations the same as, or similar to, those given to the Canonical Books of Scripture. (See CANONICAL BOOKS, p. 278, and Dict. of the Bible, s. v. CANON.)

The following extract from the Bampton Lectures of Mr. Conybeare bears directly upon the knowledge of Holy Scripture possessed by the members of the Corinthian Church in sub-apostolic days: "It is quite evident (Mr. Conybeare writes) that it (i.e. the first Epistle of Clement) must have been written to a Church, of which a considerable and influential portion of the members had been Jews, or proselytes to that faith, since it throughout supposes the most intimate acquaintance with the Scriptures of the Old Testament; for these, and not the Scriptures of the New, are universally quoted as the written authority for the doctrines it contains. The author indeed very properly refers to the discourses of our blessed Lord as to an authority of equal, and indeed more especial, weight; but he never expressly quotes these from any particular written gospel; and although he always exactly agrees with these evangelical narratives in substance and in sense, yet the verbal discrepancies will shew that he does not transcribe from them; but, as bishop Pearson has well observed, seems to have relied on a memory previously familiar with our Lord's words from the oral communications of the apostles or their disciples" (pp. 55, 56).

The same remarks apply to a considerable extent to other writings of the sub-apostolic age, and of the first three centuries of the Christian era, throughout which we observe that a uniform appeal is made to the Scriptures as the unerring rule of faith, and as the foundation of the various creeds which were composed within that period.

III. The next evidence which will be adduced of the actual use of Holy Scripture in the early Church, is derived from the numerous and earnest exhortations which are found in the homilies and other works of the most celebrated writers to the diligent study of Scripture, from the invitations addressed to the heretics and the heathen to examine the sacred writings for themselves, and from the incidental notices which their writings afford of the extent to which the Scriptures were read and studied in private, and of the effects thus produced.

Clement in his epistle, c. 45, exhorts the Corinthians to "look into the Holy Scriptures, which are the true words of the Holy Ghost." Again in the fifty-third chapter he says, "Ye know full well the Holy Scriptures, and have thoroughly searched into the oracles of God." Polycarp, in his epistle to the Philippians, c. 12, writes thus: "I trust ye are well exercised in the Holy Scriptures, and that nothing is hid from you." Tatian in his Address to the Greeks (c. 29) bears witness to the practical effect produced upon his own heart and life by the writings with which he happened to meet, "too old to be compared with the opinions of the Greeks, and too divine to be compared with their errors." Theophilus (ad Autolycum, i. 14) bears similar testimony to that of Tatian to the effect produced on his own mind by the study of the Scriptures, and he urges his friend "to study carefully the prophetical writings," assuring him that they will lead him "more certainly to a way of escape from everlasting punishments, and to the attainment of the everlasting blessings of God." Justin Martyr (Cohort. ad Graecos, c. 35) earnestly exhorts those to whom he writes "as the one thing which remained for them to do," that "renouncing the error of their fathers they would read the prophecies of the sacred writers . . . and learn from them that which will give them everlasting life." Athenagoras in his Plea for the Christians writes thus: "I think that you also cannot be ignorant of the writings either of Moses, or of Isaiah and Jeremiah, and the other prophets," and adds, "But I leave it to you, when you meet with the books themselves, to examine carefully the prophecies contained in them, that you may, on fitting grounds, defend us from the abuse cast upon us" (c. ix.). In like manner Tertullian (Apol. c. 31) invites the Roman presidents or magistrates at Carthage to "look into the words of God," and adds that the Christians did not conceal their Scriptures, and that many accidents brought them before those who were not of their religion. Clement of Alexandria in his Exhortation to the Heathen (c. ix.) not only quotes many of those "ten thousand Scriptures," which, he says, he could adduce, but he addresses them in the following words: "No one will be so impressed by the exhortations of any of the saints as he is by the words of the Lord Himself, the lover of man. . . . Faith will lead you in; experience will teach you; Scripture will train you, for it says, 'Come hither, O children; listen to me, and I will teach you the fear of the Lord.'" And, again, in the Stromateis (i. 7), Clement writes as follows: "Wherefore also the Scriptures were translated into the language of the Greeks in order that they might never be able to allege the excuse of ignorance, inasmuch as they are able to hear also what we have in our hands if they only wish." So also Tertullian (ad Uxorem, ii. 6), when setting forth the dangers arising from marriages between Christians and idolaters, asks, "Ubi fomenta fidei de Scripturarum interlectione?" where he seems to assume as a matter of course that such reading would be common with those of the same faith. Other passages might be adduced from the same writer in proof of the prevalent use of Holy Scripture amongst Christians, and of the appeals made to it in their apologetical and controversial works in terms which imply its accessibility to all. In like manner Origen (in Jerem. Hom. iv.) says: "Let us read the Scriptures of the Old Testament. . . . Let us also read the Scriptures of the New Testament, the words of the apostles; and having read them, let it be our care that they be written in the table of our hearts." And again (in lib. Jerem. Hom. xx.) he says that "though at the very time of reading them (the Scriptures) there be no sensible advantage, yet in the end they will be found profitable for strengthening virtuous dispositions and weakening the habits of vice." And, once more, he exhorts his hearers to "come daily to the wells of the Scriptures, the waters of the Holy Spirit, and there draw, and carry home a full vessel" (in Gen. Hom. x.). In the letter addressed by Theonas, bishop of Alexandria, about the close of the 3rd century, to Lucianus, the chief chamberlain of the emperor (probably Diocletian), we find some interesting directions given concerning the duties of the person who may be entrusted by the emperor with the custody of his library. Amongst these we find a direction to "hand the Divine Scriptures which Ptolemy Philadelphus caused to be translated into our language; and sometimes, too, the gospel and the apostle will be lauded for their divine oracles" (c. 7). The following advice is also given to Lucianus himself: "Let no day pass by without reading some portion of the sacred Scriptures" (c. 9; in Dacherii Spicilegium, iii. pp. 297–299). Cyprian (de Spectaculis, c. 10) says: "Let the faithful Christian devote himself to the sacred Scriptures, and there he shall find worthy exhibitions for his faith." Origen urges his hearers not only to hear the Scriptures read in the church, but also to exercise themselves in the reading of the same in their houses, and to meditate thereon day and night (cf. Hom. in Levit. ix. tom. vi. pp. 164, 165, ed. Wirceburgi, 1783; cf. Hom. in Gen. x. tom. v. p. 229; Hom. in Ex. xii. tom. v. pp. 465, 466). St. Augustine, writing to Proba (Ep. c. xxxii. ii. p. 300, Ant. 1700), exhorts her specially to read the writings of the apostles, assuring her that by them she will be incited to acquaint herself with the prophets, whose testimonies the apostles used.

[a] There is ground for doubt whether by the use of the words interpretes and interpretari, Augustine meant to denote only translators from the original tongues, or whether he included also those who undertook the revision of existing versions.

The earnest exhortations of St. Chrysostom, addressed to all classes of his hearers, to devote themselves to the diligent study of holy Scripture, are familiar to all who are acquainted with his writings. Such exhortations are found, e.g. in his twenty-first homily on Genesis, and in his thirty-second and forty-first homilies on St. John, and also in the homilies of St. Basil, as e.g. in those on Pss. xxviii. and lix. A more remarkable passage occurs in the third of Chrysostom's sermons on Lazarus, a passage which deserves special consideration in connexion with the present subject, not only by reason of the earnest exhortations of the preacher to the private study of holy Scripture, but also as bearing directly on the interesting and important inquiry respecting the extent to which copies of the Bible were multiplied and circulated in the 4th century. In the beginning of that sermon, Chrysostom assigns as one reason why he did not complete his examination of the parable of Lazarus in one day, his desire that the subject of his discourse might take deeper root in the minds of his hearers by continuous meditation on what he had said. He then goes on to assign as the reason why he frequently announced the subject of his discourse several days before its delivery, his desire that during the intervening days his hearers should take the book into their hands, and by a careful examination of the whole of the pericope, or section, they might become better prepared for what was afterwards to be said (i. p. 903, ed. Paris, 1839). Chrysostom proceeds to exhort his hearers, and to assure them that he will never cease to exhort them, to the constant reading of the Holy Scriptures, and to expose the invalidity of the excuses of those who alleged that the study of the Scriptures was incumbent only upon persons who had retired from the world, and did not appertain to those who were engrossed by its daily cares and anxieties. He proceeds to exhort his hearers to procure the Scriptures for themselves, and points out to them the advantages accruing from their possession, amongst which he alleges that even the sight of the books makes men less prone to fall into sin. It is important to observe that the exhortations of Chrysostom have reference to the Old Testament as well as to the New; that he earnestly exhorts his hearers to continue to read the Scriptures, even though they might not understand much which they read; to have recourse, when needful, to those who were better instructed than themselves; and, finally, he assures them that when the zeal and the diligence to which he encourages them are displayed, if man should be unable to teach them the truths which they desired to learn, God would Himself reveal them. The whole of the first three sections of this sermon deserve special attention.

Another passage bearing upon the multiplicity of copies of the Bible in the 4th century is found in Chrysostom's tenth homily (according to some editions the eleventh) on St. John, where he deals with the excuse for neglecting the study of the Bible grounded on the alleged difficulty of procuring copies. As regards the rich, he says that this excuse is altogether ridiculous. He does not attach much weight to it as regards the poor, but observes that if any are so poor that they cannot purchase copies of the Scriptures for themselves, they might nevertheless, by reason of the continual public reading of them, become acquainted with the whole of their contents. Once more, in his thirty-second homily on St. John, Chrysostom reproves those who cared only for the fineness of the parchment on which copies of the Scriptures were written, or for the beauty of the characters, and who neglected the contents. And, as illustrating his own practice, reference may be made to a passage in his tenth homily on Genesis, in which he says that by taking the sacred books (τὰ θεῖα βιβλία, a term first applied to the entire collection of the books of Scripture by Chrysostom) into our hands, both before and after meals, we shall be able, when at home, to derive profit, and to afford spiritual food to the soul.

More especially the great writers of the early church urged the necessity of the diligent study of Holy Scripture on the part of the clergy. Gregory Nazianzen complains of those who, before they well knew how to read the Scriptures, had the vanity to think that they were qualified for the government of the church (Orat. i. de Fuga). St. Chrysostom, in his treatise de Sacerdotio, earnestly enforces the diligent study of Holy Scripture upon the clergy. He observes that, as spiritual physic for the souls of men, the word of God was instead of everything that was used in the cure of bodily distempers (lib. iv. c. 3), and therefore that it was necessary that the ministers of God should be very diligent in studying the Scriptures, that the word of Christ might dwell in them richly (ib. c. 4). St. Jerome in like manner says that a sermon should be seasoned well with Scripture: "Sermo presbyteri Scripturarum lectione conditus sit" (Ep. ii. ad Nepotian.). And again, "Divinas Scripturas saepius lege; immo nunquam de manibus tuis sacra lectio deponatur" (ad Nepot. de Vita Clericorum, i. p. 16). So, at a later period, the council held at Toledo in A.D. 633 requires, in its twenty-fifth canon, that the clergy should be well acquainted with the sacred Scriptures. St. Gregory the Great, writing to Augustine after he had been made "archbishop of the English nation," as Bede says, assumes that he is "well versed in holy writ, and particularly St. Paul's epistle to Timothy, wherein he endeavours to instruct him how he should behave himself in the house of God" (Bede, Eccl. Hist. p. 46, ed. Giles).

At the designation of Eraclius by St. Augustine, as his colleague in the discharge of some of his responsibilities, and his successor in the episcopate, he reminded the clergy and laity of Hippo that it had been agreed between them that no one should intrude upon him during five days of the week, in order that he might discharge that duty in the study of Holy Scripture which had been assigned to him in two councils of Numidia and Carthage; and he expresses his resolution for the remainder of his days, so far as Eraclius would "kindly give him leave," to devote himself to the study of the sacred Scriptures (Letter ccxiii. vol. ii. pp. 408, 409, Clark's ed.).

The following references throw some light upon the rules and observances of those who adopted the monastic life. In St. Augustine's rules for the observance of the nuns belonging to a monastery in which his sister had been prioress, he says that from the time of their coming to table until that of their rising from it, they should listen to whatever was read to them in course, and that, whilst their mouths were exercised in receiving food, their ears should be occupied in receiving the word of God (Letter ccxi. vol. ii. p. 396, Clark's ed.). Cassian says, respecting the monks of Egypt, that their manual labour in their respective cells was so conducted that their meditation on the Psalms and other portions of Scripture was never intermitted (de Instit. Coenob. lib. iii. c. 2). St. Jerome also says of the Egyptian monks: "Post horam nonam in commune concurritur; Psalmi resonant, Scripturae resonant ex more" (Ep. xxii. ad Eustoch.). The same writer says also that they daily learned some portion of holy Scripture (ib.). Bede says, concerning his own manner of life in the monastery of Weremouth, "I wholly applied myself to the study of Scripture."

IV. The next evidence which shall be adduced of the actual use which was made of Holy Scripture in the early Church is derived from the extent to which it was either committed to memory as a distinct exercise, or, as a result of continuous reading and meditation, became familiar to the mind both of public teachers and also of private individuals.

Eusebius says that Origen's father trained him from his childhood in the Scriptures, appointing him to repeat some passages every day (Hist. Eccles. vi. 2). Socrates also says that Eusebius of Emesa had studied the Holy Scriptures from his infancy and was then taught human learning (Hist. Eccles. ii. 9)[b], and Sozomen, who bears the same testimony, says that this was done "according to the custom of his country" (Hist. Eccles. iii. 6). The same writer says that Marcus the heretic was expert in the Scriptures (vi. 29), and Palladius says that he could repeat all the Old and New Testament without book (Histor. Lausiac. c. xxi. quoted by Bingham, Antiq. iv. p. 176). Gregory Nyssen remarks, in his life of his sister Macrina, that in her infancy she was taught the easy portions of Scripture that were most suitable to her age. Sozomen says of Julian the Apostate (Hist. Eccles. v. 2) that "he had been brought up in the knowledge of the Holy Scriptures under the guidance of priests and bishops." The same writer says of Mark, one of the monks of Scetis, that "he committed the sacred Scriptures to memory" (ib. vi. 29). St. Jerome says that the young virgins whom Paula had collected out of different provinces were obliged to learn the Psalms and some portion of Scripture every day.[c] Augustine (de Doct. Christ. ii ix.) says that the first rule in the study of Holy Scripture is "to read them so as to commit them to memory," though he qualifies this direction by the words which follow, "or at least so as not to remain wholly ignorant of them." He adds: "In this matter memory counts for a great deal; but if the memory be defective, no rules can supply the want."

He refers moreover to the case of those with whom the Holy Scriptures had been so exclusively their text-book that when they met with other and more commonly used forms of speech than those to which they had been accustomed in their Latin Bibles, they were "surprised at them, and thought them less pure Latin than those which they had learnt from Scripture" (De Doct. Christ. ii. 15).

Thus, e.g. in his preface to his work on Christian Doctrine, St. Augustine refers to the case of the Egyptian monk Antony, who, though unable to read himself, "is said to have committed the Scriptures to memory through hearing them read by others, and by dint of wise meditation to have arrived at a thorough understanding of them" (Works, vol. ix. p. 2. Edinburgh, 1873). Gregory the Great, when chiding the abbat Theodore for neglecting to read some of the words of his Saviour daily, mentions the case of Servulus, a palsied man at Rome, who purchased a copy of the Scriptures, and, though unable to read, learned the Holy Scripture through hearing it constantly read to him by the religious men whom he entertained (Hom. xv. in Evangel. Quoted by Bingham, iv. p. 179). Eusebius of Caesarea mentions the case of a blind man who could repeat any part of the Bible, and sometimes supplied the place of a reader in the church (De Martyr. Palaestin. c. xiii. ib.). Socrates makes incidental mention of one Pambos, an illiterate man, who went to some one who could read for the purpose of being taught a Psalm (Hist. Eccl. iv. 23). The same writer says of Didymus, who lost his sight at a very early age, that his acquaintance with the divine oracles, as contained both in the Old and New Testament, was so perfect that he composed several treatises in exposition of them (ib. iv. 25), and of the Emperor Theodosius Junior, A.D. 422, that by his early training "he learnt the Holy Scriptures by heart," and that he was "a more indefatigable collector of the sacred books than even Ptolemy Philadelphus had formerly been" (ib. vii. 22).

Jerome (Ad Gaudentium de Pacatulae Infantulae Educatione, i. pp. 45, 1515) advises that when seven years old Pacatula should learn by heart the Psalms, and should then proceed to make the books of Solomon, the gospels, the Apostles, and the Prophets the treasure of her heart. Again, when writing to Laeta concerning the education of her daughter (i. p. 26), he advises that at a tender age she should be imbued with the sweet Psalms. He prescribes in the following words the order in which he recommends that the Scriptures should be studied and committed to memory: "Discat primo Psalterium: hic se canticis avocet: et in Proverbiis Solomonis eruditatur ad vitam. In Ecclesiaste consuescat quae mundi sunt calcare. In Job, virtutis et patientiae exempla sectetur. Ad Evangelia transeat, nunquam ea positura de manibus. Apostolorum Acta et Epistolas, tota cordis imbibat voluntate. Cumque pectoris sui cellarium his opibus locupletaverit, mandet memoriae Prophetas, Pentateuchum, et Regum et Paralipomenon libros, Esdrae quoque et Hester volumina. Ad ultimum, sine periculo discat Canticum Canticorum, ne si in exordio legerit, sub carnalibus verbis spiritualium nuptiarum epithalamium non intelligens, vulneretur. Caveat omnia Apocrypha (ib. p. 27). So again (Ad Demetriadem de Virginitate servandâ, i. p. 31) Jerome advises Demetriades thus: "Statue quot horis sanctam Scripturam ediscere debeas; quanto tempore legere, non ad laborem, sed ad delectationem et instructionem animae."

Again (Vita Hilar. c. 7) St. Jerome says of Hilarion, a monk of Palestine, "Scripturas sanctas memoriter tenens, post orationem et psalmos, quasi Deo praesente, recitabat."

V. The importance which was attached to the public reading of Holy Scripture in the religious assemblies of the early Christians is abundantly established. [EPISTLE; GOSPEL; LECTION; PROPHECY.]

But besides the public reading of the Scriptures in their assemblies and the earnest exhortations with which the writings of the early Christians abound to the diligent study of the same in private, it appears to have been a custom, adopted in some parts at least, to have copies of the Scriptures in the vernacular tongue placed in convenient parts of the churches so that those who frequented them might have opportunity of reading them for themselves either before or after the public services. The following lines written by Paulinus upon the wall of the church

[b] Valesius, in his notes on the second book of Socrates' Ecclesiastical History, says that "it is well known that the boys of Edessa got by heart the books of Sacred Scripture, according to the usage of their ancestors."

[c] "Nec licebat cuiquam sororum ignorare psalmos, et non de Scripturis quotidie aliquid discere." (Epitaph. Paulae Opp. tom. i. p. 84. 1513.)

of Nola bear witness to the existence of this custom:

"Si quem sancta tenet meditandi in lege voluntas;
Hic poterit residens sacris intendere libris." [4]

VI. The last evidence which will be adduced of the use of Holy Scripture made in the early Church is derived from the eagerness with which the heathen persecutors searched for copies of the Scriptures, the importance which the owners attached to their possession, and the infamy which was incurred by those who voluntarily surrendered them. [TRADITOR.]

Amongst the many passages which might be cited in proof of the practical use of Holy Scripture in the early Church reference may be made to the letter of Innocent bishop of Rome to Chrysostom when expelled from his bishopric, and of Theodoret to Dioscorus bishop of Alexandria. In the former of these letters Innocent reminds Chrysostom that "a good man may be sorely tried, but cannot be overcome, for he is preserved and guarded by the truths of Holy Scripture. The Holy Bible," he continues, "which we expound to the people, affords abundant examples of the afflictions to which the saints have been invariably subjected, and shews that they did not receive their crowns till they had passed with patience through the severest trials" (Soz. Hist. Eccles. viii. 26). In the letter of Theodoret to Dioscorus, written about A.D 444, he speaks of the great comfort which the examples contained in Scripture afford to those who are calumniated, and cites the case of Joseph when cast into prison by Potiphar, of David when persecuted by Saul, and lastly of our Lord the Saviour Himself when accused by His enemies of deceiving the people (Baronii Annales, vi. pp. 25, 26; 1685).

As a further illustration of the practical use made of Holy Scripture in times of sorrow, reference may be made to an incident recorded in the 'Lives of the Abbats of Weremouth and Jarrow' appended to the works of Bede, to the effect that on the night on which Benedict died, Jan. 12, A.D. 689, some of the brethren met together in the church and passed the night without sleep in praying and singing, whilst others remained in the side chambers awaiting his departure; and it is added, "a portion of Scripture from the Gospels, appointed to be read every evening, was recited by a priest during the whole night to relieve their sorrow" (Bede, Works, iv. 385; ed. Giles). [C. J. E.]

SCROLL. [VOLUME.]

SCRUTINIUM. [MISSA, p. 1203.]

SCULPTURE, CHRISTIAN. The abhorrence of carved representations of the objects of worship inherited by the Christian from the Jewish church was at first so great as almost entirely to forbid the application of the art of sculpture to the service of religion. Early Christian statues, either in marble or bronze, are of the very rarest occurrence. Hardly more than half a dozen examples can be reckoned—enough to shew that the use of the plastic art was not wholly interdicted, but, at the same time, that its use was regarded with grave suspicion and dislike. If we could accept the authenticity of the story related by Eusebius that a statue of our Lord was erected at Paneas by the woman diseased with the issue of blood [JESUS CHRIST, REPRESENTATIONS, p. 877], we should have the earliest possible example of sculpture devoted to Christianity. The tale, however, is totally unworthy of credence. The statues of Christ and other scriptural personages with which Alexander Severus furnished his "lararium" have no claim to belong to the domain of Christian art. The very few early Christian statues that are known to exist exhibit in their form and technical treatment the genius of late Roman art, and possess no individual characteristics. As Lübke remarks (Hist. of Sculpt. i. 335), "the novelty of the subject was not yet powerful enough to evoke new forms or new expressions."

The only early Christian statues we can enumerate are those of the Good Shepherd, of St. Peter, and that of St. Hippolytus. D'Agincourt's researches in Italy during fifty years discovered no other well-authenticated example. For seven or eight centuries the art of sculpture was extinct, except in works in relief on sarcophagi and ivories.

I. STATUES.

(1) Among the earliest and best of these is a small marble statuette of the Good Shepherd, formerly in the Vatican Library, now in the Lateran Museum. "It is a pleasing idyllic figure, with artistic qualities that remind one of the works of a better period" (Appell, Mon. of Early Christian Art, p. 4). The tunic drawn up is fastened round the waist, and the shepherd's scrip hangs behind; he fondly holds the legs of the recovered sheep thrown over his shoulders by both hands. The antique grace it breathes, and the absence of any distinctive marks, have caused its Christian origin to be somewhat needlessly questioned. The legs have been partly restored (Appell, u. s.; Westwood, Early Christian Sculpture, p. 50, apud Parker, Archæology of Rome, "Tomba"; Perkins, Tuscan Sculpture, i. p. xliii.). [SHEPHERD, THE GOOD, p. 1893.]

The Lateran Museum contains another marble statuette of the Good Shepherd, much inferior in execution, which is stiff and rude. The shepherd is young and beardless; he holds the lamb with his right hand on his shoulder, and the "pedum" with his left (Westwood, u. s.; Perret, Catacombes, iv. 4). There is also one of inferior workmanship in the Kircherian Museum (Perkins, u. s. I. xxxix.); and one is mentioned at the end of the 4th century in the collection of the Duke of Medina Coeli at Seville.

(2) St. Peter.—By far the most important early Christian statue as a work of art is the famous bronze figure of St. Peter in the Vatican basilica. It may probably be placed, as it is by Dr. Appell, Perkins, and Lübke, in the 5th century. Mr. J. H. Parker, however, who always regards early dates with suspicion, regards it as "a fine work of the 13th century." It is a close imitation of the ancient Roman portrait statues, and, according to Lübke (u. s. i. 337), "displays a care and accuracy of technical skill astonishing in the 5th century," but a complete absence of originality "we have in every line of the laborious imitation of antique senatorial figures." The figure is in Roman costume, with the right foot extended to receive the kisses of the faithful; the right hand is extended in blessing, and he holds the keys in the left. The marble chair in which it is seated is of the 15th century. According to one tradition, Leo I. melted down the ancient statue of Jupiter Capitolinus and recast it in this form; others hold, with less probability, that it is the old statue with a new head and hands. The celebrated statue of St. Peter which Leo the Isaurian threatened to destroy in the time of Gregory II. (726–730), was probably that preserved in the crypt of St. Peter's, the body of which is antique, the head being an addition of the 13th century.

The royal cabinet at Berlin once contained a small standing bronze statuette of St. Peter, said to have been found in the catacombs. It seems to have been taken by Napoleon I. to Paris, and to have never returned. It is described as being of good style, with drapery of artistic merit. The apostle was clad in the tunic and toga, holding the labarum in the left hand, and giving the benediction with the right. The head displayed the broad features, the short, thick beard and curling hair characteristic of St. Peter (Bartoli, Antiche Lucerne, part iii. pl. 27; Munter, Sinnbilder, ii. 21).

(3) St. Hippolytus.—This is a marble sitting statue, much restored, especially in the upper portions of the figure. It was formerly in the Vatican Library, but is now in the Lateran Museum. The figure is seated in a dignified attitude in a marble cathedra, on which is inscribed the canon Paschalis; and on the other side a list of Hippolytus's writings. It is vested in the philosophic pallium. The right elbow rests on a book held in the left hand, and the right hand is raised to the breast. The date is uncertain, but it is probably not later than the 6th century. Mr. Perkins regards it as devoid of character, while it is pronounced by Winckelmann and other authorities to be "the best known example of early Christian sculpture" (Westwood, u. s. p. 37; Perret, v. pl. i.; Bunsen, Hippolytus, i. frontispiece; Münter, Sinnbilder, ii. 13; D'Agincourt, Sculpt. pl. iii. No. 1).

II. SARCOPHAGI.

The chief field for the exercise of the art of sculpture in the early Christian church was furnished by the sarcophagi, in which the remains of its more wealthy members were deposited. The number of these is very large, especially in Rome, where very many have been discovered in the catacombs and other places of early Christian burial. Examples are also to be found at Ravenna, Milan, and other cities of Italy, as well as in the south of France, where a native school of Christian sculpture, derived from Italy, evidently flourished. There are also a few in Spain. The chief examples in Rome are now collected in the Lateran Museum, where a very interesting series of examples of Christian sculpture are brought under the eye at once, and may be studied and compared at leisure. The most important of these, as well as the other principal sarcophagi now existing in Rome, have been photographed at the cost of Mr. J. H. Parker, and their designs have been thus made accessible to the student at home.

The word "sarcophagus," as well as the mode of burial, was borrowed by the early Christians from heathenism, and passed into the nomenclature of the church. Augustine writes: "Arca in qua mortuus ponitur, quod omnes jam σαρκοφάγον vocant" (De Civit. Dei, xviii. 5). The word is also found in an early epitaph given by De Rossi, "in hoc sarcofago conditur" (Inscr. Christ. Rom. ii. 530).

Nowhere is the rapid decline of art more recognisable than in the sarcophagi. The basreliefs, which so lavishly adorn their sides, manifest a lamentable deterioration of style. The compositions are crowded and ill-balanced; the figures are usually ill-drawn, with short, thick bodies and large heads, and stiff draperies, and a general absence of dignity or grace. The compositions are rather architectural and pictorial than sculptural or statuesque. The figures occupy one plane, unrelieved by any depth of backgrounds. The majority of them are seen in front view, instead of the profile, which characterises the Grecian friezes. But with this decided deterioration of style, it is evident that the mode of decoration and its general spirit are directly derived from pagan art, and are in no sense the natural development of the Christian mind. The pose of the figures, their attitudes, the drapery, the types of the heads are inherited from ancient plastic works. The inferiority is due to the want of skill in the sculptors employed, not to the introduction of new forms. As a rule the earliest works are the best, and conform most closely to the pagan type. The later we descend, and the more unmistakable the Christian character of the sculpture, the greater is its inferiority as a work of art. Sarcophagi bearing a distinctly Christian character scarcely appear before the 4th century. Le Blant (Sarcoph. Chrétiens d'Arles, pp. iii. iv.) speaks of the exceeding rarity of earlier examples. He refers to one bearing the date A.D. 273, and regards as belonging to the same primitive type, that of Livia Primitiva, transported from Rome to the Louvre, and one at La Gayole (pl. xxxiv.), but is able to mention no others; and though an earlier date has been confidently affirmed for some others, the most trustworthy authorities agree that there are no well-authenticated examples of Christian sarcophagi which can be assigned to the 2nd century and hardly any to the 3rd.

There is abundant evidence that pagan sarcophagi were used with little scruple for the burial of Christians—"Profanis tumulis Christiani non raro quasi propriis usi sunt" (Mabillon, Iter Ital. § 10, p. 81). The use of the sarcophagus was a mark of wealth, and the desire not to shew any inferiority to their neighbours, which is nowhere more powerful than in funeral rites, would lead Christians of means and position to adopt the mode of the disposal of their dead which was appropriate to their rank, without much regard to the character of the sculptures which decorated their last resting-place. If there had been Christian sarcophagus-makers they would doubtless have employed them by preference; but in the absence of artists of their own faith, they would have recourse to sculptors of the old religion, only taking care to avoid those scenes which had an immoral tendency, and by preference selecting pastoral or vintage scenes, or other subjects into which a symbolical meaning could be easily read. A sarcophagus, discovered in the cemetery of St. Agnes, once containing the body of a Christian virgin, and bearing the inscription "Aurelia Agapetilla, ancilla Dei," is ornamented with figures of Bacchus and naked Amorini, side by side with "orantes" (Boldetti, Osservaz. 466). Another in the Vatican, figured by Cancellieri, exhibits Bacchanalian scenes, and a Christian inscription. One in the grounds of the Villa Medici on the Pincian is mentioned by Martigny, on which both Cupid and Psyche and Jonah appear. There is a very remarkable example of the 4th century at Tortona figured by Mabillon (It. Ital. Mus. It. i. 223), bearing the thoroughly pagan subjects of Leda and the Swan, Phaeton, Castor and Pollux, and boys looking on at a cockfight, together with the neutral subjects of the Vintage, and the Good Shepherd. Bottazzi, a canon of Tortona, has written a lengthy disquisition (Tortona, 1824) to establish the Christian character of this sarcophagus, but it hardly admits a doubt that it was originally a pagan work. The sarcophagus at Aix la Chapelle, in which the body of Charlemagne was first laid, on which the Rape of Proserpine is carved, is a well-known example of the employment of a pagan tomb for Christian burial. The beauty and sumptuousness of the work overrode all scruples. The earliest dated sarcophagus bearing an undoubted Christian subject is one from the cemetery of SS. Peter and Marcellinus, presenting the Nativity, with the ox and ass standing by the cratch, with the consular date A.D. 343 (NATIVITY). The magnificent sarcophagus of St. Helena, the mother of the Emperor Constantine (d. 328), now in the Vatican, probably the largest ever fashioned with the exception of that of her granddaughter Constantia, is entirely devoid of Christian symbols. It is formed of one enormous block of red porphyry, highly polished, the face of which is covered with groups of armed warriors on horseback striking down their enemies, or driving their captives before them, all, as it were, floating in the air, without any indication of the ground. On the front and back at the upper angles are the busts of Constantine and Helena, and on the lid repose lions, wreaths, and winged genii. Lübke pronounces it to be "full of expression and animation in a good antique style" (i. 338); but Dr. Braun justly remarks that "the tolerable execution of individual parts only renders its want of meaning as a whole still more striking, there being a want of unity of design and conception" (Aringhi, ii. 41; Bottari, iii. pl. 196; Ciampini, iii. 28; Parker, Tombs, pl. xii.).

The sister sarcophagus of St. Constantia (d. 324), sculptured like the last-mentioned out of a solid block of porphyry, is equally wanting in any definite Christian symbolism. It is the earliest example of the vintage scenes with which Christian sarcophagi were so frequently decorated. It is a tasteless work, exhibiting heavy groups of clumsy-winged genii gathering grapes or treading them out (of the same character, but much inferior in style to the scenes on the mosaic vault of the sepulchral chapel where the tomb was found), with arabesque festoons, peacocks, and rams at the angles, all laboriously chiselled out of the unaccommodating material (Aringhi, ii. 157; Bottari, iii. 132; Ciampini, iii. 31). A sarcophagus of much less sumptuous character but of far more graceful design, in the portico of St. Lorenzo, shews similar scenes depicted with considerable life. Small winged genii gather the grapes from the vines in baskets; a goat laden with panniers carries them; one of the genii rides an ass; a cock pecks at a lizard, &c. (Bottari, iii. 19; Agincourt, Sculpt. vi. 1). A very fine example from St. Sebastiano, considered to be of the 4th century, stands in th hall of the Lateran Museum. Here, also, genii are gathering and pressing grapes; one rides a goat; another carries a kid. In the centre and either end of the face stands the Good Shephe.d (Garrucci, Monum. del Mus. Lat. tav. xlix. fig. 1–4). Corresponding scenes from the olive harvest are with local propriety carved on a sarcophagus in the museum at Arles. Genii unwinged, naked or lightly clad, some on ladders, pick or carry the fruit to the oil-press (Millin, Voyage, &c., pl. 61, no. 3; Appell, p. 37).

Pastoral scenes are equally abundant, and the Good Shepherd occurs constantly, sometimes with, sometimes without subjects from Holy Scripture. One in the Lateran Museum (photograph 2924) portrays the shepherd character of our Lord and His apostles with unusual distinctness. The Good Shepherd with His "pedum," His right hand on the head of a sheep, stands in the centre, and is repeated with a group of two or three sheep at either end of the face. Between stand the apostles, six on either side, each with a sheep at his feet. Professor Westwood, in the above-quoted essay, supplies a large number of references to pastoral scenes represented on Christian sarcophagi (p. 43).

Many sarcophagi bear in the centre of their face, and sometimes also at the ends, what are known as IMAGINES CLIPEATAE, i. e. the busts of the departed, or in some cases standing figures (e. g. that of Probus and Faltonia, Bottari, 17), contained in a disk or shell, or surrounded with a wreath, sometimes borne by winged genii. In some cases these busts are unfinished, proving that the sarcophagi were ordinarily sold in an incomplete state, leaving the busts to be carved into the likenesses of the defunct (Le Blant, p. 14, pl. viii.; Fabretti, Inscr. p. 124; De Rossi, Bullet. 1865, p. 69; Parker's Photographs, No. 2902). Sometimes the disk bears only the sacred monogram (Bottari, 37). Not a few of the less costly are distinguished only by an "imago clipeata," the remaining surface being incised with curved channels, known as strigils, from their resemblance to the bath instrument of that name. Hardly any of the sarcophagi have inscriptions. The magnificent tomb of Junius Bassus is an exception, as is that already mentioned of Aurelia Agapetilla. The custom of decorating sarcophagi with colours, proved to exist in Syria by Renan (Descr. de Phénicie, pp. 415, 416), has been shewn by Le Blant to have been sometimes adopted, not only in Jewish catacombs (Garrucci, Cimet. d'Antichi Ebrei, p. 21), but also in those of the Christians (Le Blant, p. 37).

One class of sarcophagi have as their only or principal subject figures of our Lord and His apostles. Reference has already been made to that in the Lateran Museum, in which the whole series appear in the character of shepherds. One of the most remarkable of this class, perhaps the very finest of the Roman sarcophagi, is that of Sarcophagus of Petronius Probus.

Sarcophagus. Church of St. Apollinare in Classe (Appell).

Petronius Probus, praetorian praefect, d. 395, in the subterranean church of St. Peter's. The face is divided into compartments by spirally fluted columns supporting arches, in the spandrils of which are birds pecking at baskets of grapes. In the centre compartment our Lord, holding a jewelled cross, stands on a mound from which issue the four rivers of Paradise; on either side of Him stand St. Peter and St. Paul in attitudes of reverential attention. Beyond, to the right and left, are two arches, each enshrining two apostles. Each end has three arches, with two figures. On the back stand Probus himself and his wife Faltonia hand in hand, with a disciple at either end (Bosio, 49, 51, 53; Aringhi, pp. 281, 283, 285; Bottari, tav. 16–18; D'Agincourt, pl. vi. figs. 12–15; Appell, p. 12). A sarcophagus in the Lateran Museum (photograph 2909) bears on its face Christ and the apostles, each bearing a roll, under arches alternately round and angular. The same system of representation is found in sarcophagi out of Rome. The sarcophagus of Titus Gorgonius in the crypt of the cathedral of Ancona represents Christ standing on a mount, with a male and female figure embracing His feet. Near Him stand St. Paul and a disciple with a jewelled cross. Four disciples stand under arches on either side. At Ravenna, where the sarcophagi are of later date, we find our Lord no longer seated but enthroned, and sometimes nimbed; on one at St. Apollinare in Classe, thought by Professor Westwood to be perhaps not earlier than the 7th century, our Lord, represented as a nimbed youth, is seated between St. Paul, who with veiled hand receives a roll, and St. Peter, who bears a key and a cross. Both the apostles approach our Lord with hasty strides, their garments carried by the wind. On either side two figures offer crowns (Appell, p. 28). At "St. Maria in porto fuori" our Lord appears also as a beardless figure enthroned between four apostles, one of whom approaches Him bearing a crown. The difference in character between these sarcophagi and those of earlier date is very marked. Fine examples of this mode of treatment are offered by the sarcophagi of Arles. On one we see Christ seated, His feet on a footstool, with the apostles and evangelists seated on either side. Christ holds a book inscribed Dominus Legem dat, the other figures hold rolls, some open, some closed, those of the evangelists inscribed with their names (Le Blant, p. 7, pl. iv.). On another of remarkable beauty of execution, the central place is occupied by a cross surmounted by a chaplet with soldiers below, symbolizing the resurrection. Six apostles stand on either side, raising their right hands in token of adoration. Stars are seen in the background (ibid. p. 27; pl. xiv.) One, divided into six arched panels, contains two apostles on either side of Christ, one presenting a basket of bread, another fish, both with veiled nands. The other two hold rolls. By a remarkable, if not unique, arrangement the extreme compartments are occupied by Abraham and Daniel, indicated respectively by the sword and by the serpent or dragon (ibid. pp. 19–21, pl. x.).

The large majority of the Christian sarcophagi are sculptured with scriptural subjects. These sometimes occupy the face alone, sometimes the face and ends, and there are instances in which all four sides are carved. The reliefs are sometimes in two tiers, one above the other, but more usually there is only one. The subjects sometimes form a continuous frieze-like series, one running into the other without any division; sometimes, and more commonly, they are separated into compartments by an arcade. There are rare instances in which a secondary frieze above the reliefs bears sculptures in more diminutive proportions.

We cannot fail to remark, as in the catacomb frescoes, the limited cycle to which the sculptor was confined by ecclesiastical tradition, as well as the small amount of liberty that was granted him in depicting the selected subjects. Each as a rule conforms more or less closely to one hieratic type. The subjects are derived almost equally from the Old and New Testaments, and are mixed together without any definite system of arrangement, so as best to secure symmetry and balance in the composition. Le Blant has called attention to the large number of examples in which Moses striking the rock with the Israelites eagerly stooping to drink, at one end, is balanced by the raising of Lazarus with the adoring sisters at the other, as well as those in which a Divine Hand issues from the clouds on either side of the central subject, in one case to arrest Abraham's sacrifice, in the other to give the Law to Moses.

The subjoined tabular list shews the comparative frequency of the occurrence of the various scriptural subjects on the sarcophagi of the Lateran Museum and of those given by Bosio chiefly from the Vatican. The list is based on one drawn up by Dean Burgon from an examination of the Lateran examples (Letters from Rome, Letter XX.), corrected by Dr. Northcote, by whom the list from Bosio has been added.[a]

One of the most remarkable of this class is the very elaborate tomb of Junius Bassus, praefect of the city, A.D. 359, which "for its style and execution may be regarded as one of the best works of early Christian sculpture," though "it sufficiently betrays the decline of art, especially in the treatment of the nude" (Appell, p. 10). Its face is decorated with two tiers of scriptural subjects, in compartments divided by columns, the lower arched. In the centre of the upper tier our Lord sits enthroned between two apostles, borne up by Uranus, represented as a bearded old man with the canopy of heaven extended above him. The subjects sculptured are—beginning from the left of the upper tier—(1) The sacrifice of Isaac; (2) the apprehension of Peter; (3) Christ before Pilate; (4) Pilate washing his hands. In the lower tier—(1) Job visited by his wife and friends [OLD TESTAMENT IN ART]; (2) the Fall of man; (3) Christ's triumphal entry into Jerusalem; (4) Daniel in the lions' den; (5) Peter and Christ led to prison. On the two ends are carved genii representing the Four Seasons, engaged in operations suitable to each. The spandrils of the lower tier of panels contain on a diminutive scale one of the most remarkable series of carvings in the whole range of Christian art, and probably unique, indicating in the most unmistakable way the sense entertained by the early church of the unity of the two Testaments and the symbolical meaning of the acts of Moses as a type of our Lord, represented under the figure of the Lamb. In these very interesting and instructive reliefs a lamb holding the rod strikes water from the rock, multiplies the loaves, raises Lazarus, receives the law on Mount Sinai, and baptizes another lamb. As already stated, the sarcophagus is also remarkable from having on it the epitaph of the person found in it, with the interesting fact that he was praefect of the city at the time of his death, and that he had only recently been admitted to the church by baptism. "Jun. Bassus, V. C. qui vixit annis xlii men. ii in ipsa praefectura urb. neofitus iit ad Deum VIII. kal. Sept. Eusebio et Ypatio. coss" (Bosio, 45; Aringhi, i. 277; Bottari, i. 15; D'Agincourt, vi. 5, 11; Lübke, Hist. of Sculpt. i. 310; Parker, Tombs, pl. xiii.).

A very fine sarcophagus, supposed to be that of Petronius Probus, consul A.D. 341, formerly the altar of the chapel of St. Lucy at St. Mary Major, now in the Lateran Museum, offers one of the very best examples of this mode of treatment. The upper row exhibits the raising of [a] The correspondence of the cycle of subjects depicted on the sarcophagi and in the catacomb frescoes, with those in the Ordo Commendationis Animae in the Roman Breviary, to which Le Blant has called attention (Sarcophages d' Arles), is too remarkable to be overlooked. The list includes Noah, the sacrifice of Isaac, Moses, and Pharaoh, Job, Elijah, Daniel, the Three Children, David and Goliah, Susanna, and the deliverance of Peter from prison.

Lazarus, Daniel in the lions' den, the law received from the hand of God, the sacrifice of Isaac, and Pilate washing his hands. A scallop-shell in the centre contains two excellent portrait busts. The Divine Hand issuing from the clouds on either side of the shell shews the usual attention to balance of composition (Le Blant, Sarcoph. p. xv. cf. pl. vi.). In the lower tier we have the combined subject of Moses striking the rock and the apprehension of Peter (see OLD TESTAMENT IN ART, p. 1458), Daniel and the lions, Moses reading the book of the covenant, the healing of the blind man, and the miracle of the loaves and fishes. This last subject is represented in a somewhat unusual manner. Our Lord stands, and puts His right hand on a loaf and His left on a basket of fish (Aringhi, i. 423; Bottari, ii. 49; Lübke, fig. 200, p. 843). The sarcophagus are very differently treated. Each is carved in low relief, with a background full of buildings, including a basilica and a detached baptistery, clumsily executed, but of high interest as contemporary representations of architecture. The one represents our Lord predicting Peter's denial; the cock standing on the top of an Ionic column; the other the woman with the issue of blood, and Moses striking the rock. These reliefs are separated by some centuries from the admirable sculptures on the front. They are placed by Mr. Parker in the 8th century (Bosio, 85, 87; Aringhi, i. 317, 319; Appell, p. 20). Another sarcophagus, of somewhat similar design, deserves especial notice not only for the beauty of its execution, but as exhibiting scenes from the Passion which occur very rarely. The front is divided into five compartments by columns with largest sarcophagus in the Lateran Museum, discovered at St. Paul's outside the walls, also with two tiers of subjects, displays in the centre of the upper tier unfinished busts of a husband and wife in a "clypeus" supported by genii. The subjects belong to the usual cycle, with the addition of the creation of woman (OLD TESTAMENT IN ART), and the adoration of the Magi (Appell, 16, 17; Northcote, p. 200, pl. xix.; Westwood, p. 50).

A somewhat different mode of treatment is shewn in a sarcophagus of the 4th century, discovered at St. Peter's, now in the Lateran Museum, one of the most simple and excellent of the early Christian tombs. The front is divided by eight columns exquisitely carved with foliage and flowers. In the centre the youthful Christ, supported by Uranus bearing the vault of heaven, stands between two apostles. Others stand on either side, one of whom receives a scroll from the hand of Christ. To the left is the sacrifice of Isaac; to the right Christ before Pilate, who washes his hands. The whole are most beautifully designed and sculptured in high relief. The two ends of this very remarkable spiral flutes. In the centre stands the labarum with the crown of immortality. Doves perch on the arms of the cross, and a waking and sleeping soldier sit below. To the right Christ, represented as a youthful figure with His fingers raised in benediction, stands before Pilate, who is preparing to wash his hands; a crown of glory hangs above. To the left we see Christ being crowned with thorns, which is transformed into a victor's chaplet; and Christ bearing His cross, a mere trunk, under a guard of soldiers, a crown hanging above. Few early Christian works of art exhibit a greater union of calm dignity and grace (Appell, 20, 21; Northcote, 307).

One of the most frequently recurring subjects is the history of Jonah, a type of death and resurrection. As an example we may produce one of singular grotesqueness from the Lateran Museum, the face of which is literally crowded with figures of different sizes, of which the Jonah series is the most conspicuous. The sea monster with long sinuous tail and vast yawning mouth, well furnished with teeth, appears twice in the centre, first swallowing the prophet as he is cast out of the ship, above the sails of which are allegorical representations of the sun and wind, and then vomiting him forth. Above, Jonah lies tranquilly sleeping, naked, under the shadow of the gourd. At either extremity fishermen are plying their craft, and snails, crabs, and lizards crawl on the shore. Above and around are the common Biblical scenes on a smaller scale; the raising of Lazarus, Moses smiting the rock, the apprehension of Peter, the Good Shepherd and two sheep in a little box-like shrine, and Noah and the dove floating in the water (Aringhi, i. 335; Bottari, i. 42; Appell, p. 19).

When we quit Rome a different school of art is evidenced by the change in the workmanship and the appearance of new subjects. A sarcophagus in the crypt of the cathedral of Fermo exhibits the raising of Dorcas and the imprisonment and release of St. Peter (De Minicis, Monum. di Fermo, p. 83; Appell, p. 24). At Verona we find in the crypt of St. Giovanni in Valle the very rare subject of Judas' kiss and the SAMARITAN WOMAN with the well-pulley and bucket, which is also seen at Clermont Ferrand (Maffei, Mus. Veron. p. 484; Ver. Illustr. part iii. pl. 2, nos. 1, 2). At St. Ambrogio, at Milan, the very remarkable sarcophagus called by some that of Stilicho and Serena, deserves much attention. The chief subject is a youthful bearded Christ teaching the apostles, with the adoration of the magi on one side, and the three children refusing to worship the golden image on the other. The ends exhibit the Fall, Isaac's sacrifice, Elijah's ascension, and other usual Old Testament subjects. In a pediment to the left is a curious relief of the Nativity (NATIVITY) (Appell, p. 33).

The sarcophagi at Ravenna display a remarkable poverty of invention and feebleness of execution, together with an almost complete absence of decoration. The ornamentation consists chiefly of the meaningless repetition of conventional symbols, crosses and monograms. The limited powers of the Ravenna sculptors is strikingly exhibited in the colossal marble tombs—five in number—in the mausoleum of Galla Placidia, d. 450. Her own sarcophagus, of purest Greek marble, is now perfectly devoid of ornament, but once bore plates of precious metals. That of Honorius, d. 423, has its front divided by fluted columns; in the central compartment the Holy Lamb, with its head awkwardly turned back, stands before a cross, on whose arms doves rest. On either side are simple crosses. That of Constantine III., d. 421, has carved on its face three lambs with palm trees; the central lamb standing on a mount, whence the four rivers issue. The ten large marble sarcophagi of bishops from the 6th to the 8th century, at St. Apollinare in Classe, are characterised by the same extreme poverty of invention and feebleness of treatment. One, already described, exhibits our Lord enthroned; but nearly all are content with the same monogram repeated over and over again, sometimes encircled with wreaths, crosses, doves, and vases, lambs under palm trees, peacocks, and other frigid conventionalisms. It is an interesting fact learnt from Cassiodorus (Varior. lib. iii. ep. 19) that a certain sculptor named Daniel was summoned to Ravenna from Rome by Theodoric for his skill "in excavandis atque ornandis marmoribus," and received from him the privilege of supplying the inhabitants of Ravenna with sarcophagi, which are designated in Theodoric's rescript as "orcæ quarum beneficio cadavera in supernis humata sunt; lugentium non parva consolatio." The tomb from St. Apollinare in Classe, already described, displaying our Lord enthroned with a cruciform nimbus, is considered by Martigny to be undoubtedly the work of Daniel the Sculptor. These sarcophagi have usually semicylindrical lids with imbricated scales. The tomb of the exarch Isaac at St. Vitalis, d. 644, represents the adoration of the magi. The child is nimbed, and the star stands above the Virgin's head. It is a poor scattered work, weak in design and rude in execution (Appell, pl. 27).

The south of France, as has been already remarked, is peculiarly rich in early Christian sarcophagi of the 4th and 5th century, particularised by Millin and Le Blant, who give engravings of many of the most remarkable. Gregory of Tours mentions such sarcophagi as existing in France in his day. One he speaks of formed of white marble, sculptured with the miracles of Christ and the apostles at St. Verona, near St. Allire (de Glor. Confess. c. 35, cf. c. 42), and in the next chapter records "sepulchrum sculptum meritis gloriosum sanctæ memoriæ Gallæ." The sarcophagi at Arles conform both in style and subjects with those of Rome, in other places they are marked by local peculiarities. That of SS. Chrysanthus and Daria at Marseilles has its face divided into seven compartments by trees, on which are to be seen birds with their nests and young. Up the stems of the two end trees serpents are wriggling towards the young birds. A snail crawls up another. In the centre two harts are drinking from two brooks issuing from a rock; on either side the apostles stand in various attitudes (Appell, 39; Millin, tom. iv. p. 136, pl. xxxviii. no. 4). The same division by trees with birds on their branches and a snake climbing the trunk of one of them towards a bird's nest is found on one of the Arles sarcophagi (Le Blant, p. 9, pl. v.), and on one at Carpentras. The cycle of Biblical subjects is somewhat enlarged. One of the most favourite subjects on these Gaulish sarcophagi is the Destruction of Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea. Le Blant mentions three or four examples at Arles itself, and others at Metz and Avignon (pp. 50, 54–57). It is not, however, limited to Gaul. It is found at Rome (Bottari, tav. 40, 94, 199) and Pisa (Lasinio, tav. 128), and appears depicted with much stir and action on a sarcophagus at Spalato. In this last example, as at Arles and often elsewhere, the Red Sea is symbolized by a couchant human figure, as the Jordan frequently is in the subject of the baptism of Christ and the ascension of Elijah (Le Blant, pp. 51, 54). A sarcophagus formerly at Arles, now in the museum at Aix, in addition to the passage of the Red Sea, which occupies the whole face, has on one end Moses before Pharaoh, and on the other the gift of quails and the striking the rock. The pillar of fire is depicted in the most naturalistic manner as an actual column of stone with a blazing light on its summit (Le Blant, pp. 50–52, pl. xxxi., xxxii.; Millin, tom. ii. p. 353, pl. 2, no. 1, 2, 3). The grapes of Eshcol is found on one in the Marseilles Museum. Among the scenes from our Lord's history less frequently found elsewhere we may mention the raising of the widow's son (Le Blant, pp. 1, 9, pl. 1, i. v. p. 57), the raising of Jairus's daughter (ibid. p. 29, pl. xvii.; Millin, t. iii. p. 537, pl. lxvi. 1), Christ and the woman of Samaria (ibid. p. 30, pl. xviii. 2; p. 63), and the washing of Peter's feet (ibid. p. 18, pl. lx). The raising of Dorcas is seen on the tomb assigned to Sidonius Apollinaris in the crypt of St. Maximin (Rostan. Monum. Iconog. pl. xii.), and on one in the Arles Museum (Le Blant, p. 4, pl. ii. 1), as well as at Fermo. On another at Aix there is the massacre of the innocents (Faillons, Monuments inédits de S. M. Maj.), and the giving of the keys to St. Peter at Avignon and at Arles (Le Blant, p. 4, pl. ii. 1). One of the most exquisite of extant sarcophagi is in the museum at Bordeaux. It has no figures, but the face is covered by graceful vine branches bearing grapes, issuing from two vases surrounding the crowned monogram, which also appears on the sloping lid (De Caumont, Cours d'Antiquité, vi. 220; Appell, p. 43).

Spain also can shew some early Christian sarcophagi at Toledo, Astorga, Zaragoza, and Barcelona, but they are described as presenting no remarkable peculiarities. In England a tomb supposed to be Romano-Christian has been discovered at Barming in Kent (Roach Smith, Collect. Ant. i. 184), and a stone cist with a slightly gabled lid, bearing a long cross with a floriated foot, was found at Westminster Abbey (where it is still preserved) in Nov. 1869. The inscription states that it was erected to Valerius Amandinus by his sons Valerius Praeventor and Marcellus. There has been some difference of opinion as to its date, but it may probably be assigned to the 4th century.

The mode of fabricating Christian sarcophagi is shewn in a very interesting manner on the tomb of a sarcophagus maker named Eutropus, given by Fabretti (Inscr. Ant. c. viii. p. 587, cii.), erected by his son, bearing the inscription ΑΓΙΟC ΘΕΟCΕΒΕC ΕΥΤΡΟΠΟC ΕΝ ΙΡΗΝΗ VIOC ΕΠΟΙΗCΕΝ. It represents the sculptor seated or a stool with steps of different heights working out a strigillated sarcophagus ornamented with mask, with a young apprentice turning by a cord and pulley the pointed iron drill he is using. The mallet and other tools lie below. A finished sarcophagus bearing dolphins and the name ΕΥΤΡΟΠΟC stand to the right. Behind the sculptor stands a tall male figure with outstretched arms, holding a small vase (Rom. Sotter. iii. p. 443).

III. Tympana of Doorways, etc.—The introduction of the Lombard style of architecture offered a new field for the Christian sculptor's art in the decoration of the portals, especially the tympana, of the newly-erected churches. The larger part of the existing specimens of this mode of architectural decoration are subsequent to A.D. 800. Some, however, come within our period, and demand a passing reference. One of the most remarkable is the bas-relief which occupies the tympanum of the chief doorway at the cathedral of Monza, to which a date between 591 and 615 may be assigned. This is curious, not only as an example of the rude awkward sculpture of the age, but also as representing in stone the consecrated gifts with which queen Theodolinda enriched the church, some of which may still be seen in its treasury. The church being dedicated to St. John the Baptist, the principal scene represented is the Baptism of Christ. Our Lord stands in the water, which, in defiance of the laws of gravity, rises in a cone about Him. The Holy Spirit, depicted as a dove, descends on His head, holding a vase in its mouth, from which the sacred effluence descends upon Him. On either hand stand the Virgin Mary, St. John, St. Peter, and St. Paul. Above, Theodolinda herself appears with her second husband Agilulf, and her son and daughters, offering a jewelled crown to St. John the Baptist. Behind are seen the pensile crowns, crosses, vases, as well as the curious chioccia, or hen and chickens, presented by her. Another interesting bas-relief of a coronation, of the same date, exists in the south transept (Perkins, u. s. i. xlv.; D'Agincourt, Sculpture, pl. xxvi. fig. 8). A large number of examples of early Lombard sculpture, thirty-eight in all, are collected by D'Agincourt in the plate just referred to, which shew the extreme rudeness of the art at the period.

Other examples are to be found at the baptistery of Cividale in Friuli, erected by Calixtus, patriarch of Aquileia, A.D. 712–744. Here we find the evangelistic symbols, crosses with palms, candelabra, &c., surrounded with circles rudely sculptured in a barbarous kind of relief, formed by lowering the surface round the clumsy figures which rather suggest than imitate real objects, the details being marked by furrows on the stone.

Mr. Perkins cites as other specimens of Lombard sculpture the tomb of Pemmone, duke of Friuli, at St. Mark's in Cividale, of the 8th century; the sculptures at St. Ambrogio at Milan, St. Tommaso in limine near Bergamo, the Well in the Lateran cloisters, &c. [E. V.]

SEAL. (1) The word σφραγίς is frequently used in Greek liturgical language for the sign of the cross, and the person who makes the sign is said σφραγίζειν. [SIGN OF THE CROSS.]

(2) The stamp made on the bread used in the Holy Eucharist is also called σφραγίς, and when the bread is divided in such a way that each portion bears a stamp, the portions are called σφραγίδες. [LAMB, THE HOLY, p. 916.] [C.]

SEALS. (1) Material Seals. During the whole of the Christian period comprised in this work the most common mode of sealing was by rings, whether set with stones or not, the impression being made in wax.[a] [GEMS; RINGS.]

Wax impressions, however, were not always made from gems or rings. They were occasionally formed by a simple metallic matrix, like official seals in mediaeval and modern times. Very few such, being Christian, or indeed of any kind, appear to have come down to us until after the age of Charlemagne. We have, however, the brass matrix of the seal of Macarius, patriarch of Antioch in the seventh century, on which St. Peter is represented seated having a cock near him; it was found near Aintab in Syria by a rustic. (Chandler, Marm. Oxon. praef. p. vii., with a figure.) The following inscription, litteris ligatis, is round the margin: it runs thus in common minuscules: Μακάριος ἐλέῳ θεοῦ πατριάρχης τῆς μεγάλης Θυπόλεως Ἀντιοχείας καὶ πάσης ἀνατολῆς (Böckh, C. I. G. n. 8987). Macarius was condemned in the sixth oecumenical council (A.D. 681) as a Monothelite. Antioch was termed in the age of Justinian, who built very largely there, Theupolis (i.e. Theopolis), as being the see where St. Peter governed the church of God; this explains the device on the seal. M. D'Arc (see below) states that the matrix of Dagobert I. (A.D. 628–638) was discovered in the department of Doubs, but he does not mention the metal. It gives his face, seen in front, with long hair, accompanied by two crosses and the legend DAGOBERTVS (sic) REX FRANCORUM.

Licetus mentions, on the authority of Petra-Sancta (De Sym. lib. iii. c. 9), that Charlemagne "non in anuli gemma, sed in gladii capulo sigillum habuisse, ut edicta et leges obsignaret: putabat enim, ejusdem gladii debere esse leges tueri ac eas promulgare" (De Anulis, p. 144).

A. WAX IMPRESSIONS OF SEALS.

Of the wax impressions themselves a greater number has been preserved than might perhaps have been expected: they are mostly in very indifferent condition, and they vary much in quality. The oldest extant are white or pale yellow and pale red or reddish-brown; both colours are found in Merovingian and also in Carlovingian times. There are only two essential forms of these impressions, round and oval: the former is Merovingian, the latter Carlovingian (Heineccius, de Sigillis, pp. 51–56; Sceaux des Rois de France, p. 2, see below; D'Arcq, see below).

The most ancient mode of fixing the seal to the deed was to make a cruciform incision in the deed itself, usually on the right hand, through which the wax was introduced, and flattened on both sides. The seal was impressed on the written side.[b] Before the 11th century all wax seals were thus "plaqués;" the date of perhaps the earliest pendent wax seal being no older than A.D. 1067 (D. D'Arcq, Elém. de Sigillographie, pp. xvii. to xxiii., prefixed to Collection de Sceaux des Archives de l'Empire, Paris, 1863–1868). M. Douet D'Arcq enumerates the seals of the Merovingian and Carlovingian sovereigns existing in the archives of France; they comprise (besides the seal of Dagobert I., mentioned above, or rather apparently an impression made from it),[c] the following, all of wax and plaqués: Thierry III., Clovis III., Childebert III., Chilperic II., Pepin le Bref, Carloman and Charlemagne. Their names and portraits (more or less obliterated) occur upon nearly all of these, and a cross is still sometimes and was perhaps originally always prefixed. One of the seals of Pepin le Bref has on one side Christ crowned with thorns, seen in front, a person to the right of him is in profile; no legend; it is attached to a deed dated June 20, 750[d] (Nos. 1–16). W. ully[e] (Elém.

[a] "In Europe, as far as I know," says Beckmann, "wax has been everywhere used for sealing since the earliest ages." (Beckmann, Hist. of Inventions, vol. i. p. 140, transl. by Johnston, in Bohn's Stand. Libr.)

[b] The earliest example in the British Museum is of Eudes in the 9th century, just too late for this work.

[c] There is also an impression made from a seal ascribed to Sigebert II., reading S. R., preserved in the Bibl. Imp. Cab. des Ant. It is not mentioned by Chaboulliet.

[d] Another of his seals has a head of Bacchus or Silenus: one of Charlemagne figured by Wailly, pl. A, No. 9, bears a head of Serapis. These were probably impressions from ancient pagan gems. It is difficult to say how extant wax impressions generally were formed. The seal of Dagobert (figured by Wailly, pl. A, fig. 1) is of considerable size, about 3¼ inches in diameter; it was probably made from a matrix; but its genuineness is very doubtful. See the remarks in the Sceaux des Rois de France, p. 2. All the other ancient impressions which he figures may have been executed either from gems or from rings.

de Paléographie, tom. ii. p. 398, pl. A, No. 8, Paris, 1838), figures a wax seal (plaqué) of Charlemagne, which reads XPE · PROTEGE · CAROL · REG · FRANCR. It is attached to the charter of a gift to the abbey of St. Denys, dated September 14, A.D. 774, it is about 1¼ inches by 1; oval, not acuminated. There is an impression of this seal in the British Museum.[f]

The only English king within our period of whom any wax seal remains appears to be Offa, king of Mercia; it is described by D'Arcq in vol. iii. of the above-named work, n. 9995; head to r. surrounded by a diadem "à épi," the wax he describes as "rougeâtre, très-consistante, plaqué" on a charter of that king, dated 790, in favour of the abbey of St. Denys.

B. Bullae of Earth and Metal.

In very early times some kind of earth was employed for the purpose of receiving the impression of the seal; this method, which seems to have originated in Egypt, was occasionally employed in the Greek empire, at least as late as the 8th century. The lump of earth so sealed was attached by a string or strip of cloth or leather to the diploma or other document. Such earth must have been employed in sealing by the Byzantine emperors, for we are told that at the second council of Nice (A.D. 787) Leontius, bishop of Cyprus, defended the worship of images by saying that no one believed that those who received written orders from the emperor and venerated the seal worshipped on that account the sealing-earth, the paper, or the lead. (See Beckmann, u. s., pp. 137, 138. For the original Greek see below.) "Actual examples of such seals belonging to Egyptian and Assyrian times are still in existence, as well as remains of the cloth or strap by which they were appended" (Birch's Ancient Pottery, p. 83, 2nd ed.). No Christian seals of this character belonging to the period with which we are concerned appear to have been preserved. We have, however, a considerable number of such seals in lead, the earlier ones being principally papal bulls beginning by about the 7th century.[g]

The earliest leaden bull of certain date known to be now extant,[h] whose authenticity is generally acknowledged, is that of pope Deus-dedit (A.D. 614–617); it is figured by Ficoroni (Piombi Antichi, tab. xxiii. fig. 3). It bears on one side the Good Shepherd between two sheep, and on the other side in three lines DEVS | DEDIT | PAPAE. Leaden bulls of the following popes also are still preserved: Honorius (A.D. 638), Theodore I. (A.D. 649), Agatho (A.D. 678), John V. (A.D. 685), Sergius I. (A.D. 687), Constantine (A.D. 708), Zacharias (A.D. 741), Paul I. (A.D. 757), Stephen III. (A.D. 768), as well as of many later pontiffs. On all these, however, the types are very simple, such as a cross, a chrisma, or a star. On one side the name of the pope occurs in the genitive (sometimes in more than one line), on the other the word PAPAE (commonly in two lines). Thus: one of John, supposed to be John V., has on obv. a star of eight rays, in the centre, reading IOHANNIS around; the rev. has P + A | PAE in two lines (British Museum). Another of Sergius I. reads on obv. + SERGII on a circle, having for type chrisma and another monogram united with it; rev. PAPAE above a chrisma of the ordinary form (Brit. Mus. Figured in English Cyclop. Div. iv., Arts and Sciences, suppl. 1873, s. v. BULLA). Another of Zacharias has on obv. a cross, below which ZAC | CHAR IAE in three lines; on rev. a cross, below which PA PAE in two lines (Brit. Mus. Figured also in Martigny, Dict. s. v. Numism. ed. 2). A fourth of Paul I. has on obv. a cross, below which PAV | LI in two lines and beneath another cross. Rev. a cross; PA | PAE in two lines, and another cross below. (Brit. Mus.) Other examples are figured by Ficoroni, u. s. t. xxi.–xiv., and by Martigny, u. s., and are mentioned by Mabillon (de Re Dipl. lib. ii. c. 14). Several may also be seen in the British Museum; their dimensions vary from 1 to 1¼ inches across; the form is subcircular.

The leaden bullae of popes, so common in later times, bearing the heads of SS. Peter and Paul are not earlier than the time of Paschal II. A.D. 1099 (Martigny, u. s.). Mabillon (u. s. lib. ii. v. 14) mentions bulls bearing the names of those apost... as issued in the time of Urban II., his immediate predecessor.

The patriarchs of Constantinople were little, if at all, behind the popes in employing leaden bullae. Germanus I. who sat there A.D. 715 to 730, indited an epistle decorated with a bull of lead (μολιβδίνῃ βούλλῃ) which is described in the Jus Graeco-Rom. (tom. i. lib. iii. p. 236) as having on one side the Virgin and Child, and on the other (in Greek) "Germanus, by the mercy of God, Archbishop of Constantinople, New Rome, and ecumenical patriarch."

Somewhat later we find other bishops making use of leaden bulls both in the east and in the west.[i] The second council of Cabillon, i.e. Chalon-sur-Saône (A.D. 813), c. 41, directs that a presbyter moving to another place should carry letters fortified by the names of the bishop and the city in lead (in quibus sint nomina episcopi et civitatis plumbo munita). See Mabillon, u. s. lib. ii. c. xv. Other later authorities make et de Glypt." in the volume Sceaux des Rois et Reines de France, pl. 1.

[f] More than a dozen seals of Charlemagne are known in wax or metal according to the authors of the Nouveau Traité de Diplomatique. Pieresc took impressions of ancient seals (vetera sigilla) which he found in various ancient abbeys; they bore the true likenesses (verae effigies) of Charlemagne and other kings of the second race (Chiflet, Anastasis, p. 112).

[g] Rainaldius maintains that papal bulls go still farther back, and affirms that leaden bulls of Sylvester, Leo I., and Gregory I., are kept in "archivo Aretino" and in the Castle of St. Angelo; but Heineccius does not believe in their genuineness (De Sigill. p. 48).

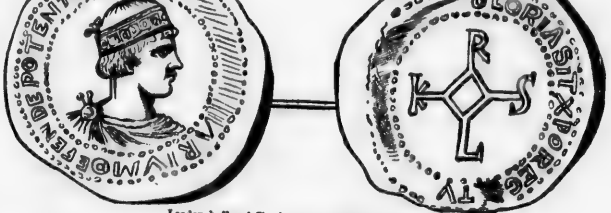
[h] Heineccius thinks that the Byzantine emperors made the earliest bulls (u. s. p. 42); that the patriarchs of Constantinople followed them, and that the popes of Rome were determined not to be behind these (p. 40). This may possibly be so, but the existing examples and notices suggest a different chronological order.

[i] The Lex Alamannorum has a chapter: De servis ecclesiasticis, si ad Episcopum aut Judicem suum venire despexerint, in which occurs this clause: "Si sigillum episcopi neglexerit aut ad veniendum aut ad ambulandum ubi jusserit, duodecim solidis sit culpabilis" (ap. Goldast. Rer. Aleman. tom. i. c. 22, p. 13). These may be suspected to be of lead, like those mentioned in council of Châlons.

mention of similar episcopal bulls (Heinecc. u. s. p. 49). The practice appears, however, to have been far from universal, and no actual examples earlier than the 12th century were known to Heineccius (u. s. p. 151). The writer, however, possesses a bulla of Hypatius, bishop of Nicopolis, in Epirus, in A.D. 826, of whom some account is given in Le Quien, Oriens Christ. vol. ii. p. 138. It reads in barbarous Greek on the obverse: + ΙΠΠΑ ‖ CIOV: on the reverse + below which ΕΠΙCΚ ‖ ΝΙΚΟΥ below which vertically, ΟΠ (retrograde) and another cross (for ἐπισκ(όπου) Νικουπό(λεως). (Formerly in the Lovati collection at Rome.) Other episcopal bulls exist about whose age it is less easy to speak, as that of Nicolaus, patriarch of Constantinople, of whom there were several so named from the 9th to the 12th century (Ficoroni, tab. xvii. n. 1, Böckh, n. 9036), of Leo, bishop of Tauromenium (Ficoroni, tab. xx. n. 7, Böckh, n. 9029), of Sergius, bishop of Therme (Id. n. 9045), of Antonius, metropolitan of Catana (Ficoroni, tab. xvi. n. 4, Böckh, n. 9001), and of Paul, archbishop of Thessalonica (Ficoroni, tab. ix. n. 1, Böckh, n. 9037).[j]

Leaden bulls of ecclesiastics of lower rank than bishops have rarely been found. We have, however, one in England of archdeacon Boniface, supposed to be contemporary with Wilfrid (died A.D. 709). It reads on obv. + ‖ BONI ‖ FATII ‖ +; on rev. + ‖ ARCHI ‖ DIAC ‖ + (Hübner, Inscr. Brit. Christ. n. 221).

μόλυβδον, ἀλλὰ τῷ βασιλεῖ τὴν προσκύνησιν καὶ τὸ σέβας ἀπένειμεν. Concil. Nic. II. Act. iv.). Leaden bulls of Charlemagne are mentioned by authors (see Heineccius, u. s. p. 44), and some are still in existence; one is rudely figured in the Nouveau Traité de Diplomatique (t. iv. p. 112) published in the last century; another impression from the same mould is here figured from a drawing kindly sent by M. Sambon, who possesses the original.[k] Neither specimen is complete, but from a comparison of the two with each other and with a bulla of Charles the Bald, the types and legends on both sides can be satisfactorily made out. On the obverse we have bust of Charlemagne to r., with broad diadem, wearing the paludamentum, with legend: + Jesu (IHV) nate Dei, Carlum defende potenter; on the reverse a cross with open diamond in the centre, each arm terminating in a letter, the four letters being KRLS (Karlus); the legend is + Gloria sit Christo (XPO), regi victoria Carlo. It is not improbable that bullae of lead were employed by other emperors before Charlemagne; but it seems doubtful whether we have any genuine examples now existing in that or any other metal before his time. The silver bulla of Dagobert, detached from its diploma, which is mentioned as being in "gazophylacio ducali Gothano" by Mabillon and others is regarded by Heineccius with suspicion (u. s. p. 41). Polydore Vergil De Inv. Rerum, lib. viii. p. 605) says, that Charlemagne introduced seals (bulls) of gold,



Leaden bulla of Charlemagne. (Size of the original.)

Leaden bulls were likewise employed by secular persons. Those of the Greek emperors in the 8th century are the earliest recorded. Leontius, bishop of Cyprus, argued before the second Nicene council from the veneration paid to the leaden bullae of the Greek emperors to the veneration of images in churches. ὁ κέλευσιν βασιλέως δεξάμενος καὶ ἀσπασάμενος τὴν σφραγῖδα οὐ τὸν πηλὸν ἐτίμησεν ἢ τὴν χάρτην ἢ τὸν but neither Heineccius (u. s. p. 33) nor any later writer apparently have ever seen such. In later times both emperors and popes certainly employed them (Heineccius, u. s.).

In a suit between bishop Wolfleoz and abbat Cotzpert held before Louis le Débonnaire, a document was produced bearing the seal of Charlemagne. "Quam (chartam) quum piissimus imperator suscepisset, sigillumque sui patris recognoscendo intuitus esset, venerando deosculatus est, circumque astantibus similiter honoris causa deosculandum contradidit" (Ratpert. de Casib. Monast. S. Galli, c. 6, p. 5; quoted by Heineccius, u. s. p. 11). It is not clear whether the diploma had a wax or a leaden seal attached; more probably perhaps the latter. (Cf. Leontius, quoted above.)

The number of leaden bullae belonging to secular persons of inferior rank is very considerable. All or almost all of them were struck in various parts of the Byzantine empire, more especially in Sicily. Many of them bear upon the obverse a cruciform monogram, representing Κύριε, βοήθει τῷ σῷ δούλῳ, or τῷ δούλῳ σου, for which τοῦ σοῦ δούλου is sometimes substituted (O Lord, help thy servant); the reverse bears in Greek the name (often in monogram) of the owner and his office (often in an abbreviated form) in the dative, more rarely in the genitive case: a cross often precedes, and sometimes follows.[1] But few of them comparatively can be dated. Of these we mention the following: A bulla, preserved in the museum of the monastery of St. Nicolai at Catania, bears on the obverse the monogram and legend above-mentioned, and on the other side the name of Sergius, patrician and strategus—Obv. K. (i. e. Κύριε) βοήθει (βοήθει) τῷ σῷ δούλῳ σου. Rev. + Σεργίῳ πατρικίῳ καὶ στρατηγῷ +. He is reasonably supposed to be the praetor of Sicily mentioned by Anastasius under the year 733 (Böckh, n. 8988). Another bears the same obverse, and on the reverse "Gregorius, patrician, strategus of Sicily." He is supposed by Castelli and by Kirchmann to be the Gregory who governed Sicily in the beginning of the 9th century (Böckh, n. 8991). Another example (in Mus. Patern. Böckh, n. 8989) has the same obverse, but bears on the reverse the name of John, "patrician and royal spatharius," probably the same as John the protospatharius, who was sent to Sicily in the reign of Constantine Porphyrogenitus (A.D. 780–797). A fourth, preserved in the Recupero Museum at Catania, is described by Prof. Salinas from a drawing by Recupero himself. The obverse is as before; the reverse bears the name and titles of Euphemius, "royal spatharocandidatus and strategus of Sicily." The title of royal candidatus occurs on other bullae, mentioned by Salinas, who considers that this Euphemius lived in the reign of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, to whom he also now attributes the gold ring which he figures, mentioned above under RINGS, § 6 B. (Tre anelli, &c., u. s. pp. 4–6.) A fifth bulla in fine, found at Philippeville in Algeria, bears on each side a cross and two pellets; below is written on the obverse the name of Photinus (in the genitive), and on the other his title "stratelates." He appears to be the proto-spatharius and στρατηγὸς τῶν ἀνατολικῶν, who is mentioned by Cedrenus as governor of the province of Sicily in the reign of Michael II. (Böckh, n. 8990).

[j] There are also leaden bullae which bear the names of various saints. A curious example, both in Greek and Latin, is given in Ficoroni, tab. xiv. n. 7. On one side is represented a man in the attitude of benediction, Ο ΝΙΚΟΛΑΟC being written κιονηδόν in two lines; on the other is a cross, below which in three lines SIGILL | SCI | NICOLAI (Böckh, n. 9035). Ficoroni and Kirchmann consider that the bull is a seal of some monastery dedicated to St. Nicolas. The British Museum has other examples bearing the figures, names, and titles of the Blessed Virgin, St. Chrysostom, St. George, and St. Theodore, which probably belong to the same category. The dates of all such being uncertain, it must suffice to have alluded to them thus briefly.

[k] D'Arcq (u. s. vol. i. p. 269) ascribes this bull to Charles the Bald.

In much the greater number of cases, however, there is no indication of date; as for example in one preserved at Syracuse, which has the obverse so often mentioned, and on the reverse "Andreas, hypatus" (consul), "and strategus. Amen" (Böckh, n. 8998). Another example, in the possession of the writer, from the Lovati collection, has the obverse as before, while the reverse has "Leo notarius" (in genitive). Another from the same collection has the same obverse in the dative, and on the reverse "Antonius notarius" also in the dative. Many other names of officers of the Byzantine court occur on the bulls which are figured and described in Böckh's work. The British Museum also contains a large number of such.[m] But it is unnecessary to multiply examples here, not only because their date is doubtful, but also because their interest is rather secular than ecclesiastical.

(2) A sacred Sign, especially the Sign of the Cross.—The word seal is used for the sign of the cross with which the bread in the eucharist is signed. In the liturgy of St. Chrysostom the priest takes the oblation (προσφορὰν) with his left hand and the holy lance (LANCE) with his right, and with it sealing (σφραγίζων) over the seal (σφραγὶς) of the oblation, he says thrice: "in memory of our Lord and God and of our Saviour Jesus Christ." Heineccius (u. s. p. 18) notes from Goar that this seal is the sign of the cross impressed on the host or oblation, as is seen in Arcudius, and in the figures annexed. He likewise observes that the sign of the cross is frequently termed σφραγὶς in early and mediaeval Greek writers, whether used in baptism, or ordination or in the eucharist, or elsewhere. The tonsure of ecclesiastics is also so called. (See Goar, Euchol. Graec. pp. 117, 321; Suicer, Thes. s. v. σφραγίς; Ducange, Gloss. Med. et Inf. Graec. s. v. σφραγὶς.)

(3) Solomon's Seal used as a Charm.—On an amulet of red copper, pierced for suspension, found at Keff in Tunis, described at length under MEDALS, part of the legend of the obverse runs thus:—Inbidia (invidia) inbidiosa (invidiosa) nicil (nihil) tibi ad. (adimat ?),[n] anima pura et mundus Quiriace; sata malina (maligna) non tibi praevaleа[n]t. Livabit te Dei brachium, Dei et Christi, et Signum et Sigillum Solomo[nis] PAXCASA. (=Abraxas?) Perhaps we should read Dei et Christi signum (i.e. the cross). Considered by M. Reuvens to be "assez récent." It may possibly be as late as the conquest of Africa in the 8th century by the Arabs, in whose view Solomon was a great magician, and from whom the Christians there may have derived it; this however is not certain, as there are gems (haematite) very similar to some coins of the 4th century; they bear a horseman spearing a fallen enemy, with legend COΛOMѠN (Solomon), and on the other side CΦΡΑΓΙΣ ΘΕΟΥ (the Seal of God), with mystic characters. (Writer's collection; others nearly similar in

[1] The same formula occurs also, though rarely, on rings. Prof. Salinas describes and figures a gold ring, preserved at Palermo in the museum of the Prince of Trabia, which reads in four lines ΚΕΒΟΗ ‖ ΘΗΤѠCѠΑΒ ‖ ΛΑѠΝΙΚΗΤΑΒ'ΠΑ'CΠΑΘΡ. i.e. Κύριε βοήθει τῷ σῷ δούλῳ Νικήτᾳ βασιλικῷ πρωτοσπαθαρίῳ. He considers that he is probably the Nicetas mentioned by Baronius under the year 797 as prefect of Sicily. (Tre anelli segnator. . . . inrenuti in Sicilia, pp. 4, 5, Firenze, 1871.) We have also a ring of uncertain age, preserved at Syracuse: K[ύριε] β[οήθει] τῆς φορ[ούσης] (B'ckh, n. 9057). These should have been given in RINGS, under Cross.

Brit. Mus.; one side of a bad specimen figured in King's Gnostics, pl. vi. n. 7). The seal of Solomon is said to be the pentalpha, or star of five rays formed by intersecting triangles (Kirch. Oedip. Aegypt. cl. xi. c. vii. t. ii. pars 2, p. 477). Hence the scars on the rhizoma of the Convallaria multiflora have given to the plant the English name of Solomon's seal. On the medal and on the gem, however, the name Solomon, and the words Seal of God, appear to constitute the charm, the sigil's power being to make the owner victorious. See more on this subject in King, u. s. p. 215, Dict. of Bible, s. v. SOLOMON; Lightfoot's ed. of St. Paul's Epist. to Coloss. Introd. pp. 91, 92, note.

SEASONS, THE FOUR. This is one of the adopted subjects of Christian art. The seasons had long been a favourite subject of Roman decoration, of the most pleasing character, and connected with rural and pastoral imagery, so that the church soon invested them with associations of her own. To the heathen they furnished matter for contemplation on life, change, growth and decay; in Christian thought the hope of the resurrection was added; and pictures of sowers, reapers, and vinedressers would have their definite meaning for all who knew the Lord's parables. And these pictures are so frequently (almost invariably in fact) associated with the form of the Good Shepherd, that it is impossible to doubt their Christian import, at an early date. It is not here as with single emblems, like the peacock, lion or eagle, which have no special thread of meaning to connect them either with the Scriptures, or with Christian imagery unquestionably derived from Holy Scripture. [C. B.]

The customary use of this subject seems to have died away, perhaps with a parallel decline to that of the Good Shepherd (see s. v.). The Seasons in the catacomb of Domitilla, or St. Nereus and St. Achilles, were perhaps the earliest frescoes of which any remains are left (see FRESCO); also Parker's Photographs, No. 1820, 618, 619, and text, p. 123). The present paintings are evidently restorations of the roughest kind. Another fine example is in the Callixtine catacomb (Bosio, p. 223; Bottari, tav. lv.), where the figures are in pairs on each side of the Good Shepherd. "Winter" is a woodman by his fire; "Autumn," a vintager, almost nude; "Summer," a well-clad reaper; "Spring," a young man, only clad in a scarf, and gathering roses. The cemetery of St. Praetextatus contains another set, perhaps equal in antiquity to those of St. Domitilla, and of the character of early 2nd century work at latest. They are arranged in beautiful decorative forms round the vaulting, and on the walls below the arches of the cemetery. Laurels, vines and grapes, corn-ears and roses, represent the seasons above; and there are four corresponding agricultural scenes on the walls, of realistic treatment, but ornamentally arranged with great skill. These were undoubtedly types in use among the heathen; but then all Christian symbols alike, except the anagrammatic fish, appear to have been more or less employed thus at earlier or later dates, and in variously secular senses.

Martigny gives woodcuts of the Four Seasons, here reproduced, from the cemetery of St. Pontianus. They form four compartments of a cupola-vault, grouped round the Good Shepherd in the centre. "Spring" is a boy, bearing a lily and a hare; "Summer," a reaper; "Autumn," a vintager applying a ladder to a tree (shewing the Italian way of culture rather than the Greek training to stakes and frames); "Winter," a young man by a fire, holding a torch in his left hand, and in his right (perhaps) a billet of wood. Martigny refers to a sculpture from the cemetery of St. Agnes (Boldetti, Cimit. p. 466; Maffei, Gemm. Ant. part. iv. No. 58, 59), where "Winter" bears a leafy bough and a bird. This subject exists in sculpture, on the ends of the sarcophagus of Junius Bassus. Bottari, tom. i. capo della prefaz., and Buonarotti (Vetri, p. i.) has published a sepulchral urn which bears it also. [R. St. J. T.]

SECLUSION. One of the penalties imposed upon penitents in the seventh and two following centuries was incarceration. It was a penal sentence, and distinct from the voluntary profession of monasticism undertaken to expiate a great crime. The practice arose on the decay of public penance. One of the earliest instances of the imposition of the penalty is in Spain. The Conc. Narbonens. A.D. 589 (c. 6) decreed that any clergyman or citizen of position convicted of crime was to be sent to a monastery for correction. In the 11th Council of Toledo, A.D. 675, c. 7, "retrusio" is coupled with exile as among the recognised punishments inflicted by the church. Nor was this mode of penance confined to the Peninsula; it became common throughout the West. Thus pope Gregory II. 715–731, in a letter (Ep. ii.) to the emperor Leo the Isaurian, contrasts the spiritual with the civil penalties: the state, he says, executes or tortures a criminal, but the church shuts him up in the "secretarium," the vestry or the chapter-house, that he may purge his soul by fasts and vigils. The sentence of incarceration occurs also among the decrees of a synod held under Boniface, A.D. 742, the decisions of which were confirmed in the following year by Conc. Liptin.: any Christian guilty of fornication was to do penance in prison on bread and water; an ordained priest guilty of the same sin was to be flogged and remain two years in prison; a monk or cleric was to be beaten thrice and shut up; and a nun who had fallen was to be confined and have her head shaved. The same discipline is apparent in the rituals of that period. The Gelasian Sacramentary, under the title "Ordo agentibus publicam penitentiam," directs a penitent to be taken in the morning of the first Wednesday in Lent, and to be shut up till Holy Thursday, when he was to be brought into the church; and among the rubrical directions for the Mass on "Feria 5, in Coen. Dom.," the penitents are instructed to come out from the retreat where they have performed their penance. Similar rubrics are contained in the Ordo Romanus, and in pseudo-Alcuin de Divinis Officiis, cap. de Coen. Dom., and in an ancient Toulouse Pontifical of the 9th century (Morin. de Poenitent., appendix, p. 599), where the penitent is ordered to be shut up "in loco secreto" throughout Lent. In the Penitential of Theodore (I. vii. 1) lifelong confinement in a monastery is ruled to be the appropriate penalty for an accumulation of mortal sins. Compare Poenitentiale Cummeani, xiv. 1, and the early British penitential fragment "Sinodus Aquilonalis Britt." cc. 1, 2 (Wasserschleben, Die Bussord. p. 103). The discipline of imprisonment was enforced also against the Canonici. Thus the rule of Chrodegang of Metz (c. 28) orders the seclusion of the collegiate clergy when under penance in terms identical with the directions of the Rituals. In the case of the secular clergy, after monastic houses had become general, it was a common punishment to confine an offending clerk in a monastery, either for a term of years or for the remainder of his life. This mode of seclusion was appointed both by civil and ecclesiastical law. Justinian's Novell. cxxiii. 20 direct that a presbyter or deacon giving false evidence, shall, in place of being scourged, be deposed and shut up for three years in a monastery. The Council of Agde, A.D. 506 (c. 50), orders the seclusion to be lifelong when either forgery or perjury has been committed by a clergyman: a similar penalty was attached by 3 Conc. Aurelian. c. 7, to adultery; and by 4 Conc. Tolet. c. 29, to magic and soothsaying. See Conc. Epaon. c. 22; 7 Conc. Tolet. c. 3; 8 Conc. Tolet. c. 5. By the second Council of Seville, A.D. 618 (c. 3), a clergyman deserting his benefice was to be confined temporarily in a monastery. Monks who subjected themselves to penance were still further secluded by confinement in the cells or "ergastula" of their monastery. Syricius (Ep. i. 6) imposes this penal confinement upon monks or nuns who, in spite of their monastic profession, have contracted what were held to be incestuous marriages. See Conc. Tarracon. c. 1; Conc. Autissiod. c. 23; Conc. in Trull. c. 41. The severity of the austerities to which delinquent monks were exposed when under confinement may be gathered from the account given in the Scalae of Johannes Climacus, grad. 5. [G. M.]

SECRETA, SECRETAE (sub-oratio, orationes. Cf. εὐχὴ προσκομιδῆς· εὐχὴ ἀντιφώνου ἣν ὁ ἱερεὺς ἐπεύχεται ἐπικλινόμενος, i.e. super oblata, μυστικῶς). In the course of the Missa Fidelium, the celebrating priest was wont to ask the prayers of the bystanders, "Pray for me, brethren," and a mutual intercession followed, "that it might be sursum corda with them, as it was already with him" (Amalarius); he then turned to the altar, and prayed with a low voice, so as only himself could hear the words, over the oblations. To this prayer, or these prayers, was given the name of secreta or secretae. In the Clementine liturgy, the bishop was enjoined to pray silently, as well as the priests present, before he commenced the more solemn part of the service (εὐξάμενος οὖν καθ' ἑαυτὸν ὁ ἀρχιερεύς, Apost. Const. viii. 12). The Council of Laodicea, rehearsing the order of service (can. 19), says, "After the catechumens have retired, then the prayers of the faithful are to be made in three parts, the first with silence (εὐχὴ διὰ σιωπῆς), and the second and third with acclamation (διὰ προσφωνήσεως); then the kiss of peace is to be given," &c. Many of the fathers mention this prayer, and the titles of it as found in the liturgy of St. Chrysostom are given above.

Some (e.g. Bossuet) have conjectured that the word secreta is derived from the secretio (secerno), i.e. after the separation from the rest of the offerings of what was reserved for the eucharistic sacrifice, or after the separation of the catechumens from the faithful; but without ground, for the ancient sacramentaries, as well as the Greek, agree in the other interpretation, which is further proved by the Book of Tours, where we find these prayers called (not secretae, but) arcanae. The word is also used as an adjective, as in the Sacramentary of Bobio, "collectio secreta." The prayers were sometimes called secretâ, i.e. submissâ (voce). Indeed Amalarius and other writers put it beyond all question by the rationale of the practice they supply. Thus Rupertus (de Divin. Offic. c. 4) says, "The priest therefore standing in silence, and silently (tacite) saying the prayer over the oblations, prepares the holy sacrifice, because our Lord also, when He hid Himself, meditated the saving mystery of His own Passion. The silence of the priest designates the hiding-place of Christ. The priest says some things secretly, because, about the Passion of Christ, His disciples did not confess Christ but secretly." And so Amalarius (de Eccl. Offic. iii. 32): "The prayer is called secret, as being said secretly. In this the priest prays to be purged at the present time. It belongs to the priest alone, to offer sacrifice to God alone. And, therefore, because we speak out of our thoughts, no resounding voice is necessary, but words for this purpose alone, that the priest may be reminded what he ought to think." The same was put into verse by Hildebert, archbishop of Tours (see Durantus, de Rit. Eccl. ii. 29). See AMEN, 2. p. 75.

At the end of this "secret" prayer the priest, raising his voice (ἐκφώνως. Lit. St. Chrys.), then said the collect, "super oblata," and then proceeded aloud.

"The Leonian Sacramentary, as it has come down to us, provides proper prayers to be said over the gifts at the different days and seasons. They have no rubric or title, but in the later Gelasian are called secretae, in the Gregorian super oblata. The fact of their being said privately by the priest, and the frequent reference in them to the intercession of the saints, shew that they were not truly primitive. Yet the position of some may be justified by regarding them as a secret prayer of entrance on the whole sacrificial action of the liturgy. God is now besought to accept the elements for the holy use to which man is devoting them." (Scudamore, Not. Euc. pp. 371, 372.) Martene treats of this part of the ritual (vol. iv. lib. ii. cap. 2, § 29).

[H. B.]

SECRETARIUM. Another name for the sacristy or diaconicum in the Latin church. The Council of Agde (can. 68) forbids lay officials "insacrati ministri" to enter the secretarium, called by the Greeks diaconicum, and touch the sacred vessels. The Saxon translation of the word in the passage of Beda (H. E. ii. 1) which records the burial of pope Gregory is "huse portice," Eucharistiae porticus, i.e. the place where the eucharistic vessels were kept (Bevereg. Pandect. vol. ii. p. 76, annotat.). Dionysius Exiguus, in his Latin translation of the canons of Laodicea, writes, "quod subdiaconi a diaconico, i.e. secretario sint remoti." In the West the secretaria were frequently large apartments sufficient for the reception of a considerable number of people. Councils were not uncommonly held in them. Thus the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth councils of Carthage were held "in secretario basilicae restitutae," and that of Aachen in 836 "in secretario basilicae S. Mariae quod in Lateranis dicitur" (Cossart, xiv. 64; cf. Greg. Turon. lib. v. c. 19). The second Council of Arles, A.D. 452 (can. 15), ordained that "in secretario diacono inter presbyteros sedere non liceat" (Labbe, Concil. iv. 1013). The word is sometimes used for the council itself, e.g. "venturo secretario," "praeterito secretario." Presbyters also sat in them to receive the salutations of the laity, or to hear and settle disputes. St. Martin sat in one "secretarium" while "in alio secretario presbyteri sederent, vel salutationibus vacantes, vel audiendis negotiis occupati" (Sulp. Sever. lib. iii. Dial. ii. c. 1). The "secretarium" also sometimes served as a lodging room. St. Martin slept there, and on his departure the virgins of the church rushed in and licked the place where he had sat, and parted the straw of his bed among them as a sacred treasure (ibid.). Paulinus of Nola describes the purpose of the two "secretaria" of his basilica, one as a vestry or sacristy, the other as a place of devout study, in the following lines.

To the right of the apse,

> "Hic locus est veneranda penus qua conditur, et qua > Promitur alma sacri pompa ministerii;"

and to the left,

> "Si quem sancta tenet meditandi in lege voluntas
> Epist. XII. ad Severum.

Muratori says (Mus. Ital. tom. ii. p. xxii.) that in the older Roman basilicas the "secretarium" was usually placed towards the lower end of the nave to the south, i.e. on the man's side. An oratory was sometimes attached to it, as that at the Vatican dedicated to St. Gregory, and at the Lateran to St. Thomas. Here the popes robed themselves before the high festivals, and went thence to the altar. This agrees with the Ordo Romanus, which states that when the pope is about to celebrate, he does not go at once to the altar, but proceeds first to the "secretarium," supported by his deacons.

Notices of "secretaria" are frequent in Anastasius. The first place of interment of Leo I. was "in abdito inferioris secretarii" at St. Peter's (Anast. § 163). Gregory IV. rebuilt at St. George's "secretarium diaconiae" (ibid. § 464); Benedict III. rebuilt the baptistery "cum secretario" at St. Mary's Trastevere (§ 572); and Nicholas I. that at St. Mary Cosmedin, and constructed in it a "triclinium cum caminatis" (§ 600). [E. V.]

SECULAR. The question about the word is whether in early Christianity it designated those who were not in holy orders, or those who were not living under monastic rule.

No very early passage is forthcoming in which the secular is contrasted with the monastic life. Even after the rise of the Benedictine system we find the term secular contrasted not with regular as applied to those living under monastic rule, but rather to ecclesiastic; for in the sixteenth Council of Toledo (A.D. 693) secular is applied to such as are not priests or bishops (sacerdotes, can. 6). So, again, in the fourth Council of Toledo (A.D. 633) the term secular seems almost equivalent to layman: "Quicunque ex saecularibus accipientes poenitentiam totonderunt se, et rursus praevaricantes laici effecti sunt . . . ." (can. 55). Yet at this period the word seems to be hovering about its later sense as describing those who are unprofessed, for in the same council we have the following language: "Duo sunt genera viduarum, saeculares et sanctimoniales. Saeculares viduae sunt, quae adhuc disponentes, laicalem habitum non deposuerunt" (Conc. Tol. iv. can. 56). In the 8th century we find the term secular in the modern sense, as distinguished from regular: "Ut si quis secularium sanctae professionis famulatum subire desiderat, non antea tonsurae habitum suscipiat, quam illius conversatio ac morum qualitas secundum monasticae regulae definitionem manifestius probetur" (Concil. Cloveshov. ii. c. 24).

The word secular as applied to those who do not live in the monastery is found in those sermons, ad Fratres in Eremo, which pass under the name of Augustine. It is now, however, generally understood that these sermons are the production of an author long subsequent to the great Latin father, so that we cannot affirm that secular was used in its technical sense so early as St. Augustine's day. SEE (Lat. sedes; Fr. siége). The history of the word sedes, in ecclesiastical usage, is exactly parallel to that of the word CATHEDRA (q. v.). Designating first simply a seat, especially a seat of dignity, it came to be especially applied to the seat of a bishop, and thence to the city in which he had his throne. Thus St. Augustine speaks of the cities, the churches of which had apostles for founders, as "sedes apostolicae," and in later times "sedes" came to designate what we call a "cathedral church." (3) In Persia likewise, but of the Nestorian body, when Acacius, their patriarch, whom Barsumas, the metropolitan of Nisibis, had accused of incontinence, proved his innocence. (Mansi, viii. 1173–1176.) The authors of L'Art de vérif. les Dates (i. 148) make two synods of this, and assign different work to both.

(4) A.D. 576, in Persia, and composed of Nestorians once more, whose bishops and metropolitans, it is said, requested their catholicos Ezekiel "ut fidem legesque Apostolorum patrumque occidentalium ipsis rursus ponere et confirmare dignaretur, quemadmodum predecessores ejus catholici facere consuevissent." This is too like the ground alleged by the bishops who formed the first of these Persian synods to be the effect of chance; but of the thirty-nine canons attributed to this synod, we have barely the headings of one-third to judge from. (Mansi, ix. 873.) [E. S. Ff.]

SEMANTRON[a], or SEMANTERION (σήμαντρον, σημαντήριον, also τὸ ξύλον, τὰ ἱερὰ ξύλα), substitutes for bells in the Greek church, usually of wood, sometimes of iron or brass. Goar (Euchol. 560) speaks of them as "perticae e ligno oblongae." There is so little change in the ritual of the Greek church that the present form of the "semantra" which are in daily use in the monasteries, under the name of "simandro,"[b] to call the monks to service, is probably that originally adopted. Neale describes a "semantron" as "a long, well-planed piece of timber, usually heart of maple, from 12 ft. and upwards in length, by 1½ ft. broad, and 9 in. in thickness." In the centre of the length, each edge is slightly scooped out to allow the priest to grasp it by the left hand, while he holds a mallet in the right, with which "he strikes it in various parts and at various angles, eliciting sounds not altogether unmusical." The semantra are usually suspended by chains from a peg in the proaulion (Neale, Hist. of Holy East. Ch. Introd. p. 217). The word for striking or sounding the σήμαντρον was the kindred verb σημαίνειν, either alone or with ξύλον, and also κρούειν. Κρούσμα was used as the sound itself. Thus we find that the joy felt at Constantinople on the translation of the relics of St. Anastasius was shewn τὰ ἱερὰ ξύλα σημάναντες (Concil. Nic. ii. Sess. iv. Labbe et Cossart, xiii. 22). In the Life of St. Theodosius the archimandrite, given by Moschus (Prat. Spirit.), we read of some Eutychian monks of the party of Severus, who, to disturb the saint at his devotions, "beat the wood" at an unwonted hour, and of Theodosius beholding Nonnus praying, with a star over his head, πρὸ τοῦ κρούσαι τὸ ξύλον (ibid. §§ 73, 74). St. Sabas rose for his devotions before the hour of striking, πρὸ τῆς τοῦ κρούσματος ὥρας (Cyril. Scythop. Vit. S. Sab. §§ 43, 59). The officer whose duty it was to sound the semantron was the candle-lighter, κανδηλάπτης.

Though usually of wood, the "semantra" were sometimes of iron, ἀγιοσίδηρα, or of brass. These were formed of slightly curved metal plates, and gave out a sound not unlike that of a gong.

Semantra were of different sizes, larger and smaller; σ. μέγα, σ. μικρόν. Thus we read in the Typicon S. Sabae, κανδηλάπτης κατελθὼν σημαίνει τὸ μικρόν (c. 1); σημαίνει σήμαντρον μικρὸν καὶ συναγόμεθα ἐν τῷ νάρθηκι ψάλλοντες (ibid. 57); and again, κανδηλάπτης ἐξέρχεται, καὶ σημαίνει τὸ μέγα (ibid. c. 1). The smaller were sounded first, then the larger (Goar, Euchol. p. 473), which were followed by those of iron. Theodore Balsamon, in a treatise devoted to the subject, compares the sounding of the little, great, and iron "semantra" to the preaching of the law and of the gospel, and the last trump. He says also that the congregations were summoned by three "semantra" in monasteries, and only by one large one in parish churches.

The slow deep notes, at long intervals, produced from the "semantra" at funerals, were called αἱ βαρεῖαι, and the striker was said κρούειν τὰς βαρείας (Goar, Euchol. p. 560).

"Semantra," from their size and shape, furnished formidable weapons, and were sometimes so used with fatal effect in a church brawl (Mich. Glyc. Annal. p. 302; Scylitzes, p. 637). [E. V.]

SENATOR, Sept. 26, martyr; commemorated at Albanum (Mart. Usuard., Hieron.). [C. H.]

SENATORIUM. A term used in the ancient Roman ordines to designate the part of the church which was reserved for nobles. It was on the south side of the church opposite the part assigned to women. When the oblations were made by nobles, the pope or priest descended into the senatorium to receive them. The emperors, however, took their oblations to the altar itself. From the use of the term by Martene (de Eccl. Rit. I. iv. x. 4, vol. i. p. 155, fol.), it appears that at Rome the senatorium was that part of the church which was occupied by (what we should call) the aristocracy. When the pope was going to distribute the sacrament, after communicating those who were in orders, "descendit in senatorium, ubi magnates Eucharistia reficiebat." [H. T. A.]

SENCHUS MOR, a collection of ancient Irish laws, modified from the pagan code to meet the Christian requirements. It is the embodiment of ante-Christian Brehon law, and, with its additions, interpretations, and glosses, has formed the authoritative Brehon code from a very early date down even to the 16th century. But the time and circumstances of its compilation are matters of dispute. Ancient tradition and its present Introduction attribute it primarily to St. Patrick, who had acquired sufficient influence to procure a purgation of the pagan laws, and the infusion into them of a milder tone and purer Christian principles. This was between the sixth and the ninth years after St. Patrick's arrival, and in the reign of Laeghaire, monarch of Ireland (A.D. 428–463). The Irish Annals of Ulster and Annals of Tigernach give the exact year, A.D. 438 (O'Conor, Rer. Hib. Script. ii. 101; iv. 1), a date which may point to the theory of the compilation as presented below. Nine are said to have been engaged together in the work, viz. three kings, Laeghaire, with Corc king of Munster, and Daire, a chief in Ulster; three bishops, St. Patrick, Benignus his successor at Armagh, and Cairnech of Tuilen; and three poets or judges, Rossa, son of Trichem, Dubhthach mac Ua Lugair, and Ferghus (Senchus Mor, i. p. 5). This would assign the original draft of the Senchus Mor to about the middle of the 5th century, and the memory of St. Patrick's connexion with it was perpetuated by the deep reverence ever paid to its constitutions, and the name given to it of "Cain Patraic" or Patrick's law. It was also called NOMIT or NOMIT, the knowledge of the Nine (Senchus Mor, i. 17).

[a] An elegant epigram on a semantron is extracted by Neale (p. 219) from Ailatius and Englished by himself.

[b] The vignette on the title-page of Curzon's Monasteries of the Levant represents the beating of the Simandro in the outer court of a monastery.

But this Patrician origin has been keenly disputed (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. c. 7, § 15), and had objections raised to it on the score of history and chronology (Petrie, Hist. and Antiq. Tara Hill, pass.; Trans. Roy. Ir. Acad. xviii. 52 sq.; Todd, St. Patrick, 48 . sq., following Petrie). Its critics and opponents would grant it Christian authority, but of a date later than St. Patrick's time. But in the edition of the Senchus Mor (published under direction of the Commissioners for publishing the Ancient Laws and Institutes of Ireland, 3 vols. Lond. 1865 sqq.) the editor, Mr. W. Neilson Hancock, has met these objections and upholds the Patrician origin, while he shews that much has since been added, and allusions are made in it to interpretations and Brehon judgments of a much later date. The era of St. Patrick was peculiarly appropriate for the codification of the Brehon laws in Ireland, especially at the instance of a Roman citizen who had newly arrived from the Continent, where a similar process upon the Roman civil law was being carried out with all the weight of the imperial authority. The Theodosian Code received the imperial sanction in A.D. 438. (O'Curry, Lect. Man. and Cust. Anc. Ir. ii. 24 sqq., and Lect. MS. Materials of Anc. Irish Hist. 16. 91, ed. 1873; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 132–34 n.; Keating, Gen. Hist. Ir. B. ii.)

The Senchus Mor (derived from the Celtic root sen, old, and mor, in recognition of its authority) is in no sense an historical treatise, but is a body of laws, criminal, commercial, social, military and agrarian, containing the original text with a large collection of glosses, interpretations, and Brehon refinements. It is interesting as a record of ancient law, and doubly valuable as shewing the mellowing influences of Christianity upon heathenism. [J. G.]

SENIOR, a presbyter or priest, one belonging to the second order of the Christian ministry. The usage arose from the more common rendering of πρεσβύτερος in Scripture. Thus in Acts xv. 6 the early version gives "Apostoli et seniores" (Sabatier, Bibl. Sacr. Vers. Ant. iii. 549), and this is preserved by St. Jerome; similarly ib. 22 (Sab. 552; Hieron.) or 23 (ib.), xvi. 4 (Sab., Hier.). In Acts xiv. 2, xv. 23, St. Jerome gives presbyteros. The word is used in this sense by Tertullian (Apol. 39), Firmilian (Ep ad Cypr. n. 75 inter Epp. Cypr. ed. Ben, "seniores et praepositi" = priests and bishops), and Paulinus (Ep. 4 ad Amand., "nomine officioque seniores)." It occurs also in the Missale Francorum, "Probet me esse seniorem" (Liturg. Gall. Mabill. 307), and the Missale Gallicanum Vetus of Thomasius and others, "Aedificet sacerdotes (the bishops) exaltet seniores, illustret Levitas" (the deacons) (ibid. 337). The prayers in which these occur are probably earlier than the codices in which we find them. We may mention, however, that so late as the beginning of the 7th century Gregory I., writing to a bishop in whose diocese Greek was spoken, uses the direct equivalent to the Greek term, "consensus seniorum et cleri" (Epist. ad Joan. Panorm. xi. 51). Compare PATRON, p. 1577. [W. E. S.]

SENNES (1), July 30, martyr at Rome, with Abdon, Persian subreguli, under Decius (Mart. Bed., Metr. Bed., Flor., Usuard.; Vet. Rom., Adon.; Hieron., Notker., Wand.). The Liber Antiphonarius of Gregory has an office for their natale.

SEPTIMUNTIA, COUNCIL OF (SEPTIMUNCENSE CONCILIUM), A.D. 418 (?), one of the many councils of this period in Africa whose canons—in this case six—are known to us only through Ferrandus. (Mansi, iv. 439.) [E. S. Ff.]

SEPTIMUS (1), Aug. 17, monk, martyr, with Liberatus an abbat, and others; commemorated in Africa (Mart. Usuard., Adon.).

(2) Oct. 24, martyr, with Fortunatus, readers, under Diocletian; commemorated at Venusia (Mart. Usuard., Adon.; Vet. Rom.). [C. H.]

SEPTUAGINTA DISCIPULI DOMINI, commemorated on Jan. 4 (Mart. Rom.).

SEPULCHRE, EASTER, amongst the many elaborate rites with which the ancient church solemnised the week before Easter was the ceremony of the Sepulchre. It is thus described in the ancient ordinarium of Bayeux: "On Good Friday a 'sepulchre' is prepared towards the left horn of the altar, with cushion and costly linen. Inside this the bishop buries the cross, the reserved sacrament and the sacramental plate; an appropriate form of service is said; the sepulchre is censed, and closed; when all depart (according to a most ancient Rituale of Poictiers), leaving only two persons to guard the sepulchre, which remains till Easter."

Martene (de Ant. Eccl. Rit. IV. xxiii. 27) only gives examples of this in France and England (Sarum), and he furnishes no particulars from which the date of this singular performance can be inferred. There seems, however, no reason to suppose that it was coeval with the rise of transubstantiation, as it is plain that the practice of "reserving" the sacrament was one that existed centuries before that dogma was formulated. [H. T. A.]

SEPULCHRE, THE HOLY. It is now more than thirty years since the controversy on the site of the Holy Sepulchre was first fairly commenced,—though doubts were thrown upon the traditional site a hundred years ago by the German bookseller Korte. Dr. Robinson renewed the attack in 1842 by arguing that the second wall must have run outside the present church — a thing fatal to its traditions. The Rev. George Williams defended the site, maintaining that not only was there a continuous chain of historical evidence in its favour, but that the second wall could be proved to have run east of the church. Mr. Fergusson, in 1847, advanced the theory that the site was a forgery of the 10th century, the real site being that now occupied by the Dome of the Rock; and Mr. Finlay in the same year attempted a new and ingenious defence of the traditional site, to which we shall presently allude. Since then, many books have been written on one side or the other. Among them are the works of Professor Willis, De Vogüé, De Saulcy, Tobler, and Lewin. Colonel Wilson has produced the ordnance survey of Jerusalem; the rock levels of the city have been almost completely determined by him, Colonel Warren, Lieut. Conder, M. Clermont Gauneau, and Herr Schick; and Professor E. H. Palmer has published a translation of an Arabic historian, which makes the Dome of the Rock to have been built by Abd-el-Melek.

The question divides itself into two: (A) Is the present site that fixed upon by the officers of Constantine? and (B) Was that site certainly, or even probably, the true spot where our Lord was buried?

A. The evidence for the first question is historical and architectural. We propose to cite, as briefly as the subject permits, the chief historical evidence which bears upon the Holy Sepulchre from the Constantinian period.

I. [A.D. 326.] The sepulchre was recovered in the year 326. An account is given in some detail by an eye-witness of the whole event, the historian Eusebius. No doubt whatever has ever been thrown upon his trustworthiness. He says (Life of Constantine, Book iii. chap. xxvi. et seq.):

"It had been in time past the endeavour of impious men to consign to the darkness of oblivion that divine monument of immortality. . . This sacred cave certain godless persons thought to remove entirely from the eyes of men, supposing in their folly that thus they should be able effectually to conceal the truth. Accordingly, they brought a quantity of earth from a distance with much labour and covered the entire spot; then, having raised this to a moderate height, they paved it with stone, concealing the holy cave beneath this massive mound. Then, as though their purpose had been effectually accomplished, they prepare on this foundation a truly dreadful sepulchre of souls, by building a gloomy shrine of lifeless idols to the impure spirit whom they call Venus.[a] These devices of impious and wicked men against the truth had prevailed for a long time; nor had any one of the governors, or military commanders, or even of the emperors themselves, as yet appeared with ability to abolish these daring impieties, save only our prince. . . . He gave orders that the place should be thoroughly purified. . . . As soon as his commands were issued, these engines of deceit were cast down, . . . overthrown, and utterly destroyed. . . . Fired with holy ardour, the emperor directed that the ground itself should be dug up to a considerable depth, and the soil . . . transported to a distant place. . . . But as soon as the original surface of the ground under the covering of earth appeared, immediately, and contrary to all expectation, the venerable and hallowed monument of our Saviour's resurrection was discovered. . . .

"Immediately afterwards, the emperor sent forth injunctions granting ample supplies of money, and commanding that a house of prayer worthy of the worship of God should be erected near the Saviour's tomb, on a scale of rich and royal greatness . . . "

Here follows the letter of Constantine, in which occurs a remarkable passage, the following:—"That the monument of His most holy Passion, so long buried beneath the ground, should have remained unknown for so long a series of years until its reappearance, . . . is a fact which truly surpasses all admiration."

Eusebius resumes the narrative:—

"Accordingly, on the very spot which witnessed the Saviour's sufferings, a new Jerusalem was constructed over against the one so celebrated of old, which, since the foul stain of guilt brought on it by the murder of the Lord, had experienced the last extremity of desolation. It was opposite this city that the emperor began to rear a monument to the Saviour's victory over death . . .

"First, he adorned the sacred cave itself . . . This monument, as the chief part of the whole, the emperor's zealous magnificence beautified with rare columns, and profusely enriched with the most splendid decorations of every kind. The next object of his attention was a space of ground of great extent open to the pure air of heaven. This he adorned with a pavement of finely-polished stone, and enclosed it on three sides with porticoes of great length; for at the side opposite to the sepulchre, which was the eastern side, the church itself was erected—a noble work rising to a vast height, and of great extent both in length and breadth."

[a] A coin of Jerusalem, of the reign of Antoninus Pius, bears upon the obverse a temple of Venus. This coin is engraved in Williams's Holy City.

The description of this church follows:—

"In the next place he enclosed the atrium which occupied the space leading to the entrance in front of the church. This comprehended first the court, then the porticoes on each side, and lastly the gates of the court. This, then, in the midst of the open market-place, the entrance-gates of the whole work, which were of exquisite workmanship, afforded to passers-by on the outside a view of the interior, which could not fail to inspire astonishment."

II. The date of the "recovery" or "discovery" of the tomb, A.D. 326, was seven years before the anonymous Bordeaux Pilgrim visited Jerusalem. The buildings were then in progress, two years before the Dedication. The following is his evidence. Because, in his case, as well as in several others quoted, his words have been translated so as to mean quite different things, the Latin only is given.

He describes the Temple in its ruined condition, where there was shewn an "angulus turris excelsissimae," the pinnacle of temptation—"ad caput anguli et sub pinnâ turris ipsius, sunt cubicula plurima ubi Salomon palatium habebat;" no doubt the substructure still known as Solomon's stables. Colonel Warren has revived the tradition of the pilgrim by placing Solomon's palace on the spot. A remarkable passage follows: "In aede ipsâ ubi Templum fuit quod Salomon aedificavit, in marmore ante aram sanguinem Zachariae." What was the aedes ipsa? And did the pilgrim confuse Hadrian's with Solomon's temple? If the memory of Herod as a builder had so completely perished, why not that of Hadrian? A line or two lower down he says, however, "sunt ibi et statuae duae Hadriani."

From the Temple he takes us to the Holy Sepulchre in the following words:—

"Item, exeunti in Hierusalem, ut ascendas Sion, in parte sinistrâ, et deorsum in valle juxta murum, est piscina, quae dicitur Siloa, habet quadriporticum . . . Inde eâdem viâ ascenditur Sion et paret ubi fuit domus Caiaphae sacerdotis, et columna adhuc ibi est, in quâ Christum flagellis ceciderunt. Intus autem, intra murum Sion, paret locus ubi palatium habuit David . . . Inde ut eas foris murum de Sion (eunti ad portam Neapolitanam) ad partem dexteram, deorsum in valle sunt parietes ubi domus fuit sive praetorium Pontii Pilati: ubi Dominus auditus est antiquum pateretur. A sinistrâ autem parte est monticulus Golgotha, ubi Dominus crucifixus est. Inde quasi ad lapidem missum est crypta ubi corpus ejus positum fuit et tertiâ die resurrexit. Ibidem modo jussu Constantini imperatoris basilica facta est, id est Dominicum mirae pulchritudinis, habens ad latus exceptoria unde aqua levatur et balneum à tergo ubi infantes lavantur."

III. [A.D. 337.] The Onomasticon places Golgotha on the north of Mount Zion.

IV. [A.D. 350.] While the temple of Venus with its foundations was being cleared away, there might have been, and most probably was present, a Christian lad, native of Jerusalem, eleven years of age, watching the discovery, which did as much as the great luminous cross which appeared in the sky four years later to confirm the doubtful and strengthen the faithful, that of the rock containing the sacred tomb. It was Cyril, afterwards bishop of Jerusalem. One must not forget that he is the third eye-witness who speaks of these things; that, though he was a boy at the time of the discovery, he lived in Jerusalem, and must have watched, step by step, the progress of the great basilica; that he was ordained before the completion and dedication of the buildings, and that many, if not all, of his lectures were delivered in the church of the Anastasis itself. "The kings of this day," he says, "have in their piety built this holy Church of the Resurrection . . . in which we are assembled."

The statements of fact which have been gathered from Cyril must therefore be admitted, unless there can be shewn any temptation to exaggerate, as exactly true. Four are important. They are as follows:—

(a) "The cleft which was at the door of the salutary sepulchre . . . was hewn out of the rock itself, as is customary here in the front of sepulchres. For now it appears not, the outer cave having been hewn away for the sake of the present adornment; for, before the sepulchre was decorated by royal zeal, there was a cave in the face of the rock."

(b) "Though the place"—outside the sepulchre—"is now adorned, and that most excellently, with royal gifts, yet it was before a garden, and the tokens and traces thereof remain."

(c) "The sepulchre consisted originally of a double cave, of which the exterior was cut away for the sake of the present adornment."

(d) "The entrance . . . was hewn out of the rock itself, as is customary here in the front of sepulchres. Now it appears not: the outer cave or vestibule having been hewn away for the sake of the present adornment; but before the sepulchre was decorated by royal zeal there was a cave in the face of the rock" (Lect. xiv.).

V. Sanctae Paulae Peregrinatio (circa A.D. 380). After praying at the Holy Sepulchre, she ascends Sion:—

"Inde egrediens ascendit Sion quae in arcem vel speculam vertitur. Hanc urbem quondam expugnavit et reaedificavit David."

VI. P. Eucherii epitome de aliquibus locis Sanctis (A.D. 427):—

"Situs ipse urbis pene in orbem circumactus, non parvo murorum ambitu, quo etiam montem Sion, quondam vicinum, jam intra se recipit, qui, a meridie positus, pro arce urbi supereminet. Major civitatis pars infra montem jacet in planitie humilioris collis posita.

"Mons Sion latere uno, quod aquilonem respicit, clericorum religiosorumque habitationibus frequentatur: cujus in vertice planitiem monachorum cellulae obtinent ecclesiam circumdantes, quae illic, ut fertur, ab apostolis fundata pro loci resurrectionis dominicae reverentia.

"Primum de locis sanctis. Pro conditione platearum divertendum est ad basilicam quae martyrium appellatur a Constantino magno cultu extructa. Dehinc cohaerentia eo casu insunt Golgotha atque anastasis: Anastasis in loco est resurrectionis, Golgotha vero, medius inter anastasim ac martyrium locus est dominicae passionis; in quo etiam cruces apparet quae quondam ipsam, affixo Domini corpore, crucem pertulit. Atque haec tum extra montem Sion posita cernuntur; quo se ad aquilonem deficiens loci tumor porrigit. Templum vero in interiori parte urbis in vicinia muri ab oriente locatum magnificeque constructum quondam miraculum fuit . . . .

"At ea fronte montis Sion, quae praerupta rupe orientalem plagam spectat, infra muros atque e radicibus collis fons Siloa prorumpit."

VII. Theodori Liber de situ Terrae Sanctae (sixth century):—

"In medio civitatis est basilica. A parte occidentis intras in sanctam resurrectionem ubi est sepulcrum Domini nostri Iesu Christi. Et est ibi mons Calvariae ad quem montem per gradus calcis est. Ibi Dominus crucifixus est et ibi est altare grande; sub uno tecto est. De Sepulcro Domine usque in Calvariae locum sunt passus numero XV. . . . De Calvariae loco usque in Golgotham passus sunt numero XV. . . . De Golgotha usque in Sanctam Sion passus numero CC, quae est mater omnium ecclesiarum. . . . De Sancta Sion ad domum Caiaphae quae est modo ecclesia Sancta Petri sunt plus minus passus numero L. De domo Caiaphae ad praetorium Pilati plus minus passus numero C. Ibi est ecclesia sanctae Sophiae."

Let us pause here to consider the position of Zion. It seems impossible to avoid the conclusion that all are agreed in describing as Zion the western hill. It is only on that supposition that the Bordeaux Pilgrim can be understood at all. Paula goes from the Church of the Sepulchre to ascend Zion, a phrase which has no meaning at all if Zion were the eastern hill and the Church of the Sepulchre built on the top of it. Eucherius speaks of the city lying below Zion, which can only be said of the higher hill, that on the west; and Theodorus places the basilica in the middle of the city, a statement which would never have been made of the Dome of the Rock. Again, there is nothing, as Lieut. Conder has remarked, in the Haram to correspond to the Golgotha of Theodorus, which was reached by steps.

VIII. Antoninus Placentinus undertook his journey at a date which is uncertain. It was, however, some time between Justinian and the Persian conquest. Very little reliance is to be placed on the statements or measurements of this traveller. He corroborates, however, the statement that the sepulchre was cut out of the rock:—

"Ingressi sumus in sanctam civitatem, in qua adoravimus Domini monumentum . . . Ipsum monumentum in quo corpus Domini positum fuit, in naturalem excisum est petram. Lucernae hydria quae illo tempore ad caput ejus posita fuerat ibidem ardet diu noctuque: . . . Lapis vero unde clausum fuit monumentum ipsum est ante illud monumentum."

IX. On the conquest of Jerusalem by Chosroes II. in 614, the whole of the buildings were entirely destroyed, but rebuilt in 630.

The authorities for this statement are contemporary with the event. The Chronicon Paschale, Modestus (de Persicâ Captivitate), and Antiochus the monk—all three contemporary authorities—describe the destruction and the rebuilding of the church. The last-named writes: "Modestus . . . templa Salvatoris nostri quae quidem barbarico igne conflagrarunt in sublime erigit omni prorsus digna veneratione, puta aedes sanctae Calvariae ac sanctae Resurrectionis: domum insuper dignam omni honore venerandae Crucis, quae mater ecclesiarum est."

There seems to be little reason for doubting that this account is true. A statement supported by three contemporary independent authorities, and followed by all subsequent historians, has a strong groundwork of probability. Add to this the undoubtedly savage character of the Persian conquest, and the general consent that his camp followers were guilty of horrible atrocities. Add, too, the difference between the buildings described by Eusebius and the Bordeaux Pilgrim, and the churches described by Arculf, and there seems to be no room whatever for any doubt. The buildings of Constantine form a symmetrical and artistically-constructed whole. There was the sepulchre surrounded with pillars, and roofless. There was the open space, the atrium, and the market-place. In the buildings of the next period, as described by Arculf, Willibald, Eutychius, and other writers, there are three churches (not counting the small church of St. Mary), separate, without architectural connexion.

X. [circa A.D. 680.] We proceed to the account of Arculf. It was taken down from his own lips by Adamnanus, abbot of Columba in Iona. The date of the journey of Arculf cannot be determined; no one knows where he lived, or of what see he was bishop. He is made by Adamnanus to speak of "Majuvias, Saracenorum rex, qui nostrâ aetate fuit." Now Moawiyah, the first khalif of the Ommiades, reigned from 661–679. Mr. Wright thinks that the visit of Arculf to Jerusalem took place not long after that sovereign's death. If the conjecture be correct, he visited the town ten years before the reputed building by Abd-el-Melek of the Dome of the Rock. "On the spot where the Temple once stood, near the eastern wall, the Saracens have erected a square house of prayer, in a rough manner, by raising beams and planks upon some remains of old ruins; this is their place of worship, and it will hold about 3000 men. . . . The church of the Holy Sepulchre is very large and round, encompassed with three walls, with a broad space between each, and containing three altars of wonderful workmanship, in the middle wall at three separate points: on the south, the north, and the west. It is supported by twelve stone columns of extraordinary workmanship; and it has eight doors or entrances through the opposite walls, four fronting the north-east, four the south-east. In the middle space of the inner circle of the house is a round chamber, cut out of a single piece of rock, within which nine men can pray standing, and the roof of which is about a foot and a half higher than a man of ordinary stature. . . . Within, on the north side, is the tomb of our Lord, hewn out of the sar rock, 7 feet in length, and rising three palms above the floor." These measurements were taken by Arculf with his own hand. "The tomb is broad enough to hold one man lying on his back, and has a raised division in the stone to separate the legs. The entrance" (i.e. of the loculus) "is in the south side, and there are twelve lamps burning day and night, according to the number of the twelve apostles. . . . . Internally, the stone of the rock remains in its original state, and still exhibits the marks of the workmen's tools: its colour is not uniform, but appears to be a mixture of white and red." He goes on to describe the other churches which then formed the group—the square church of the Virgin Mary, and to the east the large church built on the site of Golgotha. "Under the place of the cross a cave is hewn in the rock, in which sacrifice is offered on an altar." If that is true, what has become of the cave, and how could a cave be cut in the rock east of the platform in the Haram esh-Shereef, where the ground has a slope of one in six? Adjoining the church of Golgotha to the east again was the basilica of Constantine—the Martyrion. Between the Anastasis and the Martyrion Arculf speaks of an open space, doubtless that described by Eusebius.

This description, with the rude plan which accompanies it, is evidently one extracted, so to speak, by numberless eager questions. Adamnanus wished above all things to form a clear idea in his own mind of the most holy of holy places.

XI. [A.D. 690.] The Dome of the Rock, which is according to Mr. Fergusson's theory Constantine's erection, over the Holy Sepulchre was built, according to Arabic historians, in this year by Abd-el-Melek. Three Arabic writers—Jelal-ed-Dîn, Kemel-ed-Dîn, and Mejr-ed-Dîn—agree in describing the erection by the Khalif. Prof. E. H. Palmer has given a full account from these sources in his History of Jerusalem (p. 79 et seq.). Eutychius, himself of Arab extraction, also ascribes the Dome to Abd-el-Melek.

XII. [A.D. 800.] The church of the Holy Sepulchre was given by Haroun-al-Raschid to Charlemagne.

XIII. [A.D. 765.] After the death of St. Willibald, who visited Jerusalem four times, the last about the year 765, a description of the sacred places was written by his biographer, apparently from his own narrative. It is found in the Acta Sanctorum, and is quoted by Mr. Fergusson, Canon Williams, and Professor Willis. As in the case of the Bordeaux Pilgrim, the words have been used by controversialists to support opposite views: "Et inde venit ad Hierusalem in illum locum ubi inventa fuerat sancta crux Domini. Ibi nunc est ecclesia in illo loco qui dicitur Calvariae locus: et haec fuit prius extra Hierusalem; sed Helena quando invenit crucem, collocavit illum locum intus intra Hierusalem.

"Et ibi stant nunc tres cruces ligneae foris in orientali plaga ecclesiae, secus parietem, ad memoriam sanctae crucis dominicae et aliorum qui cum eo crucifixi erant. Illae non sunt nunc in ecclesia sed foris stant sub tecto extra ecclesiam: et ibi secus est ille hortus in quo fuit sepulcrum Salvatoris. Illud sepulcrum fuerat in petra excisum, et illa petra stat super terram et est quadrans in uno et in summo subtilis.

"Et stat nunc in summitate illius sepulchri crux et ibi supra nunc aedificata est mirabilis domus et in orientali plaga in illa petra sepulchri est ostium factum per quod intrant homines in sepulchrum orare. Et ibi est intus lectus, ubi corpus Domini jacebat . . . . Ille lectus in quo corpus Domini jacebat stat in latere aquilonis intus in petra sepulchri et homini est in dextrâ manu quando intrat in sepulchrum orare. Et ibi ante januam sepulchri jacet ille lapis magnus quadrans in similitudine prioris lapidis quem angelus revolvit ab ostio monumenti."

XIV. About the year 870 the monk Bernhard visited Jerusalem. The following is his account of the second group of buildings:—

"Recepti sumus in hospitale gloriosissimi imperatoris Caroli, in quo suscipiuntur omnes qui causâ devotionis illum adeunt locum linguâ loquentes Romanâ; cui adjacet ecclesia in honore sanctae Mariae, nobilissimam habens bibliothecam studio praedicti imperatoris, cum xii. mansionibus, agris vineis, et horto in valle Josaphat. Intra hanc civitatem, exceptis aliis ecclesiis, quatuor eminent ecclesiae mutuis sibimet parietibus cohaerentes, una videlicet ad orientem, quae habet montem Calvariae et locum in quo reperta fuit crux Domini et vocatur basilica Constantini; alia ad meridiem: tertia ad occidentem, in cujus medio est sepulcrum Domini, habens ix. columnas in circuitu sui inter quas consistunt parietes ex optimis lapidibus; ex quibus ix. columnis iv. sunt ante faciem ipsius monumenti quae cum suis parietibus claudunt lapidem coram sepulchro positum, quem angelus revolvit et super quem sedit post peractam Domini resurrectionem. De hoc sepulchro non est necesse plura scribere cum dicat Beda in historiâ anglorum sua sufficientia . . . Inter praedictas igitur iv. ecclesias est paradisus sine tecto, cujus parietes auro radiant; pavimentum vero lapide struitur pretiosissimo habens in medio sui continium iv. catenarum quae veniunt a praedictis quatuor ecclesiis in quo dicitur medius esse mundus."

XV. In the year 1010 the group of churches were all destroyed by order of the Khalif Hakeem. Of this fact there seems to be no doubt possible. It is attested by the following writers:—Raoul the Bald, Lib. III. chap. vii.; Ademar; Guido; William of Tyre; Abulfaragius; Makrizi; and it is acknowledged by Renaudot, Hist. Patriarcharum Alexandrinorum, and by De Sacy in his Life of the Caliph Hakem Biamr Allah. The churches, it is stated, were destroyed as completely as by Chosroes. It is related that the sepulchre itself was not spared—perhaps they broke the upper portion of the rock.

Scarcely had the buildings been destroyed than the capricious despot gave orders for them to be reconstructed. "Tunc," says Raoul, "de universo terrarum orbe incredibilis hominum multitudo exultanter Hierosolymam pergentes, domui Dei restaurandae plurima detulerunt munera." By the help of the emperor Romanus Argyros and his successor and the offerings of pilgrims, the churches were rebuilt in 1048.

XVI. [A.D. 1102.] It is hardly necessary to quote the long account given by Saewulf of the buildings as they were before the magnificent alterations made by the Crusaders. It is, however, most valuable in shewing what the buildings of the third period were—a circular church, with a group of churches and chapels round it. The description may be read in Prof. Willis's paper on the church (Williams's Holy City, vol. ii. p. 270).

No one has doubted, or ever will doubt, that the group of buildings described by Saewulf occupied the same site as that now covered by the modern church of the Holy Sepulchre. What follows, therefore, has no topographical importance, but affects the question whether the present sepulchre is cut in the rock or built up.

XVII. [A.D. 1125.] The Russian abbot Daniel writes that the rock was, when he visited it, between thirty and forty years after the occupation by the Crusaders, cased in marble, with three circular openings in the front by which the stone might be touched and kissed.

XVIII. [A.D. 1185.] Phocas says that the sepulchre was divided into two parts, in one of which was a polished stone raised a cubit, on which was laid the Giver of Life; and a writer of 1187, just before Jerusalem was recovered by the Saracens, says that within the monument was the rock of the sepulchre. Travellers in 1211, 1322, and 1336 confirm the casing with marble and the three small holes in the southern side, by which the faithful could kiss and touch the rock. In the year 1480 Fabri resolved on examining the monument carefully to see whether any portion of rock remained: he found the wall in which the little door to the sepulchre is formed, to be a naked rock in one piece, without joints, still shewing the marks of tools,—"adhibito lumine petream parietem vidi, non quadris compositam, sed integram, in quâ instrumentorum ferreorum signa manifeste apparent." He concludes from this and other indications that the Holy Sepulchre had been destroyed, but not altogether; that it had been subsequently repaired and covered with marble, to prevent pilgrims from knocking off little bits as relics.

XIX. [A.D. 1555.] Bonifacius, then prefect of the council of St. Francis in Jerusalem, superintended extensive repairs in the church, during which he removed one of the alabaster slabs with which the Holy Sepulchre was covered and exposed the very tomb itself; and shortly after he discovered near Jerusalem, among the rock-cut tombs, one exactly resembling that of the Holy Sepulchre.

XX. Among the many scattered notices of the church and the temple area which have been carefully collected by the Rev. George Williams for his Holy City, we find a few indications of importance. Thus, when Julian's workmen were driven from their work by the "globes of fire," Sozomen says they took refuge εἰς τὸ ἱερόν. What was this ἱερόν? Was it the aedes ipsa mentioned by the Bordeaux Pilgrim ubi Templum fuit quod Salomon aedificavit? Paschasius Radbertus, speaking from information given him by pilgrims, says that the monument (A.D. 848) was cut in rock; that it was all one stone, not many; and that a man could hardly reach to touch the roof. Eutychius (Saïd ibn Batrik) speaks of great damage done to the churches in the year 936 by the Moslems: "ecclesiae Constantini portas australes incendunt nec non dimidium porticus anno trecentesimo vicesimo quinto (A. H.) . . . Cranii locum cum (templo) Resurrectionis vastaverunt." This is the last fact recorded in his annals, and one can hardly suppose it to have been entirely without foundation. In 1 30 the Russian abbot Daniel, as we have already seen, states that the rock was cased in marble, but had three circular openings in the front, through which it might be touched and kissed. William of Baldensel (A.D. 1336) was the first to express a doubt whether the tomb had not been built up. "Illud vero advertendum est quod monumentum . . . non est illud in quo corpus Christi sacratissimum examine primitus est immissum: quia sacro attestante eloquio monumentum Christi erat excisum in petrâ vivâ. Illud vero, ex petris pluribus est compositum de novo conglutinato cremento minus artificialiter et, minus quam deceat, ordinate."

XXI. In the above catena of evidence we have included everything that seems of real importance. There are many other and later accounts of the Holy Sepulchre—that in the Norman French, "La Citez de Jherusalem," which may be found in Williams's Holy City; those of the Innominati and others in Tobler's volume, Palaestinae Descriptiones. But they appear to add no new facts to help in the solution of the question.

Let us sum up the evidence.

It would appear, therefore, that Constantine (see his letter) thought the site had been entirely unknown, but that, according to Eusebius, the memory had been preserved, in spite of the "attempts of impious men;" that the emperor adorned the tomb with pillars, and built a basilica at some little distance from it, leaving the space between open and decorated with columns; that, according to the Onomasticon, Golgotha is north of Zion; that according to the Bordeaux Pilgrim, he who would go to Zion from the Temple must ascend in order to get there,—in which statement he is supported by Paula—also that if he would go outside the town from Zion to the Neapolitan gate, i.e. the gate which leads to Neapolis (Nablûs), the Praetorium of Pilate is on the right, deorsum in valle; that all writers alike, from Cyril, an eye-witness in 326, to Father Fabri, an eye-witness in 1480, declare that the tomb is cut in the rock; that there is room in the sepulchre for nine men standing—not kneeling—the area of the present sepulchre available for standing is from 20 to 26 square feet, just enough for that number; that the height is such as a man can hardly reach with his fingers—it is from 7 to 8 feet; that the churches were destroyed in 614 and rebuilt, probably much after the same plan in 630; that according to a doubtful authority (Cedrenus, who has not been quoted above) the churches were burned at the time when the emperor Nicephorus II. took Damascus and recovered Northern Syria; that in 1010 not only were the churches overthrown but also the sepulchre was partially destroyed, by order of the Khalif Hakeem; that considerable alterations were made by the Latin conquerors; and that from the conquest of Saladin, despite the destruction of the sculptured columns before the sepulchre by the Charezmians in 1244, no great change was made in the church till the fire of 1808 necessitated a rebuilding from the old foundations. Professor Willis has pointed out that these accounts of repeated demolitions, burnings, and reconstructions, should be received with certain deductions. When an immense building or group of buildings is destroyed, it is done generally by the hands of hurried conquerors. The foundations remain, with some of the walls, as may be witnessed to this day on the eastern side of the Tyropaeon valley, where stand the stones of Herod's Temple, known as the Jews' Wailing Place. It would be interesting indeed to know what portions, if any, of the present church belong to the first, second, group; to trace, as far as possible, the ... of the buildings described by Saew..., ascertain what are left of the reconstructions of Modestus; to establish how much is left of the Crusaders' church; and, if possible, to find what belongs to the churches destroyed by Hakeem. This has been attempted by the count de Vogüé in the Églises de la Terre Sainte.

XXII. So far then, from Constantine downwards, the history of the Holy Sepulchre has appeared to most students a clear and continuous record of events which, exaggerated perhaps by the imaginary terrors of eye-witnesses and the zeal of historians, were really enacted around the site where now stands the traditional Holy Sepulchre. But in 1847 objections of an entirely novel kind were raised by Mr. James Fergusson, whose reputation as a student of architecture at once commanded a respectful hearing. He declared, on an examination (1) of the drawings, sections, and plans prepared by Messrs. Bonomi and Catherwood, and (2) after a personal visit to Jerusalem, that the Dome of the Rock, which he called the Masjid or Mosque of Omar, could not have been built by Abd-el-Melek in the 7th century; that not only the Arabs could not have erected such a building, but that no Christian architects of the period could have designed it; that, finally, it belongs, and can only belong, to the time of Constantine.

If of that time, then why have we no account of it? And what else can this splendid and richly ornamented erection be, but the structure placed up by the emperor's command around and over our Lord's place of sepulture?

This revolutionary theory necessitated many others: that the cave under the dome is our Lord's sepulchre; that Zion was also the Temple mount; that the Temple was in the S.W. angle of the Haram; that the eastern wall was built by Agrippa after the Crucifixion; that the second wall might run without the present church; that the northern part of the Haram area was a place of tombs, with other consequences.

Many solutions have been proposed to meet the difficulties of this theory, first started by Mr. Fergusson, but they have never yet been answered with such fulness as to convince him or his followers. Mr. Lewin (Siege of Jerusalem, p. 145) suggested that, when they wanted to build the Dome, the Arabs brought over as many pillars and other ornaments as they required from the church of Constantine over the Holy Sepulchre, on the opposite hill.

The count de Vogüé pronounced the building to be Byzantine in character, the work of Christian artists (Temple de Jérusalem, p. 82): "La disposition de l'édifice, prise dans son ensemble, est toute byzantine: un siècle avant l'hégire, les architectes byzantins bâtissaient des églises polygonales ou rondes, telles que celles de Bostra et d'Ezra, édifices datés du sixième siècle, qui se rattachent eux-mêmes par les églises Constantiniennes d'Antioche, de Saint-Constance de Rome, aux temples circulaires de l'antiquité. Sous Abd-el-Melek, les Arabes n'avaient pas d'art qui leur fut propre: ou du moins, s'ils avaient des tendances spéciales, un goût particulier pour telle forme ou tel motif de décoration, ils n'avaient ni écoles ni artistes de profession, et surtout ils n'avaient pas d'ouvriers en état de mener à bonne ... grande construction: il serait injuste de ... n'avaient aucune notion de l'art de ..., puisque les villes du centre de l'Arabie sont construites en maçonnerie de pierre et de bois, et certainement ces constructions, sur lesquelles nous manquons absolument de renseignements précis, devaient par quelque côté avoir leur originalité: mais à Jérusalem, en Syrie, en Égypte, dans les pays récemment soumis à leur domination, ils n'avaient que des soldats et des fonctionnaires: pour bâtir les nouveaux monuments de leur culte, ils furent s'adresser aux vaincus, à la population indigène qu'ils avaient convertie en force, mais non changée ni déplacée. Souvent même ils firent venir du dehors les artistes que le pays ne pouvait pas leur fournir: la grande mosquée de Damas fut décorée par des mosaïstes que le Khalife Al-Walid demanda directement à l'empereur d'Orient. . . . . Les renseignements historiques manquent sur la nationalité des architectes du Qoubbet es Sakhrah, mais le style du monument est un guide au moins aussi sûr que les chroniques arabes et ne laisse aucun doute sur le caractère byzantin de l'édifice. Mais quoique byzantin par le style, il n'a rien de chrétien: le trait principal qui le distingue des églises que lui ont servi de modèle est l'absence d'abside. . . . . L'abside est le signe distinctif des églises primitives, et son absence ici prouve que les architectes du Qoubbet es Sakhrah, dont en bâtissant suivant les habitudes byzantins, surent donner au monument le caractère musulman."

XXIII. But if the architectural argument of Mr. Fergusson, to shew that the Dome of the Rock is the work of Constantine, has never been disproved to the satisfaction of his followers, it must be also acknowledged that the objections to the corollary to the theory, that it is the monument raised by the emperor over the Holy Sepulchre, have also never been satisfactorily answered.

They are, as may be gathered from the foregoing historical evidence, briefly as follows:—

1. Constantine built no dome or church at all over the sepulchre. He simply ornamented it with columns.

2. It appears certain from the Bordeaux Pilgrim and others that the Zion of the 4th century was on that part of the city where it is now placed.

3. From the Onomasticon it is also certain that Golgotha was on the north of Zion.

4. Cyril says that the tomb had a vestibule, "as is customary here in the front of sepulchres." What ... of a vestibule can be found to the cave of the ...?

5. ... was room for only nine men to pray, standing. This exactly fits the present tomb.

6. Paula, after leaving the church, had to ascend in order to get to Zion. How can one ascend from the Dome of the Rock, which is on the top of the hill?

7. How far is the theory that the church is that built by Constantine—even making all allowances for damages at various times, repairs, and additions—compatible with the two complete destructions by Chosroes and Hakem?

13. Lastly, though mo...

is that when the passion for pilgrimages was the strongest, and the tide of pilgrims the most continuous. Can we believe, then, that a vast conspiracy—including bishops, priests, monks, pilgrims, and those who came and went each week—should have succeeded in transferring at one coup the whole of the sites, real and legendary, from one part of the city to another; that the conspiracy was joined in by all new comers while the churches were in process of erection; and that of all the hundreds necessarily engaged in this forgery, not a single one went home and told the tale, not one was found to write it? Nor was it only the pilgrims who would be pressed into complicity with the plot. There were the merchants who flocked every September to the great fair of Jerusalem—regular traders, who came year after year and knew the city, from Byzantium, Genoa, Venice, London, Marseilles, to buy spices, sugar, silks, and rich stuffs. These would have to join in the plot, and might perhaps have done so, being friends and brother Christians. But for the last thirty years of the century, Jerusalem was substituted for Mecca, and an immense number of Moslem pilgrims poured yearly into the Holy City. Was it likely that not one of these merchants, admitting their complicity, should carry home the tale? that not a single hostile Jew—Jerusalem was full of Jews, carrying on a rich trade in dyeing stuffs—should seize the opportunity of a scoff at the Christian? and that not one Mohammedan writer should tell how the worshippers of the Cross had combined together to invent a lie? Such a conspiracy must have been successfully carried through, but it seems most improbable. Such complicity and agreement between hostile fanatics seems impossible.

9. If the Dome of the Rock again was the Church of the Sepulchre, then, for [illegible] years, we must suppose the Christians and [illegible]slems entering the same sacred enclosure [illegible] side, as friends, for prayer and worship. Nothing has ever been found in the Haram area itself, or in any book, to warrant the belief of a wall of separation between the Mosque el Aksa and the dome.

10. The history of the building of the dome by Abd-el-Melek is as clear and precise as that of the building of St. Paul's by Wren. Three Arab historians relate it with such small difference as to shew their general fidelity. It may be urged that these wrote some hundreds of years after the events. That is true. There remains, however, an older record. In the building itself a long Cufic inscription in mosaic runs round the colonnade. "In the name of God [illegible] the servant of God" (read Abd-el-Melek), [illegible] commander of the faithful, built this dome in the year 72" (A.D. 691).

11. Eutychius (Annales, ii. 289) says that the Christians had built no church "within the area of the Temple," on account of the denunciations of the Lord, and had left it in ruins. The "area of the Temple" in the 10th century was surely the present Haram area.

12. Our Lord's tomb was rock cut (Luke xxiii. 53), and after the general fashion of tombs in Jerusalem. What resemblance has there been found between the cave under the dome and a Jewish tomb?

13. Lastly, though more objections might be advanced, consider the express statement of the eye-witness Cyril, that the tomb was rock-cut, after the fashion of tombs in Jerusalem, and that it had a vestibule. Couple with this the fact that it had room for only nine men standing, and that there was in it, along the north side, a place open to the south, three palms high, large enough for the body of a man. Now the cave under the dome contains more than 500 square feet; it may possibly be rock-cut, but it certainly has no resemblance to a Jewish tomb; there is no vestibule, and no appearance of there ever having been any; there is no loculus, and no place apparent to the eye where there ever could have been one.

These objections and many others of equal and minor importance may be satisfactorily disposed of, but at present they remain to be met. And there are a large body of those interested in the question, who are content to accept De Vogüé's proposed solution of the architectural difficulty; who can refer all the accounts of pilgrims without difficulty to the present site; who hold that the modern site is that spoken of by Eusebius, Cyril, and the unknown pilgrim from Bordeaux, the three contemporary witnesses.

B. The next question is, whether the site is genuine? Was our Lord really entombed in the place now shewn to visitors and pilgrims?

I. Historically the evidence is very scanty.

The place was "nigh to the city" (John xix. 20); there was a garden in the place where He was crucified (John xix. 41); the sepulchre was in the garden (John xix. 41); it was a rock-cut tomb (Luke xxiii. 53; Mark xvi. 46; Matt. xxvii. 60); it was "without the gate" (Heb. xiii. 12), that is, without the second wall.

There is no other direct evidence on the site of the tomb, though indications may be found, by the light of which theories may be examined. Thus, it will be conceded that the place was a frequented spot, or at least so near the city that it was easily accessible by the crowds who went out to see the Crucifixion; that it was perhaps so near as to be visible from the Temple wall (John xix. 20, 21); that it was probably near a road leading from one of the city gates (Mark xv. 21); and, though this is less probable, that it was near the Gennath gate, or Gate of Gardens.

II. For 300 years there is silence as regards the sepulchre. Early in the 3rd century, in 212, Alexander goes to Jerusalem to see "the holy places" generally. Origen speaks of the cave at Bethlehem as proof of our Lord's birth. Surely, it is argued, if he had known of the sepulchre, he would have seen in that stronger proof still of the Resurrection. On the other hand, it is assumed that he knew of it, but, by reason of the mound of earth erected purposely to hide it, he could not see it.

III. In the absence of evidence we fall back on theory. There are two lines of argument:

1. Those who do not believe in the authenticity of the site contend that the early Christians took no care to preserve the memory of any sacred place; that after their return from Pella they found Jerusalem a heap of ruins, with the tenth legion encamped either upon or close to the modern site (if that was the true one), a fact which by itself would have prevented them from visiting it; that, after the revolt of Barcochebas, the Christians were confounded by the Romans with the Jews, chased from the spot, and only tolerated when they shewed their distinction by electing a Gentile bishop; that the traditions of the past vanished with the Judaizing or Jewish Christians; that the spot chosen for the church was selected from some vague tradition of quite recent growth, from some fancied resemblance of ground, from some remains of gardens, or even by conscious and designed imposture.

2. On the other hand, the supporters of the tradition point out the improbability that such a place as the scene of the Resurrection, the stupendous importance of which has ever been present to all Christian teachers, should be forgotten by those on the spot. They argue that the Christians must have returned to Jerusalem very shortly after the siege, because they were able to elect for their bishop, in the place of the martyred James, Simeon, son of Clopas, brother of our Lord; that although houses and walls may be destroyed, streets and the site of gates remain to mark the places where old associations cling; that the tradition is unbroken; that the words of Eusebius clearly convey the fact that the site was known to all Christians in Jerusalem; and that when the historian speaks of old records from which he compiled his list of the early bishops, he suggests the very records which preserve the memory of the site.

IV. We may here briefly notice the theory, already referred to, of Mr. Finlay. It is this: The whole of the vast Roman empire, he says, had been exactly mapped and planned by the imperial agrimensores, under Augustus. On these maps everything — a group of trees, a garden, a vineyard, or a field—was accurately laid down. Of course, therefore, Mr. Finlay argues, the name of Golgotha or that of the tomb of Joseph would be found, and all Constantine had to do was to order a search in the survey map and send to Jerusalem word where to look for the sepulchre.

This is ingenious, but it hardly satisfies opponents of tradition, who say that it would be absurd to expect in any map the name of one tomb among many, or even the name of a certain obscure place outside the city; that it is not clear that Palestine was regularly re-examined; and that it is perfectly clear from the historian that Constantine pursued no such line at all, being under the impression that the tomb, if not the site, was unknown. On the other hand, the upholders of the site do not want the aid of an argument which requires the concession of so many improbable things.

V. We have, lastly, to notice the topographical argument.

The sepulchre was without the wall; i.e. the second wall, which, starting from Gate Gennath (Gate of Gardens), near the town of Hippius, ran to the fortress of Antonia, in some sort of curve — κυκλούμενον. The course of this second wall has yet to be traced. If it is proved to run outside the sepulchre, then the site must be at once abandoned. In 1862 a portion of a massive wall was found, about 12 feet deep, just south of the church. (Lewin, Siege of Jerusalem, p. 215.) Its stones were about 7 feet long by 5 feet wide, and shewed the well-known marginal draft. In 1874 M. Clermont Gannesu (Quarterly Statement, Palestine Exploration Fund, 1874, p. 145) found and partly traced a scarp which he ingeniously connects with the second wall. At present, however, we may admit that the course of the second wall has never yet been made out to the satisfaction of all. Until it has been followed from end to end, or at least until its foundations and general course have been established beyond a doubt, we cannot say with certainty whether or no the present site is within or "without the gate."

We may add that the latest writer on the subject, Lieut. Conder, R.E. (Tent Work in Palestine), argues from the rock levels, that the wall must have passed outside the church. He has discovered a place north of the city called the Place of Stoning, which, from the conformation of the ground as well as the name, he suggests as the real site of Golgotha.

There is one fact which makes in favour of the present site. It is that the church stands over at least one tomb of undoubted antiquity, and perhaps stands over many. It has long been suspected that the so-called tomb of Joseph of Arimathaea which is shewn within the church was a genuine rock-cut Jewish tomb. Professor Willis states the fact as already proved. Dr. Robinson, however, denied its antiquity. Colonel Wilson (Q. S. notes, p. 53) speaks of the place as an undoubted tomb with rock-cut loculi. M. Clermont Ganneau has proved beyond a doubt (Quarterly Statement, Pal. Explor. Fund, 1877, p. 81) that it was a tomb of the well-known type with three loculi on each side, in which he has been corroborated by Colonel Wilson (Quarterly Statement, 1877, p. 128), and has tried to shew that it is connected with another sepulchre cut in the rock beside it at a lower level. One may fairly argue, therefore, that by whatever means this site was chosen for that of our Lord's sepulchre, whether by transference, or by tradition, or by imposture, it was chosen with the knowledge that here had been a place of tombs. Now the only known tombs within the second wall were those of the kings and the prophetess Huldah.

It will be seen that, while no amount of argument will ever reconcile those who hold opposite views as to the continuity of tradition from the earliest times, the continuity of history from the time of Eusebius appears fairly demonstrable. On the other hand, if it cannot be disproved by architects that the Dome of the Rock is of the age of Constantine, what way out of the difficulty remains but one, that pointed out by Mr. Fergusson, itself bristling with other difficulties? A careful and exhaustive examination of this building on the spot by a thoroughly competent architectural scholar is greatly to be desired. That, indeed, seems the chief thing necessary. The next step, if it should not be the first, is the recovery beyond any doubt of the second wall. These two desiderata accomplished, and the rock-levels of the city—already far advanced—completed, the question of the site of the Holy Sepulchre will be narrowed to one or two issues. [W. B.]

SEQUENCE. [PROSA.]

SEQUESTRATION. [ALIENATION.]

SERAPHIA, Sept. 3, virgin, martyr under Hadrian; commemorated at Rome (Mart. Usuard.; Vet. Rom., Adon., Notker.). [C. H.]

SERAPION (1), Jan. 31, martyr, belonging to Corinth, with Victorinus and others, in the reign of Decius (Basil. Menol., where he is named Sarapion); Jan. 30 (Menol. Graec. Sirlet.); Feb. 25 in Egypt (Vet. Rom. Mart.); Apr. 5 (Cal. Byzant.).

(2) Mar. 19, martyr with Bassus (Syr. Mart.).

(3) Mar. 21, anchorite, martyr; commemorated at Alexandria (Mart. Usuard.; Vet. Rom., Adon.; Hieron., Notker.).

(4) Mar. 26, reader, martyr; commemorated at Pentapolis in Libya, with Theodorus a bishop, Irenaeus a deacon, Ammonius a reader (Mart. Usuard., Adon.; Hieron., Vet. Rom., Notker.).

(5) May 14, bishop of Antioch; commemorated with Aphrodisius (Syr. Mart.).

(6) May 21, martyr with twelve others at Alexandria (Syr. Mart.).

(7) May 24, Egyptian bishop and martyr under the emperor Antoninus (Basil. Menol. SARAPION; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.).

(8) July 13, martyr under Severus (Syr. Mart.).

(9) Aug. 18, martyr at Rome with Hermas and Polyaenus (Basil. Menol.).

(10) Aug. 27, martyr with Marcellinus, Mannea, and others; commemorated at Tomi (Mart. Usuard.; Hieron., Adon.).

(11) Sept. 14, presbyter, martyr (Syr. Mart.).

(12) Nov. 14, martyr at Alexandria under Decius (Mart. Usuard.; Vet. Rom., Adon.). [C. H.]

SERENA, Aug. 16, martyr, once the wife of Diocletian (Mart. Usuard., Adon.; Vet. Rom., Notker.). [C. H.]

SERENUS, June 28, martyr; commemorated at Alexandria with Plutarchus and others (Mart. Usuard., Adon.; Vet. Rom., Hieron., Notker.). [C. H.]

SERGIUS (1), Jan. 2, martyr (Cal. Byzant.).

(2) Feb. 2, disciple of St. Paul (Cal. Armen.).

(3) Feb. 24, martyr; commemorated at Caesarea in Cappadocia (Mart. Usuard.; Vet. Rom., Adon.; Hieron., Notker.).

(4) Oct. 7, martyr with Julia and Bacchus in Euphratesia, under Maximian (Mart. Usuard., Adon.; Vet. Rom., Notker.; Cal. Byzant.; Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.). [C. H.]

SERMON (Sermo, &c.). The sermon, considered as part of the liturgy, always followed immediately after the Gospel, and thus preceded the dismissal of the catechumens in the Eastern church (Constitt. Apost. lib. ii. 57, viii. 4; Ordo Rom. vi. 7). This appears to have been its liturgical position from the very earliest times. Justin Martyr, describing Christian worship in the 2nd century, says, "When the reader (of the lections) has finished, the priest (προεστὼς) admonishes and exhorts by word of mouth (διὰ λόγου) to the imitation of these noble deeds" (Apol. i. 65–67). Later on the first council of Orange is quoted as alluding to the place of the sermon as "intra missarum sollemnia habitum." Caesarius of Arles used sometimes to order the doors to be shut after the Gospel, to prevent people going out before the sermon (Cyprian Telonens. Vit. S. Caesar. lib. i. § 19). St. Gall (7th century) is recorded to have preached the consecration sermon after the Gospel had been read, on the occasion of the elevation of Joannes Diaconus to the episcopate (Wal. Strabo, Vit. S. Galli, i. 25; see Audoenus, Vit. S. Eligii, ii. 22). In St. Chrysostom's time the sermon was prefaced, in common with other distinct portions of the liturgy, with the versicle and response, "The Lord be with you," R. "And with thy spirit," and was closed with a doxology to the Holy Trinity (Ep. ad Col. Hom. iii. p. 348). Further information on this and similar points is given under PREACHING, p. 1684, and HOMILY, p. 781. [F. E. W.]

SERPENT. (See DRAGON and DEVIL.) There is this distinction between representations of the serpent and the dragon in Christian symbolism: that the former represents the evil power in its tempting office, as inviting to sin (Bottari, ii. 60, &c.), and the latter generally points to evil or the evil one in his destructive function, as the permitted agent of punishment. A gem given by Gori (Thes. Diptych. vol. iii. p. 160) represents the serpent twined about the cross and apparently tempting two doves [CROSS, p. 495]. Whether the serpent on the cross may not in this instance have reference to the brazen serpent (Numb. xxi. 9; John iii. 14) seems doubtful.

The early church simply followed Holy Scripture in its use of the serpentine symbol. Primarily it meant the power of evil; secondarily, it referred to the brazen serpent, as a type of the sacrifice of our Lord for man. In the first or direct form of symbolism, its use will date from the time of Constantine. He caused himself to be represented (see Eusebius, in Vit. Constantin. iii. 3) as piercing the dragon or serpent with the Labarum; and the same idea is repeated on one of his medals (woodcut No. 1), and afterwards on Constantius's (Aringhi, ii. p. 705; see Baronius, ad ann. 325; Gretzer, de Cruce, t. iii. l. i. c. 5). The ancient dragon form on the vexillum was continued by Constantine, with the monogram placed above it [DRACONARIUS, p. 579].

No. 1. Serpent and Labarum (from Martigny, p. 611).

Continual use is made of the serpentine or lacertine form in Irish and Anglo-Saxon ornament from the earliest date (see Westwood's Palaeographia Sacra, on the book of Kells and other ancient MSS.). This is of course in great part a result of the northern taste for plaited and interlaced ornament; and the forms to which snake heads are attached are generally mere ribands. Still Professor Westwood appears inclined to connect their continual recurrence with a symbolism of temptation, of the fall of man, and his spiritual enemies; perhaps, behind this, to fainter traditions of ancient Ophidian worship of the principle of evil or destruction.

The earliest representation of this kind in Christian Art is the great book-cover of the Vatican, representing the youthful Christ treading on the lion and adder (figured by Gori, Thes. Dipt. vol. iii. p. 32, tab. iv.; Westwood, Fictile Ivories, pp. 51, 55).

The appended woodcut of St. Michael trampling on the serpent or dragon, in his character alike of tempter of man and enemy of God, is certainly well within our period, and of some beauty and importance, as illustrating a transition (perhaps by the hands of some skilled northern workman) from classic Roman to high Gothic art. Some of the perpendicularity of the harsher Byzantine is there, but, on the whole, the older classic style has not yielded to it. The drapery is too complicated, and, with the oval cetera, may remind us of Saxon work; nevertheless the figure is worthy of the best Gothic of later times, which it strongly resembles.

No. 2. St. Michael and Serpent (from Gori's Thesaurus Diptychorum).

The various Ophite or Basilidean-Christian heretics made much use of the serpent on amulets, &c. (see GEMS, p. 721, Nos. 3, 4), and it appears from Augustine (de Haeres. cap. xvii. and xlvi.) that the Manicheans used it as a direct type of our Lord. See King (Antique Gems and Rings, vol. ii. p. 20, note), where the dove, with an olive leaf and perched on a wheat-sheaf, represents the church, and is supported by a lion and a serpent, evidently with reference to Matt. x. 16.

Our Lord's reference to the serpent of the wilderness as a type of Himself would give the early church the same natural reason for using it as a graphic symbol, as for the use of the Good Shepherd. Nevertheless, it seldom occurs, although it is the first "image" which occurs to Tertullian as permissible in his protest against all such things in De Idololatriâ, iii. St. Ambrose dwells on it thus (De Spiritu Sancto, lib. iii. c. 9): "Imago enim crucis aereus serpens est: qui proprius (De Salomon. cap. xii. et Serm. lv. De Cruce Christi) erat typus corporis Christi: ut quicunque in eum aspiceret, non periret."

No. 3. Serpent (from Martigny, p. 612).

Martigny also gives a woodcut, which we here repeat (No. 3), from a gilt glass, without reference, which, as he says, may represent Moses with his rod, and the brazen serpent, with a person who represents the Jewish people contemplating the latter. But from the large size of the serpent, and the calm attitude of the spectator, the subject may possibly be the rod-serpent as he appeared before Pharaoh, after swallowing all the others.

There still exists in the nave of St. Ambrogio at Milan a brazen serpent on a granite column, to which a number of stories are attached. It appears from Aringhi (Roma Subterranea, vol. ii. p. 453, bk. iv. 4) that it was given to Arnulf, bishop of Milan, at Constantinople in 1101; he having gone there as ambassador from Otho III. (see Ferrari, Monum. di S. Ambrogio, p. 20). It is not likely to be any remnant of a heathen temple of Aesculapius on the spot, and is probably an Alexandrian talisman of the 3rd or 4th century. (Murray's Handbook of Northern Italy, p. 158.) This reminds us of the singular wreathed or triple serpent-pillar still in the hippodrome of Constantinople,* said to be the same as that partly shattered but not destroyed by Mohammed II. in 1453, at the Turkish storm of the city. The story may be an invention of Thevenot's, and the pillar is a mere wreck (see De Quincey, Miscellanies, chiefly narrative, p. 345, ed. 1854). At Milan it was long believed to have been received by Arnulf as the identical brazen serpent of the wanderings, and accordingly held miraculous, till Carlo Borromeo seems to have remembered or rediscovered that that relic had been destroyed by Hezekiah. He forbade any honours being paid it accordingly. [R. St. J. T.]

* Its identity with the Delphic offering of Persian spoils after Plataea is now established (Rawlinson's Herodotus, vol. iv. p. 391).

SEVILLE, COUNCILS OF (HISPALENSIA CONCILIA). There were two councils held at Seville: one under Leander, the other under his brother St. Isidore.

(1) A.D. 590, which published three canons, the two first relating to the emancipation of slaves; while the third renews the 5th canon of the 3rd council of Toledo, as having been set at nought. But several more are given to it by Burchard and others (Mansi, x. 449 sq.).

(2) A.D. 619, which published thirteen canons: of which the twelfth relates to a Monophysite bishop, a Syrian by birth, who had come among them and at length abjured his heresy: which is refuted and condemned in the thirteenth. The rest are disciplinary (Mansi, x. 555 sq.). [E. S. Ff.]

SEXES, SEPARATION OF. In the early church the women were always separated from the men in public worship. What the origin of the usage was, it is by no means easy to say.

The practice may probably have come into the Christian church without any formal enactment from the usages of Jewish worship, in which the women were (and are to this day) separated from the men. Or, again, it may be simply a feature of Oriental life and manners, under which females were always kept in greater seclusion than they are with us under the civilisation of the West. In the Apostolical Constitutions it becomes the subject of a special direction that the women be seated apart (κεχωρισμένως) (Apost. Constit. ii. 57, ed. Bunsen; Analecta Antenicaena, vol. ii. p. 121); and (ibid. p. 122) if any man was found sitting out of his place, he was to be smitten by the deacon, and transferred to the place appropriate for him. At one time, moreover, it appears that the sexes entered the church by different doors. (Apost. Constit. lib. ii. c. 61). The ostiarii were to stand at the entrances of the men and the deaconesses at those of the women (see Mede's Discourse of Churches, p. 327, fol. ed.). St. Chrysostom seems to speak of an actual partition between the men and the women. "There ought to have been within you [the men] a wall which parted you from the women; but since ye would not, the fathers thought it necessary to wall you off even with these boards: for I hear from my elders that anciently there were not these walls" (St. Chrys. Hom. 73 in S. Matt.).

In some places it would seem that the part of the church allotted to the women was, in some sense, upstairs. They were placed probably in some kind of a gallery (ὑπερῷον) [GALLERIES, p. 706]. It is said by Magri (Hierolexicon, s. v. Narthex) that in non-monastic churches women were placed in the narthex, which was fenced off by grilles and rails.

The authorities for the strict maintenance of this usage of separating the sexes in the early centuries of the church are very numerous. St. Cyril of Jerusalem compares the church to Noah's Ark, "in which were Noah and his sons and his wife and their wives; and though the Ark was one, and the door was shut, yet had all things been arranged suitably. And though the church be shut, and all of you within it, yet let there be a distinction of men with men and women with women." (Catech. Prefat. Oxf. transl. p. 7.) There are several canons which expressly forbid women to enter the sanctuary of the church. We may cite as a specimen the 44th canon of the council of Laodicea—"that no woman enter into the apartment where the altar stands." The rubric of a pontifical of the church of Poictiers (executed in MS. not later than the 10th century) directs that the males be arranged in dexteram partem, and the females in sinistram (Martene, de Eccl. Ritibus, lib. i. cap. i. art. 12). [H. T. A.]

SHAVING. [BEARDS; HAIR; ORDERS, HOLY, p. 1491; TONSURE.]

SHEEP. [LAMB; SHEPHERD, THE GOOD.]

SHELLS. Both marine and fresh water shells, either whole or broken, are often found on the tombs of martyrs and other Christians (Boldetti, Osservazioni, p. 512, fig. 65). They are sometimes found fixed to the outside of the loculi; sometimes merely drawn or engraved upon them (ib. pp. 351, 435); often in the form of a buccinum or whelk. Various forms of this symbol may be observed on a curious sarcophagus in the Vatican, representing different kinds of fishing (Bottari, Sculture e Pitture, tav. xlii.). Gems are found engraved with this device, and sepulchral lamps, either in the form of shells, or having shells carved upon them (Bartoli, Antiq. Lucern. part iii. fig. 23). Ancient Gallic tombs exhibit precisely analogous features. Snail-shells were found in the sarcophagus of St. Eutropius discovered in 1843, and M. Letronne (Recueil de Pièces, &c. p. 81) shews that the use of them in Gaul cannot have been a matter of chance. Instances of the same symbolism have been met with in a Merovingian tomb in the cemetery of Vicq, and the abbé Cochet, in the course of his excavations, met with a good many, especially in a tomb of the time of Charlemagne, near Dieppe (Normandie souterraine, passim).

The most probable explanation of this custom is that the shell was used as a type of the Resurrection. The shell represents the tomb, which the occupant must leave empty on the last day. One sarcophagus, at Marseilles, shews the shell with the snail still in it (Millin, Midi de la France, pl. lviii. 4).

The significance attached to this symbol in the Middle Ages is shewn by a miniature of the 13th century, given by Count Aug. de Bastard (Bullet. des Comit. Hist. Archéol. &c. 1850, p. 173), representing a snail coming out of its shell by the side of a drawing of the resurrection of Lazarus; and the same combination may be seen in a MS. of the 15th century in a collection of ancient liturgical MSS. made by order of Louis XIV. The aptness of the symbolism is increased by the fact that the snail is said at the approach of winter to block up the mouth of his shell with a calcareous substance, which he bursts through on the return of spring (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chret. s. v. 'Coquillages'). [E. C. H.]

SHEPHERD, THE GOOD. The image conveyed by this, perhaps the earliest and most important of all Christian symbols, occurs frequently in the Old Testament, and is common to all countries in which the pastoral life has ever prevailed. The Homeric epithet, "Shepherd of People," conveys much the same idea as Ps. xxii. lxxx. though with far less force and tenderness. (See Ezek. xxxiv.; Jer. xxxiii. 12, &c.) Our Lord's own use of the similitude concerning Himself, and His personal relation to all mankind (Luke xv.; John x.), gave it precedence of all others, excepting perhaps that of the vine, which stands on exactly the same ground. That of Jonah, which relates rather to the Lord's resurrection than to His relation to His human family, occurs more frequently in bas-relief, and almost as often in painting. But as is observed under FRESCO, the Good Shepherd is most frequently the central painting of a roof or wall; and perhaps the earliest type of the complete decoration of a Christian vaulting is the vine, with more or less conventionalised branches and clusters surrounding the Form, bearing on His shoulders the sheep which was lost. (See VINE; Bottari, ii. tav. 93.) Before going farther, we may notice that there are three types of the Good Shepherd: one connected with the analogical image of Orpheus, and frequently used in half-vaults and semicircular spaces; another certainly adopted from the Hermes Criophorus of Calamis, at Tanagra, and representing the Shepherd with His charge found and rescued. This is universal; occurring in fresco and on sarcophagi, on the gilt-glass cups; on lamps, in ivory, and more rarely in mosaic. The third, with staff and dog, is less frequent.

Hermes Criophorus. From Seeman's Götter und Heroen.

For reasons which can hardly be assigned with certainty, the Good Shepherd died away in the 5th, perhaps the 4th century. Constantine, it is true, placed "symbols of the Good Shepherd" in public places in Constantinople; but as Lord Lindsay says (vol. i. ch. on Roman Art), the Eastern church gave the subject up. And though it was unquestionably an image of Hellenic origin, technically speaking, it was never adopted by the Eastern or Byzantine side of the Christian church.

The paintings in the tomb of St. Domitilla are almost certainly the earliest Christian frescoes,[a] and the Good Shepherd was as certainly chief among them. There is one in the catacomb of St. Praetextatus [FRESCO], and the Callixtine contains, or did contain, many very ancient ones. The derivation of the form bearing the sheep will be found in Raoul Rochette, Discours sur l'Origine des Types imitatifs qui constituent l'Art du Christianisme; also in Seemann's Götter u. Heroen, p. 80, where the statue by Calamis is figured in a woodcut, which we here repeat. See also Pausanias, lib. ix. cap. 22, p. 752, ed. Kuhnii. This may be compared with the two 4th century statues of the Vatican and Lateran Museums, for one of which see Martigny, p. 515. Both are among Mr. Parker's Photographs, Nos. 2901, 2903. For the repetition of this type in fresco, see also No. 2928, and Aringhi, i. p. 531, 2. For the stuccoes of the Latin Way, Aringhi, ii. 28. For the three-fold Shepherd and vine, 3rd century, on a sarcophagus of the Lateran, see Parker, No. 2917, also 2938.

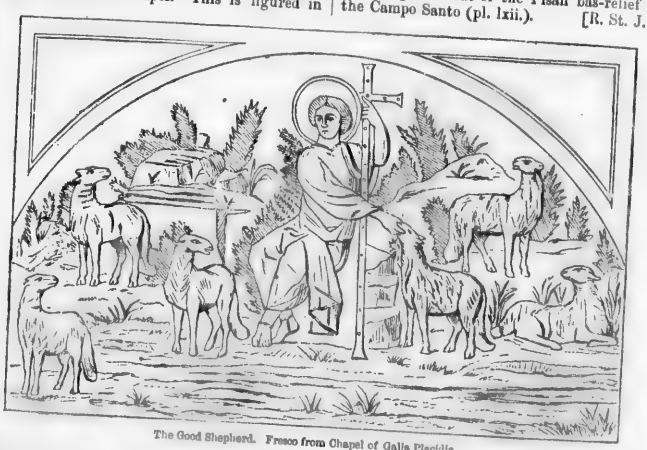
The chief example in mosaic is the Shepherd of Galla Placidia's Chapel. This is figured in



The Good Shepherd. Fresco from Chapel of Galla Placidia.

Eastlake's translation of Kugler, vol. i.; also by Crowe and Cavalcaselle, vol. i. ch. i., where it is well described. See woodcut. As a composition, this mosaic should be compared with the Orpheus of Aringhi. [FRESCO, p. 696.]

For other examples of the Orpheus-Shepherd in fresco, see Aringhi, vol. i. That on p. 563 is probably a painting of great antiquity, as it is defaced by a tomb being cut right through it, probably during the fervour for burial with the martyrs, which prevailed about the time of Damasus. There is a shepherd with syrinx (Aringhi, i. 577), with a dog at his feet, and bearing the sheep, on a slab, at p. 594. See also Parker, No. 2052, in Lateran Museum, taken from St. Callixtus. These two last give traces of a third or Roman ideal of the Shepherd leaning on his staff, but there can be but little doubt of their meaning (see also Buonarroti, Vetri, iv. 1).

This subject occurs in the S. of France (Millin, Midi de la Gaule, pl. 65); in Africa (Annales archéologiques, am. vi. p. 196); also in a Cyrenaean hypogee (Pacho, Voyage de la Cyrenaïque, pl. li. p. 376).

D'Agincourt refers three examples of vaultings painted with the shepherd in their centres to the 2nd century, given at Peinture, v. pl. vi. text ii. p. 20. One is the Orpheus under FRESCO, p. 696; in the others the Shepherd bears the sheep. These designs are too good for any late date. See GEMS, p. 713; GLASS, p. 732; LAMPS, p. 920.

Rohault de Fleury, as usual, gives several interesting examples, some of them not figured elsewhere; as the Criophorus-Shepherd with the syrinx (pl. lxi. vol. ii. p. 47), and that with the two sheep looking up to Him; both from St. Agnes. The picture from the same place, of an orante between trees, and a man milking an ewe on one side, another bearing a sheep on the other, with mulctra or milkpails, as also the pastoral scene (fig. 5, ib.), seem to be of a mingled character. He also gives a cut of the Pisan bas-relief from the Campo Santo (pl. lxii.). [R. St. J. T.]

SHEPHERDS, ADORATION OF THE. [NATIVITY.]

SHIP. The comparison between human life and its troubles and a voyage with its dangers was familiar enough to the classical mind (Hor. Carm. I. xiv. xxxiv.), and easily adopted by the Christian, especially from its near associations with the fisher-life of St. Peter and other apostles. The ship in full sail (Boldetti, p. 360), or with sails furled (ib. 366) are alike used in the cemeteries, as prosecuting the voyage of Christian life, or the having happily concluded it. (See Boldetti, pp. 360, 372–3; Perret, vol. v. pl. xxxii. xxxvi. 397 of BIVIVS RESTVTVS.) The LIGHTHOUSE or pharos is sometimes added, as a sign of the accomplishment of the voyage of the soul (see Mamachi, Origin. iii. tav. xvii.; Perret, v. pl. xli. 10; and Boldetti, 372–3). And in some instances the name of the dead appears to be inscribed on the ship, as in the case of the Eusebia, whose titulus is found in Passionei's Inscrizione antiche, p. 125 (fol. Lucca, 1763). The latter example is a marble in the Kircherian Museum, where two large urns or vases are represented in the ship; which may seem rather to point to a quasi Egyptian symbolism of the voyage after death than to the Christian voyage of life. Sometimes (Perret, v. pl. liii. 6) the monogram takes the place of the pharos on the sepulchral slab.[a]

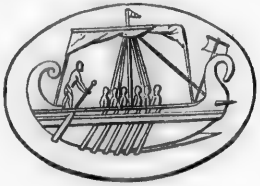
For the ship as representing the church of Christ, see CHURCH, p. 389. For the Cardinal Borgia's jasper with our Lord as pilot and six rowers on a side (of course implying six others on the other side) see woodcut.



Ship of the Lord and Apostles (from Borgia, De Cruce Velitorna).

The dove, with olive-branch, in token of peace, sometimes sits on the prow of the ship, often with the words in Pace. (See the inscription GENIALIS ‖ IN PACE, with ship and dove, Perret, v. pl. xxxii.) Sometimes (as Boldetti, p. 373) there is apparent play of words on the name of the buried person, as a ship is added to the epitaph of NAVIRA. For a large lamp in the form of a ship (see Mamachi, Orig. iii. pl. xx.) [R. St. J. T.]

SHOES. (1) The Lord's ὑπόδημα, the strap of which St. John Baptist declares himself unworthy to unloose (John i. 27), was probably a sandal; i.e. a leather sole fastened to the foot by straps; and He Himself bade His disciples "be shod with sandals" (Mark vi. 9), an injunction with which they no doubt complied (Acts xii. 8). It seems from the context that the intent of the Lord's command was, that the disciples should confine themselves to the simplest—even coarsest—necessaries in their journeys. And according to Martigny (Dictionnaire, p. 786, 2nd ed.) all sculptures on sarcophagi, all mosaics and some gilt glasses do exhibit the Lord and His apostles shod with sandals; but most of the frescoes in the catacombs (e.g. Bottari, Sculture e Pitture, liv. lvii. lxxii. cxx.) and gilt glasses (Buonarroti, Vetri, viii. xv. 1, xx. 2, etc.) represent them with bare feet. A few frescoes give them complete shoes (Bottari, xix. xlvi. lxxii.). Female figures in art are generally shod with complete shoes. See, for instance, in frescoes, the Virgin in the Adoration of the Magi (Bottari, xxxviii.), the sisters of Lazarus (xlix.), the woman of Samaria (xxiii.), and some of the Oranti (xxxvi. lx.). Many of the Oranti, whose attire is also in other respects different from that of every-day life [PARADISE], have bare feet (cxv. cxiii. etc.); shoes were probably not thought necessary for those who tread the paths of bliss.

Clement of Alexandria (Paedag. II. xi. § 117) has a curious passage on the shoes of Christians. He deplores the prevalent fashion of wearing sandals embroidered with golden flowers or studded with ornamental nails and even with erotic devices. All such decorations as these he would have the Christian reject, considering that the proper use of shoes is simply to protect the feet. Women may be permitted to use white shoes, except when they are on a journey, when they should use a blacked shoe (τῷ ἀλειπτῷ). On a journey they may also use nailed soles. They should at all events use shoes of some kind, out of consideration for modesty. For men however, unless it be on the march, it is better to be unshod; or, if they cannot bear naked feet, to wear light slippers, such as gymnasts use (βλαύταις ἢ φαικασίοις).

By the beginning of the sixth century it was found necessary in Gaul to prohibit the clergy from wearing shoes unbecoming their condition. Thus the council of Agde (C. Agathense, c. 20) A.D. 506, forbids clerks to wear, or to have clothes or shoes not suitable to their office; and a council at Mâcon (C. Matisc. i. c. 5) A.D. 591, also forbids the clergy to wear clothes or shoes after the fashion of the world (calceamenta saecularia). Probably these canons were intended to prevent clerks from wearing shoes of an extravagant fashion, such as the peaked shoes of the middle ages. [C.]

(2) Monastic Shoes.—In the earliest days of monasticism monks went barefoot, in strict accordance with the austerity of their profession; like the Stoic philosophers and Hebrew prophets in whose steps they trod (Cassian, Collat. xxiv. 10; Gregor. Nazian. Oratio viii. de Pace, i. Carm. 47). Instances occur continually of this kind of ascetic self-mortification in the lives of monks and hermits[a] (Discalceatio; nudis pedibus incedere; nudipe incedere; nudipedalia exercere, etc.). It is related of Silvanus, bishop of Philippopolis, very early in the fifth century, that during his residence at Constantinople he walked about the crowded thoroughfares of the capital of the Roman empire in sandals of twisted hay (Socrates, H. E. vii. 37).

Some heretics strove to enforce on all Christians the obligation of going barefoot; these were condemned; but the practice was commended for those who were exceptionally devout, particularly monks and penitents (Augustin. de Haeres. 68; Hieron. Ep. xxii. 28; Theodoret, Hist. Relig. 4; Gregor. Turon. de Vit. Patr. 15). Thus Augustine praises his friend Alypius for travelling barefoot through Italy in winter (August. Confess. ix. 6). Instances of this kind might be cited almost endlessly during the middle ages. "Barefooted" was an epithet commonly applied to the mediaeval friars, even when they had ceased to merit it literally.

The great monastic legislator of Monte Casino, with his accustomed sagacity and tolerance, left the question as to the proper covering of the feet to be settled for his monks by the abbat's discretion in each particular monastery, according to the requirements of climate and locality. As a rule Benedict prescribed "pedules et caligas" as sufficient in ordinary circumstances, wisely prohibiting all controversies about size, material, colour, shape; only recommending whatever in each instance might be cheapest and least eccentric in those parts. In the list of articles of necessity for a monk are mentioned these "pedules et caligae" (Bened. Reg. c. 55).

As to the exact meaning of these terms there is much uncertainty. Martene, in his commentary on the Rule of Benedict, enumerates almost endless varieties of interpretation, not easily to be reconciled with one another, and Ménard speaks of the words as obscure. Smaragdus, according to the former, takes "pedules" as shoes, "caligae" as socks; Hildemarus takes the words severally as slippers and sandals; Bernardus Casinensis as shoes, whether of wool or leather, and buskins or gaiters respectively made of leather and wool; Boberius Nicolaus de Fracturâ as shoes and boots; Haeften as woollen socks and slippers; other commentators as slippers and half-boots, or as socks and stockings (Bened. Reg. Comment. in c. 55). In such a conflict of opinions on a point so remote from the experience of modern times it is hopeless to attempt to decide.

Nor do other monastic rules solve the difficulty. Cassian allows "caligae" at midsummer only and midwinter as a protection against excessive heat or cold (Cass. Institut. I. cc. 8, 10). Isidore of Seville allows "pedules" in winter, or during a journey; at other times "caligae" only (Isid. Reg. c. 14). So Fructuosus of Braga (Fructuos. Reg. c. 4). The anonymous Rule of "Magister" orders the "caligae" to be tipped with iron and studded with nails, "ferratae ac clavatae" (Reg. Mag. c. 81). A similar expression occurs in the writings of Gregory the Great (Gregor. M. Dialog. I. c. 4. Alteserra in his Asceticon defines "caliga" as equivalent to sandal, "calceus" to shoe or boot (Altes. Ascet. V. c. 18). Probably the meaning of all these terms varied in different times and places.

As usual, the rule and practice of the female devotees correspond with those of the monks. Egyptian nuns, for instance, are spoken of by Isidore of Pelusium, as "sandalled recluses" (Isidor. Epp. I. 87).

SIGN OF THE CROSS. The use of the sign of the cross is of great antiquity, and was very frequent in the earlier centuries of the Christian Church. It was connected with such passages of Scripture as Ezek. ix. 4, Rev. vii. 3, ix. 4, xiv. 1, or more fancifully with such passages as Ps. cxliv. 1. It was by Moses' hands being held up in the form of a cross that Joshua was believed to have conquered Amalek (Ex. vii. 9–14), and the cross was identified with the sign of the Son of Man foretold to appear hereafter in the heavens (St. Matt. xxiv. 30). (Chrysost. and Jerome, in loco; Cyril, Cat. Lect. xiii. 41, xv. 22; Cyprian, ad Quirin, sects. 21, 22; Ephrem Syrus, de Panoplia.)

II. The original mode of making the sign of the cross was with the thumb of the right hand, generally on the forehead only, or on other objects, once or thrice (Chrysost. Hom. ad pop. Antioch. xl.; "Thrice he made the sign of the cross on the chalice with his finger" (Sophron. in Prat. Spirit.). So Sozomen of Donatus (lib. vii. cap. 27); and Epiphanius of Josephus (Haer. xxx.). Justin M. Var. Quaest. 118. "The sign of the cross is on our brow and on our heart. It is on our brow that we may always confess Christ, on our heart that we may always love him, on our arm that we may always work for him" (Ambrose, Lib. de Isaac et Anima, viii.). "Be not ashamed of the cross of Christ. For this reason hast thou received it on thy forehead, as it were on the seat of sname" (Aug. in frag. Serm. 27; see Serm. 2 in Parascevе; Com. in Pss. 30, 141; Cypr. de Unit. Eccles. cap. 16). The act of crossing was generally performed in the name of the Trinity, expressed or implied. "The faith is sealed in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost" (Tertull. de Bap. cap. 6), or in the name of Christ. "Being a Christian she crossed herself in the name of Christ" (Epiphan. Haer. 30, cap. 7), or with some formula of renunciation of evil. "I renounce thee, O Satan, and thy pomp and thy service, and I enrol myself as thine, O Christ. As thou sayest this, make the sign of the cross upon thy forehead" (Chrysost. Or. 21, ad Pop. Antioch). It is impossible to fix the exact date at which this primitive method of making the sign of the cross became obsolete. In the 6th century a second and more elaborate method had already supplanted it. The hand was raised to the forehead, then drawn down to the heart, then to the left shoulder and then to the right, but in the Eastern Church first to the right and then to the left shoulder. Sometimes the thumb was laid cross-wise over the index finger and kissed (Gretser, de Cruce, bk. iv. c. 2). A third method, usual in benedictions and consecrations, was to make the sign of the cross in the air over persons or objects. A fourth method was to raise the hand to the forehead in the name of God, as the head of all, then to lower it to the mouth in the name of the Son, who is the Word of the Father, then to the heart in the name of the Spirit, who is the bond of love. In all these cases some or all of the fingers might be employed with varying symbolical significations. Five fingers would represent the five wounds of Christ; three fingers the Blessed Trinity; one finger the unity of the Godhead. Thus pope Leo IV. ordered, "Sign the chalice and the oblation with the right cross; that is to say, not in a circle and with various fingers, as many do, but with two fingers extended, and the thumb bent up underneath, by which the Trinity is signified. Study to make that sign of the cross rightly, for otherwise ye are unable to bless anything" (Supplem. Mansi Concil. tom. i. p. 911). The phrases, "Portare crucem in fronte," ἐκτυποῦν ἐν τῷ μετώπῳ, have led some persons erroneously to suppose that the cross was indelibly impressed on that part of the body; and a custom does seem actually to have existed at one time in the East of branding Christian children on the forehead in order that they might be recognised again if carried into captivity by Mahomedans (Renaudot, Perpet. de la Foi, tom. v. 1, 2, c. 4, p. 106).

III. The following passages will prove how widespread the use of the sign of the cross became from A.D. 150 onwards. They form merely a handful, selected from out of the multitude of allusions to it which occur in the pages of the chief Christian writers of the first five centuries.

"In all our travels and movements, in all our coming in and going out, in putting on our shoes, at the bath, at the table, in lighting our candles, in lying down, in sitting down, whatever employment occupieth us, we mark our foreheads with the sign of the cross" (Tertullian, de Cor. Mil. c. iii.). "We see the sign of the cross naturally in a ship borne along with bellying sails; we see it when the ship glides forward with outstretched oars, and when the yard is hoisted; we see it when a pure-hearted man worships God with extended hands" (Minucius Felix, edit. 1672, p. 287, compare Justin. M. Apol. 2; Ambrose. Serm. 56; Jerome, Ep. 29, &c.). "And when ye do this, we shall lay our hands upon your heads, and make the sign of the cross upon your foreheads" (Julius Africanus, Hist. lib. vi.). "We ought, therefore, on rising to give thanks to Christ, and to perform all our daily work with the sign of the cross (Ambrose. Serm. 43). "Whatever thou doest, wherever thou goest, let thy hand make the sign of the cross" (Jerome, ad Eustoch. Ep. 22). "Let the word of God and the sign of Christ be in thy heart, in thy mouth, on thy forehead, when thou sittest at meals, when thou goest to the baths, when thou retirest to thy bed, in going out and in coming in, in time of joy and in time of sorrow" (Gaudentius Brixianus, tract. i. de Lect. Evang.; see Migne, Patr. Cursus, tom. xx. p. 890). Compare Prudentius, Cath. Hymn. vi. 129, seq.; adv. Symm. ii. 712. "For this reason the Lord himself has fixed his cross on the foreheads of those who believe on him, which is as it were the seat of shame, where proud and impious madmen mocked him in order that the faithful may not blush at his name, and may rather seek the glory of God than of men" (Augustinus, Hom. liii. in Evang. S. Joan. sect. 13; Hom. viii. sect. 2; Hom. xi. sect. 3, et passim). "A third commentator, one of those who believe in Christ, said that the rudimentary elements presented in the letter Tau a resemblance to the figure of the cross, and that therein was contained a prophecy of the sign which is made by Christians upon their foreheads; for all the faithful make the sign in commencing any undertaking, and especially at the commencement of prayer or of reading Holy Scripture" (Origen, Select. in Ezech. cap. 9). "Let us not then be ashamed to confess the Crucified. Be the cross our seal made with boldness by our fingers on our brow, and on everything; over the bread we eat, and the cups we drink; in our comings in and goings out; before our sleep, when we lie down, and when we awake, when we are in the way, and when we are still (St. Cyril of Jer. Catech. Lect. xiii. 36).

"That sign of the cross which formerly all persons shuddered at, is now so emulously sought by every one, that it is to be found everywhere, among rulers and subjects, among men and women, among married and unmarried, among bond and free. All are continually making it upon the noblest portion of the human frame, and daily bear it about engraved on their foreheads as on a pillar. Behold it at the holy table; at the ordination of priests; refulgent along with the body of Christ at the mystic meal. Everywhere one may see it celebrated, in houses, in market-places, in deserts, in high-roads, on mountains, in groves, on hills, on the sea, in ships, in islands, in couches, in dresses, in arms, in porches, in convivial assemblies, on gold and silver vessels, in pearls, in mural paintings, on the bodies of the suffering brute creation, on the bodies of persons possessed by devils, in war, in peace, by day, by night, in revellers' dances, in companies of ascetics. Thus do all vie with each other in seeking this marvellous gift, this unspeakable grace." (Chrysost. contra Judaeos et Gentiles quod Christus sit Deus, edit. 1718, p. 571; Hom. lv. in S. Matth.; Hom. xxi. ad Pop. Antioch; Hom. x. in Acta iv. 1–22, where he complains of its having dropped into a merely habitual mechanical action; Hom. in 2 Tim. ii. 26, and in 1 Cor. iv. 6, &c.)

IV. The above quotations prove that the sign of the cross accompanied almost every action, sacred or profane, in a Christian life, from rising in the morning until retiring to rest at night. It may, however, be convenient to specify some objects for which it was deemed especially useful, and some particular virtues which were believed to be contained in it, or results which were secured by its use.

(a) It was employed by members of the early Church to denote that they were Christians; and to distinguish themselves from the surrounding heathen. "We recognise the members of Christ, if they are the members of Christ, by their bearing the sign of Christ" (Augustine, Serm. 53, de Verbo Dei). The Puritans understood this, and urged the altered circumstances of the times as a ground for abandoning the custom altogether (Hooker, Eccles. Pol. lxv. 6).

(b) To put the devil to flight. It was believed to be very efficacious towards repelling the assaults and neutralising the power of evil spirits. "Then some of the assistant ministers, who knew the Lord, standing by the sacrificing priest, made the immortal sign of the cross upon their foreheads; and when it was made, the demons were put to flight, and the sacred rites thrown into confusion" (Lactantius, Lib. de Mort. Persec. edit. 1692, p. 87). "Along with these words make the sign of the cross upon thy forehead; for thus not only no human adversary, but also not even the devil himself, will be able in any way to hurt thee, seeing thee appearing everywhere protected by these arms" (Chrysost. ad Illum. Catech. ii. ad finem; Hom. lv. in S. Matth.; Adv. Judaeos, viii. 8; Cyril of Jerusalem, Cat. Lect. iv. 13, xiii. 3, 36; Augustin. Lib. de Symb. cap. i. et passim). "Let him who wishes to obtain a proof of what has been said before come, and at the appearance of demons, or in the case of the deceitfulness of oracles and of the marvels of magic, let him use the sign of the cross which is ridiculed among them, merely naming the name of Christ, and he will see how the demons are put to flight by it, and how the oracles cease, and all magic and witchcraft are brought to nought" (Athan. de Incarn. Verbi Dei, cap. 48).

(c) For reminding and encouraging themselves and others under difficulties and trials to their faith. "The flesh is signed with the cross, that the mind may be fortified" (Tertull. de Res. Carnis, c. 8.) St. Cyprian encouraged martyrs thus: "Let thy brow be fortified, that the mark of God may be preserved intact" (Epp. 56 et 58, c. 6), and congratulated those who had not lapsed in these words; "The brow purified with the sign of God could not endure the crown of Satan, but reserved itself for the crown of the Lord" (De Laps. ch. 2, tom. i. 121).

(d) As a remedy against temptation to special sins; as anger (Chrysost. in S. Matt. xxvii. 44; in Act. vii. 36–53), or lust (Ambrose, Exhort. ad Virg.).

(e) As a charm against disease or mishap, St. Chrysostom enumerates this among its chief virtues. "This sign, both in the days of our forefathers and now, hath opened doors that were shut up, hath neutralised poisonous drugs, hath taken away the power of hemlock, hath healed bites of venomous beasts." (Hom. liv. in S. Matt. xvi. 23; Hom. viii. in Col. iii., Aug. in Ps. xciii.; Sophron. in Prat. Spirit. c. 56.) Many of the fabulous stories contained in the pages of later historians and martyrologists are connected with this supposed efficacy of the sign of the cross. (Sulp. Severus, de Vita Martini, cap. iii. ix. xxiv. et al.).

(f) For purifying places, churches, vessels, cups, food, drink, and other objects which were considered unclean, or had been abused to idolatrous purposes. "Is not then swine's flesh unclean? By no means, when it is received with thanksgiving, when it is marked with the sign of the cross; no more is any other thing unclean." (Chrysost. Hom. xii. in 1 Tim. iv.; for fabulous stories of later writers vide Bede, tom. iii. in Vita S. Vedasti; Fortunatus, in Vita S. Germani, c. 34.)

V. It remains to give some account of the ceremonial use of the sign of the cross in the liturgy and sacramental offices of the primitive Church. As most of the ritual writers and most missals and manuals, at all events in their present form, are of a later date than the 9th century, this account must be necessarily of a somewhat fragmentary character. A minute and systematic account or a comparative table of its use in the Eastern and Western office-books could only be drawn from materials of mediaeval and modern times.

The Sacramentary of Leo contains no rubrical directions at all. The few rubrics enjoining the sign of the cross in the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries in the earliest ordines Romani, and in the fragments of certain Eastern and Western pontificals and rituals not later than the 9th century will be noted under different headings. Of early ritualists, Amalarius explains the meaning of crossing with oil and balsam in baptism (lib. i. c. 27), and its frequent ritual use in Holy Communion, at the gospel, at the consecration of the chalice by touching it crosswise with a particle of the consecrated host, and who suggests greater simplicity in its use: "It seems to me that if the sign of the cross was made once over the bread and wine it would be enough, because the Lord was crucified once" (lib. iii. 18, 24, 31).

There are many passages scattered up and down the pages of the Christian apologists and the early fathers which bear out what the above facts seem to imply, that the use of the sign of the cross became, at a very early date, a marked feature of Christian worship, both in their general devotions, and more especially in the administration of the sacraments. The joined or crossed hands in any prayer represented the cross—"Crucis signum est cum homo porrectis manibus Deum pura mente veneratur" (Minucius Felix, edit. 1672, p. 288), Ἐπὶ εὐχῶν σταυρὸς, κ.τ.λ. (Chrysost. Demonst. quod Christus sit Deus, cap. 8). In speaking of the sacraments, language was sometimes employed which would seem to assert their invalidity, or at least their irregularity, if the sign of the cross was not a constituent portion of their ceremonial. "Whoever may be the ministers of the sacraments, of what sort soever may be the hands which either immerse the candidates (audientes) for baptism, or anoint them; by whatever lips the sacred words are uttered, it is the authoritative use of the sign of the cross which works the effect in all the sacraments" (Cyprian, de Pass. Christi). St. Augustine said that "Unless the sign of the cross is made either on the foreheads of the faithful, or on the water itself wherewith they are regenerated, or on the oil with which they are anointed with chrism, or on the sacrifice with which they are nourished, none of these things is duly performed" (Hom. cxviii. in S. Joan. xix. 24). St. Chrysostom used these words: "As a crown so let us bear about the cross of Christ. For by it all things are wrought that are done among us. If one is to be regenerated, the cross is there, or to be nourished with that mystical food, or to be ordained, or to do anything else, everywhere that symbol of victory is present with us" (Hom. liv. [al. lv.] in S. Matt. vii.; Op. tom. vii. p. 551).

In these and other passages we find that the sign of the cross was part of the ceremonial attending certain religious services, and was especially employed on the following occasions:—

(a) At the reception of a Catechumen.—St. Augustine, in an address to catechumens, told them, "Ye are not yet regenerate by holy baptism, but ye have been conceived in the womb of holy mother Church by the sign of the cross." (Lib. de Symb. ad Catech.; Hom. l. in S. Joan. sect. 12; Hom. in 1 S. Joan. c. 2; de Peccator. Mer. c. 26, et passim). In the old Ambrosian rite the sign was ordered to be made once on the catechumen's forehead; in an old Gallican rite, twice on the forehead and breast; in an old Gothic missal four times, on the eyes, ears, nose, and heart; in a Gallican sacramentary (7th century), once on the face.

The above and the following details are culled from the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries, and the fragments of early Western missals or rituals preserved in Mabillon's Musæum Italicum, and Martene, de Antiq. Eccles. Rit. Their statements, or conjectures, as to the dates of documents have been accepted.

(b) At Baptism.—In the preliminary consecration of the water:—"Baptism, that is to say the water of salvation, is not the water of salvation, unless having been consecrated by the name of Christ, who shed His blood for us, it is marked with the sign of the cross" (Aug. Hom. xxvii.; Ib. 6, c. Julian. cap. 8; Cypr. Ep. lviii. sect. 10); in the exorcism and imposition of hands (Aug. Conf. i. cap. 11); at the unction (Constit. Apost. lib. iii. cap. 17; Tertul. de Resur. cap. 8; Ambros. de iis qui initiantur, c. 4, et passim).

(c) At Confirmation.—This rite, in early times, immediately following baptism, consisted of the imposition of hands and the making the sign of the cross on the candidate's forehead with chrism and in the name of the Trinity. "Baptized persons receive the gifts of grace by the sign of the same cross, and by imposition of hands." (Aug. Serm. 19, de Sanctis; Gelas. Sacram.; York Pontifical of Egbert; Cahors, Beauvais, Poictiers rituals of 9th century.)

(d) In extreme unction.—The short office for this rite in the Gregorian Sacramentary contains no rubric enjoining the sign of the cross. It does not appear in connexion with unction of the sick till early in the 9th century, when a Troyes pontifical directs the sick man's breast to be anointed thrice with cinders, while a Tours pontifical of about the same date presents this elaborate rubric (Martene, lib. i. Ordo, iii. cap. vii. art. iv). [UNCTION.]

(f) In Ordination, whether of bishops, priests, deacons, subdeacons, readers, or other minor church officers (vide supra); but the earliest extant Western ordinals explicitly ordering the sign of the cross seem hardly to fall within the limits of this dictionary. There are directions for its frequent and elaborate use in the old Syro-Jacobite and Coptic ordinals printed in Martene, vol. ii. [ORDINATION.]

(g) In the Consecration of Churches and Altars.—"With the mark of the same cross churches are dedicated, altars are consecrated" (Aug. Hom. lxxv. de Divers.); of fonts, of patens (Gelas. and Gregor. Sacram.); in blessing and lighting the Easter candle on Easter eve (ib.); and, therefore, probably in other minor acts of dedication or consecration which have escaped specific mention. (For further details, in addition to authorities previously quoted, consult Lipsius, de Cruce, and Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten, vol. iv. pt. 1.) [CONSECRATION.]

(4) May 24, martyr; commemorated in Histria with Servilius and others (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Hieron., Notker.).

(5) July 10 (Mart. Usuard., Notker.; Bed. SILANUS), one of the seven sons of Felicitas. [SEPTEM FRATRES.]

(6) July 30, apostle. [SILAS.]

(7) Aug. 23. [SABINUS (4).]

(8) Sept. 4, boy martyr with two other boys, Rufinus and Vitalicus; commemorated at Ancyra (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Hieron., Notker.); Aug. 31 (Hieron.).

(9) Sept. 9 (Syr. Mart.); Mart. Hieron. has a martyr under this day in Sabinum, with Hyacinthus and others.

(10) Sept. 22, confessor, in the territory of Bourges (Mart. Usuard.).

(11) Oct. 26; commemorated at Antioch with Marcianus (Syr. Mart.).

(12) Nov. 5, martyr under Diocletian with Dominus and others. (Basil. Menol.) [C. H.]

SILVESTER (SYLVESTER) (1), Jan. 2, pope (Cal. Byzant.; Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.); Dec. 31 (Mart. Bed.; Mart. Metr. Bed.; Mart. Usuard., Vet. Rom., Wand.); prayed for by name in the Leonian Sacramentary, October; his natale observed on Dec. 31 in the Gregorian Sacramentary, which gives his name in the collect; his natale also observed in the Lib. Antiph. of Gregory.

(2) Nov. 20, bishop, confessor; commemorated at Châlons-sur-Saône (Mart. Usuard., Adon.). [C. H.]

SILVINUS, Feb. 17, bishop; commemorated in the territory of Terouanne (Mart. Usuard.). [C. H.]

SILVIUS, Apr. 21, martyr; commemorated at Alexandria with Arator, Fortunus and others (Mart. Usuard., Notker.). [C. H.]

SIMEON (SYMEON) (1), Stylites, Jan. 5; commemorated at Antioch (Mart. Usuard., Flor., Adon., Vet. Rom., Notker., Wand.); Sept. 1 (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.).

(2) Senex, Jan. 5, aged prophet of Jerusalem who took the infant Jesus in his arms (Mart. Flor., Hieron., Notker.); Feb. 1 (Menol. Graec. Sirlet.); Feb. 2 (Cal. Ethiop.); Feb. 3 (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.); Oct. 8 (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Rom.).

(3) Feb. 18, bishop of Jerusalem, martyr (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Notker.); Apr. 27 (Cal. Byzant.; Menol. Graec.); Sept. 18 (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec.).

(4) Apr. 14, bishop of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, martyr in Persia under Sapor (Basil. Menol.); Apr. 17 (Cal. Byzant.; Menol. Graec.); Apr. 21 (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Wand., Notker.).

(6) July 18, patriarch of Alexandria (Cal. Ethiop.).

(7) July 21, monk with John at Jerusalem "our fathers," in the time of Justinian, natives of Emesa (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.).

(8) July 27, monk (also called Simon); commemorated in Sicily (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Hieron., Notker.). [C. H.]

SIMEON, SONG OF. [CANTICLE.]

SIMILIANUS, June 16, bishop, confessor; commemorated at Nantes (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Hieron.). [C. H.]

SIMON ZELOTES, APOSTLE, FESTIVAL OF.

i. Legend.—Although this apostle is designated by two apparently distinct surnames in the New Testament, Zelotes and Cananaeus,[a] these are, as is well known, identical in meaning. The latter merely represents the Hebrew, of which the former is the Greek equivalent, the reference doubtless being to the sect of the so-called Zealots. Beyond the fact of his apostleship, the New Testament tells us nothing of St. Simon; and, as in the case of so many other apostles, there is next to nothing of trustworthy tradition.

It is not our province to discuss either of the improbable theories which identify him either with Simon the Lord's brother, or Symeon who succeeded James as bishop of Jerusalem. The Greek Appendix of Sophronius to the Liber de Viris Illustribus, does indeed identify him with the latter (Jerome, vol. ii. 958), and speaks of the crucifixion which he underwent at the age of 120 years in the reign of Trajan. This, however, is too utterly unlikely to need further notice. A note in one of the Vienna MSS. of the Apostolic Constitutions states (viii. 27) that Simon was martyred in Judaea in the reign of Domitian.

The prevailing tenor, perhaps, of the traditions as to Simon's labours, associates him with the region east of Palestine. Thus, the prologue to the Mart. Hieronymi makes Simon suffer with Jude "in Susia, civitate magna apud Persidem" (Patrol. xxx. 437). In the Armenian chronicler Moses of Chorene (5th century) are given letters of Abgarus, king of Edessa, to Artasis, king of the Persians, and Nerses his son, which mention Simon, one of the chief apostles of Jesus, as labouring in Persia (ii. 29, 18; p. 140, ed. Whiston). Moses subsequently adds, "as regards Simon, the sphere of whose work was Persia, I can give no certain information, either as to what he did, or where he was martyred. Some declare that an apostle named Simon died near the Iberian Bosporus" (ii. 31, 6, p. 143). On this last point, however, Moses declines to give any opinion, and evidently views the whole thing as quite doubtful. It will be noticed here that there is in the above passage nothing to shew which of the two Simons among the apostles is referred to, and the Whistons (not. in loc.) remark that most commentators suppose the reference is to Simon Peter. In the Apostolic History of the Pseudo-Abdias (lib. 6, in Fabricius, Codex Pseudepig. Novi Test. i. 609), the scene of Simon's martyrdom is given as Suanir in Persia, and the name of the Persian king as Xerxes. The Christian poet Venantius Fortunatus (ob. A.D. 609), following the lead of Abdias, declares (Carm. viii. 6; Patrol. lxxxviii. 270)—

"Hinc Simonem et Judam lumen Persida gemellum Laeta relaxato mittit ad astra sinu."

[a] The Καναναίτης of some authorities is doubtless a change of spelling due to the belief that the word was derived from Canaan or Cana.

Another story says that he laboured in North Africa, Egypt, Cyrene, and Mauritania, but the evidence on which this rests is of no weight (Niceph. Call. Hist. Eccles. ii. 40; Pseudo-Dorotheus, in App. to Chronicon Paschale, ii. 138, ed. Dindorf). The latter states that after labouring in Africa, he carried the news of the gospel to the British Isles. Such also is the story told in the Menaea.

ii. Festival.—As in the case of nearly all the apostles, there seems no trace of any early commemorative festival of St. Simon. In the West, he has been generally associated with St. Jude, and commemorated on October 28; in the East they are commemorated on different days.

As regards the festival in the Western church, it is not necessary to repeat what we have already said in the article on St. Jude, and we shall accordingly merely refer the reader there. It may, however, be well again to remark that, though in some Western records St. Simon is commemorated on other days than October 28, yet in all these cases, so far as we are aware, he is associated with St. Jude.

In the Greek church, St. Simon is commemorated on May 10. The Menaeon identifies him with Nathanael (Σίμων ὁ καὶ Ναθαναὴλ ὀνομαζόμενος), although there can be little doubt that Nathanael is the personal name of Bartholomew. The entry for May 10 in the Greek metrical Ephemerides, prefixed by Papebroch to the Acta Sanctorum for May is (p. xxvii.) τῇ δεκάτῃ Σίμωνα σταύρωσαν Ἀπόστολον ἔχθροι.

In the calendars of the Ethiopic and Alexandrian churches published by Ludolf there is no mention of St. Simon, but, from the entry on July 10 "Nathanael the Canaanite" (Ad Hist. Aeth. Comm. p. 421), we may infer that these churches, like the preceding, identify Simon and Nathanael.

In the Armenian church St. Simon is perhaps commemorated on September 28, on which day we find in the first of the two Armenian calendars given by Assemani (Bibl. Or. iii. 1. 645 sqq.) "Simeon, Apostle;" though in the second the entry runs, "Simeon, the kinsman of Christ."

The name of Simon has not apparently been made much use of by the authors of apocryphal writings. We are not aware of the existence of any except the Acta Simonis et Judae given by the Pseudo-Abdias (supra). The Apostolic Constitutions, however (viii. 27, 28), assign to this apostle the regulations as to the consecration of bishops, benedictions, &c.

For an elaborate account of the legends in connexion with St. Simon and his cultus, reference may be made to Van Hecke in Acta Sanctorum (Oct. vol. xii. pp. 421 sqq.). [R. S.]

SIMONY. Bingham (Antiq. XVI. vi. 28) distinguishes between three degrees of simony; (i) buying and selling spiritual gifts; (ii) buying and selling spiritual preferments; (iii) usurpation of ecclesiastical functions without election or ordination. Against trafficking in spiritual gifts the laws of the early church were very severe. Thus the apostolical canons (c. 28) appointed that if bishop, priest, or deacon obtained his sacred character by means of money, both the ordained and the ordainer were to be subject to total excision from the church, παντάπασιν τῆς κοινωνίας ἐκκοπτέσθω, the severest sentence which it was in the power of the church to inflict. The second canon of Chalcedon likewise excommunicated those who obtained by a price the priceless grace of holy orders. Similarly the second council of Braga, A.D. 572, c. 3, recapitulating the decision of the Fathers against bribes pronounces "Anathema danti et accipienti." And in fact denunciations against simony are frequent throughout the whole of our period after the 4th century; see 2 Conc. Aurel. cc. 3, 4, 4 Conc. Tolet. c. 19, 8 Conc. Tolet. c. 3, 11 Conc. Tolet. cc. 8, 9, Conc. in Trull. c. 22, 2 Conc. Nicaen. c. 5, Conc. Mogunt. c. 30, Conc. Remens. c. 21, Basil. Ep. lxxvi. ad Episc., Gelas. Ep. i. ad Episc. Lucan., Symmach. Decret. c. 1, and very frequently in the writings of Gregory, Epp. v. 53, 55, 57; vi. 8; ix. 49, 106; xi. 46; xii. 28; xiii. 41; Hom. in Evangel. I. iv. 4. Against simoniacal transactions the civil law upheld the discipline of the church. Thus Justin. Novell. cxxiii. 1, cxxxvii. 2, required in the consecration of bishops that both the electors and the bishop elect should take an oath on the Gospels that nothing had been given either by way of donation or promise, or through friendship, to obtain the election and the consecration. Closely allied to the chief sin of corrupt ordinations was that of withholding the sacraments unless payment was made. The various canons directed against this abuse indicate that on pretence of asking an offering the clergy were in the habit of setting a price on the spiritual gifts which they administered. At baptisms, for instance, it seems to have been customary to make a voluntary oblation. This easily led to the notion that the oblation was compulsory, and was calculated to deter the poor from the sacrament. The council of Elvira accordingly (c. 48) prohibited the practice of casting money into a bowl at baptism, for the clergy were not to make gain on the sacred gift which they had received without cost. On the same ground Gelasius (Ep. i. ad Episc. Lucan.) forbade the Italian clergy from exacting a fee for baptism or confirmation. And in the Greek church Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 40 de Bapt.) remonstrates with those who kept away from baptism, alleging that they could not afford the usual offering or the entertainment for the officiating clergyman; he tells them that the only offering demanded is that of themselves to Christ, and that their own holy life was the only entertainment expected. In the Spanish church apparently in spite of the decree of Elvira, the covetousness of the clergy still debarred the poor from baptism. In the second council of Braga, A.D. 572, there is a canon (c. 7) denouncing the compulsory demand of a pledge from those who had not wherewithal to offer voluntarily. The same council (c. 5) prohibited the exaction of a fee for the consecration service of a church. The eleventh council of Toledo A.D. 675 (c. 8) pronounced it contrary to ecclesiastical law to take money not only for promotion to holy orders, but also for baptism, confirmation, or unction; the demand of a fee for the administration of the eucharist fell under the same condemnation from Conc. in Trull. c. 23. A voluntary offering, which was of the nature of a thank-offering, from one who partook of a spiritual ordinance, was lawful and praiseworthy, but a compulsory fee was tainted with simony, inasmuch as it was setting a price on the work of the Spirit.

Trafficking in the gifts of the Holy Ghost was simony of the darkest dye; another degree of the same offence was the employment of corrupt means to obtain promotion or preferment in the church. In the first three centuries, when the emoluments of office were small and the danger of holding them great, there was not much occasion to pass laws against simoniacal promotions, for when a persecution arose, the rulers of the church were struck at first. But when a bishopric became not only a position of dignity and importance, but also a secure one, there would arise unscrupulous candidates for the office. A bishop who accepted a bribe in order to advance any dependant, "a house-steward, advocate, or bailiff" (Conc. Chalced. c. 2), to an ecclesiastical position was guilty of simony, no less than the man promoted, and was subject to deposition. Compare the oath already quoted to be taken by the electors that the bishop elect was not chosen from favour or through the influence of money (Justin. Novell. cxxxvii. 2), but because he was known to hold to the Catholic faith, and to be a man of good life and sound learning. The intrusion into sees already occupied was schismatical rather than simoniacal. But the ambition of bishops to get themselves removed to larger sees, whenever it was done for the sake of gain or by corrupt means, was of the nature of simony. "That pernicious custom ought to be utterly rooted out that it be lawful for any bishop to move from one city to another; for the reason for which he does this is plain, since we never heard of any bishop who laboured to be removed from a larger city to a smaller. Whenever it appears that avarice is his motive, it is idle to plead that he has received letters of invitation, since many are corrupted by bribes and rewards to send the letter" (Conc. Sardic. cc. 1, 2). The translation of bishops whose motives were pure was a common practice, and was under no suspicion of corruption. [G. M.]

SIMPLICIUS (1), June 24, bishop; commemorated at Autun (Mart. Usuard., Notker.).

(2) July 29; commemorated at Rome on the Via Portuensis with Faustinus and Beatrix, martyrs under Diocletian (Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Hieron., Notker., Wand.). There is an office on their natale in the Liber Antiph. of Gregory.

(3) Nov. 8, with Claudius, Nicostratus, Symphronianus, and Castorius, eminent artificers and martyrs under Diocletian, commemorated at Rome on the Via Lavicana (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Hieron., Wand.). [C. H.]

SINERUS, Feb. 23 (other forms of the name occurring in Ado and Mart. Hieronym.), monk, martyr under Diocletian; commemorated at Sirmium (Mart. Usuard., Vet. Rom., Hieron., Adon.). [C. H.]

SINGER. [CANTOR; PSALMISTA; SCHOLA CANTORUM.]

SINGILIONES (σιγιλλίω). In a letter of the emperor Gallienus (ob. A.D. 268), cited by Trebellius Pollio (Vita Claudii, c. 17), in which he recounts a number of presents he was sending to Claudius, who afterwards succeeded him as emperor, he mentions, among several other articles of dress, Singiliones Dalmatenses decem. The meaning of the word is very doubtful, from its extreme rarity. It seems only to occur again in the will of Gregory of Nazianzum, where he bequeaths to the "notarius" Elaphius, with other articles of dress, σιγιλλιῶνα ἕνα (Patrol. Gr. xxxvii. 393). We may at once, with the Greek spelling before us, reject Casaubon's proposal to read Cinyliones (not. in loc.). It seems best to suppose that the Greek word is but a reproduction of the Latin and to compare it in idea with such Greek words as ἁπλοΐς, διπλοΐς (cf. the English single, double). Thus we have in Hesychius, ἁπλοΐδες, ἱμάτιον μικρὸν καὶ ἁπλῆγλι, σύμμετρος χλαῖνα οὐ δυναμένη θῆναι. Another view associates the w[illegible] Sigillum, and thus we should have a refere[illegible] marks worked into a dress (such as e. g. Gramadés [see the article] and the like), but this view seems much less probable than the foregoing. The epithet Dalmatenses may not improbably imply some connexion with the Dalmatic [DALMATIC]. See on the whole question Salmasius's note, Trebell. Poll. l. c.). [R. S.]

SIRENS. [PAGANISM IN ART, p. 1535.]

SIRIACUS, June 18; commemorated at Malaca in Spain with Paula (Mart. Usuard.).
[C. H.]

SIRMIUM, COUNCILS OF (SIRMIENSIA CONCILIA). The number and character of these councils have been hotly disputed. Cave (Hist. Lit. i. 377–379) makes five; Valesius in one place (ad Soz. iv. 15), four, but in another (ad Soc. ii. 30) a fifth; Mansi (iii. 179–289), three, but is favourable to a fourth. The Jesuits Petavius (Diss. de Phot.) and Sirmondus (Diat. Sirm.) took opposite sides on the subject; and de Marca (Opusc. v.) intervened between them without settling it. There were three creeds likewise published at Sirmium, but it is not agreed by which councils. Taking Cave for our guide, whose statement is the least confused, we may arrange them as follows:—

(1) A.D. 349, when Photinus, bishop of that see, was condemned. "verùm, reclamante plebe, sede suâ jam deturbari non potuit," as Cave says. This synod was first brought to light by Petavius, and has been accepted by most.

(2) A.D. 351, when Constantius was there, treating with Vetranio (Soc. ii. 28) and Photinus, having disputed with Basilius of Ancyra and been worsted by him, was deposed; and Marcus composed the first of the three creeds in Greek, to which twenty-five anathemas are appended. Such at least is the conclusion of Petavius and Mansi. Valesius and Cave differ only from them in asserting that Marcus was not the author of this creed.

(3) A.D. 357, when Osius and Potamius both signed and lapsed. The creed signed by them was the second creed, published in Latin, but, according to Mansi, translated into Greek by the same Marcus who composed the first. It was much more heterodox than the first, however, so much so, that it is pronounced "blasphemy" by St. Hilary. Germinius, the successor of Photinus, was present at this council.

(4) A.D. 358, when a composite creed was put forth, to which pope Liberius subscribed, and on subscribing was restored to his see. (Comp. S. Hil. Fragm. vi. 6, and the notes in Migne, Patrol. x. 689.)

(5) A.D. 359, when, according to Valesius and Cave, "conscripta est fides illa, quam Marcus Arethusius composuit," with the names of the consuls prefixed to it. This was afterwards rehearsed at Rimini; but as it was probably this also to which Liberius subscribed, it must have been promulgated the year before, for he was restored that year, and if he subscribed to a different one, there must have been four, not three, creeds published here, which nobody maintains. Let us suppose, therefore, that the names of the consuls were prefixed to it at Rimini, and this council may be merged in the preceding one. [E. S. Ff.]

SISINNIUS (1), May 29, deacon, martyr; commemorated with Martyrius reader, and Alexander doorkeeper at Anaunia or Anagnia (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Notker., Hieron.).

(2) Nov. 29, deacon; commemorated at Rome on the Via Salaria with Saturninus martyr, and Sennes deacon (Mart. Usuard., Vet. Rom., Adon.).

(3) Nov. 24, bishop of Cyzicus, martyr under Diocletian (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

SISOES THE GREAT, July 6, monk of the 4th century, "our father" (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet). [C. H.]

SIXTUS (1) (Xystus), Apr. 6, pope; commemorated at Rome (Mart. Usuard., Vet. Rom., Adon., Notker., Wand.); Apr. 3 (Flor.); Aug. 6 (Bed. Metr.), in the cemetery of Calixtus on the Via Appia (Mart. Hieron.). In the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries his natale is on Aug. 6; in the former his name occurs in the collect, secreta, and post-communion; in the latter he is mentioned in the collect. The Liber Antiph. of Gregory has an office for his natale.

(2) Sept. 1, bishop of Reims (Mart. Usuard., Wand.). [C. H.]

SLAVERY. The subject of the relation of the Church to slavery may conveniently be considered under the following divisions:—

(i) During the first three centuries, when Christianity was itself subject to oppression and whatever amelioration is to be discerned in the condition of the slave is to be traced rather (α) to the teaching of the Stoics, (β) to the state legislation, (γ) to the secret societies, &c.

(ii) From the commencement of Christian legislation under Constantine (A.D. 313), to the accession of Justinian (A.D. 525).

(iii) From the accession of Justinian to the death of Gregory the Great.

(iv) From the death of Gregory the Great to the commencement of the ninth century: (α) in the Eastern empire, (β) in Latin Christendom, (γ) among Teutonic nations, prior to the introduction of Latin institutions.

(i) During the first three Centuries.—The more general conditions of pagan life, which fostered the continuance and systematization of such an institution in the midst of highly civilized communities, are described under Society; it will be sufficient here to note a few of the principal facts which illustrate the indifference of society, as it existed at the commencement of the Christian era, to the moral wrong and physical suffering involved. Looking upon the slave as nothing more than an animal of superior intelligence, the statesman and the legislator had, up to this period, altogether discouraged the notion that he possessed any rights, or was entitled to any consideration, beyond what the interest of the master might dictate. Even Aristotle had asserted slavery to be an institution of divine origin, whereby inferior races were designedly subjected to the superior* (Politics, iii. 4), a view adopted by Cicero (de Repub. bk. iii., quoted by Nonius). Pliny compares the relation of slaves to the state to that of drones in the hive (Nat. Hist. XI. xi. 1). Cato advised that, like beasts of burden, they should be worked to death rather than be allowed to become old and unprofitable; and in order to divert them from forming conspiracies, he advised masters to incite them to quarrel with each other (Plutarch, Cato, c. 21). It was a proverbial saying that every slave was an enemy—"Quot servi, tot hostes" (Festus, ed. Mueller, p. 261). Columella (de Re Rust. i. 8) observes that the more intelligent they are the more frequently it becomes necessary to put them in chains. In the year A.D. 63, four hundred of the slaves of Pedanius Secundus, notwithstanding a strong display of popular feeling in their favour, were put to death in order to avenge his assassination by one of their number (Tac. Ann. xiv. 45); and in the time of Ulpian, who wrote in the 3rd century, this cruel practice was still authorised by law (Digest. XXIX. v. 1, §§ 32 and 39). The chief representative of the artisan class, the slave, inherited the contempt with which mechanical labour was regarded by antiquity. Plato (Repub. bk. iv.) affirms that it is of small matter whether the mechanic lives a virtuous or an immoral life; and slaves under the empire were unable to obtain redress for the violation of their own wives (Cod. Just. IX. ix. 23; Kriegel, Corp. Juris Civ. ii. 587). As he was held to be a non-religious intelligence, or of a faith differing from that of his master, he was supposed to be incapable of being bound by oath, and controllable only by fear—"quibus diversi ritus, externa sacra aut nulla sunt, colluviem istam nonnisi metu coëcueris" (Tac. Ann. xiv. 44). Even when on the eve of receiving his freedom, it was customary to bind him by a promise, subject to certain penalties, that on becoming a freedman he would ratify his promise by an oath (Digest. XI. xii. 44).

The severity with which the whole class was generally treated appears to have been owing rather to an instinct of self-preservation than to wanton cruelty. From the time of the Servile Wars of the 2nd century, the Roman, though master of the world, lived in constant dread of conspiracy and insurrection among those whom he had thus deprived of their natural rights, and the slaves of southern Italy were looked upon as ever ready allies for those who might seek to kindle the flames of civil war (Tac. Ann. xii. 65). The proportion of the slave class to the rest of the community under the empire has been variously estimated—by Gibbon (ed. Smith, ii. 179) as high as one-half the entire population. This estimate is generally regarded as excessive, but the extent to which the system of slavery was intertwined with the whole social fabric can hardly be exaggerated. Labour, whether on the farm, in trade, or in domestic service, was abandoned almost entirely to the slave, and was itself consequently without honour. The shepherds of Calabria and Sicily were all slaves, and frequently endeavoured to assert their freedom by a life of brigandage. By the same class the mines were worked, the merchant ship and the trireme manned, the aqueducts, roads, and viaducts made and repaired. In fact, in every department of arduous toil or productive labour (the military profession alone excepted), the burden was mainly borne by the slave. In the higher departments of mechanical skill and artistic accomplishments, the slave was the chief element, and in the mansions of the wealthy, by his varied labour, often supplied the whole wants of the household. He designed the palace, executed its decorations, and adorned its walls with paintings; he prepared the feast and enlivened it with music; he was the family physician and surgeon. The attendants on public functionaries, on the magistrate or the priest, were either slaves or freedmen (Varro, ap. A. Gellius, xiii. 13). The whole wealth of a citizen was shrewdly estimated by the answer that could be given to the question, "Quot pascit servos?"—an answer that might often be stated in thousands. Pliny (Nat. Hist. xxxiii. 47) tells us that one C. Caecilius Isidorus, in the reign of Augustus, was the owner at his death of upwards of 4000 slaves, although a large portion of his patrimony had been lost in the civil wars; and Chrysostom, in the 4th century, when condemning the inordinate luxury of his time, implies that it was no unusual thing for the wealthy owner to possess from a thousand to two thousand—ἀνδραπόδων χιλίων, ἢ δὶς τοσούτων (in Matt. Hom. lxiii. 4; Migne, Series Graeca, lviii. 608).

* See on this point Krug, de Aristotele Servitutis defensore, 1815. Overbeck, however, quotes Pol. I. ii. 3 (νομῷ γὰρ τὸν μὲν δοῦλον εἶναι τὸν δ' ἐλεύθερον, φύσει δ' οὐδὲν διαφέρειν. διόπερ οὐδὲ δίκαιον. βίαιον γάρ), as proof that Aristotle recognised the radical injustice of the institution. Milman (Lat. Christianity, ii. 13, ed. 1867) appears to have overlooked this passage.

A consideration of these broad facts at once suggests the risk and danger that would have attended any attempt on the part of the Christian teacher in the first three centuries to denounce and overthrow slavery as a system. Such an attempt would at once, and not without reason, have been interpreted as tantamount to advocating a revolution in the state; and the charge of being revolutionary in character, as regarded pagan institutions, was one which Christianity already found it difficult to repel. It accordingly sought to ignore rather than to obliterate the class distinctions of ordinary society, and, in this policy, it could undoubtedly claim the sanction of the highest source of spiritual instruction. The convert to its principles, if a master, found in the apostolic writings only injunctions to consider his conduct towards his slave as subject to the rules of Christian intercourse. He was forbidden "to threaten" him (Ephes. vi. 9); he was to give him what was "just and equal" (Coloss. iv. 1). If a slave, he was enjoined not to allow his condition "to be a care" to him (1 Cor. vii. 21), a passage which Chrysostom interprets as an injunction to remain contented with a slave's condition — τουτέστι, τῇ δουλείᾳ παράμενε (Migne, Series Graeca, lxii. 704); he was to be obedient to his master, and to serve him "with singleness of heart and good will" (Ephes. vi. 5–9), "fearing God" (Coloss. iii. 22); whatever his master's moral character, he was to serve him "with all fear" (1 Pet. ii. 18);[b] of the unlawfulness of such relations the New Testament contains no intimation, and St. Paul himself, when at Rome, was the owner of a slave (Philemon, 10–17).

The language of the early Fathers was mainly of the same tenor. They inculcated humanity on the part of the master by arguments which much resemble those with which the modern philanthropist urges the exercise of the same virtue towards the brute creation. On the slave himself they enjoined humility and resignation; but while the pagan philosopher recommended suicide to the most miserable of this unfortunate race (Seneca, Consol. ad Marc. c. 20), the Christian teacher pointed to the perfect freedom and happiness of a future state. Ignatius warns the slave not to be arrogant on account of his spiritual equality with his master, but to serve him with greater zeal; he advises the whole class not to seek enfranchisement at the expense of the community, lest they should themselves become the slaves of desire (δοῦλοι ἐπιθυμίας); he enjoins Polycarp not to despise slaves, whether male or female (Epist. ad Polycarp. c. 4; Cureton, Corp. Ignat. p. 7). Tatian appears to regard the tribute paid by the subject, and the service rendered by the slave, as coming under much the same category (adv. Graecos, c. 4; Migne, Series Graeca, vi. 246). Tertullian inculcates the exercise of patience, both on the part of the master and on that of the slave, as the most efficacious means of establishing satisfactory relations (de Patientiâ, c. 15). Clement of Alexandria, in whom the allusions to slavery are frequent, urges that "slaves are men like ourselves" (Paed. iii. 12; Migne, S. G. viii. 672), and that Christians are bound to act towards them as they would themselves be acted by, but nowhere condemns the institution itself. He urges, indeed, that the unduly large numbers about a household, the ὄχλος οἰκετῶν maintained by the wealthy, should be reduced, as constituting an unjustifiable luxury (ibid. iii. 7; Migne, viii. 610); and he holds that the moral condition and education of his slaves are a matter to which no master can rightly be indifferent. He even appears to place respect to parents and regard for one's slaves on an equal footing as social obligations. Origen (Cont. Cels. iii. 44, 54) tells us that it was made a reproach to Christians by their enemies that they addressed their appeals to women, children, the uneducated, and to slaves. He implies that Christian slaves often proved instrumental in bringing about the conversion of households to which they belonged (Migne, S. G. xi. 476, 483). Callistus, bishop of Rome (A.D. 218–223), had been a slave, and it is deserving of note that Hippolytus in the Philosophumena, while bitterly assailing his character and motives, does not refer to the fact as involving any stigma.[c] Of the uniform disregard in the church itself of any distinction between the slave and the free man, the catacombs afford silent but significant evidence; for "while it is impossible," says De Rossi, "to examine the pagan sepulchral inscriptions of the same period without finding mention of a slave or a freedman, I have not met with one well-ascertained instance among the inscriptions of the Christian tombs" (Boll. di Arch. Crist. 1866, p. 24; see also Le Blant, Inscrip. chrét. de la Gaule, i. 119).

In the meantime other influences were in operation, which, although there is sufficient reason for concluding that they could never have brought about the abolition of slavery, undoubtedly led to the amelioration of the condition of the slave, and to a more humane view of his position in relation to the body politic. These were (α) the doctrines of the Stoic philosophy; (β) the imperial legislation; (γ) the private clubs or societies.

That the humaner tendencies in the imperial legislation were owing to the spread of Christian doctrine, has been maintained both by the jurist and the historian, but is not supported by the most authoritative and recent research. M. Wallon (Hist. de l'Esclavage, iii. 91) distinctly admits that they are mainly to be referred to the teaching of the philosophy of the age. "When we add to these laws," says another writer, "the broad maxims of equity, asserting the essential equality of the human race, which the jurists had borrowed from the Stoics, and which supplied the principles to guide the judges in their decisions, it must be admitted that the slave-code of imperial Rome compares not unfavourably with those of some Christian nations" (Lecky, Hist. of Morals, ii. 327). "As regards certain improvements said to have been introduced by Christianity into the imperial law of slavery," says Sir Henry Maine, "they were probably quickened by its influence, but they began in principles which were of stoical rather than of Christian influence" (Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 63). The language of the Christian apologists above cited, in unison with that of the most enlightened stoicism, but scarcely transcending it, must be regarded as corroborative of these views. The stories told in Bollandus (i. Mai, p. 371; Januarii, p. 275), on the other hand, of eminent Romans in the reigns of Trajan and Diocletian, immediately after their baptism liberating large numbers of their slaves, are at variance with nearly all the evidence for this period.

The laws relating to manumission afford more decisive evidence. The customary form of manumission during the master's lifetime had hitherto been by a well-known ceremony performed in the presence of the praefect and his lictor; but, by a decree of the year 316, it was declared that a slave might be set at liberty by a simple declaration made in a Christian church in the presence of the priest and the congregation, while, instead of the ancient ceremony, a written document signed by the master was to suffice as evidence (ibid. I. xiii. 1; Kriegel, ii. 89–90).

In the year 321, a further concession was made in a decree of Constantine addressed to Hosius, the eminent bishop of Cordova, and not improbably reflecting his personal influence over that monarch (see Milman, Hist. of Christianity, bk. iii. c. 4). Here, after recapitulating the above law, the enactment goes on to declare that the clergy are permitted to bestow complete civil rights on their slaves, not only by a simple declaration of their purpose before "the church and godly folk," but also by instructions in their wills or any formal document, the freedom thus conferred to acquire validity from the day on which their intent has been made known (Cod. Just. I. xiii. 2).

Biot (de l'Abolition de l'Esclav. p. 147) interprets this latter law as proof of a design on the part of Constantine to attract converts to Christianity, inasmuch as those whose enfranchisement was proclaimed in a Christian [illegible] would necessarily be Christians, and th[illegible] here admitted to "plenum fructum libertatis," i.e. to rank not simply as "Latini" but as "cives." It was not until the year 401, nearly a century later, that this mode of enfranchisement was extended to Africa (Biot, p. 148); but, wherever valid, it appears to have been recognised as a triumph of Christianity. Augustine, in one of his sermons (Serm. cccl vi. sec. 3), announces that several of his clergy are designing to emancipate the few slaves they possess,—the result apparently of the introduction of the new law into his diocese. Gregory of Nyssa, in contrasting the features which distinguished the Christian celebration of Easter from pagan festivals, mentions, among others, "the slave enfranchised by the good and humane proclamation of the church, and not smitten in unseemly fashion on the cheek" (de Resur. Dom. Orat. 3; Migne, S. G. xlvi. 657).

A law bearing on the same subject, but of yet earlier date than either of the foregoing, is lost; but we learn from Sozomen (H. E. i. 9) that a hundred years later these three laws were placed at the head of all formal documents of enfranchisement—προγράφεσθαι ἐν τοῖς γραμματείοις τῶν ἐλευθεριῶν (Migne, S. G. lxvii. 21); and it is easy to recognise in the class enfranchised by the law of 316 the "tabularii," and in that of 321 the "chartularii" of barbaric codes of a later period (see infra, Pt. iv.).

[c] The sanction extended by Callistus to marriages solemnised in his diocese between free Christian women and Christian slaves, is noted by Overbeck (Studien, &c. p. 190), as one of the very rare instances that present themselves before the time of Constantine of any attempt on the part of the church to determine questions that came within the provisions of state legislation (see Hippolyti Refut. ix. 12).

If we add to the foregoing laws another of the year 334, forbidding the arbitrary separation of the father of a family from his wife and children upon the death of their common owner (Digest. XXXIII. vii. 12, § 7; Kriegel, i. 553); and another, passed under Zeno in the year 486, forbidding any citizen in any province of the empire to have a private prison (Cod. Just. IX. v.), we have before us the main evidence that presents itself, prior to the time of Justinian, of a desire on the part of the legislator to render the yoke of slavery less intolerable.

On the other hand, it is not to be disguised that the actual condition of the slave remained much the same. We find, for example, from a law of the year 317, that the examination of fugitive slaves was still carried on by torture (Cod. Just. VI. i. 4). A law of the year 319 declares that on a slave who has been subjected to the lash, or put in chains, dying, as the subsequent result, his master is not to be brought to trial, the latter being liable to the charge of homicide only when death has been the immediate result of his violence (Cod. Theod. IX. xiii. 1, ed. Haenel, p. 859). Another law of the year 332 enacts that freedmen may again be reduced to slavery if they have exhibited "superbiam," or have injured their patron (ib. IV. x. 1; Haenel, p. 396). Another, of the year 376, directs that slaves turning informers against their masters are to be burnt, along with whatever documentary evidence they may have put in, the sole exception being where the accusation which they have alleged has been that of treason against the state—"majestatis" (ibid. IX. vi. 2; Haenel, pp. 836–837).

It is undeniable that in the 4th century the language of the Fathers assumes a bolder tone. Chrysostom (ad Ephes. Hom. xxii. 2), Gregory Nazianzen (Poem. Theol. ii. 26), Lactantius (Div. Inst. v. 15) alike inquire into the origin of the institution, and concur in tracing it to evil principles, to avarice, tyranny, and injustice; it is openly stigmatised as a reversal of natural law (Arnobius, adv. Gentes, bk. ii.). Lactantius expressly states that Christianity recognises no difference between rich and poor, bond and free (Div. Inst. v. 16). Chrysostom boldly grapples with the apparent difficulty presented by St. Paul's non-condemnation of the system,[4] and gives it as his explanation that the exhibition of a state of slavery, in conjunction with that of spiritual liberty, was a greater moral triumph for Christianity than its abolition, even, he says, as the spectacle of the three Hebrew youths walking in the furnace was a greater marvel than the extinction of the flames would have been (in Genesim, serm. v. 1). The manner, again, in which the church asserted the slave's religious equality with the free man cannot but have paved the way for the recognition of his civil and social equality. While paganism had looked upon him as a non-religious member of the state, the church admitted him to the rite of baptism; and Gregory Nazianzen insists, with emphasis, on the absolute equality of all admitted to this sacrament: "Think not, ye rich, that it is beneath your dignity to be baptized with the poor, or, ye masters, with your slaves. For even in so doing ye humble not yourselves as did Christ, in whom ye are this day baptized, and who, for your sakes, took upon Him the form of a slave. For, from the day that ye are changed anew, all the ancient marks disappear; Christ is impressed as a common form on all" (Orat. in Sanct. Bapt., Migne, S. G. xxxvi. 712). In like manner, Chrysostom (in Sanct. Pascha, Hom. iii. 4) maintains the theory of a perfect equality among the partakers of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. According to the 73rd of the Apostolical Canons, no slave was to be admitted to ordination without his master's sanction; for this, the canon says, would be the subversion of a household; his master's consent and his own freedom are declared to be essential. It would appear, however, that in Jerome's time slaves were sometimes ordained without having obtained enfranchisement. John, bishop of Jerusalem, having complained of such an ordination in the church at Rome, Jerome, writing to Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, retorts that John himself has some among his clergy of the same condition, and urges that Onesimus, whom Paul converted while in prison, was ordained a deacon while still a slave (Epist. 82; Migne, xxii. 516). In the correspondence of Gregory Nazianzen, we find him referring to a case where a slave had been made bishop over a small community in the desert. The Christian lady to whom he belonged endeavoured to assert her right of ownership, for which she was severely rebuked by St. Basil. After St. Basil's death she again claimed the slave, whereupon Gregory addressed to her a letter of grave remonstrance at her un-Christian desire to recall his brother bishop (συμπολιμην) from his sphere of duty (Epist. 79; Migne, S. G. xxxvii. 149–154). It is, however, to be noted that Gregory himself, "though he had liberated some of his slaves in his lifetime, yet did not set others free till his death" (Babington, Influence of Christianity, &c., p. 29).

In the 5th century, and subsequently to that period, both the priestly office and the monastic profession were largely recruited from the servile class; but while the church compassionately connived at this means of escape from slavery, the exigencies of the state (as will shortly be shewn) appear to have been held incompatible with such licence. Leo the Great, indeed, in his lofty conception of the sacerdotal office, denounced a practice whereby he affirms "the sacred ministry is dishonoured, and the rights of masters are set at naught" (Epist. 4; Migne, liv. 612). A decree of the first council of Orleans (A.D. 511) requires that whenever a bishop shall have admitted a slave to the office of deacon or presbyter unknown to his owner, the ransom paid shall be double the slave's value (Sirmond, i. 180). A council held in the same city, in 538, decrees that the bishop who has thus infringed upon the master's rights shall himself be suspended for a year from the function of celebrating mass (ib. i. 255); it further requires that neither "coloni" (see infra, sec. iii.) nor slaves "shall be admitted to ecclesiastical honours until either by testament or charter they have been made free,"—"Ut nullus servilibus colonariisque conditionibus obligatus, juxta statuta sedis Apostolicae, ad honores ecclesiasticos admittatur; nisi prius aut testamento aut per tabulas legitime constiterit absolutum" (ib.). The prevailing tone with respect to slavery is still such as indicates that, like poverty and other ills, it was regarded rather as a misfortune to be endured than an injustice to be done away with,—a form of suffering, consequent upon the Fall, of which the chief compensation was to be looked for in a future life (Eusebius, Theophan. v. 21; Gregory of Nyssa, Orat. 9; Chrysostom, Hom. 29, in Gen.; Cyril of Alexandria, de Adorand. in Spiritu et in Verit. bk. viii.). The fear that Christianity might appear to be aiming at revolutionising the state still operated with considerable force. Chrysostom says that "it is fitting that the Gentiles should perceive that a slave may please God; otherwise they will assuredly blaspheme and say that, if masters are to be deprived of their slaves, Christianity has been brought in to upset the existing order of things, and is a work of violence." In the same treatise he says that if a slave is distinguished by his excellent qualities, this is all the more reason that he should continue in servitude, so that by his presence he may exert a beneficial influence over the whole household (Arg. in Epist. ad Philem., Migne, S. G. lxii. 704). He holds, however, on another occasion, somewhat different language, advising masters to give those slaves whom they do not really require, instruction in some useful art, and then, when they are able to earn their own livelihood, to set them free. But he admits that this advice is unpalatable to his hearers,—φορτικός εἰμι τοῖς ἀκούουσιν (ad Epist. i. ad Cor., Hom. 40; Migne, S. G. lxi. 354). Isidore, the learned abbat of Pelusium, puts forward the singular theory that the servile condition may even be preferable to that of the freeman, because in the day of judgment the slave might plead in his defence that he had been compelled to obey the mandates of his earthly master (Epist. bk. iv. 12 and 169). Here, however, says Prof. Babington, "he is not giving his own counsel, but paraphrasing St. Paul" (Influence of Christianity, p. 29). It is a somewhat too sweeping assertion made by the last-named writer, that the writings of St. Basil, Ephraim the Syrian, Pseudo-Ambrose, Chrysostom, Jerome, Salvian, and Leo the Great do not contain a hint that slavery is unlawful or improper; but it is certain that none of them advocate its abolition. Theodorus Cyrensis, in his seventh oration, de Providentia, puts forward the view that slavery is a punishment inflicted on the human race which, while it convicts man of sin, bears witness to the justice of the Creator (Migne, S. G. lxxxiii. 676). So completely, indeed, did the church at this period dissociate the theory of the slave's spiritual equality with the freeman from that of his civil rights, that at the Council of Gangra (circ. 379) an anathema was pronounced against anyone who should make the former theory a ground for instigating a slave to repudiate his master's authority (Hardouin, Conc. i. 530). Hefele, who cannot be supposed to understate the argument in defence of the church, admits that fathers and councils alike systematically discouraged the self-assertion of freedom (Beiträge, i. 216). Enfranchisement was generally regarded as the reward of exceptional merit, and was often associated with some religious festivals; according to Gregory of Nyssa, especially with the celebration of Easter (Migne, S. G. xlvi. 657).[a] How far the church was from proclaiming a general denunciation of slavery is to be inferred from the fact that in the year 503 the household of pope Symmachus was largely composed of slaves, and that, in the course of this pontiff's struggle with Laurentius, the royal commissioner sent by Theodoric subjected them to torture in order to extract evidence bearing upon the matter in dispute (Milman, Lat. Christianity, bk. iii. c. 3). Christianity, to quote the language of Milman (Lat. Christianity, bk. iii. c. 5), had taken slaves "out of the class of brute beasts or inanimate things, to be transferred like cattle or other goods from one master to another, which the owner might damage or destroy with as much impunity as any other property; and placed them in that of human beings, equally under the care of Divine Providence and gifted with the same immortality . . . . But the abrogation of slavery was not contemplated even as a remote possibility. A general enfranchisement seems never to have dawned on the wisest and best of the Christian writers."

[4] This passage appears conclusive against the argument of bishop Horsley (Babington, Influence of Christianity, &c. p. 16), that St. Paul in denouncing "menstealers" (ἀνδραποδισταί) intends to convey a condemnation of slavery as an institution. His reference is plainly to those who gained a livelihood by kidnapping—a practice including free men and children, as well as slaves, and selling them into captivity in other lands. The charity of the church, throughout our period, was largely devoted to redeeming these unfortunate victims [see Cyprian, Epist. 60 (Migne, iv. 99); Lactantius, Div. Inst. vi. 12; Ambrose, Off. Lib. ii. 28], but such efforts, however valuable as evidence of Christian philanthropy, cannot be regarded as proof of a desire to abolish slavery at home. Of this, the law of king Ine of Wessex, in the 7th century, gives decisive proof. "If anyone sell his own countryman, bond or free, though he be guilty, over the sea, let him pay for him according to his "wer" (Stubbs, Documents, p. 61).

(iii) From the accession of Justinian to the death of Gregory the Great.—Although the efforts both of the legislator and of the church up to the commencement of this period must be looked upon as tending rather to the amelioration of the condition of the slave than to the abolition of slavery, events, in the mean time, were conspiring to bring about a more important change,—that whereby slavery, as a political institution, was gradually supplanted by serfdom. From the earliest days of the empire, the cultivation of the soil (the vital question with the civil administrator) appears as carried on mainly by two distinct classes,—the slave and the "colonus"; the first cultivating the land solely for his master's profit, the second receiving payment for his labour or renting the land of the proprietor. Owing to a conjunction of causes, into which it is here impossible to enter, the owners of the large estates found, with the advance of the 3rd century, the supply of labour altogether inadequate to the demand. In the reign of Honorius (A.D. 395–423) this evil had grown to such an extent that in Campania, the most fertile region of Italy, no less than 528,042 jugera were exempted from taxation owing to the fact that they had been deserted by the cultivator (Cod. Theod. XI. xxviii. 2; Haenel, p. 1120).

Against these difficulties legislation (as is clearly to be seen in the Theodosian Code) had long been contending, but in the meantime the condition of the "colonus" had been one of steady and continuous degeneration.[f] His rights as a freeman had been repeatedly disregarded; his property had been confiscated, and he and his family reduced to the position of serfs, under what has been described as the state's "imperious necessity of procuring and preserving instruments for the cultivation of land" [Maine (Sir H.), Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 150]. To quote the description of M. Wallon, the "colonus" shared the condition of a slave without being legally such, and partook of the condition without enjoying the rights of a freeman. From the reign of Constantius, this anomalous condition of things is frequently referred to in legislation; but it was not until the reign of Justinian that a series of fresh enactments took formal cognisance of the grievances under which the "colonus" laboured and defined his status and rights. The result of this legislation, according to Savigny, was to produce a kind of amalgamation of the "coloni" and the "servi," whereby the heredity of labour, when associated with the cultivation of the soil, became a recognised theory in law (Mém. Acad. de Berlin, 1822–1823), and it would even appear to have been the design of the legislator to obliterate, as far as possible, all distinctions between the two classes. In a law of Justinian, indeed, we find the question distinctly propounded as to what real difference can be supposed to exist between slaves and "ascriptitii," "when," it says, "both are in the power of their lord, who is equally able to enfranchise the slave (along with his private hoard), and to exclude from his overlordship the 'ascriptitius' along with the tract which he cultivates" (Cod. Just. XI. xlvii. 22; Kriegel, ii. 702). Every freeman who had cultivated the same land for thirty years, was now declared to be a "colonus," and as such was forbidden to transfer his labour to other territory (Cod. Just. XI. xlvii. 23); if he attempted to escape, he might be recaptured and chastised by his employer. He was disqualified both for civil and military functions (ib. XI. xlvii. 11 and 18; Kriegel, ii. 700–701). He could bring no legal action against his employer, unless for arbitrary raising of his rent or some personal injury sustained by himself or one of his family (ib. XI. xlix. 1–2; Kriegel, ii. 704). The slave, on the other hand, was gradually relieved from those disabilities which had hitherto distinguished him from the "colonus." He could no longer be sold away from the land which he cultivated. In his own person, in his rights over his wife and children, and in the right of acquiring and bequeathing property, he ranked as a freeman. As was the case with the "ascriptitius," election to the episcopal dignity rendered him, ipso facto, free,—"Post creationem autem a servili et adscriptitii conditione episcopos liberos esse jubemus" (Novell. cxxiii. 4; Kriegel, iii. 544).

It will be seen, from the foregoing evidence, that as regards that large portion of the servile class whose labour was bestowed on the land, their condition in the 6th century differed considerably from that of the agricultural labourer in the early days of the empire. It was much inferior to that of the ancient "colonus," but it was a great improvement upon that of the slave, —a circumstance which requires to be borne in mind when we observe that it was in the same century, especially during the pontificate of Gregory the Great, that the territorial possessions of the church first begun to form an important element in its history and policy. Of the relations of the church to the labour question the letters of Gregory afford valuable illustration. Among them there is one to Venantius, bishop of Luna (the great seaport on the confines of Liguria), from which it appears that a community of Jews, holding lands in the diocese, were also proprietors of Christian slaves. Gregory, having been consulted by Venantius, distinctly lays it down as a rule that no Jew can be allowed to hold Christian men in bondage, but he goes on to say that, in the present instance, although those over whom these Jews assert their claim may be free men in point of law, yet notwithstanding, inasmuch as they have for a lengthened period continued to cultivate these same lands, they are bound by the circumstances of the case, and must accordingly continue to cultivate these lands and to pay their rents to the proprietors, besides complying with all the obligations legally binding upon "coloni" or "originarii,"[g] but that no further burden is to be imposed upon them (Epist. iv. 21; Migne, lxxvii. 700).

This important letter, which M. Wallon (Hist. de l'Esclavage, iii. 312) regards as embodying the imperial legislation of the period, as conceived under the conditions above described, would appear to afford unquestionable proof that the position of the "colonus" at this time was one which secured to him a considerable degree of freedom. The antipathy of the church to the enslaving of Christian men by Jews or pagans begins now to be very strongly marked.[h] A decree of the Council of Mâcon, A.D. 581, directs that Jewish or pagan proprietors shall be bound to surrender Christian slaves for a ransom of 12 solidi; and that any Christian shall be empowered to ransom a slave at such a price, whether it be his design to retain him in his possession or to set him at liberty (Sirmond, i. 373). The criticism of Overbeck (Studien, &c.

[f] For the main facts which illustrate this gradual descent of the "colonus" from his ancient freedom, see Biot, de l'Abolition de l'Esclavage, pp. 177–181.

[g] The "coloni" by descent, as distinguished from those who were such by agreement, the "ascriptitii." The influence of the question of labour in connexion with the land is to be recognised in many directions: thus a decree of the Council of Agde (A.D. 506) forbids the enfranchisement of the slaves of monasteries, holding it unjust "ut monachis quotidianum rurale opus facientibus, servi eorum libertatis otio potiuntur" (Mansi, Conc. viii. 334).

[h] As the complement to this sentiment we may note that which considered the enslaving of pagan captives in war justifiable (see Biot, de l'Abolition de l'Esclavage, p. 233).

p 211) that this aversion took its rise in mere religious bigotry, and was contrary to the theory of the primitive church, breathing rather of the ancient pagan prejudice against the barbarian (Plato, Repub. v. 15), appears harsh and over-strained. It is also to be remembered that the exaggerated importance now discernible as attached by the church to a formal observance of religious duties, e.g. fasting, keeping of saints' days, &c., must have operated very strongly in the same direction. The Christian in slavery to a pagan master could hardly have avoided living in the habitual commission of mortal sin; and to no object were Gregory's efforts more ardently devoted than to the suppression of the slave-trade as carried on by the Jews in his day (Epist. iv. 9; Migne, lxxvii. 689; see also pp. 498, 652, 868, 953, 954, 1016). Writing to Theoderic and Theodebert, kings of Frankland, he expresses his surprise that they should permit any Jews in their dominions to possess slaves (Epist. ix. 110; Migne, lxxvii. 1018). It seems accordingly that the condition of these "coloni" at Luna was such as he would never have sanctioned, had it not left them free to observe Christian worship and perform the chief duties of the Christian life unmolested.

On the other hand, he appears to have held the theory already referred to, which looked upon one Christian in bondage to another as simply the result of the divine decree finding expression in human institutions (Epist. iii. 18; x. 66; xii. 4; Migne, lxxvii. 637, 1089, 1210); nor can it be denied that this theory appears sometimes to have been construed by him in a sense repugnant to more enlightened views. Thus, when directing Januarius, bishop of Cagliari, to take vigorous measures against pagans, aruspices, and sorcerers, he says that if slaves they are to be beaten and subjected to torture, but if free men, are to be subjected simply to imprisonment (Epist. ix. 65; Migne, lxxvii. 982). But, notwithstanding, it is in the letters of this pontiff that M. Biot considers we have the earliest example of the Christian sentiment of liberty as the natural right of man, finding expression in a definite act of manumission; this is on the occasion of bestowing their freedom on two slaves, Montanus and Thomas, when Gregory compares their enfranchisement from the yoke which the law has placed upon them to the liberty which Christ came to win for all mankind—"quos ab initio natura liberos protulit, et jus gentium jugo substituit servitutis" (Epist. vi. 12; Migne, lxxvii. 804).

The decisions of Gregory having formed, in almost every important question, the rule of the Latin church during centuries after his time, the theory to which he here gives expression, may be regarded as that which continued to prevail to the conclusion of our period, whereby slavery was looked upon as an admitted antagonism between "natura" and the "jus gentium."

(iv) From the death of Gregory the Great to the commencement of the 9th century: (α) in the Eastern Empire; (β) in Latin Christendom; (γ) among Teutonic nations, prior to the introduction of Latin institutions.

(α) The influences of legislation and religion, in the eastern provinces of the empire, combined steadily to diminish the number of slaves (Gibbon, ch. xliv.; Wallon, Hist. de l'Esclavage, iii. 452), and, according to Finlay (Hist. of Greece, ed. Tozer, ii. 220), were aided by conditions more favourable to free labour, operating more immediately "in extinguishing predial slavery, and repressing the most important branch of the slave-trade, by supplying the cities with free emigrants." The evidence afforded by legislation is to be studied, after the 6th century, chiefly in the enactments of Basil the Macedonian (emp. 867–886) and of his son Leo the Philosopher, and is described in its main features by M. Wallon (iii. 452, 453). It is to be noted that the latter emperor revoked the law of Justinian which conferred freedom on slaves who had taken refuge in churches or monasteries, in the event of their giving satisfactory evidence of having been subjected to ill-usage.

The monasteries of the East appear to have been distinguished by their repudiation of the employment of slave labour, a principle emphatically laid down by St. Platon and Theodore Studites. The latter, writing to his disciple Nicholas (recently created an abbat), instructs him that he is not to have a single slave, whether for his own service, or that of the monastery, or for the culture of the land; "for this," he says, "is permissible, like marriage, only to those who lead a secular life" (Sirmond, Opera, Paris, 1696, v. 84).

(β) In those countries where Latin influences continued to predominate, the close connexion of the question of slavery with that of the cultivation of the land appears to have hindered the progress of emancipation. Among the Western Franks, the condition of the slave differed, according to Guizot, from the ancient servitude of paganism, in that it was not "uniforme, constante et séparée de celle des hommes libres par un profond abîme" (Essais, p. 214); and owing to the fact, that it was thus vaguely defined, it afforded conditions which ultimately resulted in the establishment of freedom. He concurs, however, in the opinion expressed by Gibbon (ch. xxxviii.), that from the 5th to the 10th century "the laws and manners of Gaul uniformly tended to promote the increase, and to confirm the duration, of personal servitude;" but, at the same time, considers (Essais, p. 208) that in the many cases of enfranchisement that come under our notice during this period, religious ideas suggested the preponderating motive. The Formulae of Marculfus (a monk of the 7th century) systematically represent the bestowing of freedom on the slave as a meritorious action that will be rewarded in a future state (Migne, lxxxvii. 747). It would appear that it was customary for the king, on the birth of a son, to bestow freedom on three slaves on each of his farms (villae), and the formula used on these occasions is preserved in the same writer (bk. ii. 52). The Ripuarian Code (which exhibits an admixture of Latin and barbaric elements) defines three distinct modes of enfranchisement, according to which the slave was known as a "denarius," a "tabularius," or a "chartularius." On the first of these, freedom was conferred according to Salic law,—the slave holding a coin (denarius) in his hand, and the king thereupon striking his hand, so as to cause the coin to fly into his face, and pronouncing him a free man (Marculfus, Form. i. 22). The second mode ("secundum legem Romanam") corresponded exactly to that prescribed by the law of Constantine of the year 316; the third (whereby the freedman was known as a "chartularius") reproduces the method prescribed in the law of 321 (for both of these see supra, sec. ii.). It is the opinion of Guizot (Essais, p. 213) that none of these modes secured complete freedom to the enfranchised slave, but that, in each case, he was subsequently under the necessity of attaching himself to a "patronus," who, in the first case, was the king; in the second, the church; while the "chartularius" elected to which of these two he would be bound.

A decree of the Council of Châlons (A.D. 650) prohibits the selling of slaves out of the realm of king Clovis II. (Sirmond, i. 491); and another of the year 743 prohibits their being, in any case, sold to Jews (Mansi, xii. 384). The abbat Smaragdus, in the reign of Charles the Great, exhorted that monarch not to reduce captives of war to slavery, and also to set free his own slaves (Biot, u. s. p. 311). The 104th canon of the Council of Aachen (A.D. 816) exhibits what may be regarded as the prevailing ecclesiastical view of slavery at the close of our period,—that it is to be looked upon as a consequence of the Fall, and that, although the Creator regards not the comparative intelligence (rationem) of individuals, yet He has destined some to slavery and others to freedom, in order that the "tendency of the slave to do ill may be restrained by the power of the master" (Mansi, xiv. 211).

The chronicle of the monastery of Farfi in the duchy of Spoleto, in an enumeration of the slaves and dependants of the monastery made towards the close of the 7th century, shews that these slaves resided in separate cottages, and were permitted to hold property of their own,—a condition closely resembling, if not identical with, that of the "colonus" (Muratori, Scriptt. II. ii. 428). In the year 815, Lewis the Pious, in a charter confirming the rights and privileges of the same monastery, refers to its "servi" and "ancillae" as well as its "libellarii" (= "tabularii") and "chartulati" (ib. II. ii. 365). Arichis, duke of Beneventum, in a capitulary of the year 774, defines the relations of servants to their masters as one of complete subjection,—"ita tamen ut ejus, qui eos acceperit, disciplinis et imperio, sicut servi subjacent" (ib. II. ii. 336).

In Spain, where the laws of the Visigoths represented a kind of amalgamation of their own code with that of Theodosius, the enactments relating to the condition of the slave offer few points of material difference when compared with the Roman law,—the chief distinction being that slaves were permitted to engage in military service (Biot, p. 402).

(γ) Under the influence of the spirit of Teutonic conquest, the growth of personal freedom again received a check. "The fruitful cause of personal slavery," says Gibbon (ed. Smith, iv. 374), "which had been almost suppressed by the peaceful sovereignty of Rome, was again revived and multiplied by the perpetual hostilities of the independent barbarians." The theory maintained by one writer[1] on our subject,—that slavery, strictly so-called, never existed among the German races, and that contact with the Latin race and with Roman institutions tended rather to aggravate the condition of serfdom as existing among them,—is at variance with the best established conclusions. Tacitus (Germ. c. 25) clearly implies that the slave's life could be taken by his master with impunity. "It cannot be denied," says Professor Stubbs, "that slavery in the strictest sense was an early, if not a primitive, institution of the race" (Const. Hist. i. 78). In direct contravention of the law of Valerian and Gallienus [supra, sec. i. (β)], the laws of the Merovingian dynasty in Frankland permitted a freeman to sell himself into slavery, and even prescribed the formula (Marculfus, Form. ii. 28). The researches of Jastrow clearly prove that the earliest codes of the Frisians, Saxons, Thuringians, Franks and Alemanni, all involve that fundamental violation of natural law which represented the slave as a Thing rather than a Person. He had indeed a recognised legal value, which was determined like that of other "things," by assessment. In the Saxon and Thuringian codes this value is fixed by law, but solely as a question of his worth to his owner. In the older Salic Code and in that of the Alemanni, it is estimated with reference to the "wergild" of the freeman and of the "lite." The Kentish Laws of Ethelbert are the first which deal with the question of his "Mannwerth,"—equivalent, says Jastrow, to his "wergild," only under another name. "In some respects," says Professor Stubbs, "the practice of the law is better than the theory: the slave is entitled to his two loaves a day, and his holy days are secured to him. He can purchase his freedom with savings which in some unexplained way the law has allowed him to keep, and the spiritual law can enforce a penance on the master for illtreating him. But his status descends to his children; all his posterity, unless the chain is broken by emancipation, are born slaves" (Const. Hist. i. 79; see also Kemble, Saxons in England, i. 185-225). In the laws of Ine, king of Wessex (circ. 690), this "Mannwerth" becomes technically a "wergild" (see Jastrow, Zur strafrechtlichen Stellung der Sclaven bei Deutschen und Angelsachsen, p. 41). One of the laws of Wihtred, king of Kent, made at a witenagemot held at Berghamstede in 690, requires that the head of a family who gives them meat on a fast, shall do penance by devoting his "hals-fang" (price of commutation for punishment in the pillory) to redeeming "bond or free" (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 235–6). To Theodore of Tarsus is attributed the merit of obtaining in the West the adoption of the axiom of Eastern monasticism,—that "the monastery could have no slaves" (Hefele, Beiträje, i. 217). The same ecclesiastic, however, allows men to sell themselves into slavery "for meat," i.e. in order to avoid starvation (Haddan and Stubbs, ib. iii. 202). "Manumission," says Mr. Green, "became frequent in wills, as the clergy taught that such a gift was a boon to the soul of the dead. At the synod of Calnith the bishops bound themselves to free at their decease all serfs on their estates who had been reduced to serfdom by want or crime. Usually the slave was set free before the altar or in the church-porch, and the Gospel-book bore written on its margins the record of his emancipation . . . . The slave-trade from English ports was prohibited by law, but the prohibition long remained ineffective. A hundred years later than Dunstan the wealth of English nobles was said sometimes to spring from breeding slaves for the market. It was not till the reign of the first Norman king that the preaching of Wulstan and the influence of Lanfranc suppressed the trade in its last stronghold, the port of Bristol" (Short History, pp. 54, 55).

The conclusions to which the foregoing outline of facts appears to point, as to the extent to which the Christianity of the first eight centuries modified the conditions of the slave, admit of being very concisely summarized. During the first three centuries Christianity could scarcely hope materially to influence that legislation by which it was itself persecuted, but, in conjunction with the philosophic teaching of the Stoics, it brought about a change of sentiment which led to the consideration of the whole question of slavery from a different standpoint. It spoke of him as a man in this life, and as destined to immortality hereafter. Of the general abolition of a system which underlay the entire fabric of the state and of society, it had little or no conception; but with the fall of the Western empire the whole question of labour, as associated with the cultivation of the land, assumed a phase which ultimately involved the suppression of the harshest features of the ancient slavery. Concurrently with this change, Christianity was gradually raising the condition of the slave by admitting him to the sacraments of the church and to the ranks of the clergy, as well as by the manner in which it encouraged his complete enfranchisement as a Christian act, and associated it with Christian observances. Even the intolerant spirit which, at this period, began to be displayed towards the Jew and the pagan, is to some extent redeemed by the fact that it led to the essential injustice of slavery being more fully recognised. With these considerations before us, it seems difficult not to assent to the view of M. Wallon, that when, at a later time, with the commencement of feudalism, the question of the cultivation of the soil entered upon another phase, there was no security in existing institutions that the serf might not relapse into the condition of the slave, Christianity interposed, and not merely averted any such retrograde movement, but paved the way for the complete emancipation of the serf; while, by the admission of Gibbon, "the custom of enslaving prisoners of war was totally extinguished in the 13th century by the influence of Christianity" (Decline and Fall, c. xxxviii. note 96).

SOCIAL LIFE. The design of this article is to point out and illustrate what appear to have been the distinguishing characteristics of Christian society during the first eight centuries. As, however, these characteristics are found to differ considerably according to the varying conditions of the age, any attempt to bring the phenomena of different periods within a single outline could hardly but prove fallacious; it is accordingly proposed to consider them as they present themselves to our notice at three different eras: (I.) During the first three centuries. (II.) In the empire, subsequent to the recognition of Christianity by the state. (III.) Among Teutonic communities, subsequent to their nominal conversion to Christianity.

(I.) The Christian life, as conceived in the primitive church, may be said to have been dominated by two distinct, and, at first sight, somewhat antagonistic conceptions. The apostolic injunction to be "not conformed to this world," but "transformed in the renewing of the mind," and the teaching which led the early Christians to regard themselves as "an elect people, a royal priesthood, a holy race," were combined with a theory of the relations of the Christian citizen to mankind at large, which completely broke down the barriers of the old Roman exclusiveness and led him to look upon mankind as, to use the expression of Tertullian (Apol. c. 38), one great republic. It is certain, however, that, partly from a sincere desire to inculcate principles which involved the recognition of a universal brotherhood, partly from anxiety to discourage notions which caused them to be regarded with suspicion and dislike, the earlier Christians emphatically disclaimed the adoption of distinctive institutions or peculiar habits. Thus the author of the Epistle to Diognetus (c. 5) says that Christians "are in no way distinguished by their country, speech, or customs from other men;" that "they neither dwell in separate cities, nor use any peculiar dialect, nor do they lead an unusual (παράσημον) mode of life" (Bunsen, Anal. Ante-Nic. i. 111).

It is in perfect harmony with historical experience at large that, though the centres in which Christianity first assumed a distinctive social character were noted for their luxury, dissipation, and immorality, the life of the Christians themselves in this uncongenial atmosphere appears (so far as we are able to arrive at the evidence) to have been faithful to an unusual extent to the Christian ideal. The corruptions that surrounded the convert in cities such as Antioch, Alexandria, Corinth, Rome, and Carthage were, in fact, calculated to produce in minds not totally depraved a reaction of feeling which materially contributed to preserve them from yielding to the debasing influences of the example set by their fellow citizens.[a] Origen (cont. Cels. iii. 30), when referring to the life of the Christians in these great cities, does not hesitate to affirm that even the least exemplary among them greatly surpassed the majority of the pagan community (πολλῶν κρείττους τυγχάνειν τῶν ἐν τοῖς δήμοις ἐκκλησιῶν, Migne, Patrol. Graec. xi. 466). If to this condition of moral isolation we add the sense of estrangement from the state, by which, if not actually persecuted, the earlier Christians were generally looked upon with mistrust, the Christian life at this period almost necessarily involved a certain exclusiveness and habitual caution in intercourse with the world without.

While, again, in all the ordinary relations of civil life the Christian could conscientiously disclaim eccentricity or incompatibility with prevailing practice, his religion and his conduct, as derived from that religion, were such that neither the one nor the other could pass unobserved. At home, his domestic life (the life which always affords the best guarantees for the right and virtuous discharge of the duties of the citizen) offered a superficial resemblance to that of the pagan in that the observance of worship was regular and systematic, but essentially differed from it in so far that what in the one was looked upon as a mere ceremony was observed in the other as a spiritual exercise. The three canonical hours of the early church, the 3rd, the 6th, and the 9th (HOURS OF PRAYER), were marked out as times of devotion. In the family circle, at the third hour, the Scriptures were read, the common prayer was offered, and the Hallelujah Psalm sung. Then followed the first meal of the day, preceded, like every other meal, by a special prayer for the divine blessing, an observance which, to use the expression of Clemens of Alexandria, converted every meal into a sacrament (Paed. ii. 1; Tertullian, de Orat. c. 20). When the first meal was over, the mother and her children exchanged the kiss of peace and then separated, where necessary, for their daily tasks (Const. Aegypt. ii. 57, 62; Bunsen, Anal. Ante-Nic. ii. 472–3). Besides the hours above specified, the duty of private prayer was strictly enjoined (Cyprian, de Orat. Dom. c. 4) at sunrise and at sunset (ib. c. 35), before retiring to rest, and at midnight. The Scriptures were daily to be read, but their right comprehension, it was held, could be looked for only when this exercise had been preceded by prayer (Origen, de Orat. c. 31). Husband and wife were enjoined both to pray together and to study the Scriptures together, a precept involving a view of the conjugal relations which strikingly contrasts with the reply of Critobulos to Socrates (Xenophon, Oecon. iii. 12) that "he spoke with no one less than with his wife." Even in the exercise of hospitality prayer found a place, and the householder was enjoined not to let his guest depart without a joint observance of this rite (Tert. de Orat. c. 21).

Dominated by this conception, each home became a sanctuary, each day a holy-day, and the life of the perfected Christian, to quote the expression of Clemens, one long service of adoration, ἅπας δὲ ὁ βίος αὐτοῦ πανήγυρις μία (Strom. bk. vii.; Migne, Patrol. Graec. ix. 309). In all these observances, however, one feature is to be noted which offers the greatest contrast to the pagan domestic rites, namely, that they were not looked upon as a mystery to be guarded from the scrutiny of other families or races, but were readily shared with others and the doctrines they represented willingly explained, a spirit of propagandism taking the place of the exclusiveness characteristic of paganism.

Another important feature in the Christian home life was the altered position of the mother of the family, a change so considerable as to bring about a completely different conception of the relations of womanhood to society. While obedience to her husband was enjoined as a duty upon the wife, that duty ceased when it came in collision with one of a yet higher order (Justin, Apol. ii. 2). She was looked upon as capable of attaining to an equal degree of perfection (Clemens, Strom. iv. 19; Migne, ib. viii. 223), as his equal in all relations (Clemens, Paed. i. 4; Migne, ib. viii. 37), and endowed with precisely the same nature (Clemens, Strom. iv. 8; Migne, ib. viii. 213). She was to aspire to wisdom in a like degree, φιλοσοφητέον οὖν καὶ ταῖς γυναιξὶν ἐμφερῶς τοῖς ἀνδράσι (ib. iv. 8). While enjoined to be a stayer at home (ib. iv. 8; ib. viii. 214), the sphere of her activity in the domestic circle was at once extended and ennobled. To the household industry of the Roman matron she added the higher function of instructing her children (Polycarp, ad Philippenses, c. 5), and in this relation her influence was often of incalculable importance. The mothers of Chrysostom, Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, Augustine, and Theodoret, were mainly instrumental in the conversion of their sons. Clement of Rome commends the Christians at Corinth because they taught their children moderation and chastity, μέτρια καὶ σεμνὰ νοεῖν (Epist. i. 1; Cotelerius, Patres Apost. i. 147). "Let our children," says his namesake of Alexandria, "share in the instruction which is of Christ" (Strom. iv. 17; Migne, viii. 222). Augustine, on the other hand, is to be found admitting that his father, who was indifferent to Christianity, was far more anxious to see him accomplished and eloquent than virtuous and modest (Conf. ii. 3). In the Epistle of Barnabas (c. 19) the writer enjoins every Christian to instruct his sons and daughters in the fear of the Lord from their youth upwards. Leonidas, the father of Origen, made his son commit daily to heart and repeat a set portion of Scripture (Euseb. H. E. vi. 2). The distrust with which parents regarded the appearance of their children in mixed assemblies (Clemens, Strom. iii. 11) was a reflex of their own sense of danger when mingling in pagan society, and their watchful and pious care in this respect stands in remarkable contrast to the declaration of Quintilian (l. ii. 8) that the rising generation of his day were corrupted before they could well understand the distinction between good and evil, and, so far from being demoralised by their school-fellows, often brought the contagion with them from their own homes.

The discipline of the Christian household was distinguished, again, by a spirit of greater gentleness, the sternness of the pagan father towards his son being exchanged for a tone of loving admonition (Cyprian, Test. adv. Judæos, iii. 71).

While such were the influences that prevailed in his domestic life, the Christian citizen left his home to pursue his daily avocations in the world inspired by a teaching which led him to recognise in every other man a brother, and armed with a moral code which was equal to every question of conscience that might arise, a code which was, in the language of Rousseau, "always certain, always true, always single, and always in harmony with itself." In singular contrast to that feeling of hatred for foreigners on which Plato (Menexenus, p. 245) congratulates his fellow-citizens, Justin (Apol. i. 14, ii. 13) expressly notes that whereas sympathy and intercourse had before existed only between those who belonged to the same nationality, Christianity admitted no such limitations. "We," he says, "who hated and destroyed one another, and on account of their different manners would not use a common hearth and fire[b] with men of a different tribe, now, since the coming of Christ, live familiarly with them, and pray for our enemies." Even towards those who were not of the same faith the church recognised the obligation of shewing friendship and of exchanging friendly offices, "necessitas amicitiarum officiorumque gentilium" (Tert. de Cultu Fem. ii. 11; Migne, i. 1329); while all alike, young and old, bond and free, Greek and barbarian, were equally admissible as members of the Christian polity (Clemens, Strom. iv. 8; Migne, Patrol. Græc. viii. 213). The exigencies of the state at this period forbade, indeed, any to entertain the notion of a general abolition of slavery [SLAVERY], but the Christian could look upon the slave as one born by misfortune in a condition which, however pitiable, involved no religious inequality, and which he was bound to ameliorate by acts of kindness.

Underlying this new and greatly enhanced estimate of man as an individual, there was the Christian theory of the sanctity of human life, which rested, in turn, on the belief in the immortality of the soul. The procuring of abortion, regarded among pagan communities as scarcely deserving of censure, was from the first systematically denounced by the church. The mother guilty of this crime was excluded by a decree of the council of Ancyra (A.D. 314) from the sacrament until the hour of death [CHILDREN]. Infanticide, and the exposure of newly-born infants, a common practice under the empire, and, according to St Ambrose (Hexaem. v. 18), especially prevalent among the poor, as abortion was more the practice of the wealthy, was shunned by the Christian community with horror. "Christians," says the writer of the Epistle to Diognetus (c. 5), "marry and beget children, like the rest of mankind, but they do not cast away their offspring." (See also Lactantius, Div. Inst. vi. 20; Cod. Theod. XI. xxvii. 1 and 2; ib. V. vii. 1; Allard, Les Esclaves Chrét. etc. p. 370.)

But while the conception of social obligations and sympathies became thus greatly extended, in one particular relation, that of the individual citizen to the civil power, it involved a different standard from that of paganism, and one which was also somewhat lower. The Christian placed humanity above the city, and repudiated a theory which involved the obliteration of individual rights whenever they came in conflict with the supposed necessities of the state. The duties of private life, those of the man to himself, to his family, and to God, were now regarded as paramount, and patriotism was no longer the supreme duty of the citizen. The patriotism of the pagan, indeed, it has been truly said, was but a species of refined egoism by which he demanded back with interest all that he gave to the commonweal. On the Christian the love of his neighbour was enjoined as a principle, a principle which rendered the interpretation of all social duties easy and intelligible (Clem. Rom. ad Corinth. i. 49). The emperor Julian (Epist. 49) could not but contrast the kindness of Christians to strangers with the ordinary pagan indifference, and indicates this feature, together with the care shewn by them for the tombs of the dead and their external decorum of demeanour, as three points well deserving the imitation of pagans.

On the other hand, the early Christians were ready cheerfully to recognise all the customary obligations of the citizen to the commonwealth. Justin, in addressing the emperor Antoninus Pius, says, "We everywhere before all things endeavour to pay tribute and taxes to those whom you appoint" (Apol. i. 17; see also Tatian, cont. Græcos, c. 4; Apost. Const. iv. 13). The grandchildren of Jude, Eusebius tells us (E. H. iii. 20), when summoned before Domitian, pleaded in proof of their loyalty to the civil power the taxes which they paid from their manual labour, exhibiting their hands callous with toil. Tertullian (Apol. c. 33) declares that the Christians are actuated by a more reasonable sentiment of loyalty towards the emperor than that of the pagan community. Origen affirms that by their prayers they render effective support to the imperial cause, "composing a sacred army by their intercessions with the Deity" (cont. Cels. bk. viii.; Migne, Patrol. Græc. xi. 797). His language to Celsus appears to imply that they often declined civic offices, but he justifies such conduct on the ground that in so doing they are able to give themselves "to the more holy and pressing service of the church in saving the souls of men" (ib.).

In the choice of a profession or a craft, the Christian was necessarily under a certain disadvantage when compared with his pagan fellow-citizen, from the disfavour with which his creed was regarded by the state on the one hand, and from the limitations imposed by the church on the other. By the church he was forbidden to engage in any art or occupation which either directly or indirectly subserved the rites of idolatry (TRADES). The profession of the astrologer or the conjurer (the latter at this period a frequent and fruitful source of gain) was equally unlawful (Neander, Denkwürdigkeiten, &c. i. 120). He might assume the profession of arms when it had been imposed upon him by the state, but its voluntary adoption was held to disqualify him for Christian communion (Const. Aegypt. ii. 41). The calling of an actor or public dancer was altogether forbidden him (ACTOR, THEATRE). His adoption of that of a "grammaticus" or teacher of pagan learning was discouraged, partly on account of the character of the literature which he would be required to explain and comment on, partly from the close connexion of the profession with the observance of pagan festivals and ceremonies (SCHOOLMASTER). Beyond these necessary restrictions, his choice was circumscribed only by pagan prejudices against his creed: "It is lawful," says Clemens (Paed. iii. 11; Migne, Patrol. Graec. viii. 10), "to take part in public affairs (πολιτεύεσθαι); to engage in the business of the world, provided that this be done honestly, and to buy and sell, provided that one has but one price."

Idleness was systematically discouraged, and, in contrast to pagan notions, the dignity of labour was upheld and enforced. The Apostolic Constitutions (iv. 2) direct bishops to endeavour to find employment for artisans out of work, and especially for orphans. Barnabas enjoins those to whom his epistle is addressed to labour with their hands that they may thereby gain forgiveness for past sins, εἰς λύτρωσιν τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν σου (Cotelerius, Patres Apost. i. 52). It was, however, the prevalent theory of the church, at least from the 4th century, that the clergy were entitled to be exempted from manual labour (MANUAL LABOUR).

The acquirement of wealth does not appear to have been pronounced unlawful by the church, but the teachers of this period insist strongly that when acquired it should be devoted to right purposes; money, according to Clemens (Quis dives salvetur, c. 14; Migne, Patrol. Graec. ix. 338), being an instrument, not in itself an end. If lawfully obtained, whether by frugality, enterprise, or inheritance, there was nothing wrongful in its mere possession, but it was to be devoted to charitable purposes, not hoarded in a spirit of avarice. It indicates very significantly the new spirit of philanthropy fostered by Christianity, that although slavery as an institution still continued to absorb to but a slightly diminished extent the classes which at later times appealed mainly to public charity, acts of systematic benevolence on the part of the church are to be found becoming much more common. The church at Rome, in the 3rd century, supported no less than 1500 poor (Euseb. H. E. vi. 43). Nor was this charity limited to those who had embraced the Christian faith. The spontaneity of this benevolence, as it presented itself to the observation of Pachomius, impressed him so deeply as to bring about his conversion. A recent writer has said, probably with justice, that the care shewn by Christians for the unfortunate and the poor is the feature which offers the strongest[c] point of contrast to pagan society in these times (Schmidt, La Société Civile, p. 351). "Almsgiving," says Chrysostom (in Matt. Hom. xlix. 3), "is the first of trades for the rich;" and Fleury (Oeuvres, ed. Martin, p. 223) traces the principle of charity as one of the most prominent and well-sustained traditions of the church from apostolic times until the rise of monasticism.

This active principle of charity found a corresponding expression in the Christian's intercourse with those who were his equals or superiors in station. As, according to Origen (contr. Cels. Praef. c. 2), he preferred to vindicate the tenets which he had embraced rather by rectitude of life than skill in argument, so he held that his sentiments towards his fellow-men were best shewn by his unwillingness not merely to do them ill, but even to wish it, or even to speak or think evil concerning them (Tert. Apol. c. 38). Litigation was especially avoided, and the Pauline injunction to avoid all recourse to the pagan tribunals (1 Cor. vi. 6–8) became a permanent tradition in the church (Cyprian, Test. cont. Judaeos, iii. 44). "Accustomed," says Hallam (Middle Ages, c. vii. pt. 1), "to feel a strong aversion to the imperial tribunals, and even to consider a recurrence to them as hardly consistent with their profession, the early Christians retained somewhat of a similar prejudice even after the establishment of their religion. The arbitration of their bishops still seemed a less objectionable mode of settling differences. And this arbitrative jurisdiction was powerfully supported by a law of Constantine, which directed the civil magistrate to enforce the execution of episcopal awards." The church itself inculcated the practice (Apost. Const. ii. 45; Cotelerius, i. 246), and no circumstance tended more effectually to strengthen the influence of the clergy than this habitual reference of all matters in dispute among the Christians themselves to the arbitrament of their pastors.

In his personal habits, the Christian was taught to practise moderation, all ostentation being systematically avoided. His diet was to be simple, and temperance both in eating and drinking were strictly enjoined upon him. Boys and girls, says Clemens, should not touch wine, but ought ἀπέχεσθαι τοῦ φαρμάκου τούτου (Paed. ii. 2; Migne, Patrol. Graec. viii. 65). Minucius Felix (Octav. c. 31; Migne, iii. 46) contrasts the moderation and modesty of the Christians at their banquets with the licence and excess customary among the heathen. The author of the Epistle to Diognetus speaks of the Christians as "living in the flesh and not after the flesh" (c. 5), and even the feasts held in honour of the emperor appear to have been shunned by them (Tert. Apol. c. 35). The usual accompaniment of the banquet—the revel (or κῶμος) with its lascivious dances and wanton songs—was, of course, equally to be avoided (Clemens, Paed. ii. 4; Migne, ib. viii. 70). In the matter of dress it is evident that the earlier Christians affected no peculiarity, the language of the writers of the period (see DRESS) appearing rather to imply that they followed too closely the fashion of the times. Even Clemens (Paed. iii. 11), while condemning undue luxury and effeminacy, says that "the wearing of gold ornaments and soft raiment is not altogether to be condemned, but only an undue fondness for such attire," and he quotes St. Paul (1 Cor. vii. 31). Tertullian, however (de Cult. Fem. ii. 11), seems to imply that among females the convert to the faith was distinguished by greater sobriety of apparel.

In the furniture of his house the Christian was to aim at simplicity. "The use of gold and silver vessels," says Clemens (Paed. ii. 8), "is vain and idle, a mere illusion of the eye. The superfluous possession of such wealth evokes envy, it is hard to acquire, hard to keep, and ill-adapted for use." Silver plates and goblets, tripods of cedar, ebony, or ivory, bedsteads with gold and silver feet, purple curtains, &c., are enumerated by him as tokens of undue luxury, which the Christian should not possess.

Works of art adorned with representations of the deities of the pagan mythology would of course be banished from the Christian household, but there can be little doubt that during the first two centuries the tendency to asceticism among Christian communities led to an undue depreciation of art, especially in sculpture and ornament. Buonarotti (de Vitris Coemeteriibus; Mamachi, i. 249) attributes to this fact the comparative rudeness of the devices on the Christian tombs (Hefele, Beiträge, i. 26).

In the question of lawful recreation and amusements, the broad principle laid down by Cyprian, that the scriptural code forbade the Christian to witness what it was unlawful for him to do—"Prohibuit enim spectari quod prohibuit geri" (de Spectac. c. 4; Migne, iv. 340)—afforded safe and intelligible guidance. The sanguinary gladiatorial conflicts which so delighted every class in those times were a spectacle altogether unlawful. "If," says Tertullian, "we can maintain that cruelty, impiety, and barbarity are lawful, let us to the amphitheatre" (de Spectac. c. 19). "What vileness," says Clemens, "is there which is not exhibited in the theatre? . . . They who, from the uncleanness of their own hearts, take pleasure therein, transfer the representations they have witnessed to their own homes" (Paed. iii. 11; Migne, Series Graec. viii. 109).

Of the isolation in which, according to some writers, the primitive Christians passed their lives (Renan, St. Paul, p. 562), few signs are observable in the 3rd century. "The Apostolical Constitutions," says Blunt (First Three Christian Centuries, p. 311), "abound in provisions for a mixed population of Christian and heathen thrown into the most intimate civic and social relations." Christians are not unfrequently to be found holding high public office and even important positions at court. The Christian father of St. Basil was one of the most influential citizens in Pontus. Eusebius (E. H. vi. 28) states that in the household of Alexander Severus, whose mother, Julia Mammaea, befriended Christianity, they were numerously represented. Theonas, bishop of Alexandria (A.D. 282–300), writing to Lucian, who held high office in the court of Constantine Chlorus, gives him detailed advice respecting his conduct in this difficult position: he was to practise impartial justice to rich and poor, never to grant access to the emperor for a bribe, to be courteous, benevolent, and modest on all occasions, and especially to obey and serve the emperor himself with the utmost fidelity, so long as in so doing he was not involved in a breach of religious duty (Biblioth. PP. Gallandi, iv. 69, 70). "If a Christian was appointed librarian, he was to take good care not to shew any contempt for secular knowledge and the ancient writers. He was advised to make himself familiar with the poets, philosophers, orators, and historians of classical literature, and while discussing their writings to take incidental opportunities of recommending the Scriptures, etc." (Newman, Arians, p. 68). Notwithstanding, however, many and eminent exceptions, it is evident that the larger proportion of the converts to Christianity during the first three centuries was drawn from the humbler classes of society. To Celsus, who made it a matter of reproach, that the new faith appealed to and was embraced by the most illiterate and simple of mankind, Origen contents himself with the general reply that Christianity was essentially catholic in character, and, while receiving accessions from all parts, did not exclude the young, the uneducated, and the slave (Origen, c. Cels. iii. 44; Migne, Patrol. Graec. xi. 476).

Although the foregoing outline is liable to the objection that the picture it presents is derived rather from the precepts which we find laid down by the authorities of the church than from facts in the actual lives of the early Christians themselves, there is good reason for believing that precept and practice in these ages were in closer agreement than perhaps at any subsequent period of church history. The observation of Milman (Lat. Christianity, bk. i. c. 2), that "early Christianity cannot be justly estimated from its writers," is applicable rather to the polemical character of many of their treatises—a feature which in no way detracts from the value of the didactic literature of the age, or the presumption therein afforded of large and increasing communities, like that at Rome, growing into power and importance amid quiet obscurity and the practice of a genuine though retiring Christianity. The impression which the very imperfect data that remain to us are calculated to produce—the heroism of those who from time to time were compelled to attest the sincerity of their convictions by encountering martyrdom—the reluctant admiration which the lives and tenets of the Christians evidently excited in the minds of the less prejudicial observers among the pagan party—all combine to prove that the natural recoil from the excessive demoralisation of society under the empire uniting with the lofty teaching of the new faith brought about a very high standard of practical morality.

Already, however, there were evidences of a considerable decline from the primitive simplicity and earnestness. Cyprian contrasts the lukewarmness of the church in Africa with the zeal of the apostolic age, when believers sold their possessions and gave them to the poor: "Now," he says, "we give not even tenths from our patrimony, and when the Lord bids us sell, we buy and store" (de Unit. c. 24; Migne, iv. 203). In another passage he says that long immunity from persecution had brought about a great decline in religious observance ("traditam nobis disciplinam pax longa corruperat"), and he looks upon the trial of the church under Decius as divinely designed to restore her "fallen and almost unconscious condition" (de Lapsis, c. 5; Migne, iv. 182). He cites as evidence not merely the increasing tendency to money-getting and avarice, but also the frequent marriages of Christians with pagans (ib. c. 6).

(II.) That Christianity deteriorated in genuineness and earnestness soon after its recognition by the state and its profession by successive emperors, is a generally admitted fact (Baur, Die Christl. Kirche, ii. 287; Pressensé, Hist. des trois premiers Siècles de l'Église chrét. vol. v.; Schmidt, La Société Civile, &c. p. 484). Its very existence, it has been observed, was threatened by the vast numerical, but merely nominal accessions to its ranks (Hirscher, Die Christl. Moral, ed. 1851, i. 47). The fathers of the 4th century themselves frequently admit and deplore the degeneracy of their age when contrasted with apostolic times. Chrysostom speaks of the large numbers of professed Christians in his day whose sole religious observance consisted in coming to church once or twice in the year—ἅπαξ τοῦ ἐνιαυτοῦ ἢ δεύτερον παρ' ἡμῖν φοιτῶντα (de Bapt. Christi, c. 1; Migne, Patrol. Græc. xlix. 364). Augustine laments over the numerous defections in his flock, and compares the body of the church to a corpse. Those who make a profession of religion, he says, are often influenced by unworthy motives: this man has a lawsuit, and seeks to gain the good will of the clergy that they may interest themselves in his behalf; another takes refuge in the church from a powerful foe; another seeks to gain a friend, to accomplish a marriage, or to evade some responsibility, "ut aliquam pressuram hujus sæculi evadat" (in Joh. Evang. Tract. xxvi. 10; Migne, xxxv. 1600; Serm. xlvii. 17; Migne, xxxviii. 306). On the other hand, the few who sought to lead a really Christian life were often subjected to persecution and ridicule by the rest (in Ps. 90, Serm. i. 4; Migne, xxxvii. 1152). Maximus of Turin compares the absence of charity and good works in his day with the zeal of the apostolic age. So far from collecting money to lay it at the apostles' feet, the Christians of his day, he says, are to be seen dragging the victims of their extortion from the feet of the priests. If true wealth consists in good works (1 Tim. vi. 18), he fears that a wealthy man is scarcely to be found "in coetu nostro" (Hom. 94; Migne, lvii. 321).

That, as soon as Christianity had been taken under the protection and patronage of the emperor, large numbers should have professed its tenets from no better motives than those of self-interest and policy is sufficiently intelligible; but it is necessary also to take into account other causes which at this period acted with considerable potency, and in a direction unfavourable to morality and simplicity of life. Among these the most important appear to have been—

(1) The removal of the capital to Constantinople. By this important change the imperial court was brought directly under the enervating influences of Oriental habits and customs, and as the result there prevailed among the upper classes of society an amount of luxury and effeminacy unprecedented in the history of the empire. "The manners of the East," observes Milman (Hist. of Christianity, bk. iv. c. 1), "were too strong for the religion. With the first Christian emperor commenced that Oriental ceremonial, which it might almost seem that, rebuked by the old liberties of Rome, the imperial despot would not assume till he had founded another capital." Ammianus Marcellinus describes the court at the accession of Julian as "vitiorum omnium seminarium" (bk. xxii. c. 4). With the latter half of the century this evil is to be seen spreading not only in the East, but also in Rome and throughout Italy. The sermons of Chrysostom, Maximus of Turin, and Theodoret, and the letters of Jerome and Augustine plainly shew that luxury and dissipation, with their usual concomitants of avarice and inordinate love of money-getting, were at this period the most flagrant vices of society—vices against which the teachers of the church were engaged in a continual struggle, though with very imperfect success.

(2) The rise of numerous sects and the absorbing attention given to controversial theology, which affected more directly the doctrinal teaching of the age. Ammianus describes the highways in the reign of Constantius as thronged by bishops urging their way to the different synods intent on "reducing the whole sect to their particular opinions" (bk. xxi. c. 16). Hilary of Poitiers, the distinguished opponent of the Arians, laments that there are "as many creeds as opinions among men, as many doctrines as inclinations, and as many sources of blasphemy as faults" (ad Constant. ii. 4; Migne, x. 545), and he affirms that the ten provinces of Asia are nearly all Arian (de Synodis, c. 63). Pacian declares that the simple enumeration of the different sects of Christianity at this time would suffice to fill a huge volume (Migne, xiii. 1053). When Julian essayed to establish the principle of religious equality in the relations of the state to these contending sects, their fierceness, says Ammianus, appeared to him to surpass that of the wild beasts towards man (bk. xxii. c. 5). Of the extent to which these disputes affected and stirred all classes of society, a good illustration is afforded in the thirty-second oration of Gregory of Nazianzum. He says elsewhere that the disputes generated by the Eunomians made the market places ring, disturbed every banquet, and penetrated even to the women's chambers (Orat. 27; Migne, Patrol. Græc. xxxvi. 488). Augustine deplores the fact that while the pagans worship many gods without quarrelling, Christians who worship but one God are unable to remain in unity (Serm. de Utilit. jejun. c. 7, Migne, xl. 712).

(3) Importance attached to formal religious observances. As the result of this excessive attention to obscure questions in theology, dogmatic belief began to be looked upon as of greater importance than virtuous conduct; while conduct itself was conceived in too mechanical a spirit—almsgiving, fasting, and praying at stated hours being the virtues most strongly insisted on (Baur, Die Christl. Kirche, ii. 289). Augustine expressly says that these are the most meritorious actions in this life (in Ps. 42; Serm. ix. 11). "Three things," says Leo the Great (Serm. xii. 4), "there are which most of all appertain to godly action—praying, fasting, and almsgiving."

Penance was imposed by the church for comparatively small offences, and the canons of numerous councils shew a tendency to enforce a discipline which, although perhaps productive of greater outward decorum, cannot but have exercised an enervating influence on the higher conceptions of morality.

(4) Enhanced distinctions between the monastic and ecclesiastical orders and the laity. Notwithstanding the many examples offered by monasticism in its earlier stages of self-denying virtue and saintly life, its influence on society at large was certainly of a somewhat mixed character, attracting admiration among the majority of a life which they were unable to imitate, and thus, as Gieseler observes, familiarising society with the notion of a "higher and a lower order of virtue" (Kirchengesch. vi. 104). It is again at least doubtful whether the greatly advanced conception of the priestly office that now began to prevail tended to raise the moral tone of society at large. The clergy were regarded as a class exclusively devoted to religious duties, whose works of supererogation might avail on behalf of others. Eusebius describes the clerical and lay elements as constituting the two great divisions of society, of which the former, seeking neither for marriage, nor children, nor wealth, is devoted to appeasing the Deity both on their own behalf and that of their fellow-Christians (Dem. Evang. i. 8; Migne, xxii. 29, 30). No humiliation or punishment was regarded by them with so much dread as that whereby they were degraded into the position of laymen (Milman, Hist. of Christianity, bk. iv. c. 1).

(5) Degeneracy of the clergy. Notwithstanding the increased attention paid to organization and to ritual, the morality of the clergy was exposed to no ordinary temptations by their growing power and wealth, and especially by the right which the church acquired under Constantine of holding landed property and inheriting it by bequest. The practice that now began to prevail of making the clergy the ordinary dispensers of charity, was also productive of frequent abuse. A law of Valentinian I. (Cod. Theod. XVI. ii. 27, 28) declares all bequests and donations to ecclesiastics null and void. "Charioteers, actors, and harlots," says Jerome, "yea even pagan priests, may receive what a Christian priest may not; I complain not on behalf of the church, but I blush for those who have made this law necessary" (Epist. 52; Migne, xxii. 261). Chrysostom advises his hearers to distribute their alms themselves, and not through the agency of a priest or deacon (Thierry, S. Jérôme, p. 17).

Other causes might be enumerated, but the foregoing may safely be assigned as those which appear to have operated with the greatest potency when tested by the social phenomena of the 4th and 5th centuries. The period A.D. 350–400 has indeed been indicated as that when the greatest luxury known in ancient times prevailed, and whatever may be the feature of society selected, it is impossible not to recognise, even among those communities which enjoyed the most enlightened spiritual instruction of the time and afforded the most eminent examples of the Christian virtues, the demoralising effects of this influence. In the 4th century, the ostentation and luxury that prevailed among the Christians excited the surprise even of the pagan party, and Chrysostom reminds his hearers how much more effective is practice than precept: "when they" (the pagans), he says, "see us building splendid palaces and baths, laying out gardens, and purchasing estates, they cannot believe that we are looking forward to dwelling in another city" (Hom. xii. in Matt.; Migne, Patrol. Graec. lvii. 208). The view that the frivolity and dissipation engendered by this excessive luxury are to be looked upon as mainly characteristic of those who, while giving a formal assent to Christianity, really retained the habits and tastes of paganism, is not altogether borne out by the facts. Zosimus (iv. 33) does not hesitate to accuse even Theodosius of culpable effeminacy; and the sons of Theodosius were conspicuous for the oriental splendour by which they were surrounded, and the gorgeous attire which attracted the admiration of the vulgar to their person (Müller, de Genio, etc. Aevi Theodos. p. 10). The language of Synesius at the court of Arcadius attests the existence of a moral degeneracy at the imperial court which the philosopher and the Christian alike condemned (Migne, Patr. Graec. lxvi. 1075–90). The governors of the provinces, Eutropius, Rufinus, and Andronicus, were as corrupt, as rapacious, and as cruel as Verres. Milman characterises the life of the aristocracy as "exhibiting the pomp and prodigality of a high state of civilization with none of its ennobling or humanizing effects" (Hist. of Christianity, bk. iv. c. 1). Ambrose describes the holders of high public offices as seeking to gain the popular favour by instituting games in the circus, performances in the theatre, and exhibiting gladiatorial combats (de Officiis Minist. ii. 21; Migne, xvi. 131). In another passage he says that the regard for wealth has taken such a hold of men that none but the rich are had in honour (ib. ii. 26; iii. 6). Asterius, bishop of Amasea in Pontus, remonstrates with his hearers on their abandonment of "all care for virtue and the welfare of their souls;" he describes them as devoting themselves entirely to the pursuit of gain and to lounging about the market places; he depicts the luxury of their banquets, —the attendants, wine-bearers, butlers, musicians, dancing girls, flute-players, buffoons (γελωτοποιούς), parasites,—and then asks, "How many poor are wronged in order to provide this luxury? How many orphans are maltreated (κονδυλίζονται)? How many widows made to weep?" (Migne, Patrol. Graec. xl. 170). Perhaps however the most sinister feature is that he declares that many seek to be well spoken of by slave-dealers. In his sermon on Dives and Lazarus, he describes the prevailing extravagance in dress—a feature almost invariably indicative of a low standard of public morality. Some wove into the material of their costume representations of wild animals and hunting scenes, which excited the wonder even of the children in the street, who would follow pointing at the wearers. The more pious selected subjects in sacred history, the miracles, &c. (ib. xl. 166–170).

The clergy shared in this form of degeneracy. Jerome describes the young deacons at Rome as appearing in public with their hair curled like that of actors, perfumed, and wearing rings on their fingers, going from palace to palace, and there singing love-songs or declaiming comedies, and leaving with their hands full of gold (Epist. 22; Migne, xxii. 112).

The amusements most in vogue exhibited the same tendencies. "Paganism," as Ozanam truly observes, "made its last stand as associated with these" (Civilisation in the Fifth Century, i. 89). Ammianus Marcellinus asserts of the lower orders that the Circus Maximus was at once "their temple, their dwelling, their place of assembly, and the centre of all their desires" (bk. xxviii. 4). Gambling was a vice especially prevalent, and tended materially to check all habits of thriftiness (Thierry, St. Jérôme, i. 4). At the council of Laodicea (A.D. 320) it was deemed necessary to enact that Christians attending marriage feasts ought neither to dance nor leap—βαλλίζειν ἢ ὀρχεῖσθαι (Mansi, Conc. ii. 574); the clergy are also directed to retire before the plays (θεωρίαι) have commenced, a direction which evidently implies that such performances were common on such occasions among the laity.

As a consequence of this degeneracy, religious duties and the sacraments were neglected. Leo the Great (de Vocat. Gentium, ii. 33) says that even the rite of baptism was deferred by many until they found themselves in some great peril. Other observances, such as the "Agapae" or feasts at the tombs of the martyrs, were degraded into occasions of shameful excess.

The widespread belief in magic (MAGIC), whether we look upon it as a relic of paganism (PAGANISM, SURVIVAL OF), or as fostered by new Oriental influences, shews how imperfect was the Christianity of the time. Augustine, on presenting to his congregation in church a "mathematicus" who had embraced Christianity and had come forward prepared to burn his books, implies that he had duped many Christians;—"Quam multis eum putatis Christianis nummos abstulisse?" (in Psal. lxi.; Migne, xxxvi. 748).

The laxity that pervaded married life is to be inferred from the fact that the restrictions placed by Constantine on divorce (Cod. Theod. III. xvi. 1) were almost abrogated under Honorius (ib. III. xvi. 2); and Asterius declares that men changed their wives as often as their clothes, and prepared fresh marriage chambers as readily as booths at a fair (Migne, Patr. Graec. xl. 227).

Zosimus (iv. 28, 33) supports the severest strictures of the Fathers, declaring that the corruptions of the court penetrated through every grade of society, and that all order and decency were disregarded in the gratification of appetite and indolence—a condition of society which, in the view of Gibbon (iii. 404) resulted, not from the overflowing prosperity of the empire, but from "that indolent despair which enjoys the present hour, and declines the thought of futurity." If indeed we note that the writers above quoted,—from Ammianus, who died towards the close of the 4th century, to Leo who died in 461,—represent both pagan and Christian opinion, and also depict society as it existed in the most important provinces both of the Eastern and the Western empire, the "discretion" which Milman recommends in estimating the morality of the times from the writings of the Fathers, will not prevent us from concluding that the impression conveyed is, on the whole, correct; nor can it be a matter for surprise that many Christians since have sought to escape from the influence of so much general corruption by retiring into almost complete seclusion from society. The lives of St. Basil and his mother and sister at Annesi, of Asella, and of Marcella at her mansion in the suburbs of Rome, described by Jerome (Epist. 24, 38; Migne, xxii. 129, 175), that of Jerome himself, that of Paulinus at Nola, may all be looked upon as indications of a growing sentiment which found more formal expression in monasticism.

Yet notwithstanding the evidence everywhere presented of a great decline from the standard of Christian practice in earlier times, there yet appears sufficient evidence to warrant us in ascribing to Christianity the influences which mainly averted the entire demoralisation of society, and ultimately brought about its reorganisation. Features are still to be discerned which contrast favourably with the best morality of pagan communities in any age. Infanticide and the exposure of offspring continued to be persistently denounced, and were to a great extent successfully repressed by the church (Chrysostom, in illud: Filius ex se nihil facit, Hom. 4). The dignity of labour began to be in some degree recognised, and industry to be associated with freedom (Wallon, Hist. de l'Esclavage, iii. 92; Guizot, Hist. de la Civilisat. i. 52). Chrysostom declares that laborious poverty is preferable to indolent wealth (in I. Cor. Hom. xxxiv. 5). The rights and social position of women continued to be respected, and were carefully protected by the legislator (WOMEN).

The principle of universal benevolence was more systematically recognised, and Ambrose (de Offic. Minist. iii. 7) denounces the traditional custom of expelling aliens from the city when famine appeared to be impending. Asterius, while censuring the selfish luxury of the age, affirms that the man who can look upon others suffering from hunger or disease without being moved gives the lie to his human nature (Migne, Patrol. Graec. xl. 171). The letters of Theodoret relating to Celestiacus, a wealthy citizen of Carthage, who had been compelled to flee from that city on its capture by the Vandals in 439, with the loss of all his possessions, afford a picture in pleasing relief to these times. Celestiacus had been eminent both for his virtues and for his hospitality, and Theodoret (at that time bishop of Cyrrhus) describes the Christian fortitude with which he bears his heavy misfortune, and in a series of letters of introduction recommends him to the sympathy of Domnus, bishop of Antioch, and other of the chief men of that city (Migne, Patrol. Graec. lxxxiii. 1090–1096).

It is, in fact, in the virtues and abilities of the eminent men who at this period adorned the episcopate, that we recognise the element to which society owed its preservation, and round which it was, to a great extent, subsequently reorganized. "The bishop," says Gibbon (iv. 36), "was the perpetual censor of the morals of his people." "The religious heads of the communities," says Milman (bk. iv. c. 1), "were the supreme and universally recognised arbiters in all the transactions of life." As church discipline acquired greater definiteness, from the enactments of numerous councils, the episcopal influence made itself more effectively felt. The bishop often confronted the civil power with a courage and authority to which the latter found it expedient to yield. Ambrose at Milan, Gregory at Nazianzum, Synesius at Ptolemais, Deogratias at Carthage, Leo and Gregory the Great at Rome, are instances which may be considerably multiplied at this period.

In proportion to the social and political authority of the bishop was the influence which he exerted as a teacher of morality, and the teaching of these centuries was often singularly enlightened and humane. No more judicious and effective rebukes of superstition can well be cited, than are to be found in the sermons of Maximus of Turin (PAGANISM, SURVIVAL OF). The arguments by which Asterius of Amasea enforces the advantages of temperance and occasional abstinence might command the assent of the most enlightened modern social reformer (Migne, Patrol. Graec. xl. 371–4). Synesius, "in whose hands," says Milman (Hist. of Christianity, bk. iv. c. 1), "the power of the Christian bishop appears under its noblest and most beneficial form," repudiated the theory of the celibacy of the clergy. The most eminent of the Eastern clergy (in contrast to the narrow view that prevailed in the Latin church) encouraged the study of pagan literature (SCHOOLS). Even Gregory of Tours, though singularly prone to superstition and credulity, defended the principle of religious toleration. Of society, as presented to us under the influence of these more humane and liberal conceptions yet free from the deeper corruptions of the empire, we gain a glimpse in the pages of Sidonius Apollinaris, where he describes the ordinary life of the nobility of southern Gaul, with whom the bishops of the province associated on equal terms. The day commenced with attending service in the church; then early visits were paid to neighbours, from which it was customary to return before ten o'clock in the morning: the remainder of the morning was spent in playing tennis or in reading Latin authors in the library. Here the ladies were supposed to occupy themselves only with religious works, the profane writers being reserved for the men. Then followed the use of the bath, after which dinner was served (Epist. ii. 9).

It is probable that a full and satisfactory investigation of our subject at this period would render it necessary to distinguish the phenomena of Eastern and Western civilisation. In the opinion of some writers, the earlier and more complete acceptance of Christianity in the East served as an element of cohesion among the different ranks of society, which, notwithstanding the fierceness of theological controversy, enabled the Byzantine empire to oppose a successful resistance to successive shocks of barbaric invasion such as those to which the Western empire succumbed. The traditional theory, that "the example of the Byzantine empire has proved on a vast scale and in the most indisputable manner that Christianity could act only mediately and indirectly on social life, that it might receive the assent of an entire nation and yet not save it from decrepitude and death" (Flint, Philosophy of History, i. 54) is accordingly not unchallenged. "The popular element in the social organisation of the Greek people," says Mr. Finlay, "by its alliance with Christianity, infused into society the energy which saved the Eastern empire; the disunion of the Pagans and Christians, and the disorder in the administration flowing from this disunion, ruined the Western" (Hist. of Greece, ed. Tozer, i. 138).

(III.) "As Christianity," says Milman, "received the rude and ignorant barbarians within its pale, the general effect could not but be that the age would drag down the religion to its level, rather than the religion elevate the age to its own lofty standard" (Hist. of Christianity, bk. iv. c. 5). The features of society in the Teutonic communities, after their conversion, attest the truth of this observation. It is agreed by the majority of the most competent writers that the standard of morality in these communities, when compared with that of the Latin races, exhibits yet a further decline, and that if we are presented with fewer evidences of vice there was a larger amount of brutality and violence. The barbarian conquerors and the subjugated Latin communities reciprocally influenced each other, but this influence was, in the first instance, for the most part unfavourable. The latter were still further demoralized by their subject condition (Jerome, Epist. 89; Salvian, de Gub. Dei, vii. 5–10), the former by the licence in which they could indulge without check. De Broglie (l'Église et l'Empire, III. ii. 497) characterises the conquest as "la mise à sac d'une société tout entière par des hordes qu'aucun lien social ne contient." The fearful state of society in Frankland under the Merovingian dynasty, as described by Gregory of Tours, is familiar to most students of history. Ozanam (Civilis. chez les Francs, p. 311) quotes from the Libellus de Ecclesiae Disciplinis compiled by Regino, abbat of Prüm in the 9th century, the questions which the priest is there directed to put to an ordinary warrior in the confessional—a category which implies that crimes of violence and the grossest superstition were still fearfully prevalent. The aversion of the conquerors to city life enhanced the difficulty of bringing them within the influence of Christian teaching. The clergy, whose duty it was to convert, instruct, and humanise the conqueror, themselves shared in the general corruption. "From the moment that the barbarians became masters in the West, an immense deterioration becomes manifest in the clergy, in their teaching, in their standard of conduct . . . . Even from men like Prosper of Aquitaine, Avitus of Vienne, Caesarius of Arles, the descent is great to the next generation in the 6th century, with their coarse and superficial religion, their readiness to allow sin to buy itself off by prodigal gifts, the connivance by the best men at imposture, its direct encouragement by the average" (Church, Beginning of the Middle Ages, p. 49). The episcopal order, indeed, lost for a time, much of its sacred character. The bishop was often a warrior, and differed but little in his habits of life from an ordinary baron; while the work of evangelisation and the preservation of the scanty learning of the time devolved almost entirely on the monastic orders. Slavery reappeared in its harshest form, and, in spite of the efforts of the clergy, continued long after the 9th century to disgrace the Christianity of the age (SLAVERY).

In fine, it would seem that society, if we interpret the term in its strict sense, can scarcely be said to have existed in Italy, Gaul, or Britain during the period that immediately succeeded the conquests by the Lombard, the Frank, and the Saxon. In its place we can discern only a state of disorganisation wherein the obligations and restraints imposed by the most rudimentary form of civilisation nearly altogether disappeared. This condition of things was gradually, and often with the intervention of an almost complete relapse, succeeded by one which exhibits the re-organisation of society mainly under ecclesiastical influences, and the establishment of institutions, national, social, and domestic, which reflect a combined tradition of Roman law and Christian doctrine.

SOISSONS, COUNCIL OF (SUESSIONENSE CONCILIUM), A.D. 744, attended by twenty-three bishops, when ten canons on discipline were passed, Abel and Arthert ordained archbishops of Rheims and Sens, and Adelbert condemned for heresy. (Mansi, xii. 369–372.) [E. S. Ff.]

SOLDIERS. [MILITARY SERVICE.]

SOLEAS. A term in Eastern church architecture, as to the meaning and derivation of which there has been great diversity of opinion. The orthography of the word is also very variable. We find σωλέαι, σωλέα, σωλία, σωλεία, σολέα. The difficulty in determining the reference of the word was recognised by Goar, who attributes it to the arrangement having almost passed out of use, and remarks, "in ecclesiis Græcis ubique nomen habet, in rarissimis conspicitur" (Goar, Euchолog. 18). Allatius, as is his wont, pours forth a mass of learning on the subject, and comes to strangely erroneous conclusions in the end. At one time he agrees with Meursius and Beveridge (Pandect. vol. ii. annot. p. 74) in regarding the word as synonymous with "solium," a throne (de Templ. Graec. Recent. ep. ii.); but in his Dissertation de Solea he identifies it with the "tabulatum" or "iconostasis." An examination of the passages in which the word occurs proves the erroneousness of both. It is true that the word is not always strictly used, and sometimes has a wider signification than at others; but there can be no doubt that the "soleas" was a division of the church, not a piece of church furniture; and there can be as little question that Neale is right in deciding it to be the raised platform intervening between the "trapeza" or nave, and the "bema" or sanctuary, ascended from the nave by one or more steps. It was outside the "cancelli" or "iconostasis" of the "bema," and was approached from the sanctuary through the "holy doors." The "beautiful doors," which are placed by Neale further down the nave, were to the (ritual) west of the "soleas," and the "ambo" stood near it. It corresponded to the chancel-rail step in our churches, being the place where the communicants knelt to receive the Eucharist. At ordinations, according to Goar (u.s.), the ordinand, whether deacon or priest, took his place on the "soleas," and two deacons came out from the "bema" and conducted him, on either side, up to the holy doors. At a later period the "solea" seems to have gained extension to the west, and became the place for the subdeacons and readers, and was called βῆμα τῶν ἀναγνωστῶν. It is correctly defined by Gretser (Annotat. ad Codin. pp. 360–361, ed. Bonn) as "gradus vel locus excelsior ad sacras βήματος fores positus, ex quo Christus pro Christiana communione distribuitur." Its true position and character appear from various passages in Codinus, who describes the emperor descending from the "ambo," and passing alone across the "soleas," "not the way he came towards the beautiful doors," but towards the "soleas" and "bema," and finding the patriarch standing to receive him at the "holy doors" (Codin. Curopal. c. 17, pp. 91, 94; also p. 361). In the more stately churches the "solea" was inlaid with costly marbles, ornamented with plates of silver, and decorated with images. When the dome of St. Sophia fell, it broke to pieces τοὺς σωλείας ἐξ ὀνυχίτου ὄντας λίθου; and on the restoration by Justin II., both it and the ambo were made of silver (Codin. Annotat. p. 361; Allat. de Solea, c. xi.). SOLITARIES. For some account of the impulses which led men to seek solitude in the wilderness, see HERMIT, MONASTERY. It may be added that solitaries before long began to cluster round great and populous cities. [Compare SARABAITAE.] Partly perhaps they were influenced by actual experience of the spiritual horrors of loneliness, partly by a wish to mingle in the theological fray between orthodox and heretics, partly perhaps by a longing to have their hardships noticed and honoured by men. Sometimes the cell of the solitary was semi-attached to a monastery (Theodoret, Hist. Relig. c. 3). Sometimes the solitary cell was only a temporary shelter, a retreat in which to take breath, as it were, for a moment before engaging again in the battle of life. It was ever the advice of the wisest leaders of the monastic movement that there should be a certain period of probation in a monastery before undertaking the life of a solitary, and that none should be allowed to expose themselves to the risks of it without the express sanction of their monastic superiors (Cass. Collat. Praef. xviii.). As the monastic system became more firmly consolidated, and at the same time more complex in its organisation, the solitary life, especially in Western Christendom, came to be more and more exceptional in its occurrence (Conc. Toletan. vii. A.D. 646, c. 5; Conc. Francof. A.D. 794, c. 12).

SOMNIARIUS, Somniatorum Conjector, ὀνειροκρίτης, ὀνειρόμαντις, ὀνειρόπολος. A law of Constantius and Julian, A.D. 358, denounces those who "narrandis somniis occultant artem aliquam divinandi" (Theodos. Codex, x. 16, De Malef. 6). The offence was equally forbidden in the empire founded by Charlemagne (Capit. inc. an. c. 40; Baluz. Cap. Reg. Franc. i. 518; comp. the complete code, vi. 215; Herardi, Capit. 3). The council of Paris, A.D. 829, regarded the practices of the "somniatorum conjectores" as a relic of paganism (iii. 2; comp. Add. ii. to the Cap. Reg. Franc. c. 21). [W. E. S.]

SONUS, or rather, corruptly, sonum. The OFFERTORIUM of the Franks was so called, e. g. "Sonum quod canetur (sic) . . . quando procedit oblatio" (German. Paris. Expos. Brev. Miss.). The name is said (Germ. u. s.; comp. Isid. Hisp. de Eccl. Off. i. 14; Amal. de Eccl. Off. iii. 19) to have been given to the anthem, because sung in imitation of the sounding of trumpets over sacrifices under the law (Num. x. 10).

Among the Goths of Spain the proper anthem at lauds and vespers on festivals was also called sonum. E. g. the council of Merida, 666, orders that on such days "post lumen oblatum (=lucernarium) prius dicatur vespertinum quam sonum" (can. 2). This sonum was sometimes called laudes; for whereas the Mozarabic breviary directs that it shall follow vespers immediately, Isidore says that the lucernarium was followed by "two psalms, one responsory and laudes" (Regul. Monach. 6). The following is the sonum, or in the yet lower Latin of the Hispano-Gothic breviary, the "sono," for Easter day: "ego dormivi et quievi, et resurrexi, quoniam Dominus suscitavit me. P. Gloria mea. Alleluia. V. Non timebo millia populi mei circumdantis me: exurge, Domine; salva me, Deus meus. P. Gloria mea. Alleluia" (Brev. Goth. Lorenzana, 370). [W. E. S.]

SORTILEGY. It was held that "demons rule lots" (Cypr. de Idol. Vanit.; comp. Minut. Fel. Octav. 8; Greg. M. Epist. vii. 66). Hence divination by lots was thought a part of magic and a branch of idolatry. It was therefore forbidden to Christians both in the East and West; as by Conc. Ancyr. 358 (can. 23), C. Venet. in Gallia, 465 (c. 16), C. Agath. 506 (c. 42), Aurel. I. 511 (c. 30), Autiss. 518 (c. 4), &c. It was a subject of inquiry at episcopal visitation (Regino, de Discipl. Eccl. 151, ed. Baluz.), and at confession (see the old Gallican penitential, c. 26, in Mus. Ital. i. 393, and others in Morinus, de Sacram. Poenit. 587, &c.). It was condemned by Christian princes; as by Childeric, 742 (c. 5), Carloman, 742 (c. 14). Car. M. 769; id. 789 (c. 23), Capit. Reg. Franc. vi. 215, vii. 128. Under the Frankish laws sortilegi were not received as witnesses (Capit. Reg. Franc. vi. 397, vii. 369).

The methods were various, "sortes quas sanctorum vocant (comp. Concc. Agath. Venet. Aurel. u. s.; Bede, de Remed. Peccat. c. 11), vel quas de ligno, aut de pane faciunt" (Conc. Autiss. u. s.). Divination "per sortes sanctorum" was a Christian counterpart of the sortes Virgilianae, &c. An augury was drawn from, or a conclusion founded on, the first passage at which some sacred book (as the psalter or gospel, Car. M. an. 789, c. 3; the lectionary, Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iv. 16; the sacramentary, Jonas Aurel. in Vita S. Huberti, c. 15, in Baluz. Not. ad Cap. Reg. Fr. ii. 1038; &c.) first opened at hazard. This is condemned by St. Augustine as an abuse of the divine oracles, though he had rather men had such recourse to the gospels than to demons (Ep. 55 ad Januar. xx. 37). The Gallican Penitential, u. s. punished even this when "contra rationem." See instances of the practice in Greg. Tur. or Jonas, u. s.; Vita S. Consortiae 9, in Acta Bened. i. 249; Vita S. Hucberti, 18; Acta Ben. iv. i. 302. An unsought omen from a Psalm ended the opposition to the choice of St. Martin as bishop of Tours (Sulpicius Sever. de Vita B. Mart. 9).

There is extant, under the title of Sortes Apostolorum, a collection of pious sentences, but not from the apostolical writings, so framed as to give suitable, though vague, replies to every probable inquiry. They were printed by Petr. Pithoeus in his Codex Canonum Vet. Eccl. Rom. Par. 1687, p. 370. A fast of three days on bread and water is prescribed before using them. On the third day the office of the Holy Trinity is to be recited and Mass heard. Special prayers are also provided. At the end we read, "Haec sunt Sortes Sanctorum quae nunquam falluntur, neque mentiuntur; id est, Deum roga et obtinebis quod cupis. Age Ei gratias."

Many tribes retained a custom observed by their heathen ancestors (see of the Suessones, Vita Anskari, 18, 26, 30, Pertz, ii. 701; of the Saxons, Transl. S. Alex. 2, ib. 675; of the Frisiones, Wulframi Vita, 6, 8, in Acta Bened. iii. i. 359, 361; Vita Willibrordi, 11 ("sors damnatorum"), ib. 609; comp. Willebrordi Vita, 3, Pertz, ii. 381) of deciding questions of guilt or innocence, life or death, by lot. This was sanctioned by Christian princes; e. g. of a slave accused of theft, "ad sortem ponatur" (Childebert, 593, c. 5). The Lex Frisionum describes a method (comp. Tacitus, Germania, 10). Two tallies, one marked with a cross, were wrapped in white wool, and laid on the altar. If that marked was drawn, the person was acquitted. Some kinds of ordeal, as governed by chance, were included under the term sors. Hence, "ad sortem ambulare" (Childeb. u. s. 8). Dagobert, 630: "Ad ignem seu ad sortem se excusare studeat" (Lex Ripuar. xxxi. 5; Reg. Franc. Cap. Baluz. i. 34). Leo IV. charges the Bretons with settling every cause by lot: "Sortes quibus cuncta vos in vestris discriminatis judiciis" (Ep. ii. 4).

SOUL, SYMBOLS OF THE. The following symbols were used by Christians in the first centuries to denote the deliverance of the soul from the fetters of the flesh and its approach to heaven: (1) a horse running a race and near the goal, derived no doubt from 1 Cor. ix. 24, and perhaps from 2 Tim. iv. 7; (2) a ship in full sail towards a lighthouse, or already arrived at port; (3) a sheep or a lamb, sometimes by itself, sometimes borne back to the fold in the arms of the Good Shepherd; (4) a dove, sometimes on the wing, sometimes seated near an empty vase—a symbol of the body deserted by the spirit—or again settling in a flower-garden, to signify the repose of the soul in Paradise; (5) a female figure quitting a lifeless corpse; (6) by a miniature figure resembling, and close by, the representation of the dead. A curious instance of the use of the female figure occurs on a leaden medallion figured by Lupi (Dissert. i. 197), representing the martyrdom of St. Lawrence [Money, pl. viii.]. An executioner is turning the body of the saint upon the gridiron, and a half-length female figure is rising from it with hands clasped towards heaven, from which a hand is extended, placing upon her head a crown of gold.

It is possible that the female figures in prayer or contemplation between two trees, found on so many tombs, may also be symbolic representations of the soul (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v. 'Ame').

SPANOCLISTUS. A corrupt form of the Greek ἐπανόκλειστος, a term applied to chalices, patens, chandeliers, &c., closed-in at the top. The word occurs frequently in Anastasius. There we read that Leo III. gave to St. Peter's "calicem aureum praecipuum spanoclistum diversis ornatum lapidibus," together with "patenam auream spanoclistam" (Anast. § 399). The same pope also gave "gabathae spanoclistae" to hang for the purpose of giving light in the "quadriporticus" or cloister (§ 418); and a "regnum spanoclistum" of gold with a cross depending from it to hang over the altar (§ 398). Paschal I. also presented to the church of St. Praxedes a gold and jewelled "regnum spanoclistum" to light the altar (§ 435). [Crown; Corona Lucis; Gabatha.]

SPIRITS, EVIL. [Demon; Demoniac; Exorcism.]

tualia) it is convenient to enumerate the principal practices which are believed to contribute to the exaltation of the spiritual life.

1. First among these we may reckon Reading, and especially the reading of the Bible [SCRIPTURE, STUDY OF], both in public and in private. To this soon came to be added works compiled with a special view to edification, such as the Acts of Martyrs, the Collationes of John Cassian, and the lives and miracles of famous men collected by Rufinus, Theodoret, Joannes Moschus, Gregory of Tours, and others. Forgeries in this field of literature soon came to be frequent, and many Christians had an inclination for the pagan literature which the more ascetic leaders condemned; circumstances which led to certain books being marked off by authority as unfit for the reading of Christian people [PROHIBITED BOOKS; SCHOOLS].

2. The Psalms in particular have always had a special prominence among the books used for spiritual exercise [PSALMODY]. The fathers constantly recommend the learning and the saying of psalms as an exercise of the highest efficacy. (See, for instance, Jerome, Epist. 107, ad Lactam, c. 4; Epist. 125 ad Rustic. c. 11; Epist. 108 ad Eustoch. c. 19.) And the psalms —however long a portion might be said—were commonly recited standing, unless in case of some grievous infirmity (Theodoret, Hist. Relig. cc. 2 and 5; Moschus, Pratum Spirituale, c. 140; Basil. Epist. 63 ad Neocaesarcenses, &c.). With psalmody is intimately connected the observance of VIGILS, especially in monasteries [HOURS OF PRAYER, p. 795]. A whole class of monks, the "Sleepless" [ACOEMETAE], devoted themselves to keeping up the Divine office [OFFICE, THE DIVINE] without intermission.

3. PRAYER and PROCESSIONS, LITANIES, ROGATIONS, STATIONS, and PILGRIMAGES, which are reckoned among spiritual exercises, are treated under their proper headings.

4. The Confession of sin, both to the Lord (Ps. xxxii. 6; 1 John i. 8, 9), and to the brethren (James v. 16), is reckoned among the exercises which tend to edification. Nothing, says an old father of the desert (Rufinus, Vitae Patrum, ii. 9), so weakens the power of Satan as to disclose our unclean thoughts to holy men and spiritual fathers. And nothing, says another (ib. 117), more rejoices the enemy of souls than the concealment of such thoughts in the breast. Hence in monastic orders, both of earlier and later times, a reciprocal confession of sins is enjoined on the brethren. See, for instance, Regula Columbani, c. 10, and the Regula Cujusdam, c. 6 (in Holstenius, i. 397); the latter is supposed by Holstenius to be Columba's. This kind of confession is distinct from the auricular confession which is followed by sacramental absolution.

5. That the Holy Communion holds a high place among the means of grace needs scarcely to be said. On the frequency of communion, see COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 421. It may further be observed that in the early African Church the brethren were so anxious to sanctify every meal by first partaking of the Eucharist, that the consecrated elements were taken home for that purpose (Tertullian ad Uxorem, ii. 5; De Orat. 19; Cyprian, de Lapsis, ii. 26. See also ARCA, RESERVATION). Hippolytus wrote a treatise, which was known to Jerome (Epist. 71 ad Lucin. c. 6), on the question whether we ought to communicate daily or at set times. We may see from the laments of Chrysostom and others that ordinary lay persons communicated less frequently than was desired, but with specially devout men it was otherwise. The old monk Apollo, for instance, communicated daily, and taught his disciples not to eat until they had received the Eucharist (Palladius, Hist. Laus. c. 52, pp. 750, 751).

6. Self-Examination (sometimes called Recollectio) is a recognised duty of Christians (2 Cor. xiii. 5), especially before Holy Communion (1 Cor. xi. 28); but self-examination as a systematic practice, regulated by definite rules and recurring at certain times, is the development of a later age. Clement of Alexandria, in the directions for Christian life which form the Paedagogus, though he quotes the Pythagorean precept, that a man should examine himself every day, does not hold it up as necessary for the Christian (Paedag. i. 10), and Macarius in his special treatise on "the Guarding of the Heart," while he insists strongly on the necessity of withdrawing into oneself and of constant self-watchfulness, nowhere recommends any methodical practice of this exercise (περὶ φυλακῆς καρδίας, c. 1.; but compare Athanasius, Vita S. Antonii, c. 28). Cassian (Collat. v. 14) advises every man to direct his principal efforts against the sin which most easily besets him, but gives no directions for self-examination such as prevailed in later times. Nor do Chrysostom's strong recommendations of watchfulness over oneself (Hom. 73 ad Pop. Antioch.; Hom. 82 in Joann.) imply any definite rules for examination of conscience. Such rules, in fact, scarcely belong to an age earlier than that of St. Bernard and the mediaeval mystics.

7. Meditation or Contemplation, the effort to withdraw the soul from the world of sense, and fix it on God and things divine, plays a very important part in the lives of mediaeval and modern mystics. But in this case also the development of the system does not belong to the ancient Church, though we frequently find in ancient worthies—especially in the ancient hermits or "Fathers of the Desert"—an immense power of withdrawal from the outer world, generally coupled with the faculty of seeing visions of things unearthly. One particular form of contemplation—the contemplation of death—is found from a period of considerable antiquity. Several of the Eastern ascetics, after the example of Anthony, dug their graves near the caves which they inhabited, or lived in tombs, so as to be always reminded of their latter end (Palladius, Lausiaca, cc. 5, 45, 109, 113; Theodoret, Hist. Relig. cc. 6, 9, 12). John the Almsgiver, patriarch of Alexandria (†616), had his grave and coffin partly prepared, and bade the workman inquire aloud, on every high festival, whether he should not finish the work, as he knew not when his Lord would come (Leontius Neapol. Vita S. Joann. Elcemos. c. 18). The abbess Caesaria of Arles, sister of the famous bishop Caesarius (†542), had a hundred stone coffins made for her hundred nuns, which were placed around the church, that they might daily be reminded of death. And other instances might be mentioned of similar practices.

8. Silence of course accompanies meditation. Pambos, the monk, we read (Socrates, H. E. iv.

23, p. 238) was so struck by the first verse of the 39th Psalm—"I said, I will take heed to my ways, that I offend not in my tongue"—that he would hear no more, and said that in many years he had not learned to practise it. Monks came to be named ἡσυχασταί and their dwellings ἡσυχαστήρια, from their habit of silence [HESYCHASTAE]. Macarius kept silence a whole Lent (Lausiaca, c. 20, p. 723); Arsenius rushed from the tumult of the court-life of Constantinople to learn to practise silence in the desert (Rufinus, ii. 190). The monks of Tabennae kept so profound a silence that they seemed to be in solitude (Lausiaca, 48); the Nitrian monks appear to have kept silence, each in his separate cell, except when they met at the church on the Sabbath and the Lord's Day (ib. 69). The abbat Thomas kept silence for thirty years (ib. 50; Rufinus, ii. 6), an unnamed virgin (Lausiaca, 85) for twenty-five; John the Silentiary for forty-seven (Cyrillus, Vita Jo. Sil. c. 23; in Surius, v. 399). Pachomius taught his monks to indicate their wants by signs, so as to avoid talking (Pachomii Reg. c. 3, in Holstenius, i. 27). The Benedictine Rule, and most other monastic rules following it, enjoin absolute silence in a monastery after Compline, and also at table, except so far as regards the reading of an edifying book (Reg. Benedicti, cc. 38, 42, 52; Fructuosi, cc. 8, 15; Columbani, c. 8; Magistri, c. 8). (Altesserrae Ascoticon; Zöckler, Kritische Geschichte der Askese.) [C.]

SPOLIA. [VACANCY.]

SPONGE. The sponge used in the Greek liturgical ritual is known as ἅγιος σπόγγος, or μύσα, spongia sacra, or purificatorium. Its present form, which has probably come down with little change from earlier times, is described by Allatius (de Rec. Graec. Templ. p. 149) as a piece of sponge compressed into a solid cube, affixed to a long handle. It was used in the office of prothesis to collect the small crumbs of the bread on the paten, that none might fall off (Office of Prothesis, Neale, H. East. Ch. Introd. 349), and in the Eucharistic office was repeatedly employed by the deacon to cleanse the paten and chalice (Goar, Euchолog. Lit. Chrysost. pp. 76, 151), and after the reception any remaining fragments were swept by it into the chalice, and both that and the paten cleansed. For this purpose the holy veil was also employed, μετὰ τὴν μετάληψιν σπογγίζει τῷ καλύμματι τὸ ἅγιον ποτήριον . . . . τότε λαβὼν τὸν ἅγιον δίσκον ὁ διάκονος ἐκάνω τοῦ ἁγίου ποτηρίου ἀποσπογγίζει τῷ ἁγίῳ σπόγγῳ κάνω καλῶς (Liturg. S. Chrysost.; Goar, Euchol. p. 83). The sacred virtue of the Eucharist was regarded as being imparted to the sponge, which according to Goar (u. s.) was distributed by the patriarch among the people. It is similarly recorded in the memoir of Gregory II. by Anastasius (§ 182) that Eudo of Aquitaine, when about to encounter the Saracens, distributed portions of a sponge "ad usum mensae pontificis," which saved all who received them from wounds and death. A liturgical sponge of larger size was also kept for the ritual washing of the Holy Table by the patriarch on Maundy Thursday (Typ. S. Sabae, c. 41; Euchol. p. 624). (Allat. de Eccl. Graec. Temp. Epist. 1, de Missa.) [E. V.]

SPONSALIA. [MARRIAGE.]

SPONSORS (ἀνάδοχοι; οἱ προσφέροντες; παιδαγωγοί; καθηγεμόνες; χειραγωγοί [of adults]; οἱ ἀποστατόμενοι, συνταττόμενοι; sponsores; fidejussores; fidei doctores, al. fidedoctores; susceptores; computres spiritules, even parentes; offerentes. The occurrence and meaning of several of these titles will appear below).

HISTORY.—Though analogies and justification for the institution of sponsors may be found in the Bible, yet there is no mention of the word or thing. And though Fuller (Worthies of England, p. 326) says "that the Jews had a custom, at the circumcising of their children, that certain undertakers should make a solemn stipulation for their pious education, conformable to our godfathers in baptism," it is doubtful whether these were anything more than witnesses of the ceremony. We may adopt the argument of Tertullian (de Cor. Mil. 3), "If no scripture hath determined this, assuredly custom hath confirmed it, which doubtless has been derived from tradition. Other observances, without any Scripture document, we defend on the ground of tradition alone, and by the supports of consequent custom. In fact, to begin with baptism, when we are about to come to the water, in the same place, but at a somewhat earlier time (i.e. as catechumens), we do in the church testify, under the hand of a chief minister, that we renounce the devil, his pomps, and his angels. Then are we thrice dipped, pledging ourselves to something more than the Lord hath prescribed in the Gospel; then, some undertaking the charge of us (suscepti, i.e. by the susceptores, lit. those who take the candidates out of the font, or god-parents), we first taste a mixture of honey and milk." The origin of sponsorship is lost in obscurity, for though some (e.g. Durantus, de Rit. Eccl. i. 19) make Hyginus, bishop of Rome, A.D. 138–141, to be the first authority for it, the necessity for its introduction is rather to be referred to the general circumstances of those times. The frequent persecutions during those early ages brought with them a twofold peril, the probability of the violent death of Christian parents, and the possibility of the lapse into paganism of the baptized. Hence arose a twofold necessity on the part of the church of obtaining a security, independent of the parents, that the baptized infants should be brought up in the faith of the church in case of their parents' death or apostasy, and that the real character of adults seeking baptism should be answered for by other than themselves, to guard against the like spiritual calamity. We know that the risk of post-baptismal sin and fall led many of the severer school of Christian thought to advise and practise postponement of baptism, e.g. Tertullian, who uses the following argument, which incidentally bears witness to the sponsorial office as an established institution in the church. "The delaying of baptism is more profitable, according to the condition, or disposition, and moreover the age of each person, but especially in the case of children. For why is it necessary, if the thing be not so necessary, that the sponsors (sponsores) also be brought into danger? for both they themselves may, from their mortal nature, fail of their promises, and they may be disappointed by the growing up of a bad disposition" (de Baptism. c. [illegible]). The more charitable and trustful course that indicated in the Respons. ad Orthod., attributed to Justin Martyr, 56, Ἀξιοῦνται τῶν διὰ τοῦ βαπτίσματος ἀγαθῶν τὰ βρέφη τῇ πίστει τῶν προσφερόντων αὐτὰ τῷ βαπτίσματι. And so the author under the name of Dionys. Areop. (de Eccl. Hierarch. cap. vii. ad fin.), "It appeared good to receive infants in this way, that the natural parents of the child offered should hand the boy over to one of the faithful, a good teacher of divine things, under whom, as under a divine father (godfather), and a pupil in sacred saving truth, the boy should be. On this man then promising that he will educate the child in holy living, the priest enjoins that he promise the renunciations and confess the faith. Mark, he does not say, I do this instead of the child, but so the child does, i.e. I promise that I will train up the child by my sedulous exhortations, so that when he grows to years of discretion he will renounce."

The rationale of the office for adults is thus given by the same writer (de Eccl. Hierarch. cap. ii. par. 2): "He that is inflamed with desire of obtaining the heavenly gift (in baptism) goes to some one of the number of the faithful, and prays him to take him to the priest, promising that he will thoroughly follow all that is delivered to him; and he prays that he will both bring him, and that he will undertake the care of regulating the rest of his life for him. The other (with deep sense of his responsibility, &c.) most kindly promises to do what he asks, and, taking the man, brings him to the priest, who with joy proceeds, &c. [At a later stage of the proceedings] he orders the man and his susceptor to be described and the names written down. One of the ministers calls aloud to each, and then leads him into the water," &c.

That these sponsors were provided in a great measure to afford guarantees for the character of the catechumen is plain from the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. viii. c. 32), "Let those who first come to the holy mystery be led by the deacon to the bishop or to the presbyters, and let them examine into the reasons wherefore they are come to the word of the Lord. And let those who bring them bear witness unto them, knowing accurately what concerns them. And let their manner and life be examined into." The rest of the chapter deals with this examination in detail. For the same ends it was customary for deacons and deaconesses to undertake the office. In the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. iii. 16) it is prescribed, "Let a deacon receive (i.e. as sponsor, for baptism) a man, a deaconess a woman, that the grant of the irrefragable seal may be made with seemly security." Instances are given by Cotelerius in his note, from the Life of St. Epiphanius: "Lucian was the father (i.e. the godfather) of Epiphanius in holy baptism; and Bernice, a holy virgin, had been the (god) mother of the sister of Epiphanius." Victor of Utica (de Persec. Vandal.) says, "A deacon stood for (suscepit) each one." (See also Bingham, bk. xi. cap. viii. § 7.)

Hence also the great care which the early church used in the selection of persons (other than deacons) to undertake the office of sponsors. The ancients excluded all catechumens, energumens, heretics, and penitents, that is, all persons who were never yet in full communion with the church, as being themselves unbaptized; or else, such as had forfeited the privileges of their baptism by their errors, or crimes, or incapacity. By some canons persons who were never confirmed were also excluded. At a council held at Auxerre, A.D. 578, monks and nuns were forbidden to act in this capacity (see Bingham, bk. xi. cap. 8, § 10). It does not appear that wives stood with their husbands in any case. Elias, metropolitan of Crete (A.D. 7[illegible]), answering the monk Dionysius (lib. iii. juris Orientalis), speaks strongly on the grave duties of sponsors.

The fourth Council of Carthage (A.D. 398), canon 12, prescribed one of the duties of widows and deaconesses to be the instruction of the ignorant and rustic women how to make their responses to the interrogatories which the ministers would put to them in baptism; and how to order their conversation afterwards.

In the writings of St. Augustine, and in those attributed to him, we have frequent allusion to the institution of sponsors, with practical advice; e.g. Serm. 163, de Tempore, and to similar purport, De Rectitudine Cathol Conversat. §§ 2, 4, "I admonish you above all, both men and women who have stood for children in baptism, that you recognise that you are sureties (fidejussores) to God for those whom you have been seen to receive from the font." Where also he adds further injunctions to persevere in this duty: "You ought to admonish them to preserve chastity, love, justice, charity, and above all things teach them the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and Ten Commandments, and the first rudiments of the Christian religion." These instructions are quoted in the canons of Cealchythe, A.D. 785.

In his Epistle to Macedonius, no. 153, he speaks of a surety deceived by him for whom he stood.

The threefold interrogatories put to sponsors, and the promises made in return by them, are often alluded to by St. Augustine, and all is reckoned to the benefit of the child: e.g., "It is piously believed that the faith of those by whom he is offered for consecration is profitable to the infant" (De Lib. Arbitr. iii. 23; and similarly De Baptismo c. Donatist. iv. 31; and De Pecc. Mer. et Rem. lib. i. in various passages, especially in cap. 38).

The questions put to Augustine by a scrupulous bishop, Boniface, occasioned him to treat of the subject of sponsors, and to expound the rationale of them more fully than elsewhere (Ep. ad Bonif. 98, al. 23). He expressly states the Scripture truth that regeneration is by water and the Holy Ghost, not by the will of the parents (1), or by the faith of the sponsors (2), or by the faith of the ministers; where we should observe the distinction between (1) and (2) drawn by the writer. Again, even misdirected faith and lack of right intention, on the part of sponsors, do not vitiate the sacrament. "For it is not so much by those by whose hands they are carried that children are offered for receiving spiritual grace (although by them too, if they be themselves good and faithful), as by the universal society of the saints and faithful; by all, in short, whose love and faith is in operation." Thirdly: "It is not necessary for the removal of original sin, that the children be presented by the parents: for in fact many are often offered by persons, as it may happen, no way related to them, e.g. slaves offered by their masters; or children whose parents were dead are offered by those who have had it in their power to take on them this merciful office. Sometimes also those whom their parents have cruelly exposed to be nurtured by any chance people, are gathered in by holy virgins, and by them presented to baptism. They certainly never had any children of their own, nor have it in prospect."

In the view of this paragraph, exhibiting the great variety of sponsors in that disturbed time, we may believe that Bingham has assumed too much when he says (bk. xi. cap. viii. § 2), "Parents were commonly sponsors for their own children." The dogmatic truth which lay at the foundation of the institution of sponsors is stated by St. Augustine in the latter part of chap. 5 of his letter aforesaid. The very next scruple proposed by Boniface, and dissipated by Augustine, would seem to shew that if parents were sponsors in any case it was not qua parents, but as being members of the church and representing the church; that the primitive doctrine of infant baptism was to make sponsorship depend, not on a natural tie, but on its position in the communion of saints. And the answer of Augustine is made general for all cases, viz. that a child who through his sponsor answers that he believes, does believe, as having received the sacrament of faith, for the sacrament of faith does itself render him a faithful one. It may be added that, as the church was really and ultimately the spiritual mother, so on the church, and not on the sponsors, devolved the duty of maintaining the baptized orphan or destitute.

The writings of Clement of Alexandria, when he treats of regeneration in baptism, with details analogous to those of the birth in the flesh, embody the ancient sense of "godparents," as designating the parties who promote the spiritual regeneration of the infant by taking for him the pledges, or engaging to remind him of them, or both (see Blunt, On the Use of the Fathers, p. 337). And so is the later term "patrini" explained by Hugo, de Sacram. (ap. Durantus, de Rit. Eccl. lib. i. 19); "They are so called because while they offer children to be regenerated to a new life, they in a sort of way become auxiliary to their new regeneration." "That the spiritual generation may be more expressively represented, there being spiritual parents present, they are called parentes, and the suscepti are called filii" (S. Aug. Serm. 116). Other writers speak of the love which a godfather ought to bear towards his godchild as that of a father, not in the way of consanguinity but of spiritual proximity.

From language of this sort the step was perhaps natural to the doctrine associated with the term "spiritual affinity." [PROHIBITED DEGREES, p. 1728.] In the laws of king Ina, A.D. 693, no. 14, the sponsor had a share in his godson's weregild if slain, i.e. the satisfaction to be made in money for murder to the kindred of the murdered party. Nicephorus, patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 806, excluded a man from church for having married a woman whose children he had stood for, thus being already a "compater," i.e. "simul pater." The Council of Mayence, A.D. 813, uses the same term "compatres spirituales," and orders them to instruct their children in the catholic faith. In canon 55 it is enjoined, "Nullus proprium filium vel filiam de fonte baptismatis suscipiat; nec filii olam, nec commatrem ducat uxorem; nec illam cujus filiam, aut filiam ad confirmationem duxerat." Where the reason on which the canon is based is to be especially observed. It was the same reason which led to the limitation of the number of sponsors again, which originally had been one, and in after years had grown to more.

It was always understood that the promises made by the sponsors were made, not in their own name, but in the name of the baptized, and that they became subsequently responsible.

Bingham (bk. xi. cap. viii.) has collected, as usual, much valuable information on the subject of sponsors. Martene has an apposite quotation from St. Chrysostom 'in Ps. 14,' but the reference is incorrect. [H. B.]

SPOON, EUCHARISTIC. In the 7th century in the East communicants often used small vessels, sometimes of gold, in which to receive the sacred elements and convey them to their mouth. This practice was forbidden by the Council of Constantinople in 691, on the ground that there could be nothing more meet for that office than the hand of the Christian (can. 101). From the language of John Damascene, 730, "With hands put together crosswise let us receive the body of the Crucified" (De Fide Orthod. iv. 13), and from the absence of all later mention of these vessels, we infer that the practice was effectually suppressed. It is probable, however, that the tradition of their use suggested that of the spoon which somewhat later became general in the Greek and in most of the Oriental churches. This was first employed, as is supposed (Maldonatus, de Caerem. Disp. 2, xxii. 3), to take out of the chalice, after the COMMIXTURE, so much of the steeped oblate as was to be reserved for the sick; but afterwards both for that purpose and for the communion of the laity.

The Greeks call the spoon λαβίς, the tongs, in allusion to Isaiah vi. 6, it being a very common thing with them to speak of the Eucharist under the figure of a "live coal;" a usage yet more common among the Syrians (St. Chrys. Hom. in illud Vidi Dom. § 3; Joan. Damasc. u. s.; St. Ephrem, Comm. in Escai. u. s. ii. 31, Rom. 1740). Hence even a conventional Syrian name for the sacrament, viz. gmurto, a coal (J. S. Assemani in Biblioth. Orient. i. 70; Renaud. Liturg. Orient. ii. 63). At first the fingers were spoken of as the tongs, as in the liturgy of Jerusalem: "The Lord shall bless us and make us meet to take up the fiery coal with the pure tongs of the fingers, and to lay it on the mouth of the faithful" (Assem. Codex. Lit. v. 56). When the image was transferred to the spoon we cannot say. In a Coptic prayer at the consecration of the latter, the bishop, after a reference to the angel "in whose hands were the tongs with which he took the live coal from the altar," proceeds thus: "Now also, O God, ... stretch forth Thy hand over this spoon, in which are to be taken up the members of the holy body," &c. (Renaud. i. 54).

In all the churches of the East the laity receive the elements together, i.e. the body steeped in the blood, and in all except the Armenian (Le Brun, Dissert. x. 21) the spoon is employed. In the Syrian rite the minister assisting, whether priest or deacon, may receive them either separately or from the spoon (Renaud: ii. 119); in other Oriental churches and in the Greek he always receives in the former manner (Goar, Euchol. Gr. p. 83, 149; Renaud. ib. 118).

Intinction, as the practice of steeping the body in the blood was called in the West, is thought by some (Ligeridius in Goar, 152; Arcudius, Concord. Eccl. et Or. iii. 53) to have been first adopted (with the use of the spoon) in consequence of a heretic of Constantinople, whom St. Chrysostom was commemorating, having carried off the Eucharist which he had placed in her hand (see Sozom. Hist. Eccl. viii. 5). It is more probable, however, that a custom so general was suggested by the convenience found in ministering thus to the sick. In a story told by Eusebius the person sent to a dying man with the Eucharist, the priest himself being sick, was directed to moisten it and drop it into the mouth (Hist. Eccl. vi. 44). The Council of Carthage, A.D. 398, orders "the Eucharist to be poured into the mouth" of those who have become insensible (can. 76). In the same city, not much later, a woman who had an obstruction in the throat received a "steeped particle of the Lord's body" (De Prom. et Praed. Dei, Dim. Temp. 6, inter Opp. Prosp.).

When intinction for ordinary communions began to prevail in Europe, it seems, like so many other minor rites, to have been introduced from the East through Spain and Portugal; for we find the first mention of it in a prohibition by the Council of Braga, A.D. 675. The ground alleged was that our Lord gave the bread and wine to the apostles separately (can. 2). The practice thus received a great check among the Latins, but in the 11th century we find it general. In the 12th it was suppressed, very much because it suggested the sop of Judas, but still under the authority of the canon of Braga, which was then known as a decree of pope Julius (Notitia Eucharistica, 705, ed. 2). There is no evidence that a spoon was ever employed in the West during the prevalence of intinction.

So far as I have discovered, the only proof that the practice of intinction existed in Europe between the 7th and the 11th centuries is to be found in the words of delivery used in many churches at the communion of the sick, and in directions that have reference to them. The form given by Theodulf of Orleans, A.D. 794, runs thus: "The body and the blood of the Lord be unto thee remission of all sins," &c. (Capit. ii. in Baluze, Miscell. ii. 104, ed. 2). A Scottish order of the beginning of the 9th century: "The body with the blood," &c. (Book of Deer, 90). Similarly two Irish orders in the Books of Dimma and Moling (Liber de Arbuthnott, xix. xxi.). Prudentius of Troyes, A.D. 846: "The body and blood of our Lord," &c. (in Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. I. vii. 6, n. 3). Regino, A.D. 906, gives a canon of Tours of uncertain date, in which it is expressly ordered that the "sacred oblation be steeped in the blood of Christ, that the presbyter may be able to say with truth, The body and blood," &c. (D. Discipl. Eccl. i. 70. See again Not. Euch. p. 55). In the 11th century some formulae of delivery verbally recognised the intinction: "The body of our Lord Jesus Christ, steeped in His blood, preserve thy soul," &c. (Pontif. Sarisbur. in Ware, u. s. 16; Miss. Ambros. cited by Sala in Bona, Rer. Lit. ii. 18, § 2) [W. E. S.]

STERTULA is properly the basket used in distributing presents of money or food to clients (Juvenal, iii. 249). Hence it came to be applied to presents or donations generally, and Cyprian calls the clergy of his time "sportulantes fratres," as depending upon the contributions of their flock (Epist. 1, p. 466, Hartel). STAFF (Baculus, cambuca). During the saying of long offices, consisting principally of psalmody, at which it was usual to stand, it was permitted for the worshippers to lean on a long staff or crutch by way of relief (Martene, de Rit. Eccl. Ant. iv. xv. 13). Chrodegang of Metz in his Rule (c. 26) does not permit this indulgence to his canons, unless in case of infirmity. The monks of Fulda in their supplication to Charles the Great (Migne, Patrol. cv. 419) complain that their abbat did not permit even the infirm to use a staff or to lean on the standing-desk (inclinatorium or reclinatorium). The staff was laid aside at the reading of the Gospel (see p. 744). For the staff of the bishop, see PASTORAL STAFF. [C.]

STAG (IN ART). From a very early date in Christian symbolism and iconography, the stag has been used to represent the Gentile convert thirsting for and approaching the waters of baptism [CROSS, p. 496]. He accompanies the lambs or sheep, the catechumens of Christian or Jewish birth, in most baptismal works of art, as the Lateran cross, the frescoes of St. Pontianus, and the more ancient mosaics of the Ravenna baptisteries.

The stag is represented in the mosaics of Ciampini (De sacr. Aedif. cap. ix.); on tombs (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. c. 3; see also for later paintings Bottari, tav. xliv.); on lamps (Aringhi, ii. p. 603; see LAMPS, p. 921).

It would seem, from a Ravenna sarcophagus given by Ciampini (Vet. Mon. ii. p. 7, tab. iii. D), where two stags are represented with the chalice (as birds frequently at Ravenna), that the animal symbolises the desire of the faithful for the other sacrament also. These examples on Christian tombs can hardly have a secular meaning only; though occasionally, as in Buonarotti (Frammenti di Ostro, xxiv.), the stag only appears as a beast of chase. It is seen in this sense very frequently on the Lombard carvings from the 8th to the 11th century; very notably in the celebrated hunt of Theodoric on the façade of S. Zenone at Verona. [R. St. J. Bingham (Antiq. lib. ii. cap. xix. § 6) thinks that this arrangement may be the reason why the body of presbyters was called by Ignatius (Ep. ad Magnes. 13) the "crown of the presbytery." The term "throne" was not anciently confined to the seat of a bishop, but was applied to that of the presbyter also. Presbyters were spoken of by Constantine (Euseb. l. 10, c. 5) as "certain persons from the second throne." St. Gregory of Nazianzum speaks of himself (de Vitâ suâ) as forced by violence "into the second throne," i.e. into priests' orders. This arrangement, says Viollet-le-Duc (Dict. rais. de l'Architecture, s. v. Choeur), was maintained in some cathedrals, for example in that of Lyons down to the middle of the 18th century. The same writer (ibid. s. v. Stalle) affirms that in France stalls were constructed in wood at a very remote period. In Italy and Sicily, on the contrary, they were sometimes made in stone or marble, a practice which the comparative rigour of the climate rendered unsuitable in France. There are no stalls remaining in France anterior to the time of Charlemagne; but the earliest specimens that are left can only, says Viollet-le-Duc, be the consequence of a long tradition.

The principle upon which official seats were assigned in the early church seems to have been this, that seats were the index of spiritual rank. Hence great care was taken that men who were in deacons' orders should not sit with those of superior spiritual rank. As early as the Council of Nicaea there is a trace that deacons were endeavouring to thrust themselves into the row of priests. By the 18th canon of that council the disposition on their part to intrude into the "highest seats of the synagogue" is formally condemned. "But let it not be permitted to the deacons to sit in the midst of the presbyters, for that which is taking place is contrary to canon and contrary to order." It should be observed that deacons were always forbidden to sit amongst the priests in the sanctuary (see the 15th canon of the Council of Arles, ap. Martene, iii. 1, 7). The deacons were bound to stand.

It is not easy to say precisely when the arrangement of the clergy behind the altar, which originated in the East, was superseded by the plan of a choir with which we are now familiar. But the ancient arrangement of the clergy appears to have prevailed in the French church in the 6th century. Queen Chrodieldis, with the cross in her hand, enters the church to silence the abbess, and presents herself before the assembled priests, who take their seats in the tribunal of the church—"Tunc residentibus sacerdotibus qui aderant super tribunal ecclesiae" (Greg. Turon. Hist. Francorum, lib. x. 15).

No mention of those appendages to choir stalls which are known as Misericordes (Misericordiae) has been found within the period comprised in this work.

STAMINEA (also stamineum, staminia, &c.). A woollen under-garment used by monks. The Rule of Fructuosus allots "staminiae duae" to each (c. 4, Patrol. lxxxvii. 1101: reproduced in the Concordia Regularum of Benedict of Aniane, c. 17, Patrol. ciii. 1248, where see Menard's note). The Regula Magistri, making a distinction according to the seasons, orders that in winter each monk should have "pro tertiam grossam quotidianam stamineum." Reference is also made below to a "pallium stamineum" (c. 80, Patrol. lxxxviii. 1030). See Ducange's Glossary, s. v.

[R. S.]

STANDING was, as is well known, a common posture among the ancient Christians in PRAYER [p. 1684], on hearing the GOSPEL [p. 744] or sermons, and during PSALMODY [p. 1747], which formed a large portion of the daily offices. Compare STAFF, p. 1926. [C.]

STAPIO. A word of doubtful meaning, but standing for some article of female dress or ornament. In his Life of St. Radegundis (c. 13; Patrol. lxxviii. 503) Venantius Fortunatus describes the rich objects deposited by the queen at different altars, including the above. Mabillon suggests that scapio (with the meaning of some sort of crown) should be read (Acta Sanctorum ordinis Benedicti, saecl. i. 321). He argues that if stapio be retained, it must be some kind of ornament for the feet. [R. S.]

STARS (IN ART). One or more stars are often seen on either side of the figure of Christ on early glasses, &c., which are regarded by Buonarotti as symbols of His divinity (Vetri, p. 38). A Christian lamp given by Bellori (Antiche Lucerne, part iii. 29) presents the Good Shepherd with His head encircled by seven stars. Sometimes the monogram alone appears thus attended (ibid. viii. 1). A starry field is frequently used in early Christian art as emblematical of heaven. At St. Vitalis at Ravenna the Holy Lamb is seen in a field thus sown with stars (Ciampini, tab. 18), and the cross is similarly placed in the chapel of Galla Placidia (ibid. tab. 65). On a sarcophagus at Arles stars, alternately single and double, are placed between the heads of the apostles (Millin. pl. lxv. 3; Le Blant, pl. xiv. p. 27). The figure of Habakkuk bringing food to Daniel on a sarcophagus at Brescia has seven stars above his head (Le Blant, p. 12). A single star, together with emblems of the Resurrection, and a Dove surrounded with stars, are seen on a gem given by Perret (Catacombes, iv. pl. xvi. 8). A young man with four stars on his tunic, accompanied with eucharistic emblems, is found on a glass (Maranzoni, Cose Gentileschi). In the representations of the Nativity and the Epiphany the star is an almost unfailing accompaniment of the scene. Instances will be found in the woodcuts of the articles NATIVITY; MAGI, ADORATION OF.

STASIDIA. The stalls in the monastic and other churches of the East. They are distinguished from the stalls of the Western church by their being originally, as their name implies, places for standing in, not for sitting. They had no seats, and their occupants supported themselves when weary on the elbows of the stalls, which corresponded to the crutches which were and are still much used by the worshippers in the Eastern churches. Suicer defines them with much accuracy as "sedilia in quibus sacerdotes vel sedentes quiescunt, vel stantes accumbendo laborem levius ferunt; eo ordine ut digniores dignius occupent sedile" (sub voc.). Goar states that the stall of the "hegumenos" was the furthest to the east, on the south side opposite the "icon" of the patron saint (Euchol. p. 4, n. 35). He says also that in monastic churches they were usually returned, but not in parish churches (ibid. 19). Each monk had his own stall. The Typicon S. Sabae speaks repeatedly of a monk going εἰς τὸ στασίδιον αὐτοῦ. They are sometimes called τόποι. [E. V.]

STASIS (στάσις), one of the subdivisions of he Greek Psalter. In the Greek church the Psalms are divided into twenty groups, called καθίσματα or sessions. Each κάθισμα is divided into three στάσεις by the recital of the formula, Δόξα καὶ νῦν. Ἀλληλούϊα. So imperative was this rule that even Psalm cxix., which by itself constitutes the 17th session, was divided into three στάσεις. And further, when the number of Psalms in a session is even, still the odd number of στάσεις in it was preserved by grouping two or more Psalms together. With this may be compared the Western practice of securing the same result by saying two Psalms under one Gloria Patri. For further information on this curious subject the present writer may be permitted to refer to an essay upon it in his volume on The Gradual Psalms.

For the actual division of the Psalter see PSALMODY.

Suicer thinks the term στάσις arises either (1) from their standing to recite the Psalms, or (2) from their standing up at the close of each session (Thesaurus, s. v.). Perhaps, however, it may have meant a halt or stop, a sense which the word acquired in post-classical Greek. [H. T. A.]

STATE AND CHURCH. [LAW.]

STATIO. 1. By early Latin writers was applied to a fast day. Yet a distinction can be drawn between jejunium and statio.

There has been much difference of opinion whether a statio differed at all from a fast (jejunium); and if so, in what respect it differed. Pamelius, for example, argues that there is no difference. Bona, however, concludes that the statio is sometimes identical with the jejunium, and sometimes not. The statio closed at none, the jejunium (proper, e.g. in Lent) at vesper; then they were different. But sometimes the shorter fast (which Tertullian calls semi-jejunium) was called jejunium. In this case the faithful might take food at none, and then the fast was the same as the statio. The relation between statio and jejunium is discussed by Bona (de Horis Div. Psalmodiae, cap. iii.). In Tertullian, he says, solvere stationem is the same as jejunium solvere. But Gregory the Great assigned certain churches of the city (Rome) to stations, and on the more solemn days commanded that stations should be done (stationes fieri) until sext, and to those churches on stated days (statis diebus—this perhaps suggests the origin of the term statio) the faithful usually resort. The stations, Bona complains, have disappeared, owing to the chill that has come upon love, and the abstinence of the fast alone remains.

The classical passage on the subject in very early writers is a clause of Tertullian's: "Similiter et stationum diebus non putant plerique sacrificiorum orationibus interveniendum quod statio solvenda sit accepto corpore Domini" (de Orat. c. xiv.). To this there may be added one or two other sayings of the same writer (de Jejun. c. 14; ib. c. 10; ib. c. 13), from which we gather that the statio was held on Wednesday and Friday in every week throughout the year (because, according to Gratian, on those days respectively the betrayal was planned and the Crucifixion accomplished), and that it lasted till the ninth hour. The fast on these two days of the week is enjoined by the sixty-ninth of the Apostolical Canons, though the Greek equivalent of the name statio does not appear there. It may be added that bishop Beveregе's long note upon this canon will be found to give the most complete and the clearest résumé of the facts, amidst all that has been written upon the subject (Pandectae Annot. p. 35).

It has been already suggested that the fast was called statio, because the solemnity was kept on fixed days (statis diebus); but St. Ambrose gives another account of the origin of the term. "Our fasts are our encampments which protect us from the devil's attacks; in short, they are called stationes, because standing (stantes) and staying in them we repel our plotting foes" (S. Ambr. Serm. 25). Tertullian likewise undoubtedly takes advantage of this military sense of the word (stationem facere) in his treatise de Coronâ Militis (cap. xi.). For an account of how the fast of the Wednesday statio became in process of time exchanged for the Saturday fast in some parts of the West, see SABBATH.

2. An assembly of the faithful in church, especially that which took place on the Lord's day. It has been mentioned above that Gregory the Great regulated these stations in Rome, but it is clear that he did not originate them: for though the word appears to be used in the sense of the Fast in all the passages of Tertullian (see the several notes on them in the Oxford translation), yet it (στάσις) is used by St. Gregory of Nazianzum in a passage where it could hardly mean anything but an assembly (Greg. Naz. Orat. hab. in Concilio Const.). The term has an obvious appropriateness in a Greek church, where there were no seats and all had to stand.

3. In a sense closely connected with the foregoing, a station is a church, oratory, or other place where ecclesiastical processions made a halt, and certain offices of divine worship were performed, sometimes the service of the Holy Eucharist itself. From this it came to pass that the processions themselves were called stationes. They were first instituted by Cyril of Alexandria (Ducange, s. v.). The tombs of the martyrs were often the scenes of stations. In later times the term was used of a procession made by all the clergy of a city to some leading church of the city. (Anselm. Leod. c. 69, in Wolb.) Ducange says that when the clergy from the various churches were assembled at a station, any difficult question that was pending was settled. This fact, he thinks, accounts for Tertullian's statement that the station was sometimes prolonged to the vesper hour. It appears from St. Cyprian (Ep. 41) that the Novatian schismatics demanded that their charges should be investigated "in statione." Some have thought that it was the stations of this class that Gregory the Great took order to regulate ("sollicitè ordinavit"), and that while taking part in them he delivered many of his homilies on the gospels. This would point to the use of the eucharistic office in the station. The same use, too, prevailed in the church of Constantinople, where we are told that the epistle and gospel at the stations used to be recited in Latin (Nicolaus I. Ep. 8). Anastasius again (in S. Vitaliano) speaks of a station "ad Sanctum Petrum" on the Lord's day, and of the mass being celebrated there. It is not unlikely, indeed, that in the early Christian mind statio was eminently connected with the Eucharist, because the corresponding word (מַעֲמָד) was already in use in the ritual of Israel in connexion with the sacred oblation (see Buxtorf, Lex. Talmud. s. v. עָמַד); and statio may be an example of those many ideas which Christianity adopted from Judaism. Hofmann (Lex. Univ. s. v.) boldly defines statio as ritus audiendi Evangelium. This, however, would seem to restrict the liturgical use of the word too much.

At these stations the sacramental vessels were carried in procession. Anastasius tells us that this practice existed as early as the time of Hilarus (A.D. 461), the successor of Leo the Great in the papal see. Leo the Third (A.D. 795) made twenty such vessels of the purest silver, to be carried by acolytes in procession ("qui praecederent per stationes per manus acolytorum").

In modern times the term stationes is most often applied to the use of certain devotions in front of pictures or sculptures representing the leading incidents of our Lord's Passion. Of this use, however, no example has been found within the period to which the present work is restricted.

STATIONS OF PENITENTS. [PENITENCE, p. 1591.]

STAUROPEGIUM (σταυροπήγιον). The solemn act of fixing a cross by the bishop of the diocese, at the foundation of a church or monastery. The service and ceremonial in use on such an occasion, with full rubrical directions, are given in Goar's Euchologion, pp. 608–613. This custom is an ancient one. It is probably alluded to by St. Chrysostom, when he asks, "What community is there which has not the staff and cross? What church which has not been fortified with the cross?" (Hom. in Baia.); and it is distinctly mentioned by later writers (Balsamon in can. vii. Septimae Synodi).

In later times the term came to denote a special right claimed by a patriarch to consecrate a church in any diocese within his province, by sending a small wooden inscribed cross to be fixed behind the altar. Such a church became the patriarch's peculiar, exempt from ordinary diocesan jurisdiction. An account of the controversies caused by this custom is given in Ducange, Glossary, Graec. Med. Aevi, s. v. See for further authorities on the subject J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, Gen. Introd. p. 1041.

[F. E. W.]

STAUROPHYLAX. After the supposed discovery of the true cross by St. Helena, the custody of the holy relic was committed for the time being to one of the presbyters of the church of Jerusalem, who was thence called ὁ σταυροφύλαξ. It was regarded as a position of very high dignity, and the holder of it was frequently advanced to the episcopate. Porphyrius bishop of Gaza (A.D. 421) held the office, as did John III. bishop of Jerusalem (513–524). "Elias episcopus Hierosolymae exilio traditur et pro eo Joannes crucis custos episcopus ordinatur" (apud Ducange sub voc.). The names of several presbyters who were "guardians of the Cross" occur in the biographies of St. Euthymius and St. Sabas by Cyril of Scythopolis.

STEPHEN, ST., PROTOMARTYR, LEGEND AND FESTIVAL OF. 1. Legend.—In one of the appendices to the works of Augustine is a letter from Avitus, a Spanish priest then living in Palestine, to Palchonius, bishop of Bracara (Braga) in Spain, which was to be conveyed to him by Orosius the historian, then about to return to Spain, which was his native land. Besides the letter, Avitus furthur entrusted Orosius with some relics of St. Stephen, and with a Latin translation of the Greek narrative of Lucian, to whom, it was believed, had been vouchsafed the discovery of the martyr's remains (Augustine, vol. vii. 1125, ed. Gaume).

We shall proceed to give, in the first place, a brief abstract of this latter document. Lucian was priest of the church of Caphar-Gamala, a village twenty miles from Jerusalem, and on a certain Friday ("parasceue, hoc est sexta feria"), three days before the Nones of December, Honorius being for the second time, and Theodosius for the sixth time, consuls (Dec. 8, A.D. 415), he was lying half asleep in the baptistery, where his bed was placed that he might guard the sacred vessels. Here, at the third hour of the night, he saw a vision of an old man clad in white, with a golden wand in his hand, who commanded him to go to John, bishop of Jerusalem, and bid him open his sepulchre. He further announced that he was Gamaliel, the teacher of Paul, and that he had caused the remains of Stephen to be secretly conveyed by night from the scene of his martyrdom outside the north gate of Jerusalem to Caphar-Gamala. Here Gamaliel laid the body in his own tomb, on the east side; and subsequently Nicodemus, who had been excommunicated by the Jews and had been maintained by Gamaliel, was laid in the same tomb. There also Abibas, a son of Gamaliel, who had with his father been baptized into Christ, and had died before his father, was laid. Last of all, Gamaliel himself was buried there; but his wife Ethna, and his eldest son Selemias, not having embraced the faith of Christ, were buried elsewhere.

Lucian, on awaking, doubted the reality of the vision, and prayed that if it were sent by God it might be repeated a second and a third time. On the following Friday the vision appeared again, and Gamaliel asked why Lucian had not obeyed. On being told the reason, he shewed as emblems of the relics three golden baskets filled with roses (one with red for Stephen, two with white for Nicodemus and Gamaliel), and a silver basket filled with fragrant crocuses for Abibas. The vision then vanished. Yet a third time it appeared. On the following Friday, at the same hour, Gamaliel appeared and upbraided him for neglecting to obey.

Lucian, being now convinced, set off for Jerusalem, and related the story to the bishop, who bade him dig for the relics, it being believed that they would be found under a heap of stones in the field indicated by Gamaliel. However, Gamaliel in a vision to a monk named Migetius explained that the bodies were not there, but had merely been laid down there at the funeral, the heap having been set in sign of mourning. The bodies really lay in the north part of the field, in a spot called Debatalia. A vain examination of the heap proved the truth of the last vision, and the relics in four coffins were found at the spot indicated. On that of St. Stephen was engraved, according to one text, "Keayea Celiel, quod interpretatur servus Dei" (c. 8, Op. Cit. 1133); according to another, "Celeliel quod Stephanus dicitur" (ib. 1134). The latter interpretation is of course the correct one, celil (כְּלִיל) being a common Aramaean word for a crown, as Stephen in Greek. Bishop John, then at the Council of Lidda or Diospolis, being at once informed, came to the spot, bringing with him Eleutherius bishop of Sebaste, and Eleutherius (al. Eustonius) of Jericho. When the coffin of St. Stephen was opened, the earth shook, and a fragrant odour was diffused, by which seventy-three persons were restored to health. The coffin was then reclosed, and was carried to Jerusalem, as the church of which St. Stephen had been deacon; a small portion of the relics being left at Caphar-Gamala. This translation was made, according to one text, on Dec. 26 (7 Kal. Jan.), or, according to the other, on Aug. 3 (3 Non. Aug.).

We cannot of course attempt to define accurately the historical element in this legend, still it is clear that some discovery of the relics, real or supposed, took place; and that this was followed by universal credence in the story. Thus, for example, as we shall presently see, Augustine, in the twenty-second book of the De Civitate Dei, written a few years after the above events are said to have happened, refers to miracles supposed to have been wrought by relics of St. Stephen brought from Palestine to the province of Africa; and the events are taken for granted by most of the immediately succeeding writers. The series of visions supposed to have been seen by Lucian we may readily allow; it demands nothing more from us than to credit Lucian with a lively imagination and an intense faith. Explorations in pursuance of these visions might easily be rewarded by the finding of a body, even if not so simply as the story makes out. We are not called upon either to lay to the charge of bishop John a craftily conceived and carefully worked-out imposture, or to accept the elaborate story in all its details. Much of these, the names upon the coffins and the like, we may readily discard as mere embellishments—a story of this kind never loses by the telling.

The news, when promulgated, would be; we can well believe, eagerly caught up. Relics were, as we have seen, widely dispersed; and the simple but intense faith of the time might often, by its very intensity, do marvels. Thus, for instance, the case of Paulus and Palladia, afterwards to be mentioned, is just one where strong faith, working on the line of strong nervous excitement, might well produce the results said to have happened.

We return now to Orosius. We find from the letter of Avitus that, in Dec. A.D. 415, he was eagerly looking forward to his return journey from Palestine. He returned to Augustine in the following year (Aug. Epist. 175, § 1; vol. ii. 923), bringing with him portions of the relics of St. Stephen, which Avitus had obtained from Lucian (Avitus, l. c.; Gennadius, de Viris Illustribus, c. 39; Patrol. lviii. 1081). The history by which Orosius is most generally known was then written; and after this he set sail for Spain with the relics. On his way, he landed on the island of Minorca; and here, learning that the Goths were ravaging Spain, and that it would hardly be possible for him to return thither, he settled rather to return to Africa, having intrusted his relics to the church in Minorca (Severus, Epist. ad omnem Ecclesiam, § 3; apud August., vol. vii. 1146, in Append.).

We have said that the belief in the discovery of St. Stephen's relics soon spread widely. Besides Augustine, of whom we have already spoken, and to whom we shall recur presently, we may mention Chrysippus, a priest of the church of Jerusalem, living about the middle of the 5th century. Photius (Bibliotheca, cod. 171; Patrol. Gr. ciii. 500) says that he had read a work of Chrysippus, a panegyric of Theodore the martyr, where, in a digression, he speaks of Lucian and his vision, and the consequent discovery. At about the same period, Basil of Seleucia wrote a panegyric of St. Stephen and concerning the discovery of the relics (Orat. 41; Patrol. Gr. lxxv. 461). The Chronicle of Idatius mentions the manifestation (martyr Stephanus revelatur) at Jerusalem in the episcopate of John (Patrol. li. 877); and the Chronicle of Marcellinus speaks of the discovery of the relics and of Lucian's narrative (ib. 923; see also Gennadius, de Viris Illustribus, 39, 46, 47; Patrol. lviii. 1080 sqq.).

We now return to Augustine. In the last book (the twenty-second) of the De Civitate Dei, written apparently towards the close of A.D. 426, he tells us of numerous miracles that had been wrought by the help of the relics in and near Hippo (c. 8, §§ 10–22, vol. vii. 1065), where a memoria or oratory of St. Stephen had been built about A.D. 425 (ibid. § 20), in commemoration, it would appear, of the arrival in Africa of fresh relics of the martyr. A sermon of Augustine's seems to have been delivered specially for this occasion (Serm. 317, vol. v. 1870), and the succeeding one when the relics were deposited in the church erected for them. In a letter of Augustine's to bishop Quintilian, commending two ladies to his care, he remarks that they are the bearers of relics of St. Stephen, "which your Holiness knows in what befitting way you ought to honour, even as we ourselves have done" (Epist. 212, vol. ii. 1194).

Besides the memoria at Hippo, Augustine specifies Aquae Tibilitanae, a place between Hippo and Cirta, Sinita, a town near Hippo, and Calama, where Possidius was bishop. At all these places, and at others near, as well as at Hippo, were memoriae of St. Stephen. Augustine remarks (ibid. § 20) that though he has mentioned many miracles, he has also passed over many, which, were they all to be given, "plurimi conficiendi sunt libri." He adds that not only in the country round Hippo, but at Uzalis also, a town near Utica, many wonders were done. The bishop of Uzalis, Evodius, an intimate friend of Augustine, caused a work to be written, De Miraculis S. Stephani Protomartyris, in two books, which is given in the Appendix to the seventh volume of Augustine (col. 1161 sq.).

One more example may be added, seeing that it was made the occasion of several sermons by Augustine, the case of Paulus and Palladia (de Civitate Dei, xxii. 8. 22; Serm. 320–324, vol. v. 1881). These were two out of ten children of a lady at Caesarea in Cappadocia, all of whom their mother's curse had afflicted with a terrible shaking of their limbs. The two above-named came at last in their wanderings to Hippo, about fifteen days before Easter. Here they daily visited the memoria of St. Stephen, and while praying on Easter morning, the youth was suddenly healed. On Easter Tuesday Augustine, in his sermon, embodied the whole deposition of Paulus (Serm. 322, supra), and on that day the sister was restored as the brother had been. Obviously, however, the above admits, as we have already said, of a very simple explanation, without recourse being had to the theory of miracles properly so called.

Another place where the cultus of St. Stephen early prevailed was Ancona. Augustine relates (Serm. 323, vol. v. 1884) that at the martyrdom of St. Stephen, a certain man picked up a stone that had rebounded after striking the martyr's elbow.[a] This man was a sailor, and, once being at Ancona, it was revealed to him that he should deposit the stone there, which he did, and thenceforth a memoria of St. Stephen existed in that place. This is mentioned by Gregory the Great (Dial. lib. i. 5; Patrol. lxxvii. 177).

Into later legends it is not worth while to enter at length, but we shall give them a passing notice. A translation of St. Stephen's body from Jerusalem to Constantinople is mentioned by Nicephorus Callistus (Hist. Eccles. xiv. 9; Patrol. Gr. cxlvi. 1084) as taking place in the reign of Constantine. This, of course, is at variance with the story of Lucian. Theodorus Lector (Hist. Eccles. ii. 64; Patrol. Gr. lxxxvi. 215) also speaks of a translation to Constantinople, but puts it in the reign of Theodosius II. on a certain September 21. The story of the translation, with much the same details as that told by Nicephorus, is given in a writing purporting to be a translation into Latin by Anastasius Bibliothecarius, and sent by him with an accompanying letter to Landuleus, bishop of Capua (Augustine, vol. vii. 1137 sqq.).

From this we gather that Capua, too, claimed to possess relics of St. Stephen. In this narrative the translation to Constantinople is referred to the episcopate of bishop John. In the Martyrologium Romanum is recorded, under May 7, a translation of the body of St. Stephen from Constantinople to Rome in the pontificate of Pelagius, when it was laid in the sepulchre of St. Laurence. Even Baronius, however (not. in loc.), gives up this legend.

To draw illustrations from other districts than those we have already cited, we find Gregory of Tours speaking of the relics of St. Stephen taken into Gaul (Hist. Franc. i. 30; De Gloria Martyrum, i. 34; Patrol. lxxi. 177, 734). For the story of the African bishop Gaudiosus fleeing from the persecution of the Vandal king Genseric to Naples, and of the relics of St. Stephen taken with him, see Baronius (not. ad Mart. Rom. Aug. 3, Nov. 28). We may note in conclusion before leaving this part of our subject, that the empress Eudocia, wife of Theodosius II., built a church just outside Jerusalem, on the scene of St. Stephen's martyrdom, and was herself interred there on her death in A.D. 461 (see e.g. Nicephorus Callistus, Hist. Eccles. xiv. 50; Patrol. Gr. cxlvi. 1240).

2. Festivals.—The discovery of the relics in Palestine, whatever explanation we may give of the matter, soon caused the commemoration of St. Stephen to be widely observed as a festival of high importance. Still, prior to the date of that event, we have definite traces of the existence of a festival of St. Stephen. Thus we have two sermons for the festival by Gregory of Nyssa (ob. circa A.D. 396), in which, as well as in that next to be mentioned, we are told that it fell on the day after Christmas (Patrol. Gr. xlvi. 701, 721). We also have a sermon for the day by Asterius,[b] bishop of Amasea in Pontus, which we may safely refer to a date prior to A.D. 415 (Hom. 12; Patrol. Gr. xl. 338). Indeed the absence from the above three sermons of any allusions to the discovery in Palestine would of itself be evidence. The homilies, however, for the festival of St. Stephen, once attributed to Chrysostom, are clearly spurious (vol. viii. 501, 699; xii. 929, 931, 935, ed. Migne).

[a] The play upon Ancona and ἀγκών is of course obvious.

To the above may, we think, be added the instance mentioned by Augustine (supra) of the ancient memoria of St. Stephen at Ancona. If Augustine honestly believed that this had been built at a period not long subsequent to the martyrdom, we may fairly acquiesce in at any rate sufficient antiquity to carry it back to a time before A.D. 415. The reference to the festival of St. Stephen in the Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 33) would be of great importance, if only we had more definite knowledge of the date of the work. In the passage cited, it is ordered by Peter and Paul that slaves are to rest on certain great festivals, besides which are the days of the apostles and of Stephen and other martyrs unspecified.

It may at once be allowed, however, that these isolated notices do not suffice to establish the existence of a festival observed by the church at large, and thus we record its absence from the Roman calendar of Bucherius, a document of about the middle of the 4th century. When, however, we pass to the period after A.D. 415, we soon find all ancient calendars, martyrologies, and liturgies agreeing in containing a commemoration or commemorations of St. Stephen. The days specially associated with him are Dec. 26 and Aug. 3. The first is certainly the commemoration of the martyrdom, both because we have it mentioned in writings prior to the date of the finding of the relics, and because of the constancy with which it is so noted in ancient authorities. On the other hand, one text of Lucian's narrative gives Dec. 26 as the date of the translation, the other referring it to Aug. 3. Probably the latter date really commemorates the consecration of some church in honour of St. Stephen, or the like event, but, as we shall presently see, it is generally associated with the translation.

The festival of Dec. 26 is recorded in the Roman calendar of Polemeus Silvius of A.D. 448 (Patrol. xiii. 688), and in the Calendarium Carthaginense, which is probably only slightly subsequent to A.D. 484 (ib. 1228). It is not necessary to give an extended list of ancient authorities recognising the festival; it may suffice to mention the Mart. Hieronymi as edited by D'Achéry from the Corbey MS. (Patrol. xxx. 437), the Mart. Gellonense (D'Achéry, Spicilegium, xiii. 390), the Gelasian (Patrol. lxxiv. 1309), the Gregorian (ib. lxxviii. 33), and Ambrosian (Pamelius, Liturgg. Latt. i. 306) Sacramentaries, the Mozarabic Missal, the Lectionarium Luxoviense, the Gothico-Gallic Missal, and others. To the Leonine Sacramentary we shall refer at length below. Among the fathers who have written homilies for the day are Maximus of Turin[c] (Hom. 64, Serm. 85; Patrol. lvii. 379, 701) and Fulgentius of Ruspe (Serm. 3; Patrol. lxv. 729). Again, Aug. 3 is given as the date of commemoration of the discovery of the relics, e.g. in the Mart. Corbeiense (supra), the Martyrologies of Bede (Patrol. xciv. 996), Rabanus Maurus (ib. cx. 1160), Wandalbert (ib. cxxi. 606), Notker (ib. cxxxi. 1131), &c., and in one text of Lucian's narrative. Besides the above-mentioned two days, the Mart. Corbeiense also cites a commemoration at Jerusalem on Jan. 2, and at Antioch the "natalis reliquiarum Stephani protomartyris et diaconi," on Aug. 2. It is not improbable that in this last case Antioch is an error for Ancona, for several martyrologies (e.g. Bede, supra), while naming Antioch, add the story of the stone which struck St. Stephen's arm, mentioned by us above. Also Aug. 2 is perhaps an error for Aug. 3, on which day the reference occurs in Bede, Rabanus Maurus, &c.

It is now necessary to enter into details in connexion with one or two liturgical monuments. The Leonine Sacramentary makes no mention of St. Stephen among its December festivals, though it recognises there the festivals of St. John and the Innocents. In August, however, we have the heading "iv. nonas Augusti. Natale Sancti Stephani in coemeterio Callisti via Appia," after which follow no less than nine masses for a festival of St. Stephen (Patrol. lv. 91). Muratori, connecting the heading with the masses, considered that the iv. nonas was an error for iii. nonas, but there is no doubt that the Stephen mentioned in the heading is Stephen bishop of Rome (ob. A.D. 257), for in the Depositio Episcoporum (i.e. of Rome), which stands at the head of the calendar of Bucherius, we have "iv. nonas Augusti Stephani in Callisti" (Bucherius, de Doctrina Temporum, p. 267). Also the Mart. Corbeiense gives under the same date, "Romæ in coemeterio Calisti Sancti Stephani martyris," and the Mart. Gellonense, "Roma Stephani episcopi et martyris." In like manner, too, the Gregorian Sacramentary gives a mass for the day (Patrol. lxxviii. 128). While, however, there can be no doubt as to the reference in the heading in the Leonine Sacramentary, the masses have direct reference to the protomartyr, except the eighth, which has no individual reference at all. It is important to note that the Preface in the seventh mass definitely places the festival of St. Stephen on the day after Christmas, shewing clearly that this mass, and therefore probably some at any rate of the others, are in their wrong place here, and should be transferred to December. It may be added that several of the prayers in these masses occur in the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries under Dec. 26. The ninth of the Leonine masses refers to the dedication of a church in honour of St. Stephen, and the Ballerini (not. in loc.) suggests that the reference may be to the church on the Mons Cœlius, dedicated by pope Simplicius (ob. A.D. 483). Possibly this mass properly belongs to Aug. 3.

In Mabillon's Lectionarium Luxoviense, a lection is provided for the festival of St. Stephen, ad

[b] This sermon is definitely ascribed to Asterius by Photius (Bibliotheca, cod. 271; Patrol. Gr. civ. 204).

[c] There are also two other sermons attributed to Maximus, but relegated to the appendix as spurious, one for the festival of St. Stephen and the other for the Octave (Serm. 29, 31, in Append.; Patrol. lvii. 905, 913).

matutinum, Jeremiah xvii. 7–18, followed by an extract from a sermon of Augustine. At mass, the lections are Acts vi. 1–vii. 2; Matt. xvii. 23–xviii. 11 (Patrol. lxxii. 174). In the Gothico-Gallic Missal is a contestatio or preface (the so-called praefatio being here the priest's first prayer) of unusual length, by which the minds of the worshippers were to be better fitted for the solemnity which was to follow. In this fact we may see obvious evidence of the importance of the festival (ib. 230).

In the Mozarabic Missal, the prophetic lection is not a special one, but serves also for the festival of St. Clement, Wisdom iv. 7–15; and for the epistle and gospel are respectively Acts vi. 1—viii. 4 (omitting vii. 2–51) and Matt. xxiii. 1–39 (Patrol. lxxxv. 190).

In the Greek church, the martyrdom of St. Stephen is now commemorated on Dec. 27, the festival of the previous day commemorating the Blessed Virgin and St. Joseph. The heading in the Menaea speaks of St. Stephen as the "holy protomartyr and archdeacon." The festival of the translation is held on Aug. 2. The notices for these days in the metrical Ephemerides prefixed by Papebroch to the Acta Sanctorum for May, vol. i., are respectively εἰκάδι λαΐνεος Στέφανον μόρος ἐβδόμῃ εἷλεν and δευτερίῃ νέκυος Στεφάνου γίνετ' ἀνακομιδή (pp. lix., xxxix.). The epistle and gospel for Dec. 27 in the Greek church are respectively Heb. ii. 11–18 and Matt. xxi. 33–43.

In the calendars of the Armenian church, published by Assemani (Bibl. Or. iii. 1. 645 sqq.), Dec. 26 is the commemoration of the martyrdom, and Aug. 2 that of the discovery of the relics. Jan. 7 is also a commemoration of St. Stephen, apparently of the martyrdom, which thus comes, it will be observed, on the day after that on which the Armenians still, alone among Christians, celebrate the Nativity of our Lord. [CHRISTMAS.]

In the calendars of the Coptic and Ethiopic churches, published by Ludolf, Dec. 27 is the day for the commemoration of St. Stephen, though the Coptic calendar adds the note "Finding of the bones of Stephen" (ad Hist. Aeth. Comm. p. 403). This, however, as we have already said, is obviously wrong. On Sept. 12, both calendars have another commemoration, specially defined in the Coptic calendar as the "martyrdom of Stephen"[4] (ib. 391). On Oct. 14 is yet another, but in the Ethiopic calendar only (ib. 395).

3. Apocryphal Literature.—The council held at Rome in A.D. 494, under the episcopate of Gelasius, condemned among other books a "Revelatio quae appellatur Stephani" (Patrol. lix. 178).

In addition to works cited in this article, reference should be made for the legend and festival of St. Stephen to Tillemont, Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire Ecclésiastique, vol. ii. pp. 1, 503. The Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists do not avail us here, not having yet reached beyond the end of October. [R. S.]

STICHARION or STOICHARION (στιχάριον, στοιχάριον). This vestment is simply the equivalent in the Eastern church of the alb [ALB] of the Western church. Before citing any references as to its use, we must first speak briefly as to the word itself. The etymology must be considered doubtful. Goar (Euchologion, p. 110) derives it from στίχος, "ab uno quasi lineae ordine," from the long unbroken sweep of the dress ("recta et longum protensa"). Ducange (Glossarium Graecum, s. v.) forms it from a word στιχίον, a tunic. There is no reason to doubt the bona-fide existence of this latter word, for we find in Hesychius, ἄβολον, ὄνομα στιχείου, and there are perhaps traces of a Latin word stica (see Ducange, s. v.) in the same sense; still it brings us no nearer the derivation. G. J. Voss (de Vitiis Sermonis, lib. iii. c. 50) suggests that stica is for sticta, giving us the notion of a χιτὼν κατάστικτος. He calls attention in support of this, to the fact that the sticharia of bishops are waved in bands. Although the fact is certainly so, the roundabout theory of derivation must be pronounced absurd. Indeed it does not seem unlikely that stica may have arisen as a shortened form of sticharion. It is possible, however, that the sticharion may have received its name from the bands or lines upon it.

As in the case of most other ecclesiastical vestments, the word evidently represents in the first instance a dress of ordinary life. One of the charges brought against Athanasius was that he had required the Egyptians to furnish contributions of linen sticharia (Apol. contra Arianos, c. 60; Patrol. Gr. xxv. 358). As, in describing this incident, Sozomen speaks of χιτωνίων λινῶν φόρον (Hist. Eccles. ii. 22), and Socrates (Hist. Eccles. i. 27) of λινῆν ἐσθῆτα, we may feel pretty certain that we are not dealing here with ecclesiastical vestments properly so called. The same may be said of the references to sticharia in the will of Gregory of Nazianzum, who bequeaths to Evagrius the deacon, κάμασον ἓν, στιχάριον ἓν, πάλλια β', and to the "notarius" Elaphius a similar gift (Patrol. Gr. xxxvii. 293). See also Palladius (Hist. Lausiaca, c. 136; Patrol. Gr. xxxiv. 1235), where Athanasius, on an attempt to apprehend him, catches up a sticharion and a βιβλίον and flees in the dead of night.

We must refer now to the word in its ecclesiastical sense. Here we find it for the tunic of bishops, priests, and deacons, as well as for subdeacons and for monks. The earliest reference with which we are acquainted, other than those in a Liturgy the date of the several parts of which must be considered doubtful, is to be found in Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople, early in the eighth century. His account is, "And first the sticharion, being white, setteth forth the splendour of the Godhead and the glorious citizenship of the priest (τοῦ ἱερέως). The stripes (λωρία) of the sticharion which are on the sleeve (τὰ ἐν τῇ χειρί), do set forth the bonds of Christ . . . . The stripes which run across, the blood which flowed from the side of Christ on the cross" (Hist. Eccles. et Mystica Theoria; Patrol. Gr. xcviii. 394).[a]

[4] It is all the more probable that this variation from ordinary use is simply an error, because in the Calendar of the Coptic Church, published by Mr. Malan, the entry for September 12 is "Removal of bones of Stephen, First of Martyrs and First of Deacons;" and that for December 27, "Martyrdom of the holy Apostle Stephen, ..."

We gather from all this that the vestment was originally of white linen; though it is now often made of costly materials, and in Lent (except on the Annunciation, Palm Sunday, and Easter Eve) purple sticharia are worn (Codinus Curopalata, de Officiis, c. 9, in fin.). This is of course meant in sign of mourning.

The bands spoken of by Germanus may be illustrated by those found in early instances of vestments in the West [see e.g. DALMATIC]. It will have been noticed that Germanus referred to the sticharion without special reference to any particular order. The wavy bands are now, however, peculiar to the sticharia of bishops. For another kind of ornamentation see GAMMADIA.

The Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, at its beginning, gives the formulae to be used by priest and deacon on assuming the sticharion (Goar, p. 59). The same name, too, is given to the garment put on the subdeacon at his ordination (ib. 244). According to Goar, however (p. 246, n. 6), this is a tighter and shorter garment than that ordinarily so called. For an instance of the use of the term for the dress of monks, see ib. p. 484. Among the Syriac churches the vestment is known as koutino, a mere corruption of χιτώνιον (Renaudot, Lit. Or. Coll. vol. ii. 54, ed. 1847). Among Coptic Christians it is known as jabat, or touniat, the latter obviously formed from the above Greek word (ib. vol. i. 161). See for further notices Ducange's Glossarium, s. v.; and Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v. [R. S.]

STICHERA (στιχηρά). (1) Verses composed by ecclesiastical authority, and forming part of the Greek liturgical offices. (Goar, Eucholog. pp. 32, 206.) στιχηρὰ προσόμοια were versicles composed of an equal number of syllables, so that they could be sung conveniently to the same tone.

(2) Stichera Biblia was a name given to certain books of the Old Testament, in consequence of their metrical or poetical character, viz. Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticles. (Greg. Naz. quoted by Ducange, s. v.) [F. E. W.]

STOLE (orarium, stola; ὡράριον, ἐπιτραχήλιον, περιτραχήλιον, φακεώλιον [Germanus, l. c.]; יְעֵדָה). It is true that the word stole does not occur, in its technical sense, as the title of a certain ornamental Christian vestment, till after our period of the first eight centuries, but it will be convenient to include here under this head our notices of the various ornaments which, under whatever name known, may be grouped together as being but varieties of the same general type.

Before doing this, however, we shall briefly remark on the uses of the word stole (στολή, stola) itself, in its earlier non-technical meanings. In classical Greek, στολή is most often found in the sense of garb or equipment (see e. g. Herodotus, i. 80, ἱππάδα στολὴν ἐνεσταλμένους), and also, though less frequently, with the meaning of an article of clothing, a single garment. This twofold use obtains also in the LXX. Here στολή stands for a variety of Hebrew words, but most frequently it is used for the priestly and high-priestly garments, both in the singular for the whole set of vestments (and that though the Hebrew word itself is plural [בְּגָדִים]; see e.g. Exod. xxviii. 2, 3; xxix. 21, 29, &c.), and in the plural, where reference is made to the component parts (e.g. Exod. xxviii. 4). The collective sense of στολή is not confined to the priestly garb, though this is the commonest use of it (see e.g. Deut. xxii. 5, στολὴ γυναικεία; Jer. lii. 27, τὴν στολὴν τῆς φυλακῆς; see also Baruch v. 1). We may add that στολή is the word used for the robe put on Joseph by Pharaoh (Gen. xli. 42), for the "change of raiment" given by Joseph to his brethren, and that it twice occurs as the translation of ephod, David being the wearer (2 Sam. vi. 14; 1 Chron. xv. 27). The word will doubtless carry with it as a rule the notion of a long, stately dress, as may be inferred from the choice of it to represent the flowing priestly garments, though of course it is not meant to imply that the word per se will mean the priestly garb. Such is markedly its New Testament use (see e. g. Mark xii. 38; Luke xx. 46 [of scribes loving to walk about ἐν στολαῖς]; Luke xv. 22 [where it is the "best robe" brought forth for the prodigal], also Mark xvi. 5; Rev. vi. 11, &c.), and also that found in classical Latin, to which we shall presently refer.

In ecclesiastical Greek, the word, as applied to the garb of Christian priesthood, occurs exceedingly rarely.[a] Theodoret (Hist. Eccles. ii. 27) tells of Constantine's gift of a ἱερὰ στολή to Macarius, bishop of Jerusalem, where one would suppose the word to be used much in its old classical meaning. Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople early in the 8th century, speaks of ἡ στολὴ τοῦ ἱερέως as being κατὰ τὸν ποδήρη Ἀαρών (Hist. Eccles. et Mystica Contemplatio; Patr. Gr. xcviii. 394). This, it cannot be doubted, is to be taken of the phelonion, the vestment par excellence; indeed it may be noted that the orarium is afterwards mentioned and described, as we shall shew below. Again, in the still extant letter of the patriarch Theodosius of Jerusalem to Ignatius of Constantinople, at the time of the Fourth General Council of Constantinople (A.D. 869), when a present of the supposed ποδήρης, ἐπωμίς and μίτρα of St. James is sent to the latter, they are grouped under the collective term of ἡ ἱεραρχικὴ στολή (Hardouin, Concilia, v. 1029).

In classical Latin, the stola was the characteristic dress of a Roman matron, as the toga of a citizen.[b] It came down to the feet, ad talos stola demissa (Horat. Sat. i. 2. 99), and was generally edged with a kind of flounce (instita). The use of stola in the Vulgate version of the Old Testament is not of course specific, like this, but it generally carries with it a notion of stateliness. In the collective sense of the Greek word for the set of priestly vestments, it does not seem to occur. In the Vulgate version of the New Testament, stola is always the translation of στολή.

[a] Hefele (Beiträge, ii. 185) speaks of only two instances as to be found in the writers of the first eight centuries.

[b] Very rarely we find the word used in connexion with men, e.g. of the priests of Isis (Apuleius, Metam. xi. 24).

The technical use of stola for a stole does not occur before the 9th century,[6] orarium being the current name of that ornament in the preceding centuries. Early in the 9th century, it would seem, the new name began to come into use. Thus Rabanus Maurus, writing about A.D. 820, speaks of the "orarium . . . . licet hoc quidam stolam vocent" (de Inst. Cler. i. 19; Patrol. cvii. 307). Only a few years later, Amalarius speaks of the ornament as stola, and ignores the word orarium altogether (de Eccl. Off. ii. 20; Patrol. cv. 1098). In Walafrid Strabo's list of Christian vestments, however, in the middle of the 9th century, the name orarium alone is used (de Rebus Eccl. 24; Patrol. cxiv. 952). Long after this, moreover, the old name survived side by side with the new. Thus, in a statute of Riculfus, bishop of Soissons (ob. A.D. 902), enjoining a proper stock of vestments for priest and altar, one item is "oraria, id est stolae duae nitidae" (stat. 7, Patrol. cxxxi. 17). Again, in a work once wrongly ascribed to Alcuin, but evidently written in the 10th or 11th century, we meet with the expression, "orarium, id est stola" (de Div. Off. 39; Patrol. ci. 1242), as though the former were rather a technical, the latter a familiar name. Writing as late as the middle of the 12th century, Honorius of Autun still uses the old word, "stola, quae et orarium dicitur" (Gemma Animae, i. 204; Patrol. clxxii. 695).

It may now be asked why such a word as stola, with its long-established meaning of a full flowing robe, should have been chosen to represent so totally different a thing as the narrow ribband-like ornament which we know as a "stole." To this question no very satisfactory answer has been given. It has been suggested that the border was the only surviving element of the old stola, and thus inherited its name. This is the view of Durandus (Rat. Div. Off. iii. 5, 6), who, after stating that the stola was once a white dress coming down to the feet, adds, "sed postquam alba coepit portari, mutata est in torquem." With this, Bock (Liturg. Gewänder des Mittelalters, i. 437) agrees. It must be confessed, however, that this theory does not seem at all probable. Equally little does Marriott's view (Vest. Christ. p. 215) commend itself to our mind, that from the use of stola in the Vulgate it became especially associated with the idea of a priestly robe, and that perhaps the orarium, being in the 8th century "the special vestment of Christian priesthood," gradually acquired the name of the "stola," as though the vestment par excellence. It does not, however, seem to us that stola, as used in the Vulgate, has any special priestly connexion; and further, it is rather a large assumption that the orarium, and not the planeta, should be considered the typical Christian vestment.

Even after stola had assumed the special meaning of orarium, the old meaning was still retained side by side therewith. Thus, e. g. Honorius of Autun (op. cit. 216) speaks of the "best robe" of the prodigal's father as prima stola. Very rarely we find stola and orarium spoken of together, the former presumably in its early sense—"stolam cum orario" (Vita S. Livini, c. 14; in D'Achéry and Mabillon's Acta Sanctorum Ordinis Benedicti, saec. 2, p. 455).

We must now discuss the history of the earlier word orarium; and here, as with stola, the technical meaning is preceded by a non-technical one. Of this we have given one or two instances under the separate article, to shew that the non-technical sense still, as it were, overlapped the technical in Christian writers. We must now, however, carry back our examination a stage further. Much the most probable derivation of orarium is from ora, the face, but several others, some indeed very far-fetched, have been proposed, some from the Latin and some from the Greek. Salmasius (infra) derives it from ora, in the sense of border, "lorum quod ad oram vestis asseritur," much the same in fact as the instita of the stola. Another Latin derivation is from orare, seeing that the stole is always to be worn during prayer. Rabanus Maurus, and one of the canons of the Fourth Council of Toledo (infra), derive it from orare in the sense of praedicare, with reference to one of the special offices of the deacon. The advocates of a Greek etymology propose, some to derive it from ὥρα, because by means of it "is indicated the time of the different parts of the service," or because it is useful "ad ministrationem in horas;" others from ὡραΐζειν, because the deacon is beautified with it (!); and others even from ὁράω, because the sight of it shews whether it is the priest or the deacon who is ministering. A significant piece of evidence bearing on the question of the language is furnished by the Etymologicum Magnum, s.v. φώσσων, φωσσώνιον (an Egyptian word, meaning a linen cloth), which is explained as σίνδων, ... ἢ παρὰ Ῥωμαίοις καλεῖται ὡράριον. Λέγεται δὲ οὕτω καὶ ὁ προσώπου τι ἐκμαγεῖον. More reasonable than any of these latter views is that first given, and we thus obtain the meaning of handkerchief, in the point of view of a primary use of wiping the face. Then, by a very natural extension, the word would become used for things like the handkerchief, strictly so called, but without any reference to the function implied by the derivation. Thus in this latter stage it would cover pretty much the same ground as the English word kerchief.

Our earliest examples are found in the Historiae Augustae Scriptores. Trebellius Pollio quotes a letter of the emperor Gallienus (A.D. 260–268) to Claudius, who afterwards succeeded him, in which he mentions the presents he had sent him. Among them we find "penulam [see the article] Illyricianam unam . . . . oraria Sarabdena[d] quatuor" (Vita Claudii, c. 17). The next emperor, Aurelian, was, as we are told by his biographer, Flavius Vopiscus, the first who gave oraria to the Roman people, "quibus uteretur populus ad favorem" (Vita Aurel. c. 48, where see the notes of Casaubon and Salmasius). This appears to mean that the people could by these indicate their applause in the circus or theatre, having previously been in the habit of waving their togas. Thus they would naturally be worn over the other dress. Marriott justly cites in evidence here one of the sculptures on the Arch of Constantine, where a number of the attendants of the emperor wear over their left shoulder a broad band or scarf (Vest. Christ. plate iv.). When we find that the earliest pictures of the ecclesiastical orarium (ib. plates xxviii. xxx. xxxi.) are, on the whole, similar to the above, the inference does not seem at all forced, that the Christian orarium, like the chasuble, the dalmatic, and other vestments, is but the old secular ornament, modified and adapted to its new use. The technical Christian meaning of the word then being thus formed, it speedily passed into Greek and Syriac; and indeed the earliest instance we are able to cite of this technical use is from the canons of a Greek council. Doubtless relevant to this matter is the question of the pallia linostima, which Sylvester, and afterwards Zosimus, is said to have commanded deacons to wear [MANIPLE]; and the papal pallium [PALLIUM] is obviously but another special instance of the general ornament. So too in the East we have ὠράριον, ἐπιτραχήλιον, ὠμοφόριον; all of which, we do not doubt, are but modifications of one primary idea.

[6] There would be a much earlier instance than this if we could accept the judgment of the editors as to the date of an anonymous fragment concerning the vestments used in the Gallican church (Martene and Durand, Thes. Anecd. v. 99, cited by Marriott, p. 204). Here the vestment is called stola, the name orarium being altogether absent. Although, however, the date of this document is given by the editors as the middle of the 6th century, there seems every reason for putting it several centuries later. We may note here that the rule is laid down concerning the stole, that it is not to be worn in Lent, "pro humiliatione." Again, the word stola occurs in the technical sense in the Gregorian Sacramentary, but the form in which this has reached us is certainly too much modified from the original to allow of any weight being given to this instance in the absence of any evidence which could be adduced in support of it.

We must now trace the history of the orarium as a ministerial garment. In the West our starting point for such a history will be the canons of early Spanish councils of the 6th and 7th centuries, one of which furnished us with an important record in tracing the history of the chasuble [PLANETA]. In the Eastern church, however, the use of the orarium can be traced much further back. It is to be remarked, before entering on this discussion, that the orarium, having been originally merely a handkerchief, even though at times of a choice and ornamental character (from which species of it, indeed, the orarium, in the sense of stole, has sprung), still retained its ordinary, as opposed to its ecclesiastical, meaning, even amongst Christians, long after its ecclesiastical meaning had been formed. Of this we have already given some examples [ORARIUM], but shall again here cite one or two instances. Ambrose uses the word orarium for the "napkin" with which the face of Lazarus was bound (de excessu fratris Satyri, ii. 78; Patrol. xvi. 1396). We find it in Augustine for the bandage which binds up a wounded eye (de Civ. Dei, xxii. 7; Patrol. xli. 765). Jerome couples it with sudarium (Epist. 52, ad Nepotianum, c. 9; vol. i. 264). The Christian poet Prudentius says of the martyrs Hemeterius and Celedonius, that they sent up to heaven, as it were heralds, the one his ring, the other his orarium—"hic sui det pignus oris[e] ut ferunt orarium" (Peristeph. i. 86; Patrol. lx. 289; cited also by Greg. Turon. de Gloria Martyrum, i. 93; Patrol. lxxxi. 727). Indeed, nearly two hundred years after this we may still cite an instance. The four oraria which Gregory the Great sends as a present to Constantinople, together with two camisiæ, are obviously merely handkerchiefs (Epist. vii. 30; Patrol. lxxvii. 887). We must now proceed to speak of the orarium as a ministerial vestment.

The general result yielded by the whole series of early allusions is that the orarium might be, and was to be, worn by orders down to that of deacon inclusive, but below the order of deacons its use was prohibited. It thus becomes specially associated with the order of deacons, as the planeta with that of priests. Our earliest reference is to be found in the canons of the Council of Laodicea (c. A.D. 363), which forbade the use of the orarium to sub-deacons, readers, and singers. The latter are not to wear a stole when they read or sing (cann. 22, 23; Labbe, i. 1500). Again, in a sermon once attributed to Chrysostom, and which, though probably spurious, is not much later than his time, the writer speaks of the Λειτουργοὶ τῆς θείας Λειτουργίας imitating the wings of the angels with their λεπτὰ ὀθόνια, which are worn upon the left shoulder, the earliest trace of that which we afterwards find the universal custom (Parab. de Fil. Prodigo, vol. vii. 655). Much about the same time, Isidore of Pelusium speaks of the ὀθόνη with which the deacons minister in holy things (Epist. i. 136; Patrol. Gr. lxxviii. 272). It is true that per se the word ὀθόνη might just as well be a maniple, as a stole; but, in the first place, the maniple, as the word is understood in the West, is unknown to the Eastern church, and moreover in the preceding passage the ὀθόνια of the deacons are worn upon the shoulder. A very similar allusion to that of the Pseudo-Chrysostom is found in the account of Christian vestments by Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople (l. c.). Here the word ὀθόνη has been replaced by ὠράριον. We must notice, however, that whereas in Latin orarium means a stole, by whatsoever order worn, in Greek ὠράριον means the stole of a deacon, and ἐπιτραχήλιον is applied to that of a priest or bishop.

We shall next call attention to a series of conciliar decrees on the subject of the orarium, which, taken together, give us a pretty complete view of the state of the case. In the first instance, that of the Council of Orleans (A.D. 511), it is probable that the ordinary interpretation, which explains orarium in its non-ecclesiastical sense, is correct, from the company in which orarium here finds itself. The use of orarium and tsangas [TSANGAE], a kind of boots, is forbidden to monks (can. 20; Labbe, iv. 1407). Our earliest definite instances are drawn, as in the case of the planeta, from Spain. The Second Council of Braga ordained in A.D. 563 that, inasmuch as the habit had arisen among deacons of the province of wearing the orarium below the tunic, and consequently hiding it, so that they could not be distinguished from sub-deacons, therefore for the future, "superposito scapulae (sicut decet) utantur orario" (cap. 9, Labbe, v. 841). It is from the records of the Fourth Council of Toledo (A.D. 633) that we obtain the greatest amount of information. One regulation passed here was to meet the case of clerics unjustly deposed from their orders. If a fresh synod reverses the sentence, they are still not to be considered to have regained their lost functions till they have received before the altar the external badges of their order from the hands of the bishop. In the case of bishops, priests, and deacons, one of these is the orarium. A subsequent canon of the same council forbids bishops and priests, and a fortiori deacons, to wear two oraria. The deacon is to wear it on the left shoulder only,[1] and it is to be plain (purum), not ornamented with colours or gold (cann. 28, 40; Labbe, v. 1714, 1716). The Fourth Council of Braga (A.D. 675) orders that at the celebration of the Eucharist the priest should wear his stole (and only one) so that it should pass round the neck and over both shoulders, and form a cross on his breast (can. 4; Labbe, vii. 581). This regulation is quoted by Innocent III. (de Sacro Altaris Mysterio, lib. i. c. 54; Patrol. ccxvii. 794). The penalty enacted for disobedience is excommunication.

[d] The meaning and spelling of this word is doubtful: one conjecture is Sareptena, from Sarepta, the Phoenician city.

[e] The implied connexion here between orarium and os, as bearing on the question of derivation, will be noticed.

All this points to a well-established state of things, when even the manner of wearing the vestment is prescribed; and there is nothing unfair in assuming that it represents a long-settled usage. The reference also to stoles ornamented with gold and colours points to the same conclusion. As an illustration of this last point, we may cite the will of Riculfus, bishop of Helena (ob. A.D. 915), who, among his legacies to his church and successors, leaves "stolas quattuor cum auro, una (sic) ex illis cum tintinnabulis" (Patrol. cxxxii. 468). We may probably assume, too, that the omophoria and oraria, by presents of which, according to Nicetas Paphlago (Vita Ignat. Const., Patrol. Gr. cv. 572), the patriarch Photius signalised his restoration (A.D. 878), would be richly ornamented.

A number of later rules go beyond those we have already cited, and require at any rate a priest to wear his stole constantly. Thus the Council of Mayence (A.D. 813) directs priests to wear the stole, — "Sine intermissione . . . . propter differentiam sacerdotii dignitatis" (Concil. Moguut. can. 28; Labbe, vii. 1249), with the view of course of shewing at all times that he was a priest. This rule assumes a special form as laid down at the beginning of the 10th century by Regino, abbat of Prumia, to the effect that a priest on a journey shall always wear his "stola vel orarium" (Eccl. Discipl. i. 62; Patrol. cxxxii. 190).

Later notices of the stole, its ornamentation, and special rules concerning it, do not fall within our province. It may suffice to remark that even in the 9th century not only were coloured and ornamental stoles worn, but also the prohibition to wear more than one stole seems to have been disregarded. We find, for example, in the illustrations to the Pontifical of Landulfus, a MS. of the 9th century, that some of the priests wear two stoles, one of which is white, with black crosses, and the other gold-coloured (plates xxxiv.–xxxvi. in Marriott, taken from D'Agincourt, Histoire de l'Art par les Monuments).

[1] The reason for choosing the left shoulder is given, viz. that, the right being free, the deacon may be able the more readily to hasten to and fro on his duties.

In the Greek church the stole is known by a different name, and assumes a different form, according to the different orders by which it is worn. Thus, as we have already seen, the form assumed by prelates is known as ὠμοφόριον [OMOPHORION], the stole worn by bishops generally and by priests being known as ἐπιτραχήλιον and περιτραχήλιον, the name ὠράριον being exclusively associated with the stole as worn by deacons. Into the case of the omophorion we need not again enter; the epitrachelion differs from the Western stole in that it is not thrown round the neck, but has a hole for the head to pass through and hangs down in front, though, from the seam down the middle, it preserves the idea of the ornament of which it is but a modification.

It may be convenient now, if we, at the risk of a slight repetition, indicate the various methods of wearing the stole characterising different orders in different branches of the church. In the Western church, the custom has been that priests, wearing the stole over both shoulders, should cross it on the breast, and confine it at the waist with a girdle; the bishop, who has his pectoral cross, allowing it to hang free, while the deacon has the stole hanging over the left shoulder and fastened at the right hip. As regards deacons, however, the present plan is an innovation on an older one, dating, it would seem, from the 12th century (Hefele, p. 191), before which time they appear to have allowed their stoles to hang down freely like those of the Greek deacons. Perhaps from the 12th century also dates the habit of deacons of the Western church of wearing the stole under the dalmatic. To do more, however, than just hint at this would be to go beyond our legitimate limits.

In the Greek church, the epitrachelion (worn by priests and bishops) practically forms, as we have said, one band, hanging down in front; and the deacon wears his orarium over the left shoulder, hanging down before and behind, thus justifying the simile of the wings. Among Syrian Christians we find a difference: here the stole is worn by readers (but among the Maronites only), hanging from the right shoulder; by sub-deacons (among the Syrian Christians generally), round the neck; by deacons, hanging from the left shoulder (as in the Greek church generally); and by priests, hanging round the neck and in front of the breast (Assemani, Bibl. Or. iii. 2. 797). It may be added that among the Nestorians a reader wears the orarium over his arms, but only at the time of his own ordination. Among the Malabar Christians, the vestment, as worn by deacons, is known under the name of orro, the shape being apparently like that of the epitrachelion, with a hole for the head (Howard, Christians of St. Thomas, p. 133). The vestment is known in the Coptic church under the name bitarchil, which is clearly a corruption of epitrachelion (Renaudot, Liturg. Or. Coll. i. 162, ed. Frankf. 1847). Among the Armenians it is known as poor-Ourar, apparently a corruption of orarium; the shape, however, is that of the epitrachelion (Fortescue, The Armenian Church, p. 133).

STYLITES. [Compare Mortification, p. 312.] Solitaries, who made their abode on the top of a pillar (στῦλος), received the name of στυλῖται. The first of these pillar-saints was Symeon, who in the early part of the 5th century took his stand on a pillar in the neighbourhood of Antioch, and died, after many years' exposure to the elements, A.D. 459 (Evagrius, H. E. i. 13 f.). His most famous followers were his pupil Daniel († 489), whose pillar was near Constantinople, and Symeon the younger († 596), who displayed himself, like his namesake, near Antioch (Evagr. vi. 23). [See their lives in the Dict. of Christ. Biogr.] A certain Alypius is said to have spent seventy years on a pillar in the neighbourhood of Adrianople (Surius, Nov. 26). The first Symeon's pillar was, according to Evagrius (i. 13), two cubits (about three feet) in circumference; and the saint abode seven years on lower pillars, and for thirty years upon one of forty cubits (about sixty feet). Another authority (Theodoret, Hist. Rel. c. 26) says that he took his stand at first on a pillar six cubits high, then on one of twelve, then on one of twenty-two, and that in the year 440 he was seen on one of thirty-six cubits. The supposed base of Symeon's pillar is still shewn at Khelat-Sema'n in central Syria, between the church and the monastery of St. Symeon (De Vogüé, Syrie Centrale, pl. 139, quoted by Martigny). So slender a pillar as Evagrius describes must of course have had some kind of platform at the top, probably railed, or it would have been impossible to avoid falling during sleep; but it is clear that the saint allowed himself no protection from sun or storm. In an ancient drawing figured by Martigny (p. 745, 2nd ed.) the saint is represented sitting in a kind of cup-shaped capital, while a figure below attaches a basket, probably of food, to a cord which he lets down.

The pillar-saints naturally found few imitators in the more rigorous climate of the West. A Lombard named Wulfilac did, however, pass some time on a pillar in the district of Trèves, and quitted it at the desire of his bishop. He himself told Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. viii. 15) that he suffered horribly in winter from the cold, which had caused the nails to drop from his feet; and that the rain, freezing on his beard, formed icicles which hung down like a bunch of candles. (U. G. SUBCINGULUM. [Girdle, p. 728.]

SUBDEACON (ὑποδιάκονος, ὑπηρέτης; subdiaconus). At what precise time the orders lower than that of deacon were instituted in the church is a matter of complete uncertainty. The attempt to trace it to the apostles or their immediate successors is acknowledged by Cardinal Bona (Rer. Liturg. lib. i. c. 25, § 17) to be a failure. The most probable view of the case is that the growing needs and organization of the Christian community gave occasion to their institution and gradual and orderly development. "Crescente ecclesia, crevit officium ecclesiasticum: ut multitudini ecclesiae subveniri posset, adjiciuntur inferiores in adjutorio praepositorum" (Amalar. de Eccl. Off. lib. ii. c. 6). And, after their introduction, an apposite precedent was discovered by later writers (e.g. Isidor. Hispal. de Eccl. Off. lib. ii. c. 10; Amalarius, lib. ii. c. 11; Rabanus Maurus, de Instit. Cleric. lib. i. c. 8) in the Nethinim of the Jewish church, though, with their ignorance of Hebrew, they strangely interpreted the word as equivalent to "humilis;" and, by a similar mistake in etymology, they considered Nathanael, the "Israelite in whom was no guile," to have been a type of the order.

St. Ignatius certainly makes mention of only three orders—bishops, priests, and deacons. In his Epistle to Polycarp, vi., ὑπηρέτης means evidently a deacon. And so it is in Hermas, Vis. iii. 5. Beveregе (Cod. Can. lib. ii. 4), after quoting No. 43 of the Apostolical Canons, argues that the office existed as far back as the 2nd century, though (he acknowledges) we can find no mention anywhere of its first institution. All that can be said is, with Martene (tom. ii. lib. i. c. 8), that it may have been of more ancient introduction than the other "minores ordines," and that it, as well as they, was instituted by the church in the 2nd or 3rd century.

Subdeacons are not mentioned by name in any Christian writings of the West till the 3rd century; e.g. St. Cyprian, Epp. 24, 28, 78, 79, 80 (ed. Benedict), and the Epistle of Cornelius, bishop of Rome, to Fabius, ap. Euseb. vi. 43; and in the Greek church not till the 4th century: e.g. St. Epiphan. in Exposit. Fidei Cathol. and St. Basil, Epist. Can. ii. who calls the office ἡ ἀχειροτονητὸς διηρεσία. Even then, and later, some uncertainty hangs over the time of their introduction into different churches, because other minor orders were included under the term deacon, after they were certainly in operation. E.g. Optatus (lib. i. p. 39, lib. ii. p. 53, as quoted by Cotelerius in his note on Apost. Const. ii. 25), "episcopos, presbyteros, diaconos, ministros, et laicos seu turbam fidelium"; "cum sint quatuor genera capitum in ecclesia; episcoporum, presbyterorum, diaconorum, et fidelium." And so St. Jerome, on Isaiah xix. speaks of five orders in the church, not specifying subdeacons. In the Apost. Const. lib. ii. 28, the word ὑπηρέτης is used as an equivalent to διάκονος. In other places, e.g. iii. 11, vi. 17, viii. 28, it is used as equivalent to ὑποδιάκονος. This variation of meaning points to the probability of some interpolation in these passages; although the same variation of meaning can be exemplified from other writers.

The age for ordination to the subdiaconate was twenty years, according to the second council of Toledo, can. 1 (A.D. 447), and so the council in Trullo, can. 15 (A.D. 692). For the form of ordination, see ORDINATION, p. 1510.

In regard to his duties, the subdeacon was at first, no doubt, little more than what his name imported, one under the deacon, to assist the deacon. Special duties, however, were soon assigned to him. Such were, to supply water to the priest in which to wash his hands at the appointed time in the office (Apost. Const. viii. 11), a function elsewhere assigned to the deacon (see Cyril. Hieros. Catech. xxiii. 2). By the Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 11) it is enjoined that deacons should stand at the door by which men entered, and subdeacons by that at which women entered, so that no one even of the faithful should go in or out during the recitation of the solemn part of the office. The whole of this duty presently devolved on the subdeacons (so Dion. Areop. Eccl. Hierarch. c. 5). In the acts of the Nicene council, part 2, were recounted the ἱερούμενοι, viz. ἐπίσκοπος, πρεσβύτερος, διάκονος, ὑπηρέτης. It was the province of the last to remain at the narthex of the church, and there to keep order as people went out and in; and not to depart from the door, till the service was over. By the council of Laodicea, cans. 20–22, a subdeacon is to pay the same respect to the deacon as the deacon to the priest. He must not have any place in the deacon's apartment, nor touch the sacred vessels. He must not wear an ORARIUM, nor leave the doors. This is again forbidden him by can. 43. Zonaras on these canons explains that the subdeacons were placed at the doors for the purpose of clearing out the catechumens after their part of the service was finished; and so to bring in, and shew out, the penitents, calling aloud to them to leave the church, and to the faithful to remain. They were not to leave the doors for the purpose of joining in the sacred mysteries, for that office belonged to the priests. Before the service they had to bring to the deacon the paten, to have charge of the bread for the oblations, and of the chalice; and after the conclusion, to convey them back again. In earlier times, the epistle had been commonly read by the lector, i.e. after the deacons had been appointed to take the gospel. The practice of the subdeacon reading the epistle cannot be traced earlier than the 7th century. Martene says it did not begin till the 8th century. Amalarius, at the beginning of the 9th (ii. 11), expresses his wonder how the subdeacons had come to read the epistle, a new practice which was then gaining ground. Other functions in detail fulfilled by subdeacons are to be found in Apost. Const. viii. 11, 12; Martene, sub voce subdiaconus (Ind.); and Bingham, bk. iii. c. 2.

In the church of Rome, as we learn from Euseb. vi. 43, the number of subdeacons was, and continued to be, seven only, in close adherence to Acts vi. In the church of Constantinople there were seventy.

The subdiaconi regionarii in Rome, of whom we read in Gregory M. (lib. viii. Indict. i. Ep. 14, p. 906, ed. Ben.), were appointed to attend on the priest, and on high days the pope himself, as he celebrated on the station days, to change his vestments, &c. Originally these were seven in number, then seven were added, and seven again, so as to make twenty-one in all; and they were placed under a prior (Ducange, s. voc.; Milman, Latin Christianity, bk. iii. ch. 7, p. 411).

At their first institution subdeacons were reckoned amongst the minor orders, as is evident from the council of Laodicea. From the writings of Gregory the Great, it appears they had come to be considered a sort of intermediate order. [ORDERS, HOLY.]

It is difficult to say when celibacy was first imposed on subdeacons. By the fourth canon of the first council of Toledo (A.D. 400), "subdeacons marrying a second time are to be reduced to the rank of porter or reader, and not to be permitted to read the gospel or epistle." From the thirteen canons of the council in Trullo, we learn that married men had been ordained subdeacons. Sundry epistles were written by Gregory the Great to subdeacons, from which we gather that the rule of celibacy was strict in Rome, but less so in Sicily, where Gregory made arrangements for a stricter rule in future. And as by degrees celibacy was enforced, so was the subdiaconate by degrees reckoned amongst "the holy orders": subdeacons could now enter the sacrarium, and touch the holy vessels; thus innovating on the canons of the councils of Carthage, and of Agde (can. 66). (Cf. Greg. M. Epp. lib. i. Ind. ix. Ep. 44, &c.)

[H. B.]

SUBINTRODUCTAE (συνείσακτοι, ἐπείσακτοι, extraneae adoptivae (Conc. Bracc. ii. iii.) called also ἀδελφαί, sorores, and ἀγαπηταί), females, not related by blood, who, under the plea of spiritual relationship, resided with the clergy, occupying not only the same house but the same room, and even sometimes, with perilous rashness, often productive of the grossest scandals, the same bed (Hieron. Ep. ad Eustoch. 22, de Virg. Custod.). These females were commonly some of the consecrated virgins of the church, "whom," in the words of Bingham, "they that entertained them pretended to love only with a chaste love." The suspicions, however, which this injudicious custom gave rise to were so grave, and the evils resulting so terrible, that the practice received the sternest condemnations of the church. How deeply it was rooted in human nature is evident from its springing up again and again in spite of ecclesiastical censures, and requiring to be repressed by repeated canons of councils. One of the earliest notices of this close intercourse between the sexes, cloaked with a religious sanction, occurs in the Shepherd of Hermas (lib. iii. simil. ix. § 11). The virgins of the vision invite him to stay with them. To his question, "ubi manebo?" they reply "nobiscum dormies ut pater, non ut maritus," which put him to the blush. He accepts, however, their invitation, and passes the night with them outside the tower, lying in the middle of the virgins on their "tunicae lineae," the whole night being spent by them in prayer. This passage, though, as Hefele remarks, inconsistent with the early date once assigned to the "Shepherd," proves the existence of this practice in the 2nd century. As early as the council of Elvira, A.D. 305, can. 27, a bishop or any cleric was forbidden to have any female residing with him except a sister or daughter, "extraneam neque quam habere placent" (Labbe, i. 973). The council of Ancyra also by its 19th canon, A.D. 314, forbade virgins to hold intercourse with males, συνερχομένας ὑπ' ἀδελφάς (Labbe, i. 1463). The third canon of the council of Nicaea was directed against this practice, forbidding any cleric, either bishop, presbyter, or deacon, to have any such female to reside with them, but only their mother, sister, or aunt, whose natural relationship would disarm suspicion, μὴ ἐξεῖναι συνείσακτον ἔχειν πλὴν εἰ μὴ ἄρα μητέρα ἢ ἀδελφὴν ἢ θείαν (Labbe, ii. 29). These "subintroductae" were also condemned by the third and fourth canons of the first council of Carthage, A.D. 348, (ib. 715), the seventeenth canon of the third council and the forty-sixth of the fourth, as well as by the second council of Arles, A.D. 452, can. 3 (ib. iv. 1011); and of Lerida, A.D. 524, can. 15 (ib. iv. 1613); the first council of Seville, A.D. 590, can. 3 (ib. v. 1589), and the second and third of Braga, can. 15, and lex. 19 (ib. v. 838, 909), and the second (can. 3) and fourth (can. 42) of Toledo (ib. iv. 1733, v. 1716). The council of Antioch also, by which Paul of Samosata was deposed, A.D. 369, urged among the reasons for his degradation that his clergy had received into their houses "συνείσακτοι γυναῖκες, as the Antiochenes called them" (Euseb. H. E. vii. 30). In spite of ecclesiastical censures, however, the custom continued to flourish to the great scandal of the church and the demoralisation of those who adopted it. The frequency of the recurrence of its prohibition by the Spanish councils proves its prevalence in Spain, where it was practised by the Priscillianists (Braccar. ii. can. 15, Labbe, v. 838). How intolerable the practice had become is evident from several passages of the writings of Cyprian, who praises Pomponius for excommunicating a deacon who had persevered in it in spite of episcopal warning (Cyprian, Epist. 62 [4] ad Pomponium; Epist. 6 [14]; Epist. 7 [13]). The grossly indecent lengths to which it was carried by some called forth Jerome's most powerful vituperation (Ep. ad Eustoch.). "Unde in ecclesias Agapetarum pestis introiit? Unde sine nuptiis aliud nomen uxorum? Immo unde novum concubinarum genus? Plus inferam, unde meretrices univirae? Quae eadem domo, uno cubiculo, saepe uno tenentur et lectulo; et suspiciosos nos vocant si aliquid existimamus . . . cum in eodem proposito esse simulant quaerunt alienorum spiritale solatium ut domi habeant carnale commercium." And in his letter to Oceanus, de Vita Clericorum, he ordains that if any one after his warnings, "agapetas amplius quam Christum quaesierit amore," he is to be convened according to the rule of the synod, and the Nicene canons read to him. Among the letters of Basil is one to a presbyter, by name Paregorius, an old man of seventy, threatening that, unless he dismissed his "subintroducta," he would depose him from his office, and if he ventured to exercise its functions he would excommunicate all who recognised him (Basil, Ep. 55 [198]). Basil's brother Gregory Nyssen also condemns those who openly cohabit with women, and give the name of sisterhood to such cohabitation (De Virg. c. 23).

We learn from Gregory Nazianzen that not only were clerics in the habit of having females to reside with them, but that ladies, who professed celibacy, also had their συνείσακτοι of the opposite sex. In his advice to virgins he says:

ἄρσενα παντ' ἀλέεινε συνείσακτον δὲ μάλιστα and he expresses his suspicion of this questionable relationship in the following lines:

τοὺς δὲ συνεισάκτους ὡς δὴ φάσκουσιν ἅπαντες οὐκ οἶδ' εἰ τε γάμῳ δώσομεν, εἴτ' ἀγάμοις θήσομεν, εἴ τε μέσοντι φυλάξομεν· οὐ γὰρ ἔγωγε κεῖν με λέγητε κακῶν πρᾶγμα τόδ' αἰνέσομαι.

We see from the words of Jerome, "coelibem virgo sperait germanum, fratrem quaerit extraneum" (Ad Eustoch.) that this indecorous custom was also in vogue among the religious ladies of the Western church.

On his appointment to the see of Constantinople, Chrysostom found "subintroductae" prevailing to the most scandalous extent among his clergy, and the unpopularity which culminated in his deposition and exile had as one of its first moving causes the stern determination with which he endeavoured to put them down, and the withering sarcasms he poured out upon them. It appears from the two homilies delivered by him, "de iis qui subintroductas virgines habent," that the clergy who adopted this practice degraded themselves into "cavalieri serventi" to their imperious mistresses, carrying their cushions, smoothing their sofas and easy chairs, providing delicacies for their table, and humouring their whims, to the complete disregard of their sacred character and the neglect of their clerical duties. The voice of the church having proved insufficient to repress the spreading evil, the civil power was called in to legislate against it. A law of Honorius and Theodosius II. (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. ii. de Episc. leg. 44; Cod. Just. lib. i. tit. iii. leg. 19) expresses its strong disapprobation of this "consortium sororiae appellationis," and forbids the clergy of any degree whatsoever to have any females residing with them, except mothers, daughters, and sisters, with a special reservation for wives married before their husbands entered holy orders, "quae ante sacerdotium maritorum legitimum meruere conjugium." The practice, however, obstinately survived, and was repeatedly denounced by the ecclesiastical authorities in vain. The second canon of the council held at Rome under pope Zacharias in the middle of the 8th century repeats the old prohibition of the Nicene council, and, as subsequent history shews, with as little effect, "presbyteri vel diaconi subintroductas mulieres nullo modo secum audeant habitare nisi forsitan matrem suam aut proximitatem generis sui habentes." SUBSELLIUM. Other words used in the same sense are scabellum, subpositorium, suppedaneum (ὑποπόδιον), the last of which is exclusively applied to the support of the feet of our Saviour on the cross. They all mean a footstool or any rest for the feet; and from the earliest time persons of rank or authority are represented, when seated, as resting their feet upon a subsellium. This mark of honour, according to Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. 10), was invented by the Persians. Homer gives a footstool to Helen and to Ulysses (Odyss. iv. 136; x. 315). In Christian monuments this distinction is assigned to God when receiving the offerings of Cain and Abel (Bottari, Sculture e Pitture, &c. cxxxvii.); to our Lord when seated and teaching his disciples (Perret, Catacombes de Rome, ii. pl. 24): and to the Virgin when the Magi are presenting their offerings (Bottari, Sculture e Pitture, xl).

Episcopal chairs always had the subsellium, and Christians generally avoided the use of it as a matter of humility, and reserved the honour for bishops. In this spirit Jerome cautions Eustochium (Ep. ad Eustoch. xxiii.) (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v.).

SUBSTRATI. [PENITENCE, p. 1593.]

SUBURBICARII (EPISCOPATUS) or SUBURBICARIAE (ECCLESIAE). The earliest use of this term, in connexion with church history, occurs in the sixth canon of the council of Nicaea as given by Rufinus of Aquileia (Hist. Eccles. i. 6), decreeing that "the ancient custom" shall continue to be observed both at Alexandria and at Rome, whereby the patriarch (or metropolitan) of the one city exercises a general oversight over the churches throughout Egypt, and the metropolitan (or patriarch) of the other, over "the suburbicarian churches," "et ut apud Alexandriam et in urbe Roma vetusta consuetudo servetur, ut vel ille Aegypti, vel hic suburbicarium ecclesiarum sollicitudinem gerat" (Migne, Patrol. xxi. 225; Mansi, ii. 702). In the corresponding decree of the council of Chalcedon the same expression occurs: "Antiqui moris est, ut urbis Romae episcopus habeat principatum, ut suburbicaria loca et omnem provinciam suam sollicitudine gubernet" (Mansi, vii. 1127). It is matter of considerable dispute (i) as to what is intended by the above expressions, "suburbicarian churches," "suburbicarian districts;" (ii) whether the superintendence to be exercised was that of a patriarch or a metropolitan (METROPOLITAN).

(i) A decree of the emperor Julian affords further illustration of the use of the term. It says that the resources of the landed estates, whether patrimonial or copyhold, must be carefully preserved "not only throughout all Italy, but also in the suburbicarian territories, and in Sicily"; "Non enim per Italiam tantum, sed etiam per suburbicarias regiones et Siciliam patrimoniallium et emphyticorum fundorum vires servandas esse perspeximus" (Cod. Theod. II. i. 9). Here it seems difficult to accept the view of Gothofredus (ad loc.) and Cave, that the "suburbicariae regiones" are those included in the district governed by the "praefectus Urbi" or "custos Urbis," a region which from the time of Augustus embraced a circuit of 100 miles' radius from Rome (Dig. I. xii. 1, § 3, 4; Gregorovius, Gesch. d. Stadt Rom. ii. 55; Gothofredus, Opera, Jurid. Min. p. 1320). The law appears rather to contemplate the divisions of the empire established by Constantine, according to which "Italia" would mean the Italian vicariate, which comprised northern Italy, the First and Second Rhaetin, &c.: in distinction from this the "suburbicariae regiones" would denote the ten provinces of the Roman vicariate, which were—1. Campania; 2. Tuscia and Umbria; 3. Picenum suburbicarium (so called to distinguish it from Picenum Annonarium in the Italian vicariate); 4. Valeria; 5. Samnium; 6. Apulia and Calabria; 7. Lucania and Bruttii; 8. Sicilia; 9. Sardinia; 10. Corsica. To this interpretation of the expression in the decree, the separate mention of Sicilia presents a slight, but by no means insuperable, difficulty.

Bingham, in discussing the above two interpretations, says, "either may be admitted, as having at least their arguments of probability to defend them" (Antiq. IX. i. 9). Ducange (s. v.) distinguishes between "suburbicariae" and "urbicariae," holding that the former term denotes the ten provinces, the latter the territory of the "praefectus Urbi." Baronius, on the other hand (Ann. 325, cxxxv., cxxxvi.), considers that these terms were of the same significance, and both denote the yet wider range of provinces bound by the "leges frumentariae" to supply the capital with corn at a fixed rate.

(ii) Bearing in mind the close analogy that existed between the political and ecclesiastical organisation of the empire, it seems difficult to suppose that the term "suburbicariae" could have been used in the church in a different sense from that in which it is employed by Julian; and we are thus led to the conclusion that the council of Nicaea recognised the right of the bishop of Rome to exercise over the ten provinces of the Roman diocese or vicariate a patriarchal authority corresponding to that exercised by the patriarch of Alexandria over Egypt. [METROPOLITAN, HOLY ORDERS.] That he already exercised immediate jurisdiction as a metropolitan over these provinces, and that this could have been described as "vetusta consuetudo" at the time of the council of Nicaea, is contrary to all probability (POPE, iv. 2). [J. B. M.]

SUCCENTOR (Latin, succentor; Greek ὑποφωνητής; Sicil. succiantro). It is not easy to say when this word or the corresponding office first came into use. But it was known to Joannes de Janua, who finished his Catholicon in 1286, for he describes it thus: "Qui in ecclesiâ post praecentorem sive principalem cantorem subsequenter canendo respondet, vel qui facit officium principaliter in choro sinistro." But although the word does not become at all common till later times, still it seems quite clear that it was known in early days; for it is named by St. Augustine: "Praecentor scilicet qui vocem praemittit in cantu, succentor autem qui subsequenter canendo respondet" (Enarr. in Ps. 87, 1). This is the earliest known passage in which the word occurs.

Some idea of what was meant by the term "succent" (succinere) may be gathered from the following passage, in which St. Basil describes the antiphonal mode of singing the Psalms in very early days:—"They sing them alternately, divided into two choirs. Then having entrusted to one to begin the tune, the others succent." (ὑπηχοῦσι, succinunt, Lat. Tr. Ep. 63 (al. 207) ad Cler. Necocaes.)

The Greek word which is given by Ducange as the equivalent of succentor, is found in a passage of the interpolated epistle of Ignatius to the Philadelphians: τίς γάρ εἰμι ἐγὼ . . . ἀλλ' ὡς συστρατιώτης ὑμῶν, ὑποφωνητοῦ τάξιν ἐπέχων (Oxon. 1644).

The passages already quoted point to this officer's duty of "succenting" in the service of the church. In subsequent times, when the office became a dignity in the greater churches, another character was superadded to him in that he was made the representative of the precentor in his absence. It is observed by Magri (Hierolex. s.v. Cantor) that in many churches of France a festival of the first class is called festum cantoris, because it then belongs to the praecentor (cantor) to arrange the service (officium ordinare); while a festival of the second class is called festum succentoris, because then the same duty falls upon the succentor. SUN (see MOON). Martigny states, on Bottari's authority (tavv. xxxii. lxxvi.), that the two colossal masks or grotesque faces, sometimes observed at the angles of ancient sarcophagi, are intended to represent the sun and moon. In this sense they have the same import of the seasons, as denoting the meting-out of human life. Such faces or masks occur, at all events, on the altar of the Basilica of S. Lorenzo-fuori-le-Mura at Rome, which resembles an ancient sarcophagus in all its details of ornament (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. c. 1, tab. xlv. fig. 4).

The sun appears on the well-known Vatican sarcophagus, with the history of Jonah and the double sea monster (Bottari, tav. xlii.) with rays and a nimbus (see Parker, Phot. 2005). On a lamp referred to by Martigny in the collection of Sante Bartoli (Lucern. antich. part iii. No. 39), the sun and moon accompany the Good Shepherd, perhaps representing time and eternity, as is suggested by the Abbé Cavedoni (Ragguaglio delle Art. Christ. p. 32). Or they may probably be placed with the Good Shepherd, for the same varied reasons which account for their presence in so many of the early crucifixions. Either, which is possible, they denote the two natures of our Lord, or they give the idea of a presence and attendance, as it were, of the powers of nature at the central event of the world, and remind of the eclipse and darkness of that day. Both sun and moon occur, at all events, in the crucifixion of the Laurentian or Rabula MS. of Florence [CRUCIFIX, p. 515]. So in the 9th century MS. Bibliothèque nationale, No. 510). On the gates of St. Paul (R. de Fleury, ii. pl. 88), as angels. So in the majority of Saxon and Irish MSS.; on the diptych of Rambona, as half-length figures [CRUCIFIX, p. 515]; on the cross of Velletri (Borgia, de Cruce Veliterna), as faces; so also in the wall painting of the cemetery of pope St. Julius I. (Bottari, t. lxxxii.). The torches borne by the figures of the diptych of Rambona are a singular instance of barbaric return to classical treatment, quite in keeping with the almost unique addition of the wolf and twins.

In the classical revival of Charles the Great and Alcuin, for such in MSS. it really was, the sun and moon become figures in chariots, the sun drawn by horses, the moon by oxen. The Bible of Ct. Vivian in Count Bastard's second volume, contains a beautiful example of Franko- or Anglo-Greek fancy [MOON]. In the MS. of Joshua, 7th or 8th century (Vatican; d'Agincourt, Peinture, vol. v. pl. xxviii.) the sun stands still as an 8-rayed star, and the moon on the other side. This had been long before represented in the 5th-century mosaics of St. Maria Maggiore at Rome. The Utrecht Psalter has a sun and moon on its frontispiece; at the heading of the Song of the Three Children, at Pss. cxxxviii. and cxliii. as two heads, one wearing a crown of spikes or rays, the other a crescent; and in Ps. cxxi. they are represented as shooting "sharp arrows and hot, burning coals" on the false tongue. They are not present at the Crucifixion in Ps. cxii. [R. St. J. T.]

SUPERHUMERALE. This word is primarily used in patristic Latin for the ephod of the Jewish high-priest, exactly translating the ἐπωμίς of the LXX (see e.g. Exodus xxviii. 4, 6, &c.: Jerome, Epist. 64 ad Fabiolam, § 15, vol. i. 363: Bede, de Tabernaculo, iii. 4; Patrol. xci. 466: Rabanus Maurus, de Inst. Cler. i. 15; Patrol. cvii. 306).

The meaning of the word having thus been fixed, it seemed only natural to later liturgical writers, who saw in Christian vestments the reproduction of the Jewish, to find a Christian representation of the ephod, and to call it by this name. Accordingly the amice [AMICE] was often thus called (see e.g. Pseudo-Alcuin, de Div. Off. 39, Patrol. ci. 1242; Gilbert of Limerick, de Statu Eccl., Patrol. clix. 999).

The word is also used for the archiepiscopal pallium [PALLIUM], as by Gregory the Great (Reg. Past. c. 14; Patrol. lxxvii. 29; Epist. lib. i. 25; ib. 471 [a long quotation from the preceding work]; lib. vi. 64, ib. 848), and in the Collectanea of Anastasius Bibliothecarius (Relatio motionis in S. Maximum; Patrol. cxxix. 610). In this last case the corresponding Greek word is ὠμοφόριον [OMOPHORION]. For further references see Ducange's Glossary, s. v. [R. S.]

SUPERPOSITIO JEJUNII. An addition of one fast to another, causing two, three, or sometimes even four or six days to be passed in total abstinence, was known in the Latin church by the name of superpositio jejunii, and in the Greek by ὑπέρθεσις. Such lengthened periods of fasting were termed ὑπερθέσιμοι ἡμεραι, and the corresponding verb was ὑπερτίθεσθαι, superponere. This superposition of one day of abstinence on another might take place at any time as an act of extraordinary devotion, but it was most commonly practised in Holy Week, as a preparation for the Easter solemnities, especially on Good-Friday and Easter Eve, which were very usually kept as a continuous fast. This practice is called by Tertullian "jejunia conjungere" (de Patientia, c. 13), and "sabbatum continuum cum jejuniis parasceues" (de Jejun. c. 14). It is referred to by Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. xviii. c. 17) when he gives the ὑπέρθεσις τῆς νηστείας τῆς παρασκευῆς as a reason for shortening his address, lest he should exhaust the catechumens. Epiphanius also, when speaking of the observance of this week, states that all Christians observed it ἐν ξηροφαγίᾳ, i.e. taking bread and water and salt, and that only in the evening, but the more earnest passed the greater part or the whole of the week in perfect abstinence: οἱ σπουδαῖοι διπλᾶς καὶ τριπλᾶς καὶ τετραπλᾶς ὑπερτίθενται, καὶ ὅλην τὴν ἑβδόμαδα τινές (Epiphan. Epitom. Fid. tom. ii. c. 22; cf. Haer. 29, Nazoraeor.; Constit. Apost. lib. v. c. 18) Dionysius bishop of Alexandria in his canonical epistle (can. i. apud Bevereg. Pandect, tom. ii. p. 3) uses the same terms, ὑπερτιθέθαι and ὑπέρθεσις when speaking of those who practise special abstinence during this week, some adding two days together, some three, some four, some the whole six, while some keep the fast of superposition only on the Friday and Saturday, and think they have done a great thing if they hold out till break of day on Easter morning. This continuation of the fast from day to day during Holy Week is termed by Sozomen ἐπισυνάπτειν τὴν νηστείαν (H. E. i. 11). As has been said, neither the term nor the thing was peculiar to Holy Week, but was applicable to any period of special abstinence. So Evagrius, speaking of the strict asceticism of the monks of Palestine, observes, οἱ πόλλακις τὰς καλουμένας ὑπερθεσίμους πράττουσι (H. E. i. 21), and Victorinus uses "superpositio" of abstinence for two days in succession: "ratio ostenditur quare usque ad horam nonam jejunamus, usque ad vesperam aut superpositio usque in alterum diem fiat" (De Fabrica Mundi, apud Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 103), and in the Acta Martyrum Numidarum, c. 8, we find "continuatis in carcere geminis jejuniis." Such a fast was also called jejunium duplex, or duplicatum (Hieron. Epitaph. Paulae, c. 1). The prolongation of the Friday's fast through Saturday, which we learn from Augustine (Epist. 86), had become customary in his time in the church of Rome and in some of the African and Spanish churches, was also known by the title of "superpositio." This double fast was, with the exception of the months of July and August for health's sake (Labbe, i. 973), enacted by the council of Elvira, can. 26, "Errorem placuit corrigi, ut omni Sabbati die jejunium celebremus," and can. 23, "jejuniorum superpositionem per singulas menses placuit celebrari." [E. V.]

SUPERPOSITIO SILENTII. This expression occurs in the de Poenitentiae Mensura of Columbanus, c. 5, 6, for the penance of total silence. [E. V.]

SUPERSCRIPTION. The superscription and subscription of letters of ceremony early became in the Christian church, as elsewhere, matters of form and prescription. John the Deacon informs us (Vita Greg. iv.) that Gregory the Great in his letters used to address all bishops as "brothers and fellow-ministers;" clerics of other orders as "dearly beloved sons;" laymen as "dominos;" and laywomen "as dominas." He seems in fact to have used "dominus" and "domina" nearly as equivalent to the "sir" and "madam" of modern correspondence. According to the common forms of the Roman court, preserved in the LIBER DIURNUS, letters to the Byzantine emperor are to be addressed "Domino piissimo et serenissimo, victori et triumphatori filio, amatori Dei et Domini nostri Jesu Christi;" to an empress (Augustae), "Dominae piissimae filiae;" to a patrician, a "Comes Imperialis obsequii," an exarch or a king,[a] "Domino excellentissimo atque prae-excellentissimo filio;" to a consul "Domino eminentissimo filio." This is so far in accordance with Gregory's practice that "dominus" forms part of all the superscriptions, to laymen given in the Liber Diurnus, but none are given to a person of lower rank than a consul. Probably the pope did not communicate directly with inferior persons. [LORD, p. 1041.]

[a] A specimen of this form of address may be seen in the letter of Pope Honorius, A.D. 634, to King Edwin, in Bede, Hist. Angl. ii. 17. Pope Boniface IV., A.D. 625, wrote to Edwin as "glorioso regi" (ib. ii. 10).

The subscriptions given in the Liber Diurnus (lib. i.) are: to an emperor, "plissimum Domini imperium gratia superna custodiat eique omnium gentilium colla substernat;" to an empress, "vestrae pietatis imperium gratia superna custodiat, domina filia;" to a patrician or count, "incolumem excellentiam vestram gratia superna custodiat, domine fili;" to a consul, "Deus te incolumem custodiat, domine fili." Of ecclesiastical persons, a patriarch is addressed by the papal chancery as "dilectissimus frater;" a bishop as "dilectissimus nobis;" a presbyter, or one of lower rank, as "dilectissimus filius;" while to an archbishop of Ravenna the superscription is "reverentissimo et sanctissimo fratri coepiscopo, servus servorum Dei." The subscription is in each case "Deus te incolumem custodiat," with the addition "dilectissime frater, fili," &c. as the case may be. To the pope himself the superscription used—at least by the clergy of a suburbicarian church—is "Domino beatissimo papae," or "Domino sancto" (Lib. Diurn. ii. titt. 1 and 3). [C.]

The only instance of a representation of this miracle (Luke viii. 27) given by Martigny is from a mosaic of St. Apollinaris at Ravenna, in which the possessed kneels at the mouth of a cave or tomb (Mark v. 3) and stretches out his hands towards the Lord, who stands before him, nimbed, while in the background the swine are rushing towards the sea (Martigny, Dictionnaire, p. 241, ed. 2). SYMBOLISM. Σύμβολον means a sign by which one infers or knows a thing. It will apply in fact to any object by whose means we get a new idea of comparison, which is substituted in our own thoughts, or by general consent, for anything else; the substitution of a more obvious or familiar idea, drawn, written, or spoken, for a more recondite or important one, is necessary to human instruction or communication, in spite of all its various dangers of misapprehension or misapplication.

I. Symbolism of Decoration.—The Idolatrous misuse of picture-symbolism within the body of the faithful itself, seems not to have affected the Christian church very severely for the first three centuries.

(α) The strong expressions of Tertullian (de Idololatria, iii.) are directed against paganism, and in his anxiety to prevent any tampering with it, he objects to all images and representations indiscriminately, and considers the painter's art unlawful. But it is evident that he virtually excepted the scriptural emblems, such as Clement's list (Paedagog. iii. 11, § 59; see GEMS, p. 712), and the figure of the Good Shepherd. He is obviously not thinking of them at all, and indeed has to make an exception in favour of the brazen serpent soon after one of his most sweeping statements. In the primitive church it was so practically understood as not to need statement, that images in painting or carving, made for the sake of conveying instruction, are an entirely different thing from images intended for use in prayer. The subject of IMAGES is already treated [p. 813]. The repugnance of the Jews to the use of images extended, after the time of the Maccabees, even to the making of the form of any living thing; and this would account of course for the strong feeling among Hebrew Christians against both symbolic and direct representation, if it involved the use of images resembling living beings in any place of worship. This prohibition has been adopted in its fulness by Islam. Again, recently converted heathen would often have nearly as strong a detestation of the idolatrous system which they had escaped from. Symbols in the second or a subsequent generation are apt to become, first, conventional realisms, then personifications, then idols. In the middle ages, the cross, from being in the 6th century the symbol of Christ's person, became an object of worship in itself, no longer an emblem of the life and death of God for man. This degeneracy of symbolism has exercised the church from the 4th century at least, and ran a parallel course in the Christian church and in the Hebrew. For as the Hebrews were always tempted to worship the images of the nations among whom they lived, so the Christians were tempted towards saint worship, as a traditional reproduction of the ancient Greek hero worship, or of Roman adoration of the manes. All mankind have a tendency either to turn symbols into images or actual fetiches, or to substitute beautiful personifications, or portraits of divine or sacred persons, for ancient conventional symbols of the entirely unseen presence of the Lord. Nevertheless, however dangerous tendencies may always exist in image-symbolism, carved or painted, very few systems of worship, Christian or gentile, have totally resigned its use. That the Hebrew dread of images in the apostolic days by no means prevented pious Hebrews from using picture-ornament is proved once for all by the Jewish catacombs (Parker, Phot. no. 1160, 1161). The seven-branched candlestick was painted in red or scratched in the mortar of every loculus. One of them was adorned with human figures, flowers, and birds, including the peacock, afterwards adopted as a Christian image. The earliest part of this cemetery dates from the Augustan age, but part is as late as Constantine. The Christian pictorial or graphic system was a convenience of teaching. Those who could not read, and perhaps could not well understand the language used by oral teachers, had the pictures of our Lord, His miracles and history, to help them.

The pictures were understood by the brethren, if they conveyed no meaning to the heathen. The ancient family religion of Rome was domestic and ancestral, and the human symbolism of hope in death belonged to it. It held the spiritual expectation of another life, and of a retribution, illustrating both largely by emblem and sign in its tombs. The Roman-Etruscan reverence for the dead led them to pay great attention to their sepulchres; and the decoration of burial vaults in ancient Etruria, and also in pre-Christian Rome, bears important witness to the permanence of national custom, and the willing adoption by the church of non-Christian symbolism, if only it was not pagan or anti-Christian.

There will be found in d'Agincourt, vol. ii. (Architecture, pl. x.–xiii.) three illustrations with important bearing on this point. One is the interior of the tomb of the Scipios, long since discovered and despoiled under Pius IV. This has chiefly architectural or constructive interest, from its sarcophagi and loculi—the prototypes of Christian burial in after days. But the burial vaults of Tarquinii, which accompany it, contain symbolisms of the gravest kind, asserting immortality and retribution. The soul is there, led away lamenting to punishment by dark yet beautiful Genii or Eumenides, its white guardian angels interceding. There are chariots of Day and Night, Seasons, and various other subjects known in the catacombs. There can be no doubt that this earlier sepulchral art, with its notes of future life and retribution, already naturalised and in use for centuries in Rome, made it easier for the early church to use picture-symbolism in tombs.

The relations of Christian symbolism to that of earlier religious systems seem to have been as follows:—Certain relics of Egyptian or Assyrian imagery, passed into the Hebrew system, were there found to lead back at length to the idolatry of the races who had first used them, and therefore, after the Maccabean dynasty, were rejected by the Jewish nation, though partly resumed in idea, and as pure symbols, by the Christian church. Such were the cherubic forms. Those of the lion, the ox, and the eagle have a Christian position of their own. A supposed permission of symbolic images and no more was inherited from the Hebrew church: the cherubic images and the brazen serpent being taken as precedents. But for nearly 300 years of its existence in Rome the church of Christ might be considered as a Greek colony, with cosmopolitan relations as well as Hebraic. Greeks were used to pictures everywhere, and would freely adopt and adapt the decorative wall-painting of their day. In the basilicas, or large halls of palaces where the brethren met for worship, there would then be symbolic pictures at an early date—principally the vine and the Good Shepherd, considered as painted texts of the Lord's words. But further, when we come to consider that the old religion of Rome was less mythological than sepulchral, and that its ancient Etrurian rites dwelt so much on adorning the tomb-chambers of the dead, it will be seen what special family-Roman reasons there were for the sepulchral paintings in the catacombs. The Etrurians had imaged an unknown life beyond the grave; the Christians set forth a known one.

The following is a list of the symbols most frequently represented in painting or sculpture by the church of the first seven centuries. Most of these are treated in separate articles, or under OLD TESTAMENT IN CHRISTIAN ART, or under PAGANISM IN CHRISTIAN ART.

A and ω	Hippocampus (Jonah)
Abel with Cain	Horse
Abel in the act of sacrifice	House
Abraham " "	Issue of Blood
Abraham with the Holy Three	Jerusalem,

Fish (Ἰχθύς)	Sheep
Fish, pictorial	Ship
Fisherman	Stag
Fountain or well	Shepherd, The Good
Furnace	Sirens
Goat	Triangle
Gourd (Jonah)	Ulysses
Hand	Vine
Hare	Whale (Jonah's).

Symbolic personifications occur not unfrequently in early art, especially in the MSS., and may be distinguished from pure symbols because they are in some degree connected with mythology; perhaps with idolatry, either as derived from it or leading to it. For instance, the frequent repetition of the figure of the river-god, Jordan, as in the celebrated Greek drawings of the Book of Joshua in the Vatican, in the great Venetian Evangeliary, on the vault of the baptistery at Ravenna, and in the Benedictional of St. Ethelwold (Westwood, Palaeographia Sacra) are harmless relics of Greek personification. In the Greek 7th-century MS. of the Book of Joshua in the Vatican (D'Agincourt, Peint, pl. 29), the hill of the foreskins (Josh. v. 3) is represented as a young man, and the city of Gibeon as a woman with a face full of anxiety; not to speak of the frequent personifications of the church as an Orante, as Susanna, or even as the woman with the issue of blood. A picture of Night occurs in a Bible of the 9th or 10th century in the Bibliothèque du Roi at Paris, as a female figure in a dark-blue robe powdered with stars, and bearing an inverted torch. It is a beautiful reproduction of classical imagery, combined with Gothic colour and depth of feeling. Day and night, or the sun and moon, drawn respectively by horses and oxen, are found in the Bible of Charles the Bold (Palaeogr. Sacra). [PERSONIFICATION.]

The range of authorities on this subject is, of course, very wide. The best manuals, perhaps, are those of Alt (Heiligenbilder, Berlin, 1845), Dr. Piper's Mythologie d. christl. Kunst, and Merz's article, "Sinnbilder," in Herzog's Encyclopädie, Bp. Munter's Sinnbilder (1825) is strongly commended. The Abbé Auber's Symbolisme religieux is ample, and perhaps verbose. The author may refer to a book called Art Teaching of the Primitive Church (S. P. C. K. 1873). The proper authorities for the art of the Christian cemeteries will be found under CATACOMBS. Prof. Westwood's works contain many facts relative to MSS. Aringhi's index, in Roma Sotterranea, contains an excellent account of early Christian symbols, with quoted authorities, for the most part. Lord Lindsay's work, with references to D'Agincourt's plates, is an equally brilliant and accurate manual of Christian art and symbolism.

II. Symbolism of Construction.—Hitherto we have been considering symbolic ideas as conveyed by sculpture or painting. But we can hardly pass over the indirect or less demonstrable symbolisms of architecture, or the religious or spiritual meanings attached to styles and features. What spiritual ideas did, or do, certain styles of building, in fact, convey to a competent number of competent witnesses? and how far, by the builders and contrivers, were the styles or features intended to convey spiritual or any other special ideas?

In the first place, the church or temple itself is in all cases a symbolic object, as indicating an unseen object of more importance than itself. All its splendour, all its grandeur, is in the nature of things emblematic of a house not made with hands. Symbolisms of the altar, and all in which the idea of sacrifice is involved, are matter for the theological rather than the artistic department of this work. We are concerned only with the constructive form of sacred buildings, whether designed by the ingenuity or piety of the builders, or inherent in the structure itself. Decorative symbolism is an addition to structure, unmistakably planned and intended by those who paint or carve; while to a great extent constructive symbolism seems to depend on resemblances observed after the fact, and analogies which the original builders may not have thought of. The features of a building typify or indicate the needs for which it was raised, or in honest architecture they ought to do so.

The simple constructive arrangements of the earlier Greek temple, passing through all the vicissitudes of time, climate, barbarism, war, and pence, developed into the Christian, even into the Gothic church, by a steady natural law of progress, which some call decadence and others development. The essential parts are always the place of the god, and the place for his ministers, with space — "temple," or "enclosure" — around, roofed, unroofed, or cloistered, for his people to stand before him. In the Hebrew temple there was strict classification; all the chosen people were sacred, and had their exclusive court; and the department of the priests was divided between their inner cloister and the sanctuary where the ministering course were employed; but the Holy of Holies still remained, where the brightness of God's presence had appeared. The later synagogue has its choir, sanctuary, and symbolic ark or chest as a memorial of the ark of the covenant, occupying the Jerusalem end of the building, as the Christian altar is placed at the east. [ORIENTATION.]* The construction of a Christian church then is in itself symbolic, like that of all other temples. The meanings attached to various parts of it, or to the horizontal or vertical style of its architecture, appear to have sprung up gradually from devout imaginations of various times. The form of the church is traceable in all cases either to the Basilica, or the circular buildings, baths or temples, of which the Pantheon is the grandest type remaining. The church, in the first instance, occupied the basilicas, or her builders adopted heathen construction, as they did heathen painting and sculpture. But they lost no time in connecting meanings of their own with the building and its parts. The ship-symbolism is fully carried out, when resemblances are contrived in the form and arrangements of the actual structure; and this is certainly indicated in the well-known passage from the Apostolical Constitutions. (Apost. Const. ii. c. 57, ed. Cotelerii, tom. i. p. 263.)

There was an important symbolism connected with the crypt of the basilica, which connects the larger churches with the primitive worship and celebrations in the catacombs, and may probably be coeval with the Book of Revelation. The altar of a cubiculum was originally the table-tomb above the remains of a martyr [CATACOMBS]. It is scarcely possible not to connect this with the passage in Rev. vi. 9, referring to the souls of the faithful to death, who cry from below the altar; nor with the parallel use to which the crypt (or prison cell) of a Roman basilica was converted. In Christian hands the crypt became the tomb of the martyr or saint to whom the church was dedicated, and its altar was placed directly above his sarcophagus or grave. Lord Lindsay says the theory of an ancient church presumed it to be built over a catacomb, but it seems probable that the catacombs were often opened from churches or their area (see s. v.). An altar in later days could not be consecrated without relics.

The arch of triumph, between the central nave and the sanctuary, in the Christian basilica-church, was figurative of the transition through death, and the decoration of the apse and tribune are often clearly intended to give the idea of heaven or the apocalyptic Jerusalem, with the Presence of God [MOSAICS]. See Art-Teaching of the Primitive Church, p. 163, by the author of this article.

This is matter of decoration; and the constructive symbolism of the simple or Roman basilica goes no further. But in Byzantium, during the early splendour of Constantine's great works, the Eastern or absolutely Christian form of church was adopted, and the whole building made, as it were, emblematic from its foundations by being raised in the form of the cross. The cross is now combined with the dome; the form of the church commemorates the humiliation and sacrifice of God for man, while its central cupola involves all those ideas of aspiration and soaring victory which have since been claimed, almost as its exclusive property, by the northern spire, and campanile. The first and loftiest ideas of aspiration were given in strictly horizontal architecture by the Eastern dome and cupola. It is not pure vertical height which gives the idea of aspiration, it is the sweeping and climbing curves of arches or circles in perspective. Aspiring lines mean lines in which or by which the sight is led to travel upwards. The soaring effect of a Gothic interior, such as Westminster Abbey, is not conveyed by perpendicular lines, but by the perspective curves of piers and arches. The symbolism of aspiration has been worked out in the dome and cupola, as well as by the pointed arch and spire; and horizontal architecture is not necessarily grovelling, but adapted in the first instance to the uses of a hot climate, and capable of being adapted by modifications of the arch and vault to the needs of any climate. Without doubt the Eastern dome, rightly decorated, and seen from within, did and does seem, as Lord Lindsay says (i. p. 63), to expand into infinity like the vault of heaven. His beautiful corollary, that it is the emblem of heaven, as the cross-structure on which it rests is the type of suffering obedience, which in the end is built up or edified to reach heaven, is in the best and truest spirit of ancient imagery; and he adds, in a note, the remark that the roofs of temples, both Christian and Pagan, were frequently painted azure and powdered with stars to convey the same idea.

The elaborate symbolisms of pointed architecture are far beyond our period. [R. St. J. T.]

SYMBOLUM. [CREED; TRADITIO.]

SYMEON. [SIMEON.]

SYMMETRIUS, May 26, presbyter, martyr; commemorated at Rome (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Notker.). [C. H.]

SYMPHORIANUS, Aug. 22, martyr in the reign of Aurelius; commemorated at Autun (Mart. Bed., Bed. Metr., Usuard.); called Sinfurianus in the Gothic Missal, where there is a mass for his natale (the day unnamed), and he is mentioned in the prayers as a follower of Andochius and Benignus. The Liber Antiphonarius of Gregory has an office for his natale and that of Timotheus jointly. [C. H.]

SYMPHOROSA, July 2, martyr in Campania with her seven sons (Mart. Usuard., Adon.); commemorated at Tibur or on the Via Tiburtina July 18 (Hieron., Rom., Notker., Wand.); July 21 (Bed.); June 27 (Usuard., Mart. Vet. Rom.). [C. H.]

SYMPHRONIANUS, July 7 and Nov. 8, artificer and martyr; commemorated at Rome with Claudius, Nicostratus and others (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom.). [C. H.]

SYMPHRONIUS, July 26; commemorated with Olympius and others on the Via Latina (Mart. Usuard.); Dec. 4 (Mart. Vet. Rom.) [C. H.]

SYNAPTE (συναπτή, scil. δέησις ἢ αἴτησις), the Greek term equivalent to the Latin Collecta, Angl. Collect. The longer prayers in the Liturgy were called μεγαλαὶ συναπταί, and the Shorter Collects in Terce, Sext, &c., μικραὶ συναπταί, also called τὰ διακονικά, from their being generally read by a deacon or εἰρηνικὰ, from the pax vobiscum which preceded them. Synapte is properly applied to the series of short petitions which often occur in Eastern offices, and of which a Western example may be seen in the Ambrosian Missal (Domin. 2, edit. Pamel. i. 321, 328. The expression συναπτὴ αἰτήσεως refers to the frequent repetition of the phrase τῷ κυρίῳ δεηθωμεν (Morinus, de Sacris Ordinat. p. 227; Goar, Euchology. pp. 46, 47). [F. E. W.]

SYNAXARIA. [MENOLOGIUM.]

SYNAXARIA (συναξάρια). The lives of the saints as drawn up and arranged in the Menaea or other ecclesiastical books, sometimes extracted and published for convenience' sake in a separate form by themselves. [F. E. W.]

SYNAXIS (σύναξις). (a) A general name for a course of ecclesiastical offices, constituting the day-hours and night-hours of the church. Cap. vii. of the Reg. S. Columbani is entitled "De Synaxi, id est, de cursu Psalmorum et orationum modo canoncio." Each separate office was also entitled a synaxis. Mention is made of a vespertina synaxis (Rule of St. Benedict, c. 17; Mab. de Lit. Gall. p. 109); a matutinalis or matutinorum synaxis (Martene, Ampliss. Coll. vi. 384, Acta SS. Ord. Benedict, saec. iv. pt. i. p. 399); nonae synaxis (ib. saec. v. p. 15).

(b) A congregation or gathering of monks or clergy for any religious purpose (Cassian, lib. ii. de Instit. Mon. cap. 10).

(c) An equivalent term for eucharistia (Dionys Areop. de Eccles. Hierar. lib. cap. iii.; de sacramento synaxeos sine communionis, et passim).

(d) In a non-technical sense in connexion with time; post unius anni synaxin, after the lapse of a year. [F. E. W.]

SYNCELLUS. Originally a monk occupying the same cell with another monk; subsequently a subordinate brother who shared the cell of the abbat, or of the bishop when the latter resided in a monastery, to be the constant witness of his manner of life and devotions, who by his presence might strengthen him against temptation and stimulate him to the practice of piety (see the authorities given by Ducange, sub voc.). In later times the term lost almost all reference to its original meaning, and became the designation of a high ecclesiastical dignity, the "syncelli" being the chaplains and confidential ministers, or private secretaries, of metropolitans and patriarchs, who very frequently became their successors. The number of "syncelli" of the patriarch of Constantinople attached to the church of St. Sophia was at one time very large, but it was reduced by the emperor Heraclius early in the 7th century to two. In public assemblies and synods the "syncelli" took precedence of the metropolitans, which, according to a passage cited by Suicer, once gave rise to an unseemly squabble at the Pentecostal celebration (Codin. Curopal. p. 112, ed. Bonn). The chief of the "syncelli" at Constantinople was called πρωτοσύγκελλος τῆς μεγάλης ἐκκλησίας, corrupted into πρωτοσύγγελος (Liturg. Chrys.); he ranked next to the patriarch, whose spiritual director he was, and whose confessions he heard. He had rooms in the archiepiscopal palace, or when the patriarch resided in a monastery, a cell adjacent to that occupied by him. Cedrenus states that the "protosyncellus" before his time had usually succeeded to the patriarchal throne on its vacancy. (Goar, Euchol. p. 112; Suicer, sub voc.; Ducange, sub voc.; Codin. Annotat. pp. 112, 377.) [E. V.]

SYNDICUS. [ADVOCATE.]

SYNETUS, Dec. 12, martyr at Rome in the reign of Aurelian (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.). [C. H.]

SYNOD. [COUNCIL.]

SYNODICAE EPISTOLAE. [COUNCIL, p. 475.]

SYNODITAE. Monks are called Synoditae in the Theodosian Code, from their living in communities (συνόδοις) [COENOBIUM; MONASTERY]. [C.]

SYNOPSIS (σύνοψις). Any abbreviated compilation from the larger Office Books of the Eastern church and from other sources for private use. [F. E. W.]

SYNTHRONUS (σύνθρονος). The name given to the chancel seats round and behind the altar in the Greek church, in use by the officiating clergy during the Liturgy, &c. The Thronos, or chief seat, the bishop's throne, occupied the central and easternmost position behind the altar. It is marked G on the ground plan of the church exhibited in Goar's Euchology, p. 13. [F. E. W.]

SYNTYCHE, July 22, Phil. iv. 4; commemorated at Philippi (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Notker.). [C. H.]

SYRINX. As in numberless instances in ancient Pagan art the pipe is the regular accompaniment of the shepherd, so the Good Shepherd is, in Christian art, often represented with a pipe of seven reeds or straws. Sometimes he is holding it in his hand (Bottari, Sculture e Pitture, lxxviii. cv. cix.), sometimes he holds it to his mouth (Perret, Cat. de Rome, v. pl. lxviii.), sometimes it hangs on his arm (Bott. clxix.), or at his side, suspended by a strap over the shoulder (ib. clxxiv.); again, it is to be seen lying at his side, as on a fragment of ancient glass in the collection of Buonarroti (Osservazioni, &c. tav. v. 2).

This primitive musical instrument, with which shepherds were supposed to call back their flocks to the fold, like other pastoral emblems, soon began to be used in an allegorical sense by the early fathers. Thus Gregory Nazianzen (Or. 28, 43), after describing the anxiety of a shepherd, who, mounted on an eminence, fills the air with the melancholy strains of his pipe, recommends the spiritual pastor to follow his example and try to win souls to God by persuasion rather than by force, to use the pipe rather than the staff (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v.). [E. C. H.]

SYROPHOENICIAN, THE (IN ART). The Syrophoenician supplicating the Lord to heal her daughter (Matt. xv. 21 ff.; Mark vii. 24 ff.) is thought to be represented in a bas-relief of a sarcophagus from the Vatican cemetery (Bosio, Roma Sott. p. 65; Martigny, p. 162, 2nd ed.). The woman, represented of small size, kisses the hand of the Lord, while an apostle behind her lays his hand on her shoulder. The identification of this figure with the woman of Canaan is however by no means certain (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v. Chananéenne). [C.]

SYRUS, Sept. 12, confessor; commemorated with Eventius at Ticinum (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Notker.). [C. H.]

SYSTATICAE EPISTOLAE. [COMMENDATORY LETTERS.]

TABITHA (IN ART). The subject of the resurrection of Tabitha is not to be found, as far as is known, on any Roman monument, but two instances occur in France. One of these is on a sarcophagus, supposed to be of Sidonius, bishop of Aix, seemingly as early as the 4th century, and still existing in the crypt of St. Madeleine at the abbey of St. Maximin (Monum. relat. à Ste Madeleine, t. i. col. 767). In agreement with the Scriptural account, St. Peter is represented standing and holding out his hand to Tabitha. The bed on which she is represented sitting up is furnished with curtains suspended by rings from a rod, and near it two children of unequal height kneel and extend their hands to the apostle in token of gratitude. On the other side of the bed is a front view of two female figures in a dress very like that of modern nuns, which is supposed to have been the dress of widows in the earliest Christian times. These two figures are of course intended for the widows spoken of in Acts ix. 39. The other instance referred to repeats all the features of the one already described, and is to be seen on a tomb in the museum of Arles, No. 70. The same subject is also found on a sarcophagus in the cathedral of Fermo, with this difference of treatment, that all the persons represented are taken from the Acts of the Apostles, and are in some way connected with the life of St. Peter. (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v.) [E. C. H.]

TABULARIUM. A name sometimes given to the muniment-room of a church in which the archives were kept. It was ordered in the legislation of Justinian, and afterwards in that of Charlemagne, that documents of special importance should be deposited in the tabularia of churches. (T. Eckhart, Schediasma de Tabulariis Antijuis, 1717; J. C. Beheim, de Archivis sive Tabulariis Vet. Christian. Altorf. 1722.) [C.]

TALIONIS LEX. [CORPORAL PUNISHMENT, p. 469.]

TANIST ABBAT, according to the Celtic laws of Tanistry, was the abbat designate (Reeves, St. Adamnan, 364, 379), and may have exercised a certain authority (principatum lae tenuit, Ann. Tig. A.D. 707, ap. O'Conor, Rer. Hib. Script. iv. 224), but the matter is obscure. (Skene, Fordun, ii. 441 sq.; Vallency, Coll. i. 265 sq., 274 sq.; O'Curry, Lect. Man. Cust. Anc. Ir. iii. 600.) [J. G.]

TAPERS. [LIGHTS; PASCHAL TAPER.]

TARACUS (THARACUS), Oct. 11; martyr with Probus and Andronicus in the Diocletian persecution (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Notker., Wand.); Oct. 12 (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.); Sept. 27, Oct. 9, Oct. 10 (Hieron.); May 13 in Palestine (Hieron.); Apr. 5 (Hieron., Notker.). [C. H.]

TARASIUS, Feb. 25, patriarch of Constantinople (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.). [C. H.]

TARBUA, Apr. 22, martyr in Persia under Sapor, sister of bishop Simeon (Mart. Usuard., Notker.). [C. H.]

TARRAGONA, COUNCILS OF (TARRACONENSIA CONCILIA). Only two fall within our limits.

1. A.D. 464, to censure Silvanus, bishop of Calahorra, for ordaining out of his diocese; and to appoint to the see of Barcelona, then vacant. The alleged letters from this council to pope Hilary have been noticed under an alleged Roman synod of the year following (Mansi, vii. 957).

2. A.D. 516, when thirteen canons on discipline were passed, to which ten bishops under John, bishop of Tarragona, subscribed. (Ib. viii. 539-46.) [E. S. Ff.]

TARSUS, COUNCILS OF (TARSENSIA CONCILIA), A.D. 431 and 435. The first when several bishops returning from Constantinople met and deposed St. Cyril and the seven bishops who had been sent thither from the council of Ephesus against the Easterns (Mansi, v. 1147); the second when Helladius, metropolitan of Tarsus, and several of his suffragans, gave their adhesion to the peace made between John of Antioch and St. Cyril, and anathematised Nestorius. (Ib. p. 1179.) [E. S. Ff.]

TATIANA, Jan. 12, Roman deaconess, martyr under Alexander Severus (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.). [C. H.]

TATIANUS (1), Mar. 16, deacon, commemorated at Aquileia with bishop Hilarius (Mart. Usuard.); Mar. 17 (Notker.).

(2) July 19, martyr; commemorated with Macedonius and others at Synnada (Syr. Mart.); Sept. 12, with Macedonius and Theodulus, under Julian, the place not named (Menol. Graec. Sirlet.). [C. H.]

TAURINENSE CONCILIUM. [TURIN.]

TAURINUS, Aug. 11, bishop of Evreux, confessor (Mart. Usuard., Hieron.). [C. H.]

TECLA. [THECLA.]

TE DEUM. The history of this wondrous hymn is obscure. Although no version of it in Greek has as yet been met with, there can be little doubt that large portions of it were drawn from Greek or Oriental sources. Taking our modern version as our text, we shall find that it consists of twenty-nine clauses. Of these the first ten are closely connected with the Eucharistic hymn of the liturgy of Jerusalem. We find the germ of the next three in the Morning Hymn of the Alexandrine manuscript. Of the last nine clauses those numbered 22, 23, are to be found in Psalm xxvii. 9 (Vulg. or Septuagint). The next three are found in the Morning Hymn above referred to; 27 is identical with Psalm cxxii. 3; 29 is clearly derived from Psalm xxi. 6.

The conclusion of the hymn varies from our received text in three series of important manuscripts. In one manuscript, which probably survived the sack of a French monastery, and, after being purchased by Queen Christina of Sweden, was given by her to the library of the Vatican (Reg. xi. or Vat. Alex. xi.), we have the following clauses: "Benedictus es Domine Deus patrum nostrorum et laudabile et gloriosum nomen tuum in aeternum. Dignare die ista sine peccato nos custodire." In another MS. at the Vatican, No. 82, we have nearly the same clause: "Benedictus es Domine," &c. We may compare this, together with the clauses 24, 25, 26 still remaining in our version with the following portion of the Alexandrine hymn, and the comparison will shew convincingly what is the origin of these clauses:—

καθ' ἑκάστην ἡμέραν εὐλογήσω σε
καὶ αἰνέσω τὸ ὄνομά σου εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα καὶ εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα τοῦ αἰῶνος.
καταξίωσον κύριε καὶ τὴν ἡμέραν ταύτην ἀναμαρτήτους φυλαχθῆναι ἡμᾶς.

εὐλογητὸς εἶ κύριε ὁ Θεὸς τῶν πατέρων ἡμῶν καὶ αἰνετὸν καὶ δεδοξασμένον τὸ ὄνομά σου εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας. Ἀμήν.

It will have been seen that there are four different conclusions to this hymn. Speaking generally, all the copies are the same up to and including our clause 21; but the Vatican MS. 82 (a Roman psalter), after 21, has only 24, 25, 22, 23, concluding with the Benedictus es, as above. That is, it omits altogether 26, 27, 28, 29, and so far severs itself from the Greek hymn. The Vat. Alex. xi. a magnificent psalter, containing the versio Hebraica of Jerome, omits in the Te Deum clauses 24, 25, 28, 29, and reads thus: 22, 23, Benedictus es, 26, 27. A third version was current in Ireland. In the hymn-book edited by Dr. Todd for the Irish Archaeological and Celtic Society, p. 194, and in the hymn contained in the Antiphonary of Bangor (now one of the treasures of the library at Milan) the order is 22, 23, 24, 25, 28. They leave out 26, 27, 29. These versions are introduced by the words "Laudate pueri Dominum; laudate nomen Domini" (see the Bangor Antiphonary, in Migne, 72, p. 587). These last verses precede the hymn also in the copy contained in the Isidore MS. now in the Franciscan convent at Dublin. At the end of the copy in Dr. Todd's Book of Hymns, p. 19, is the following:

"Te Patrem adoramus eternum: te sempiternum filium invocamus: teque spiritum sanctum in una divinitatis substantia manentem confitemur. Tibi uni Deo in Trinitate debitas laudes et gratias referemus ut te incessabili uoce laudare mereamur per eterna secula." These words also occur in the Franciscan MS., but they are not arranged in versicles in the Irish hymn-book. The order in the Bangor Antiphonary is the same as in the Irish hymn-book. According to Muratori, the "Te Patrem adoramus" is not found in this Antiphonary; but towards the end of the MS. there are some curious fragments sewn together (not noticed by Muratori), amongst which the above address to the Holy Trinity is inserted, and also another, which is identical with it as far as the word confitemur, and then proceeds:—

"Tibi Trinitas laudes et gratias referemus; tibi uni Deo incessabilem dicimus laudem; te patrem ingenitum, te filium unigenitum, te spiritum sanctum a patre [et filio is added in the margin] procedentem corde credimus; tibi inaestimabili incomprehensibili omnipotenti deo qui regnas in aeternum."

The result of this investigation seems to be that the Te Deum, even in its earliest form, was regarded, like the Morning Hymn of the Alexandrine MS., as a hymn sung to the Holy Trinity, even though the work of our Lord predominates in its latter clauses.

The earliest notice of it that has been discovered is in the Rule of Caesarius (about A.D. 527). According to it on every Sunday there were to be first six missae or prayers; these finished, the Matins were to follow. Exaltabo te (Psalm cxlv.); then Confitemini (cxxxvi. (?); then Cantemus Domino (the canticle in Exodus xv.); Lauda, anima mea (Psalm cxlvi.); Benedictio (the Benedicite omnia opera Domini Dominum); then Laudate Dominum de caelis (Psalm cxlviii.) Te Deum laudamus, Gloria in excelsis, and the Capitellum. The Rule of Aurelian was somewhat similar. Columbanus, who was connected with the Irish Bangor, and founded the monastery of Bobio, where the Bangor Antiphonary came from, does not mention the canticles or Te Deum in his rule; but it is worthy of notice that this Antiphonary gives the hymns Canticum, Cantemus Domino, Benedictio trium puerorum, Benedicite, "Hymnum in die Dominico, Laudate pueri Dominum; laudate nomen Domini; Te Deum laudamus" in the order of the rule of Caesarius. Only the introduction to the Te Deum is furnished by the two verses of Psalm cxii. instead of Psalm cxlviii.: the same two verses which precede the Te Deum in the two Irish hymn-books.

Towards the end of the Bangor Antiphonary, as given by Muratori, are series of five or six sets of short prayers to be used after the Cantemus, after the Benedicite, after the Laudate Dominum de caelis, and after the gospel. Internal evidence shews that the Laudate Dominum de caelis included here the Te Deum; and the prayers furnish a beautiful illustration of the Rule of Caesarius.

Columbanus died about 615, Caesarius about 542, but there is one expression in the Te Deum which seems to carry us back to an earlier date. We refer to the phrase "suscepisti hominem," for such was the universal reading until Abbo of Fleury altered it to "susceperus." There are two readings of the verse. The two Irish manuscripts read, "Tu ad liberandum mundum suscepisti hominem." All the other old copies which have been examined omit the word "mundum." In either case the verse means, "Thou didst take upon thee man" or "a man" either "to deliver him" or to "deliver the world." The phrase "suscepit hominem" was current in the time of St. Augustine, but went out of favour after the Nestorian controversy; it gave way to the phrase "adsumpsit humanitatem" or "humanam naturam." (We find the words "ad liberandos homines" as describing one object of our Lord's Incarnation in Augustine's letters No. 137, § 11). We conceive that so far there is sufficient evidence that the words of the hymn may date from the time of St. Augustine.

The titles which we find prefixed to the hymn in various psalters are interesting in themselves, and may perhaps throw some light upon the localities where these psalters were written. The hymn is not found in the oldest psalters, as in those at Bamberg and Verona and the original Vespasian A 1 (which no doubt belonged to St. Augustine's monastery, Canterbury, and which was placed in a kind of recess or shelf over the high altar on the supposition that Augustine brought it from Rome, a present from Gregory the Great), or the original Galba A, xviii. It is found in several psalters written in the 9th century. The title "Hymnus in Die Dominica ad matutin." or "ad matutin. in die dominica" is prefixed to it in Marinus' psalter at C. C. C. Cambridge (No. 272); in the beautiful psalter of Charles the Bald at Paris; one at St. Gall, 15; another at C. C. C. 411; and the second part of Galba A, xviii. In the beautiful volume at Oxford, Douce, 59, it is entitled "Hymnus in Die Dominica." In the latter part of Vespasian A 1, in Claudius C. vii. (the Utrecht psalter), Harleian 2904, and the quadripartite psalter at Bamberg it is called simply "Hymnus" or "Ymnum in matutinis," or otherwise to the same effect. In the last-named psalter there is an attempt at a Greek version as far as clause 12, when it ceases. In St. Gall 20 we find the words "hymnus domin. pro noct. hoc est ante lectionem evangelii," and in Arundel 155, "hymnus doms. nocturna laud. can." In the former as well as in St. Gall 23 (Folkard's magnificent psalter), the words "Te decet laus, te decet ymnus, tibi gloria, domine, patri et filio et spiritui sancto in saecula saeculorum. Amen," are at the end of the hymn. In what is called Bacon's psalter in the Cambridge University Library it is entitled "Hymnus optimus." In Reg. 2 B. v. at the British Museum "oratio pura cum laudatione." In St. John's College, Cambridge, c. 15, "laus angelica." Then we come to a series in which the title is prefixed, "hymnus quem S. Ambrosius et S. Augustinus invicem condiderunt." This is found in Vienna, 1861 (the famous psalter said to have been sent by Charlemagne to Hadrian: Daniel "confesses that he had always suspected that additions were made at the end of this psalter by a later hand"), Vitellius E. xviii.; St. Gall 23 (Folkard's) and 27. This or some equivalent title prevailed in later years. In a psalter at Salzburg, A. v. 31, "hymnus Augustini." In several notable psalters such as that in the great

Venice Bible and Paris 13,159, C. C. C. 391, Lambeth 197, Salzburg A. v. 30, there is no title prefixed. The Irish book of hymns has "haec est laus sanctae Trinitatis quam Augustinus sanctus et Ambrosius composuit." Archbishop Ussher seems to have seen two manuscripts in which the composition was ascribed to one Nicetus: one was in the Cotton Library. Such a volume cannot now be found, but in the Norfolk Library, now in the British Museum, "Arundel 60," the hymn is introduced thus, "YMH' SCI VICETI EPI DIEB; DOMIN. AD MATUT." and there are two MSS. at Florence, Plut. xvii. Col. iii. and viii. where nearly the same words are found. Elsewhere (see Oudin, t. i. p. 668) it is described as "Sisebuti," "Sisebuti monachi," "S. Abundii;" these probably are phonetic spellings of the same name.

These memoranda may possibly assist in the effort to trace these manuscripts to their original sources or to the localities where they were used. Many of the titles agree with the account given in the rules of Caesarius, Aurelian, and Benedict. In this last the Te Deum preceded the lesson from the Gospel, the Te decet followed it on the vigils of the Sundays. The change from mattins to nocturns is interesting. Of course the service was the same, though the name was altered. It is also interesting to notice that in the 7th century, as now, the Te Deum preceded the lesson from the Gospel.

The words "Te gloriosus apostolorum chorus" have recalled to many minds the beautiful passage at the end of Cyprian's treatise de Mortalitate, "illic apostolorum gloriosus chorus, illic prophetarum exultantium numerus, illic martyrum innumerabilis populus."

The Te Deum laudamus is mentioned twice by Alcuin in his book de Psalmorum usu (Migne, 101, pp. 468, 469). It is entitled Hymnum dominicale, p. 592. But the text has been modernized in the "suscepisti."

TELEPTE, COUNCIL OF (Teleptense, Telense, or Zellense Concilium), A.D. 418. We have ten canons attributed to this council by Ferrandus, and nine, by no means identical with them, in a letter of pope Siricius, said to have been recited at it. There are several expressions in both calculated to suggest doubts of their authenticity; nor was it Siricius, but Zosimus, who was then pope; nor, again, is this alleged letter of his found in the Dionysian collection; nor are the marginal references to this letter in Ferrandus of any value, as Ferrandus all through quotes the exact words of the council, and never of the pope, where the two differ; see Rome, Councils of, A.D. 386. TEMPESTARIUS, Tempestuarius, Tempestatum immissor, Νεφοδιώκτης. By the last word Balsamon (Comment. in Conc. Trullan. can. 61) understands a diviner by observation of the clouds; but the earlier author of the Quaestiones et Responsa ad Orthodoxos, long ascribed to Justin, makes it identical with tempestarius. "How is it," his querist demands, "that they who are called νεφοδιῶκται contrive by means of certain invocations to send hail and excessive rains wherever they please" (Qu. 31). The reply denies that any have such power; but this remnant of heathen superstition prevailed widely among all classes of Christians from the 4th century downwards. A law of Constantius, 357, declares that there were "many who dared to disturb the elements by magic arts" (Codex Theodos. ix. 16, v.). The offence, which seems to have been more common in France than anywhere else, is frequently mentioned in the Carlovingian laws (Carol. M. 789, Capit. i. 63 (Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 62); id. 805, Capit. ii. 25 (C. R. F. vi. 374)). A law of the Visigoths tells us that "immissores tempestatum" were "reported by means of certain incantations to send hail on the vineyards and crops" (Lex Visig. vi. 2, § 3). Agobard, 813, who wrote a tract on the subject, declares that almost every one in his part of France, of whatever condition, believed in their power, and that a storm ascribed to it was commonly called "aura levatitia" (Contra insulsam Vulgi Opinionem de Grandine et Tonitruis, 1, 12, 14). They also believed in a country called Magonia, from which ships came to the earth in the storm clouds, whose sailors bought of the tempestarii the fruits and corn that appeared to perish here (2). This imaginary crime is punished by the Greek council in Trullo (u. s.) with six years' penance. Latin penitentials assign seven to it (Halitgar, Poen. Rom. c. 5; 7; Theodor. Cant. Poenit. 356, p. 73, Par. 1677); the old Gallican adds that three of the seven are to be on bread and water (Mus. Ital. i. 393).

TEMPLUM for a Christian church. In the Christian writings of the first three centuries "templum" maintains its pagan meaning, and is scarcely ever used to denote a Christian church. Wherever ναός or "templum" occur with a Christian reference it is almost universally in a metaphorical sense. In the passage from Ignatius (ad Magnes, c. 7) πάντες οὖν ὡς εἰς ἕνα ναὸν συντρέχετε Θεοῦ, ὡς ἐπὶ ἓν θυσιαστήριον, the local reference which cannot be ignored is subordinate to the spiritual. The early fathers are unanimous in spiritualising the idea of a temple, and applying it to the heart of the Christian. Thus Barnabas in answer to the inquiry whether the temple of God still exists, replies that it does, but it is the heart of Christian πνευματικὸς ναὸς οἰκοδομούμενος τῷ Θεῷ (Epist. c. 16), and again, ναὸς ἅγιος τῷ κυρίῳ τὸ κατοικητήριον ἡμῶν τῆς καρδίας (ibid. c. 6); and Augustine, to quote one out of an infinite number of similar passages, writes, "Simulacrum Deo nefas est Christiano in templo collocare;" how much more to admit evil passions into the true temple of his heart! (de Fid. et Symbol, c. 7). Passages are, however, to be found in which "templum" and ναός are unmistakably used for a sacred Christian building. Ambrose, writing to Marcellina (Ep. 33), says that, on the new basilica being demanded of him for Arian worship, "respondi, templum Dei a sacerdote tradi non posse." Lac-tantius also (de Inst. lib. v. c. 2) states that at the time he was summoned to Bithynia to teach oratory "the temple of God was overthrown." The word ναός is also of frequent occurrence in the later books of Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History for the churches rebuilt after the persecution, e.g. νεὼν αὖθις ἐκ βάθρων εἰς ὕψος ἄπειρον ἐγειρομένους (H. E. lib. x. c. 2), and says of that erected by Paulinus at Tyre, νεὼν φιλοπόνως δεκέδαπτο (ibid. c. 4). Many other examples are referred to by Bingham (VIII. i. 6). [E. V.]

* Cumeanus Hyens., A.D. 630.

TENEBRAE. The office of Matins and Lauds in the last three days of Holy Week, at which a triangular candlestick with fifteen candles is used, one of which is extinguished after each psalm. The last one is, however, held behind the altar during the Benedictus, and is then brought back to typify Christ's resurrection from the dead. Allusions of Alcuin and Amalarius prove such an office, with local variations, to have existed in the 8th cent. (Martene, de Ant. Ec. Rit. iv. xxii. § 2). [F. E. W.]

TERENTIUS, April 10, African martyr under Decius (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.); Apr. 10, Oct. 28 (Menol. Graec. Sirlet.). [C. H.]

TERMON, receiving etymologies more or less fanciful as terra immunis, terre-moine or terra monachorum, and the Sanscrit tarman, is probably the Irish form of the Latin terminus, and was originally the name given to a place of sanctuary, marked off by its stones set up as boundaries. Hence it was applied to all lands belonging to a sanctuary, and more generally to all church lands. As such the termons were entirely free from secular control or interference; they might be mensals to the bishop or monastery, or let to tenants for maintenance, service, or money rent, and he who had charge of the termon lands was called the erenach, whose importance is shewn by his name being often found in the Irish annals. The immunity of the termons from all lay exactions was affirmed by the council of Cashel (c. 4), A.D. 1172, as an old right that had been encroached upon by the lay lords. In the year 831 (Four Mast.), and again in 844, the Irish annals record the burning and pillaging of the termon or terra immunis of St. Ciaran at Clonmacnoise. The presence of a termon is frequently found in the nomenclature of Irish topography. (Ord. Surv., Londonderry, 50, 208 sq.; Ussher, wks. xi. 421 sq.; Vallancey, *Coll. de Reb. TESSELLI. A word occurring in the life of Caesarius of Arles by Messianus and Stephen, published by Mabillon (Acta Sanctorum ordinis Benedicti, vol. i. 672), who explains (not. in loc.) the word as meaning "quadrati panniculi fovendo stomacho appositi." TESSERAE. In the time of persecution, Christians recognised each other by secret signs or symbols, whether spoken as watchwords or pictorial. [GEMS; RINGS; SEALS.] Small tablets engraved with such symbols were called tesserae. Tesserae were given in particular to the newly baptized (tesserae baptismales), and the small fish of bronze or crystal which are frequently found, are believed to have served this purpose [FISH, p. 674]. It seems also probable that Christians, like their pagan forefathers, gave tesserae to each other as pledges of friendship (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v. Tessères). [C.]

TETRAPODIUM, a term in general use for any table with four feet; in special use for the table on which the bread and wine for oblation, the oil for consecration, &c., were placed in the Eastern Church. It usually stood near the iconostasis on the north side of the holy doors. [F. E. W.]

THEATRE. The objections of the teachers of the early church to the theatrical profession, and the reasons on which those objections were chiefly founded, have been partly stated under ACTORS; it will here consequently be necessary to consider simply what the church taught, and on what grounds, as regarded the lawfulness of witnessing such performances.

Here the maxim enunciated by the author of the treatise, de Spectaculis, that it was unlawful to witness what it was unlawful to do, "prohibuit enim spectari quod prohibuit geri" (de Spect. c. 4; Migne, Patrol. iv. 340), would supply a ready solution of the question; nor is it necessary to inquire what was taught as to the desirability of being present at grossly immoral

The author of the above treatise de Spectaculis, formerly attributed to Cyprian, observes that "at the theatre it was lawful to teach whatever the law forbade" (Migne, 841), and declares that the Christian has better sights to witness, "the beauty of the world around, the rising and setting sun, the evolutions of the twinkling stars," &c. Augustine (de Civit. Dei, ii. 8), however, draws a distinction between the coarse representations of the mimes, and comedies or tragedies,—the latter class of plays being, he says, at least free from filthy language, while their study is approved by elders in a scheme of liberal education for youth; in his Confessions (iii. 2) he speaks of the performances he had himself witnessed as "luctuosa atque tragica," and of the scenes therein depicted as "vel antiquae vel falsae," language which clearly implies that the ancient drama still held its ground.

That the stage might be made a means of teaching moral lessons was a theory evidently not unknown to the primitive church, although the plea is summarily dismissed by Tertullian (de Spect. c. 27), who advises those whom he addresses to look upon whatever elements of good they may discern in stage productions as nothing better than "drops of honey intermingled with poison of toads" (Migne, i. 659). When, however, with the recognition of Christianity by the state, the majority of the population became professedly Christian, it was found altogether impossible to suppress such exhibitions. In conjunction with the games and combats of the circus they constituted very nearly the sum of the diversions of the lower orders (Ammian. Marcell. bk. xxviii. c. 4). Hence the utmost the church could do appears to have been to prohibit the profession of the actor among Christians, and to discourage as far as possible the popular passion for theatrical performances. The twenty-eighth of the African canons, recited at the council of Carthage in the year 419, forbids that "spectacula theatrorum" shall be given on Sundays or other days held sacred in the Christian calendar, for when such is the case, and especially at Easter, the canon goes on to say, "the people prefer the circus to the church," "populi ad circum magis quam ad ecclesiam conveniunt." The popularity which these performances still possessed for the majority is, however, clearly attested by the fact that the same canon enjoins that Christians shall not be compelled to witness them,—"nec oportere etiam quemquam Christianorum cogi ad haec spectacula" (Mansi, Conc. iv. 490). At the council of Arles, A.D. 452, Christians were forbidden to take part in the performance of plays, but nothing is said about their being present as spectators (Mansi, vii. 881; Hefele, Conciliengesch. ii. 284). Leo the Great says that in his day the theatre attracted greater throngs than even the celebrations at the festivals of the martyrs (Serm. 84; Migne, liv. 335).

In the East the untiring severity with which Chrysostom attacks these exhibitions [Opera (ed. Migne), ii. 337, 682; iv. 696–7; vi. 267; vii. 71, 426; viii. 120, 188, &c.], and the reproaches in which he indulges, clearly prove that even among the Christian community the fascinations of the theatre were too strong for their religious principles. At Antioch he complains that his audience brought with them to church the habits acquired in witnessing these performances, and instead of laying the exhortations of the preacher silently to heart, watched for opportunities of indulging in theatrical applause (Opera, ix. 227; Neander, d.r heil. Chrysost. i. 118). In his first homily on St. John he says that many Christians after listening to the words of Scripture and the Holy Spirit speaking therein, go away to witness lewd women "saying obscene things and representing still more obscene actions," and effeminate men indulging in buffoonery one with another (Migne, Patr. Graec. lix. 28–9).

Theatrical performances and the exhibitions of the circus appear to have been almost inseparably combined, and Isidorus, in the 7th century, indicates the characteristic vice of each kind of performance when he declares that Christians have no right to share in "the mad excitement of the circus, the impurity of the theatre, the cruelty of the amphitheatre, the barbarity of the arena, and the luxury of the play" (Etym. xix. 59; Migne, lxxxii. 409). So again Salvian, when describing the recklessness of the population of Carthage during the invasion of the Vandals, says that "the church of Carthage indulged in the mad excitement of the circus and the softer delights of the theatre, and while the victims of the one were butchered without the city, the victims of the other were debauched within" (de Gub. Dei, vi. 12). It is probable, from other passages besides the foregoing, that the exhibition of gladiatorial conflicts was not infrequent, even after the time of Honorius (GLADIATORS). We find, for example, Theodoric the Great addressing to Maximus, the consul, a letter in which he makes reference to the different modes of conflict in certain games which Maximus has recently been instituting, especially the conflicts of men with wild beasts, and implies that the result is frequently fatal to the man. He regrets that Maximus should be under the necessity of holding these games ("quibus necesse est talia populis exhibere"), but urges him to greater liberality in rewarding the combatants (Cassiod. Variae, v. 42; Migne, lxix. 675–7).

Among the collection of canons from former councils made at the second council of Braga, A.D. 610, we find one forbidding the clergy to be present at certain "spectacula," such as it was customary to give on the occasion of marriage feasts or other convivial entertainments; when any such exhibitions were about to commence the clergy were to withdraw (Migne, Patrol. lxxxiv. 624).

Where plays were not actually immoral in their tendency, the fathers of the church appear to have still held them to be open to objection. The author of the treatise attributed to Cyprian says that fathers of families were usually represented in a ridiculous light (de Spect. c. 6; Migne, iv. 341). Augustine associates such performances with paganism, and says that the gods enjoined them when the Pontifex Maximus would fain have forbidden them (de Civit. Dei, i. 32).

We find no traces of theatrical representations, properly so termed, among the Teutonic race for a long time after their conversion, not, in fact, until the institution of the religious plays of the middle ages. [J. B. M.]

THEBAEA LEGIO, Sept. 22 (Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Hieron., Notker., Wand.). [C. H.]

THECLA (TECLA, TEGLA) (1), Sept. 23, virgin, "Protomartyr" of Iconium, disciple of St. Paul, buried at Seleucia in Isauria (Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon., Hieron., Vet. Rom., Rom., Notker., Wand.; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. vi. 546); Sept. 24 (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.); Mart. Hieron., followed by Notker, mentions her again under Feb. 22, in connexion with Nicomedia, and Bede's metrical martyrology assigns her, if the same, to Nov. 22. It must be this St. Thecla the martyr in whose memory Justinian built a church at Constantinople near the Julian gate (Procop. De Aedif. lib. i. cap. 4, ed. Dindorf, p. 190), and whose church or μαρτύριον is mentioned in the preface to the 159th Novel of Justinian (Ducange, Cpolis. Christ. lib. iv. pp. 104, 133, ed. 1729).

(2) June 1; commemorated with Zosimus at Antioch (Hieron., Notker); Dec. 20 at Gildoba in Thrace (Hieron.).

(3) June 9, martyr in Persia in the 4th century with Mariamne, Martha, and Maria (Boll, Acta SS. Jun. ii. 173).

(4) Aug. 19, martyr with Agapius at Gaza (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec.).

(5) Oct. 8, virgin martyr with Barbara and Pelagia (Cal. Armen.); she may be the companion of Andropelagia at Alexandria on Sept. 6 (Menol., Graec. Sirlet.). [C. H.]

THENES, COUNCIL OF (THENITANUM CONCILIUM), A.D. 418 (?). Three canons preserved by Ferrandus alone vouch for it. (Mansi, iv. 440.) [E. S. Ff.]

THEOCTISTUS, Sept. 3, monk, "our father," companion of Euthymius; martyr under Maximian (Cal. Byzant.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.). [C. H.]

THEODOLUS. [THEODULUS.]

THEODORA (1), Mar. 13; commemorated at Nicaea with Theuseta and others (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Notker.).

(2) (THEODATA), Apr. 1, martyr, sister of Hermes (Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Notker.; Boll. Acta SS. Apr. i. 5).

(3) Apr. 28, virgin martyr with Didymus at Alexandria (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Notker.; Boll. Acta SS. Apr. iii. 572); May 27 (Basil. Menol.); Ap. 5, May 26 (Menol. Graec. Sirlet.); Jan. 12 (Cal. Byzant.).

(4) Sept. 11, confessor at Alexandria in the time of the emperor Zeno (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec.; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. iii. 788). [C. H.]

THEODORETUS, THEODORITUS. [THEODORUS (11).]

THEODORICUS, July 1, confessor at Reims (Mart. Usuard.). [C. H.]

THEODORUS (1), DUX, of Euchaïta, general of Licinius, martyr; commemorated on Jan. 12 (Cal. Byzant.); Feb. 8 (Cal. Byzant.; Basil. Menol.); Feb. 7 (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 23); June 8, translatio (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.). It was probably this saint or the following to whom the church of St. Theodorus, erected by St. Helena at Constantinople, was dedicated (Codinus, De Aedif. p. 38; Ciampini, De Aedificiis, p. 176), as well as that erected by Justinian (Procop. De Aedif. lib. i. cap. 4; Ducange, Cpolis. Christ. lib. iv. p. 132). There was likewise at Constantinople in 536 a monastery of St. Theodorus (Mansi, viii. 907 D). On the distinction between this saint and the following Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 23 may be consulted.

(2) TIRO, of Amasia, soldier, megalomartyr at Heraclea, under Maximian; commemorated on Feb. 17 (Cal. Byzant.; Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec.); Nov. 9 (Mart. Bed., Flor., Usuard., Adon., Rom.); under the same day Vet. Rom. Mart. and Wand. probably mean this saint. He is commemorated in the Gregorian Sacramentary on Nov. 9, his name appearing in the Collect, Super Oblata, and Ad Complendum.

(3) Patriarch of Alexandria, commemorated on Feb. 1, Mar. 9 (Cal. Ethiop.); Dec. 3 (Basil. Menol.); Sept. 12 (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec.; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. iv. 10); under Sept. 2 the Mart. Hieron. probably means the same.

(4) Mar. 26, bishop of Pentapolis in Libya, martyr; commemorated with the deacon Hieraeus or Irenaeus and the readers Serapion and Ammonius (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Notker.; Boll. Acta SS. Mart. iii. 617).

(5) TRICHINAS, Apr. 20, solitary near Constantinople (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Menol. Graec. Boll. Acta SS. Apr. ii. 756).

(6) SICEOTES, Apr. 22, bishop, "our holy father" (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Menol. Graec.; Boll. Acta SS. Apr. iii. 32).

(7) SANCTIFICATUS, May 15, disciple of Pachomius (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec.).

(8) July 4, bishop of Cyrene in the reign of Diocletian, martyr (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec.; Mart. Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. i. 19).

(9) Sept. 19, archbishop of Canterbury. It is inferred by the Bollandist Cleus (Acta SS. 19 Sept. vi. 55) that Bede, who records the day of his death, Sept. 19, must have taken it from the calendars of the church, thus affording proof of Theodore's early beatification. The inference is not confirmed by Bede's own martyrology, which omits him. Theodore does not occur in any of the early martyrologies, nor in the Martyrologium Romanus of 1498, Venice; but it appears in those of 1576, 1586, and all later dates.

(10) Martyr at Perga in the reign of Antoninus; commemorated Sept. 21 (Basil. Menol.); Apr. 19 (Menol. Graec.); Sept. 20 (Mart. Rom.).

(11) (THEODORETUS, THEODORITUS, THEODOBICUS, THEODULUS), presbyter of Antioch, martyr under Julian; commemorated Oct. 23 (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Rom.); Mar. 23 (Flor., Hieron., Notker., Wand.; Boll. Acta SS. Mart. iii. 449); Oct. 22 (Notker.); Nov. 24 (Menol. Graec.); Mar. 2 (Basil. Menol.); Mar. 29, Apr. 10 (Hieron.). On the variety of names and attempts to distinguish them, see Boll. Acta SS. 23 Oct. x. 32.

(12) Nov. 3, bishop of Ancyra (Menol. Graec.).

(13) STUDITA, commemorated on Nov. 11 (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec.; Cal. Byzant.).

(14) Dec. 14, commemorated at Antioch with Drusus and Zosimus (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom.).

(15) GRAPTUS, "holy father," commemorated on Dec. 27 with Theophanes poet and confessor, opponents of the iconoclasts (Menol. Gr.).

(16) Patriarch of Constantinople, commemorated Dec. 28 (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

THEODOSIA, Apr. 2, virgin martyr under Diocletian, at Caesarea in Cappadocia (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Notker; May 29, Cal. Byzant.).

THEODOSIUS (1), Jan. 11, Coenobiarcha, "holy father," cir. 485 (Cal. Byzant.).

(2) Emperor, commemorated on Jan. 18 and March 2 (Cal. Ethiop.).

(3) Patriarch of Alexandria, June 22 (Cal. Ethiop.).

(4) (THEODOTUS), Oct. 25, martyr at Rome with Lucius, Marcus, Petrus; commemorated on the Via Salaria (Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon.). [C. H.)

THEODOTA (1), July 3, martyr with Theodotus under Trajan (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.).

(2) Martyr at Nicaea with her three children under Diocletian; commemorated on Aug. 2 (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Notker.); July 29 (Cal. Byzant.); Dec. 22 (Basil. Menol.). It is probably this Theodota to whom a church was dedicated in the Hebdomon suburb of Constantinople (Procop. de Aedif. lib. i. cap. 4, p. 190, ed. Dindorf.; Du Cange, Cpolis. Christ. lib. iv. p. 105).

(3) Of Pontus, martyr under Alexander Severus, commemorated with the presbyter Socrates on Oct. 23 (Basil. Menol.); Oct. 21 (Menol. Graec.). [C. H.]

THEODOTION (1), Jan. 24, of the city of Cleopatris, martyr with Paulus and Pausirius under Diocletian (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.).

(2) June 20, martyr in Galatia (Cal. Armen.), probably the same as THEODORUS (12). The Cal. Armen. places a Theodotion under Oct. 22 also. [C. H.]

THEODOTIUS, Oct. 25. [THEODOSIUS (3).]

THEODOTUS (1), Jan. 4, martyr with Aquilinus and others in Africa (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Hieron., Notker, Rom.).

(2) Of Cyrinia in Cyprus, confessor under Licinius; commemorated on Jan. 17 (Cal. Byzant.); Jan. 19, Mar. 2 (Basil. Menol.); Jan. 19, May 6 (Menol. Graec.); May 6 (Mart. Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Mai. ii. 105). It may have been this Theodotus or the next in whose honour there was a monastery at Constantinople in 536 (Mansi, viii. 906 E).

(3) Martyr under Maximian with Maximus and Asclepiodote or Asclepiodotus, commemorated on Feb. 19 and Sept. 15 (Basil. Menol.); Sept. 16 (Menol. Graec. Sirlet.).

(4) June 7. [THEODORUS (12).]

(5) Jun. 19, martyr at Antioch (Mart. Syr.).

(6) July 3, martyr with Theodota under Trajan (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec.; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. i. 634).

(7) Nov. 2, bishop of Laodicea, physician (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Rom.).

(8) Nov. 3, companion of Theodorus of Ancyra (Menol. Graec.).

(9) Nov. 14, martyr with Demetrius, presbyters, at Perinthus (Mart. Syr.).

(10) Nov. 14, martyr with Clementinus and Philominus at Heraclea (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Wand., Rom.). [C. H.]

THEODULA, Jan. 18, of Anazarbus, martyr under Diocletian (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.); Feb. 5 (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. i. 657). [C. H.]

THEODULUS (1), Jan. 14, monk of Sinai, son of Nilus (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 967).

(2) Mar. 23, presbyter of Antioch [THEODORUS (11)].

(3) Apr. 4, reader, martyr with the deacon Agathopus at Thessalonica, under Maximian (Syr. Mart.; Basil. Menol.; Mart. Hieron., Mart. Notker., Mart. Rom.); Apr. 5 (Cal. Byzant.).

(4) May 2, martyr with his brothers and their mother Zoe, slaves in Italy, in the reign of Hadrian (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec.; Mart. Rom.).

(5) May 3, presbyter at Rome, martyr under Trajan with bishop Alexander and the presbyter Eventius (Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Hieron., Notker, Wand., Rom.).

(6) Jun. 18, martyr in Phoenicia, companion of Leontius in the reign of Vespasian (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec.; Mart. Rom.).

(7) July 26, martyr at Rome, commemorated with Symphronius and Olympius (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom.); July 26, Oct. 31 (Mart. Rom.); translation, Dec. 4 on Via Latina (Vet. Rom., Adon.).

(8) Sept. 12, martyr under Julian commemorated with Macedonius and Tatianus (Menol. Graec.; Mart. Rom.).

(9) Dec. 23, martyr with Saturninus and eight others in Crete in the reign of Decius (Basil. Menol.; Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

THEOGENES (1), Jan. 3, martyr in the Hellespont under Licinius, commemorated with Cyricus and Primus (Mart. Flor., Usuard., Hieron., Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 133); Jan. 4 (Notker.).

(2) Jan. 26, martyr with thirty-six others (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Hieron., Rom., Notker.; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 718). [C. H.]

THEOGNES, Aug. 21, martyr with his mother Bassa and brothers Agapius and Pistus in the reign of Maximian (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.; Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

THEONAS (1), Aug. 23, patriarch of Alexandria (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. 4, 579); Dec. 28 (Cal. Ethiop.).

(2) Jan. 4, martyr with Theopemptus in Cilicia under Diocletian (Basil. Menol.); Jan. 3 or 4 (Menol. Graec. Sirlet.); Jan. 3 (Mart. Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 127); Jan. 5 (Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 250); Jan. 5, called Thomas (Cal. Byzant.). [C. H.]

THEONILLA, Oct. 29, martyr in Cilicia under Diocletian (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

THEOPEMPTUS. [THEONAS (2).]

THEOPHANES, hegumenus, confessor for images under Leo Armenus, commemorated on Mar. 12 (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Mart. Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Mar. ii. 213); Oct. 11 (Cal. Byzant.). See also under THEODORUS (15).

THEOPHANIA. [EPIPHANY.]

THEOPHILUS (1), JUNIOR, Jan. 30, martyr under the Mahometans in the time of Constantine Copronymus (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.).

(2) SCHOLASTICUS, Feb. 6, martyr at Caesarea in Cappadocia with Dorothea (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Hieron., Rom.).

(3) June 26, bishop, martyr with Philip and others at Laodicea (Syr. Mart.); July 28 (Hieron., Notker.).

(4) July 23, martyr with Trophimus under Diocletian (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.; Mart. Rom.).

(5) Sept. 8, martyr at Alexandria with Ammon, Neotherius and others (Mart. Usuard.; Mart. Rom.).

(6) Oct. 2, monk, confessor under Leo Isaurus, (Basil. Menol.; Mart. Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. i. 492); Oct. 2 and 10 (Menol. Gr.).

(7) Oct. 13, bishop of Antioch (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Notker, Rom.; Boll. Acta SS., Oct. vi. 108).

(8) Oct. 14, patriarch of Alexandria (Cal. Ethiop.).

(9) Nov. 3, martyr at Caesarea in Cappadocia with Germanus and others (Mart. Syr.; Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Hieron., Wand., Rom.); Nov. 12 (Hieron.).

(10) Dec. 20, martyr at Alexandria (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Rom.).

(11) Dec. 28, deacon, martyr under Maximian. (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

THEOPISTE (THEOSPIS), martyr with her husband Eustathius and her sons Agapius and Theopistus or Theospes, in the reign of Trajan; commemorated Sept. 20 (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.; Mart. Rom.); Nov. 2 under Hadrian (Mart. Usuard.). [C. H.]

THEOPREPIUS, Aug. 22, martyr, companion of Agathonicus (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.). [C. H.]

THEOTECNUS, commemorated on Oct. 4 (Syr. Mart.). [C. H.]

THEOTICUS, Mar. 8, martyr with Arrianus at Antinous (Mart. Usuard.; Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

THEOTIMUS, Nov. 5, martyr, companion of Domninus under Maximin (Basil. Menol.; Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

THEOTOKION (θεοτόκιον). A troparium or sticheron in honour of the Virgin Mary, of frequent occurrence in the sacred offices of the Greek Church, into which it is stated to have been introduced after the condemnation of the Nestorian heresy. Its occurrence is sometimes indicated by the marginal mark θ. [F. E. W.]

THERAPEUTAE. The ascetics mentioned under the name of θεραπευταί by Philo (de Vita Contempl. c. 4) were (it can scarcely be doubted) a development of the same tendency of Jewish thought which in Palestine produced the Essenes [DICT. OF THE BIBLE, i. 583]. There would be no need to notice them in a work on Christian Antiquities, were it not that Eusebius (H. E. ii. 17) takes them to have been a Christian sect which retained some Jewish customs. The supposition, however, that a Christian sect could have been formed in Egypt before the time when Philo wrote his treatise is destitute of all probability, and his language in no way favours the supposition. [C.]

THERISTRUM (θέριστρον). A dress or veil for female use, specially adapted, as the name shews, for summer wear. The Greek word occurs several times in the LXX (Gen. xxiv. 65, xxxviii. 14, 19; Cant. v. 8; Isa. iii. 23), in all cases for one of the two Hebrew words צָעִיף, רְדִיד. In Gen. xxxviii. 14, Isa. iii. 23, the Vulgate reproduces the Greek word. See Jerome (Comm. in Isa. l. c.), whose remarks are also cited by Isidore (Etym. xix. 25. 6; Patrol. lxxxiii. 692). [R. S.]

THESSALONICA, COUNCILS OF (THESSALONICENSIA CONCILIA), A.D. 649–50. Two seem to have been held in consecutive years by Paul, its Monothelite bishop—one for confirming his heretical doctrines which he then embodied in a letter to be sent to pope Martin, the other for dealing with the reply made to him by that pope. (Mansi, x. 785; L'Art de vérif. les Dates, i. 155.) [E. S. Ff.]

THEUSETA, Mar. 13, martyr at Nicaea, commemorated with Horris and others (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Notker., Hieron., Rom.). [C. H.]

THEVESTINE, COUNCIL OF (THEVESTINUM CONCILIUM), A.D. 362, held by the Donatists, whom the emperor Julian had given leave to return, at which Primosus, bishop of that place, protested in vain against their excesses. (Mansi, iii. 374.) [E. S. Ff.]

THEVIS, COUNCIL OF (THEVINENSE CONCILIUM), A.D. 536, when ten bishops under Nierses, catholicos of the Armenians, rejected the council of Chalcedon, and declared for the Monophysite doctrine, thereby separating themselves from the church (Mansi, viii. 871). Mansi (ix. 771) reports a second council, which, however, he miscalls, at this place, where the addition to the Trisagion—Qui crucifixus es pro nobis—was confirmed, A.D. 562. The authors of L'Art de vérif. les Dates report a council at another place in Armenia, called Tiben, ten years before, confirming all that had been done by Nierses and the ten bishops of the first council. (i. 152.) [E. S. Ff.]

THOMAS, ST., APOSTLE, LEGEND AND FESTIVALS OF. 1. Legend, &c.—As the name Thomas is merely the Aramaean word for a twin, with a Grecized termination, it is obvious that the apostle must also have had a personal name. This is given as Judas, e. g. by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. i. 13), the Acts of Thomas, the Doctrine of the Apostles (in Cureton's Ancient Syriac Documents), &c. Supposing this to be correct, it would be very natural that with two other Apostles of the name Judas, advantage should thus be taken of a convenient means of distinction.

Who the other twin was it is of course impossible to guess. From the fact that St. Thomas is always coupled with St. Matthew in the lists of the Apostles in the Synoptic Gospels, it has been argued that St. Matthew was the other brother. Again, two Paris MSS. cited by Cotelier (Apost. Const. lib. ii. 63, note) speak of St. Thomas and his sister Lysia, and add that Antioch was the native place of the Apostle. It has been argued by Thilo (Acta S. Thomae, p. 95) that the author of the apocryphal Acts identified Thomas with Judas the brother of the Lord. Here we might cite the curious remark of Isidore, that Thomas was "juxta Latinam linguam Christi geminus ac similis Salvatori" (de Ortu et Obitu Patrum, c. 74; Patrol. lxxxiii. 152).

Save the mention of Thomas in the lists of the Apostles, the only allusions to him in the New Testament are to be found in John xi. 16; xiv. 5; xx. 25 sqq.

The general tenour of early tradition connects him with Edessa and with Parthia (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. i. 13; iii. 1 [cited from Origen]; Socrates, Hist. Eccles. i. 19). Chrysostom (Hom. in Heb. 26, § 2; vol. xii. 338, ed. Gaume) speaks of the graves of Peter, Paul, John, and Thomas, as being those whose locality was known, though he does not specify them. That, according to the current tradition, St. Thomas was interred at Edessa may be inferred from Socrates (Hist. Eccles. iv. 18, cf. Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. vi. 18), who speaks of the splendid memorial church there (μαρτύριον). Some authorities also give India as the scene of the Apostle's labours (Greg. Naz. Orat. xxxiii. 11; Patrol. Gr. xxxvi. 27). Sophronius, in an Appendix to the De Viris Illustribus of Jerome (vol. ii. 958), says that St. Thomas preached the Gospel to the "Parthians, Medes, Persians, Carmanians, Hyrcanians, Bactrians, and Magians," and that he died at Calamina in India. The story of the Apostle's work in India also forms the basis of the Acts of Thomas, already referred to.

It is by no means clear how we are to interpret the name India. The word is doubtless often used in a somewhat vague way, and there are grounds for believing the India of the Acts of Thomas to be Arachosia and the neighbouring regions, lying westward of the Indus (see DICT. OF CHRISTIAN BIOGRAPHY, Vol. I. p. 23). On the other hand, we find traditions associating the name of St. Thomas with the extreme south of India. When the Portuguese expeditions under Vasco de Gama and Pedro de Cabral succeeded in reaching India, they found there (first apparently in A.D. 1500) Christians, belonging to a fully developed and obviously very ancient church.

These Christians claimed the apostle St. Thomas as their founder, and, still surviving as a distinct church, are ordinarily known as "Christians of St. Thomas." The district occupied by these people was part of Malabar, on the western side of the southern extremity of India, between the ninth and twelfth parallels of north latitude. With their history generally we have nothing to do here, but a brief notice may be bestowed on the legend connecting them with the apostle. [On the subject generally, see Assemani, Bibl. Or. vol. iii. part 2, pp. 435 sqq.; La Croze, Histoire du Christianisme des Indes; Howard, The Christians of St. Thomas, and their Liturgies.] It would of course be rash to claim the legend as authentic history; it is, perhaps, none the less rash to maintain its certain groundlessness, but this latter form of rashness, it would appear, has seemed more justifiable than the former. We pass over as inconclusive from the vagueness of the word India, the story of Pantaenus's journey thither (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. v. 10); and the alleged presence of a "Metropolitan of Persia and the great India," among the signatories of the Council of Nicaea.[a]

We come to something undoubted, however, in the narrative of Cosmas Indicopleustes, who visited India in the 6th century, and tells us, "In the island of Ceylon (Ταπροβανή) in further (ἐσωτέρα) India, where the Indian Ocean is, there is a church of Christians, with both clergymen and believers. In Malabar (Μαλέ), in like manner, where the pepper grows . . . . and in the place called Calliana, there is also a bishop, ordained and sent from Persia" (Topographia Christiana, lib. iii.; Patrol. Gr. lxxxviii. 169; cf. lib. xi. ib. 446). In the 9th century Sighelm and Aethelstan were sent by king Alfred with alms to Rome, and thence to India, "to St. Thomas and St. Bartholomew" (Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, sub anno A.D. 883, p. 152, ed. Thorpe; William of Malmesbury, lib. ii. 122). The latter chronicler speaks of the envoy as Sigelin, bishop of Sherborne. Again, in the 13th century, Marco Polo visited the place in Southern India, where St. Thomas was said to have been martyred (lib. iii. cc. 17, 18); and see Col. Yule's notes, vol. ii. 342, ed. 2).

The existence, then, of these "Christians of St. Thomas," can be traced back definitely to the 6th century, and we have references of a still earlier date, which, however, do not necessarily apply. Those who reject the tradition of the apostle's labours in India ascribe the foundation of the Malabar church to one Thomas Cana, who, in any case, bore an important part in the history of this distant branch of the church. His date and nationality, however, are much disputed, for while one account makes him an Armenian, and places him at any rate before the sixth century (La Croze, p. 46), others (e. g. Asseman, op. cit. p. 444) think Armenian an error for Aramaean, and fix the date at the end of the 8th century, when he was sent out by the Nestorian patriarch. If this latter date could be considered as proved, then whatever share this later Thomas may have had in the development of the Malabar church, he clearly could not have been the founder,[b] since the testimony of Cosmas shews that Christianity was existing in Malabar more than two centuries before his time. In this uncertainty we must leave the matter, merely observing that if it be proved that the word India in the apocryphal Acts is used in a different sense from that in which we now use the word, still this only touches the main question to the same extent as if the Acts had called the region, e. g. Parthia, in which case we should have had two distinct claimants, not necessarily altogether antagonistic.

[a] The reference to a mention of India seems altogether a mistake; and even as regards Persia there seems good reason for thinking that there has been some confusion between the name of the country and Persa the name of a place (Pitra, Spicilegium Solesmense, i. 533, note).

We conclude this part of our subject by remarking that the common form of the story as to the apostle's remains describes them as translated from India to Edessa, where they were buried (Mart. Rom., Usuard, Bede). The first named Martyrology speaks also of a later translation thence to Orthona in Apulia.

It may further be noted that whereas writers who refer to the manner of St. Thomas's death at all, invariably speak of it as a violent one, Clement of Alexandria cites Heracleon the Gnostic to the effect that Thomas was one of those who died a natural death (Strom. iv. 9).

2. Festivals.—It seems probable that the observance of a festival of St. Thomas first arose in the East and thence passed to the West. Perhaps the earliest testimony to which we can refer is a Homily, cited as Chrysostom's by two early councils, but which editors have long decided not to be his, from the marked inferiority of style (v. l. viii. 624, in Spuriis). Still Tillemont's arguments, to which Montfaucon assents as at any rate probable, tend to shew that it would have been delivered at Edessa in A.D. 402. The Homily is evidently delivered before the tomb of the Apostle (γέροντες καὶ νέοι προσκίπτομέν σου τῷ ταφῷ), and is distinct evidence of the existence of a festival (cf. also Socrates, l.c.; Sozomen, l.c.). The two historians speak of the splendid church of St. Thomas at Edessa and of the emperor Valens's visit to it. The author of the life of St. Ephrem (ob. circ. A.D. 373) tells a story of the healing of a paralytic before the doors of this church (Assemani, Bibl. Or. i. 49). About twenty years after St. Ephrem's death (year of Greeks 705 = A.D. 394), there took place, according to the Edessene Chronicle, the translation of the coffin of St. Thomas to the church dedicated to him in Edessa. The day is specified as August 22 (op. cit. p. 399; cf. also p. 403, where the prefect Anatolius is said to have made a silver coffin for the apostle's remains). The celebration of the festival in Edessa is dwelt on by Gregory of Tours (de Gloria Martyrum, i. 31; Patrol. lxxi. 733). By him it is said to happen "mense quinto." If this is taken according to Western reckoning, the 5th month would be July, and, as we shall see, on July 3 is a commemoration of the translation in the Western church. Ruinart, however (not. in loc.), appears to refer the 5th to the Syriac reckoning, so that counting from November, the 5th month would be March. We shall presently mention a commemoration of the Apostle in this month in the East.

The earliest definite reference to a festival other than the local Edessene one, carries us back to the middle of the 5th century. Theodoret (Graec. Aff. Cur., Serm. 8; Patrol. Gr. lxxxiii. 1033) speaks of the change of the old festivals of the heathen gods, into those of Peter and Paul and Thomas (the only three apostles mentioned), and other saints.

As regards the West, the earliest reference to the cultus of St. Thomas in any way is, so far as we are aware, to be found in a sermon of Gaudentius (bishop of Brescia at the beginning of the 5th century), on the occasion of the dedication of a church (basilica concilii Sanctorum). The good bishop claims to have acquired for this church relics of St. Thomas and three other saints (Serm. 17; Patrol. xx. 959).

It may fairly be assumed that the festival of St. Thomas was but gradually, and not till a comparatively late date, recognized in the churches of the West. This may be inferred from the absence of any mention of it in e. g. the ancient Kalendarium Carthaginense, the Roman Calendar of Fronto, the Leonine Sacramentary, and some forms of the Gregorian[c] Sacramentary (e. g. Cld. Reg. Suec., Calensis), Mabillon's Lectionarium Luxoviense, the Gothico-Gallic Missal, the Orationale Gothicum, &c., representing North Africa, Rome, Gaul, and Spain.

It is found, on the other hand, in the Gelasian and in some forms of the Gregorian Sacramentaries, the Mozarabic Missal and Breviary, the Martyrologium Hieronymi, &c. In these St. Thomas is commemorated on December 21, the commemoration being undoubtedly of the martyrdom, though, as we shall see, in some cases it has been referred to the supposed translation of the Apostle's remains from India to Edessa.

In the last named of the above cited authorities, besides the main Western festival on December 21, several other commemorations are given. As regards this chief festival, it may be noted that while the reference to it in the list of festivals of Apostles, which forms a prologue to the Martyrology, speaks of it as "natalis Thomae Apostoli qui passus est in India" (Patrol. xxx. 451), the notice in the ordinary course of the Calendar gives "in Mesopotamia, natalis et translatio sancti Thomae Apostoli qui translatus est ab Indis, cujus passio ibidem celebretur" (ib. 501). We further have on December 28, "in Edessa, translatio corporis S. Thomae Apostoli;" on February 9, "depositio Thomae," if this be the Apostle (ib. 457); on May 9, a commemoration of SS. John, Andrew, and Thomas, at Milan, in the "basilica ad portam Romanam" (ib. 471); on June 3, a festival of the "natalis" (ib. 476); and on July 3, "in Edessa . . . natalis et translatio corporis S. Thomae Apostoli . . ." (ib. 479).

In the other documents cited, December 21 is the Natalis in the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacra-

[b] No weight at all need be given to the claim on behalf of the Thomas, mentioned by Theodoret (Haeret. Fab. Comp i. 26; Patrol. Gr. lxxxii. 380), as one of the three missionary disciples sent out by Manes, India being assigned as his province. It is a sufficient answer to say that no trace of Manichaeism was seen, when the Malabar Christians became known to the outer world.

[c] Menard gives the mass for the day, but Pamelius puts it in brackets (Liturgg. Latt. ii. 364).

mentaries, the martyrology of Bede, &c. So, for instance, we have in the metrical martyrology of Bede (Patrol. xciv. 606),

"Bis senis caelum coepit conscendere Thomas."

The metrical martyrology of Wandalbert, however (Patrol. cxxi. 622), refers the day to the translation,

"Translati Thomae celebret duodenus honorem," and the martyrology of Usuard has in one MS. (Cod. Lucensis) the translation, and in another (Cod. Corbeiensis), the two commemorations combined. The true text, however, of this last martyrology certainly gives Natalis. The day really associated with the translation in the Western church is July 3 (so Mart. Rom., Bede, Usuard, Mart. Hier.), and occasionally the two commemorations have flowed together.

In the Greek church, the day on which St. Thomas is commemorated is October 6. Thus e. g. in the metrical Ephemerides prefixed by Papebroch to the Acta Sanctorum for May, the notice for the day is δούρασιν οὐτάσθη Θωμᾶς μακροῖσιν ἐν ἕκτῃ (Acta Sanctorum; May, vol. i. p. xlvii.). It may be noted further that the first Sunday after Easter is, in the Greek church, known as the Sunday of St. Thomas, from the subject of the gospel. This, however, is not strictly to be called a commemoration. In the Pentecostarion the title of the day is given in full, as κυριακὴ τοῦ ἀντίπασχα ἤτοι ἡ ψηλάφησις τοῦ ἁγίου ἀποστόλου Θωμᾶ, writ short in the Synaxarion as κυριακὴ τοῦ Θωμᾶ. The same gospel is used both on this day and on October 6, St. John xx. 19–31.

In the calendars of the Armenian church given by Assemani (Bibl. Or. vol. iii. part 1, pp. 645 sqq.), March 31 is given in both as a commemoration of the "unbelief of Thomas;" August 22 commemorates "Thomas the Apostle," with a reference to India in the case of one of them; and on October 6 is yet another commemoration, but in one calendar only.

In the calendars of the Alexandrian and Ethiopic churches, given by Ludolf, is a commemoration of St. Thomas by the former church on September 9 (ad Hist. Aeth. Comm. p. 391), by the latter church on October 6, with the note "apostle of India" (ib. p. 394), and by both churches on May 21 (ib. p. 417).

3. Apocryphal Literature. — An apocryphal gospel, bearing the name of St. Thomas, was current in early times. There are two distinct recensions of it in Greek, and an independent Latin form, the Latin and one of the Greek texts having first been published by Tischendorf. The gospel is apparently referred to by Irenaeus (adv. Haer. i. 20); and the author of the Philosophumena mentions it by name (lib. v. Patrol. Gr. xvi. 3134), and probably also Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii. 25). Cyril of Jerusalem, in speaking of it, assigns it to Thomas, the missionary-disciple of Manes, to whom we have already referred (Catech. iv. 36; Patrol. Gr. xxxiii. 593; cf. Catech. vi. 31). In view of the above-mentioned references this of course is absurd. For further details see GOSPELS, APOCRYPHAL, in Dict. of Christian Biography. We have also Acts of Thomas, first edited by Thilo, and since by Tischendorf. This and the Consummation of Thomas, first edited by Tischendorf, form the beginning and end of a whole, of which some of the middle part is lost. An abridged form is given in the Apostolic History of the Pseudo-Abdias (lib. ix.; in Fabricius, Codex Pseudepig. N. T. vol. i. pp. 687 sqq.), and we have also the Syriac form of the Acts edited by Dr. Wright. The Acts of Thomas are mentioned by Epiphanius (Haer. 47; Patrol. Gr. xli. 852), and a περίοδος Θωμᾶ is named in the Stichometria of Nicephorus (Patrol. Gr. c. 1060), which is possibly, though not certainly, the same as the preceding. Both Gospel and Acts of Thomas were condemned by the council that sat at Rome under Gelasius in A.D. 494 (Patrol. lix. 162). A Revelation of Thomas, no longer extant, was condemned at the same time. In the Apostolic Constitutions (lib. viii. 21) the constitution with respect to sub-deacons is referred to St. Thomas.

For further notices on the subject of St. Thomas reference may be made to Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten der Christ-Katholischen Kirche, vol. v. part i. p. 523 sqq.; Augusti, Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Christlichen Archäologie, vol. iii. pp. 219 sqq. The Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists do not avail us here, not having advanced as yet farther than the end of October.

Mar. 20, patriarch of Constantinople (Basil. Menol.).

(3) July 7, solitary in Mons Malaeus (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 262).

(4) Apostle, commemorated on Dec. 21 (Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Hieron., Wand., Rom.); on this day his natale is celebrated in the Gelasian Sacramentary, his name appearing in the Collect and Secreta. An oratory dedicated to him was built and adorned by pope Symmachus in the Vatican Basilica (Anastas. Lib. Pontif. art. 'Symmachus'; Ciampini, de Aedif. pp. 69, 95). In the Cal. Ethiop. he occurs under May 21, and "Thomas, apostle of India" under Oct. 4. His festival in the Greek church was on Oct. 6 (Basil Menol.; Menol. Gr.; Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 270). Three churches and a monastery dedicated to St. Thomas are known to have existed at Constantinople in the 6th century (Du Cange, Cpolis. Christ. pp. 116, 117).

THRONE (Lat. thronus; Gr. θρόνος), a seat to be occupied by persons of pre-eminent dignity on solemn occasions. By early writers (v. CATHEDRA) the words "throne" and cathedra seem to have been not unfrequently employed indiscriminately for the seat of the bishop, and "throne" was even employed for the benches on which the presbyters sat. At the present day we use the former word when we speak of the bishop's seat in his cathedral church.

A distinction, however, has existed both in the use of the words and in the objects themselves; "cathedra" being the more proper expression for the chair of a bishop, throne for that of an archbishop, a patriarch, a pope, or a sovereign prince. A good though late example of this distinction is afforded by the words used in the consecration of the pope of Rome when already a bishop, before he is placed in the papal seat by the senior cardinal bishop: "Deus . . . respice quaesumus propicius hunc famulum tuum N. quem de humili cathedra violenter sublimatum in thronum ejusdem apostolorum principis (i. e. St. Peter) sublimamus" (Marcellus, Rituum Eccles. &c. libri tres, p. xv. Ven. 1516).

That there was a distinction between the material throne and the cathedra we may learn by comparing the representations of the former to be found in mosaics in Rome and Ravenna, and in sculpture in marble and ivory, with existing examples of cathedrae; of these last several are to be found in the basilicas at Rome, often ancient "sellae balneares," of marble, of moderate size, with arms, rounded behind, and with a low, upright, back finishing, with a curved outline. Such are the cathedrae in the churches of S. Stefano Rotondo and SS. Nereo ed Achilleo at Rome. The chairs in the catacombs hewn in the living rock, and that in which the figure believed to represent Hippolytus, bishop of Porto, is placed (now in the museum of the Lateran), are all varieties of this form. The ivory cathedra at Ravenna, believed to date from the time of Justinian, is of nearly the same type, but has a much higher back. The cathedra in St. Cecilia at Rome is formed of marble slabs, but is of the same type.

If, however, we examine the mosaics abovementioned, we find that objects symbolical of our Lord, as crosses, or figures representing Him or the Virgin Mary, are placed on seats of a different type—that of a wide seat without arms, and usually with a low, straight back. This type, it would seem, was derived from the Roman bisellium, a seat of honourable distinction, which was a sort of wide stool without arms or back.

The emperor Theodosius and his sons Arcadius and Honorius are represented as seated on such seats on the silver disk at Madrid. In the mosaic, probably dating from the 4th century, in the apse of Sta. Pudenziana at Rome, the throne on which our Lord sits appears to have a low, straight back; and in the mosaic on the triumphal arch of Sta. Maria Maggiore, in the same city, the infant Saviour is placed on a wide seat with low sides and back. This mosaic probably dates from the 5th century. In the church of SS. Cosmo and Damian—a mosaic which covers the surface of the wall in front of the apse—has on the summit of the arch a figure of the holy lamb placed on a throne, represented as a wide stool richly ornamented and furnished with a cushion, but without sides or back. This mosaic dates from the 6th century.

The distinction between the two forms was, it would appear, not rigidly kept up, thrones being sometimes furnished like cathedrae, with arms and backs; but it will generally be found that down to the mediaeval period bishops are usually represented in works of art as seated in chairs with arms and backs, while sovereign princes often appear as occupying seats without sides, though furnished with backs. Good examples will be found in plates lxvi. lxvii. of Agincourt's History of Art by its Monuments, section "Painting," particularly figs. 2–7 on the former, and 4 on the latter page. In the first the countess Matilda and her ancestors are shewn; in the last, the emperor Constantine. All these are taken from MSS. of the 12th century.

It seems probable that thrones were constructed without arms, in order that as they were intended for the use of persons of the highest dignity, on occasions of great solemnity, when dresses of the utmost richness would be worn, the stiff or voluminous embroidered robes of the dignitaries who occupied them might be conveniently disposed and fully seen, possibly also the tradition of the form of the Roman bisellium may have had its influence.

No example of a true throne, constructed within the period embraced by this work, has been described, but one probably very little later in date has been preserved—the so-called cathedra Petri—which is kept in a repository in the wall of the apse of the Vatican Basilica at Rome. This chair, after having remained shut up for many years, was exhibited in 1866 on the occasion of the centenary celebration of the martyrdom of St. Peter, and was carefully examined, among others, by that distinguished antiquary and student of Christian art, Padre Rafaelle Garrucci. The legend that it had been the curule chair of the senator Pudens, and bestowed by him upon St. Peter, is evidently erroneous, for the chair bears no resemblance whatever to a curule chair, which was fashioned in such a manner as to fold up like many garden chairs (v. a paper on the "Fauteuil de Dagobert," by M. Lenormant, in the first volume of the Mélanges d'Archéologie). It is a chair without arms, but with a back finishing in a pediment. On the front, below the seat, are fixed some carvings in ivory, but these are additions, not part of the original decorations. What, doubtless, are original, are the bands of carved ivory which are placed perpendicularly and horizontally on the front and back, and on each side of the pediment. On these are sculptured various groups of warriors fighting with men and with beasts, monstrous animal figures, and the like; but the most remarkable subject is a half-length figure of an emperor which Padre Garrucci believes to represent Charles the Bald. No figure or symbol of a religious character is to be found in these carvings; and from these facts it has been inferred that it was probably a throne made for or presented to Charles the Bald at the time of his coronation at Rome, A.D. 875. It may be, at any rate, safely asserted that neither its construction nor its ornamentation indicates that it was constructed for a cathedra (v. Two Memoirs on St. Peter's Chair, published by the Society of Antiquaries, 1870).

seen, that, in addition to the folding-pieces in the form of an X, there are uprights finishing in lions' heads. On many consular diptychs the throne on which the consul sits is so represented as to shew that it was constructed in like manner. M. Lenormant considers that the chair in question is probably of the period of the sovereign whose name it bears (A.D. 622–638). The curule chair, in its simple and primitive form, was evidently the model of the faldistorium or faldstool, the portable seat occupied by a bishop or abbat. M. Lenormant supposes that the use of such a chair was allowed to bishops in recognition of the dignity of their office.

In a painting in the cemetery of St. Callixtus at Rome (v. Marriott's Vestiarium Christianum, pl. xv.), St. Peter and St. Paul are represented as occupying such seats, while our Lord is seated on an elevated throne without sides, but with a high back. As none of the figures have nimbi surrounding their heads, and the style of drawing is good, this painting should belong to an early period. [A. N.]

THURIBLE, a censer, a vessel for burning incense, called also thymiaterium, thuricremium, incensorium, fumigatorium. The thurible was usually made of precious metals, and was at first no more than an open dish or vase, to which a pierced cover was subsequently added, and eventually chains for swinging; these last, however, are not found earlier than the 12th century. An example of this date, suspended by three chains, is given by Martigny from the church of the Nativity at Bethlehem, De Vogüé, Eglises de la Terre Sainte, pl. iii. Ciampini, tom. iii. tab. xxxiii. There is no mention of them in the Apostolical Constitutions. Thuribles of gold or silver, of large size and ornamented with precious stones, occur very frequently in Anastasius among the gifts made by the popes to the Vatican and other Roman basilicas. To take one example. Constantine is recorded to have presented to the Lateran two thuribles of gold set with jewels, one weighing 30 lbs., the other 15 lbs. (Anastas. in Sylvestro). Evagrius (H. E. vi. 21) also mentions golden thuribles among the gifts of Chosroes to the Church of Constantinople. The weight of these vessels shews that they were stationary, not to be swung.

The following description of a thurible is given by Alcuin (poem. 3):—

> "Hic quoque Thuribulum capitellis undique cinctum, > Pendet de summo, fumosa foramina pandens,
> De quibus ambrosia spirabunt tura Sabaea,
> Quando sacerdotes missas offerre jubentur."

According to Amalarius (lib. iii. c. 18), "Thuribulum ante Evangelium portatur, quia Christus odor suavitatis in igne passionis pro nobis sacrificatus praedicatur." We find a different symbolism in the Gemma Animae (lib. i. c. 42), "Thuribulum significat corpus Dominicum; incensum ejus Divinitatem; ignis Spiritum Sanctum."

THURIFICATI. Those who in times of persecution betrayed the faith by offering incense to idols. Frankincense was an accompaniment of the heathen sacrifices, so that the offering of it was made a common test in the persecutions. The act of burning incense was so slight, taking two or three grains in the fingers and sprinkling them on the fire, that it readily lent itself to the purposes of a test, and the Christians were urged to save themselves by complying with it. "It seems absurd to be tortured and slain rather than throw into the fire incense taken with two little fingers" (Tertull. de Idol. c. 11, note, Oxford ed.). For the penalties incurred by compliance see SACRIFICATI. [G. M.]

THYRSUS (TYRSUS) (1), Jan. 28, martyr in the reign of Decius, commemorated at Apollonia with Leucius and Callinicus (Mart. Usuard., Adon., *Vet. TINTINNUM, a bell (v. BELL). The verses by Tatwine, archbishop of Canterbury (A.D. 731–734), alluded to in the article BELL, run as follows:—

DE TINTINNO.

Olim dictabar proprio cognomine Caesar
Optabantque meum proceres jam cernere vultum
Nunc aliter versor superis suspensus in auris
Et caesus cogor late persolvere planctum
Cursibus haut tardis cum adhuc tum turba recurrit
Mordeo mordentem labris mox dentibus absque.

From these verses it would seem that in the earlier part of the 8th century it had become customary in England, as on the Continent at a still earlier date, to hang bells of considerable size on the exterior of churches in order that the congregation might be summoned by their sound. Alcuin (ob. 804), describing the works executed at York, says (Opera, ed. Fröben, ep. 171), "Videtur condignum ut domuscula cloccarum stagno tegatur propter ornamentum et loci celebritatem." The "domuscula" in this instance would seem not to have been a tower, but rather a small separate edifice. Bells, according to Walafrid Strabo, who wrote in the early part of the 9th century (de Exord. et Increment. rer. Eccl. c. 5), were of two kinds, "fusilia," and "productilia," the former cast, the latter of sheets of metal, joined by rivets and hammered into form, in the manner of the early Irish hand-bells. The "tintinnum" of which archbishop Tatwine wrote was of the former class, and it should seem formed out of a bronze statue of some Roman emperor. Few, if any, bells of this early period (if we except the small Irish hand-bells) are probably now in existence, but Filippini is quoted as stating in his history of Corsica that a bell, bearing the date A.D. 700, had been found in the old campanile of the church of S. Maria dell' Assunzione near St. Florent in that island; it does not appear what was the size of this bell. [A. N.]

TITHES (δέκατα, decimae). There is hardly any evidence of the general payment of tithes before the end of the 4th century. Until the publication of Selden's History of Tithes, A.D. 1618, the generally prevailing opinion was that tithes were due de jure divino, and that if not paid from the beginning, they were paid as soon as the church was free from persecution. This opinion not only lacks the direct support of antiquity, but is opposed to the few notices we have remaining of the practice of the early church. As the same passages have been quoted on both sides of the controversy, and as much depends upon the actual expressions, the more important evidence must be quoted in full.

In the 1st century it is admitted by all that there is no evidence of the payment of tithes. When the collection was made for the poor brethren in Jerusalem at Antioch, each man gave "according to his ability" (Acts xi. 29); in the churches of Galatia and of Corinth, each is ordered to give "as God has prospered him." (1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2.) In the epistles to Timothy, where St. Paul touches upon the finances of the church, there is no mention of tithes or of any other fixed proportion as being paid or considered due.

In the 2nd century also it was felt that to fix upon a definite proportion was to limit the free spirit of Christian love. Irenaeus (Haer. iv. 27) says that our Lord came to expand and extend the law, and in place of definite commands to substitute principles; "and therefore instead of 'thou shalt not commit adultery,' he commanded men not to lust (Matt. v. 28), and instead of 'thou shalt not kill,' not even to be angry; and instead of paying tithe to divide all one's goods to the poor." Thus did Christ remove "the fetters of slavery." So again (iv. 34) Irenaeus contrasts the servitude of the law of Moses with the freedom of the sonship of Christians: "and for this reason, whilst they (the Jews) used to consider the tithes of their property as consecrated, they, on the contrary, who have apprehended freedom, decree to the uses of the Lord all things which they have—joyfully and freely giving not what is less, inasmuch as they have a greater hope." Yet in iv. 20, after stating that the Levites lived on tithes, he adds "Discipulis inquit Dominus Leviticam substantiam habentibus."

In the 3rd century, Origen (Hom. xi. in Numeros), advocating the payment of first-fruits mentions tithes also, not as due from Christians, but as a limitation which the Christian will exceed. He quotes Matt. xxiii. 23, "'Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithe of mint, and anise, and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith: these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone.' But if you say that He was saying this with reference to the Pharisees, not to the disciples, hear Him again saying to the disciples, 'Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven.' What then He wishes to be done by the Pharisees, he wishes to be fulfilled much more and with greater abundance by the disciples. What He does not wish to be done by the disciples He does not command the Pharisees either to do. How then is our righteousness abounding more than that of the scribes and Pharisees, if they dare not taste the fruits of their land before they offer first-fruits to the priests, and tithes be separated for the Levites; whilst I, doing none of these things, so misuse the fruits of the earth that the priest knows nothing of them, the Levite is ignorant of them, the divine altar does not perceive them?" (cf. Hom. xvi. in Genesim.)

That Origen did not intend in this passage to give his judgment upon tithes is evident from the incidental way in which they are referred to, and from his formal conclusion in which he makes no mention of them, "Haec diximus efferentes mandatum de primitiis frugum vel pecorum debere etiam secundum literam stare."

Cyprian (Epist. i. 9, ed. Erasmus, 66 Pamel.) writes to dissuade a presbyter from accepting the position of guardian on the ground that the clergy are separated from all secular business. The tribe of Levi had no inheritance but was supported by tithes, that they might devote themselves entirely to divine service; "the same plan and form is now preserved in regard to the clergy," that they may not be diverted from their sacred duties, but receiving, as it were tithes ("sed in honore sportulantium fratrum tanquam decimas accipientes") may not depart from the altar. Here the phrase tanquam decimas is decisive against the payment of tithe as a fixed legal due, for decimae paid as legal dues could not be tanquam decimae. There is analogy, not identity in the method of support.

Cyprian also laments the diminution of almsgiving, which was consequent upon dissension (de Unitate, 23). "Then they were selling houses and estates, but now from our patrimony we give not even tithes; and when the Lord bids us sell, we are rather buying and increasing."

This passage is against the fact of payment, and does not even recommend tithes; for the reference is not to annual income, but to property: "we give not even the tenth part of our estates," not, "we do not even pay tithes on our estates."

Thus the fathers of the first three centuries nowhere speak of tithes as even a minimum due de jure divino, though they had occasion for saying so, had such been the opinion of the church, or had tithes generally been paid as legally due; they frequently and earnestly exhort to almsgiving, they never exhort their hearers to give tithes.

These are all the genuine passages which can be brought forward. They fail completely to shew that tithes were paid as a fact, or that payment was considered necessary de jure divino. In early times a tenth was not an authorised or an adequate proportion. Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Cyprian, all make some reference to church finance, but in none of them are tithes mentioned as a source of income.

During the 4th century the Apostolic Constitutions refer to tithes. In lib. ii. cap. xxv. we read, "The gifts of tithes and first-fruits which are given in accordance with the command of God, let the bishop, as a man of God, expend." The Levites were so supported of old, and the clergy are the Levites now. Yet after this, a clear distinction is drawn between tithes payable then under the law, and the oblations offered now, under the Gospel. See also lib. vii. cap.

xxx., and lib. viii. cap. xxx., which regulate the disposal of tithes.

St. Ambrose (Sermo xxxiv. in feria 3 post prim. dom. quadr.) says, "God has reserved the tenth part to Himself, and therefore it is not lawful for a man to retain what God has reserved for Himself. To thee He has given nine parts, for Himself He has reserved the tenth part, and if thou shalt not give to God the tenth part, God will take from thee the nine parts."

So in a sermon on Ascension Day, "a good Christian pays tithes yearly to be given to the poor." (Cf. in Lucam xi. 7.)

Epiphanius (Haer. 50) argues against those who kept Easter according to the Jewish law for fear of the curse of the law, though in other respects they agreed with the church. The curse, he says, refers not to the case of the passover only, but also to circumcision and tithes. Thus he implies that the law of tithe was not binding on the church any more than the law of circumcision, and also that it was not observed by those whom he was addressing any more than by the church at large.

In the 5th century, Jerome on Malachi iii. says, "What we have said of tithes and first-fruits, which of old used to be given by the people to the priests and Levites, understand also in the case of the peoples of the church, to whom it has been commanded to sell all they have and give to the poor and follow the Lord the Saviour. . . . If we are unwilling to do this, at least let us imitate the rudimentary teaching of the Jews so as to give a part of the whole to the poor, and pay the priests and Levites due honour. If anyone shall not do this he is convicted of defrauding and cheating God."

In an epistle to Nepotianus, Jerome writes, "If I am the portion of the Lord, and the line of his inheritance, and do not receive a portion among the other tribes, but as if (quasi) a Levite and priest live upon tithes, and serving the altar am supported by the oblation of the altar." His language is clearly metaphorical, and not a precise statement of a fact.

Augustine (Ps. 146) gives conclusive evidence that tithes were not yet regarded as a legal due "Cut off, therefore, something first, and assign some fixed portion . . . . take off some considerable part of your income? Tithes will you? Take off tithes, although it be too little ("decimas vis? decimas exime"). . . . He beyond whom your righteousness is to abound, gives tithes; you, however, give not even a thousandth part.

In Homily 48, Augustine says that the present excessive taxation is laid upon them because they do not give to God the things that are God's. "Our ancestors used to abound in wealth of every kind for this very reason that they used to give tithes, and pay the tax to Caesar. Now, on the contrary, because devotion to God has ceased, the drain of the treasury has increased. We have been unwilling to share the tithes with God, now the whole is taken away. Alms ought to be paid according to the measure and quantity as it is written (Tobit iv.) 'As thou shalt have, give alms; if thou shalt have little, from that little impart to the hungry.'"

In his sermon to the brethren in the wilderness (Serm. 64), he warns those who till the earth not to defraud the church in the matter of tithes, nor any other, however they may live, lest they lose all.

A spurious sermon, attributed to Augustine (de Tempore, 219) is wholly on the duty of paying tithes. God who has given the whole condescends to demand back the tithes. This is enforced by Malachi iii. and Exodus xxx. God is wont to reduce to a tithe those who withhold tithes. For tithes are sought as a debt, and he who has refused to give them has invaded the property of other men. He, therefore, who wishes to gain reward or to merit indulgence for sin, let him pay tithe, and out of the nine parts as well, be zealous to give alms to the poor.

Other spurious documents are—a canon of Damasus, a letter of Jerome to Damasus, and later, a decretal of Gelasius, and some canons of Orleans and Seville (Selden, ch. v.).

Chrysostom (Hom. iv. in Eph. ii.) says that the Jews paid two tithes, whereas, now, a man observes to him with astonishment, "So-and-so gives tithes! Is not this shameful? If under the law it were dangerous to neglect tithes, consider how great a danger there is now."

Some writers quote also Hom. xxxv. in Genesim, and Hom. xviii. on the Acts; but in both these places decimas is found only in the Latin translation for ἀπαρχάς.

A homily on Luke xviii. 12, attributed to Eusebius of Emessa (c. A.D. 430) says that the payment of tithes is a very good and laudable practice.

Cassian (Collat. Abbat. Theonae xxi.) tells us that in Egypt many persons offered tithes and first-fruits to the famous old man, abbat John (c. 1). This is the earliest instance of the gift of tithes to a monastery. Yet they were not regarded as legally due, for (c. 3) the righteous shew that they are not under the law by exceeding the legal tenth (cf. c. 5); and Christ bids us not to pay tithe, but to sell all (c. 7). Yet, in c. 25, he says, that by the law of Moses a general precept was promulgated ("universo populo"), and we who are bidden (qui praecipimur) to pay tithes of our substance should also pay tithes of our time, and observe the lenten fast (cf. c. 33).

Isidore of Pelusium (c. A.D. 440), lib. i. Epist. 317, writes to count Hermin that he does great honour to the Lord by paying first-fruits and tithes, and will, as a reward, enjoy much prosperity here and eternal happiness hereafter.

The evidence belonging to this period would seem to shew that payment of tithe was first regarded as a duty soon after A.D. 350. By that time the idea generally prevailed that the priest of the Christian church had succeeded to the office of the Levitical priests, and consequently to their rights and privileges. Ambrose was the first exponent of this duty. Augustine and Jerome waver, partly influenced by the new ideas, partly mindful of the perfect freedom of Christian charity. In the East this doctrine seems to have made very little progress; Chrysostom shews that it was rarely practised. Epiphanius completely rejects it, Eusebius can say no more than that it is a good practice. Isidore is grateful; even the monk who accepts and enjoins tithes is mindful of a higher law than the Mosaic.

Caesarius of Arles (c. A.D. 490) de Eleemos.

Hom. 2, says not only are tithes not our own, but belonging to the church, but also all we have is from God, and therefore we ought to give to the poor (cf. Lev. xiv. and xxxvii., where he quotes chiefly from Augustine). Eugippius (Vita S. Severani, c. 17, § 18), c. A.D. 510, says that in Pannonia tithes were zealously paid—"quod mandatum licet cunctis ex lege notissimum sit," was taught there by the saint. A famine which happened was thought to be the punishment of neglect of tithes. When the Lombards were threatening Italy, one instance given of their savage habits was that they did not pay tithes (Greg. Turon. vi. 6). Anastasius Sinaita (A.D. 544), in his Dux Vitae, question 13, asks what proportion of his goods a man ought to offer to God. The answer is, "If he who gives half [referring to Zacchaeus] does nothing, quanti erit is qui ne decimam quidem praebet?"

In a synodical letter written after the second council of Tours, A.D. 567, the faithful are exhorted to follow the example of Abraham and pay tithes.

Thus for two hundred years, the doctrine of the obligation of tithe had been making its way, but still remained only a pious opinion, unenforced by any decree of emperor or council.

At length, in A.D. 585, the council of Mâcon, eager to take away the causes of the decay of the church, recites how the divine laws had ordered the payment of tithes that the clergy might be left free to their sacred duties: "Quas leges Christianorum congeries longis temporibus custodivit intemeratas. Nunc autem paulatim praevaricatores legum pene Christiani omnes ostenduntur, dum ea quae divinitus sancita sunt adimplere negligunt." Wherefore for the future all are to pay tithes, which the priests may spend also in redeeming captives or aiding the poor. All who refuse are liable to excommunication.

Selden says this canon is not in the oldest collections. Agobard, bishop of Lyons, certainly writes as if he had never seen it. Gregory the Great (Hom. xvi. in Evang.) says: "As ye are bidden by the law to pay tithes of property, so strive to offer Him also tithes of days."

About A.D. 660, Marculphus collected all legal forms relating to land; but there is no form for charging land with tithe. But the constant exhortations of the clergy began at last to produce permanent results.

Towards the end of the 7th century grew up the custom of making tithe a permanent charge upon land. The council of Arles (iv. c. 9, A.D. 813) orders "ut ecclesiae antiquitus constitutae nec decimis nec ulla possessione priventur." This does not require an earlier date; 130 years would fully satisfy "antiquitus constitutae."

In A.D. 680, "decimancula in Rodolfi curte—that is, a tithe of small value, in a place called Rodolph's Court—was consecrated to the church of Arras.

The Ethiopian Missal, which dates from about this time, has a form of prayer: "Rogemus pro iis qui obtulerunt munera sanctae unicae quae est super omnes ecclesiae sacrificium scilicet primitiarum decimarum, gratiarum actionis signum et monumentum."

A.D. 720, Eadbert, bishop of Lindisfarne, was noted for his charities, so that, says Bede (Hist. Eccl. iv. 29), he used, according to the law of Moses, every year to give tithe, not only of beasts, but of corn and fruits, and of clothes for the poor. Bede also says (super Exod. quaest. c. 36) that ten is the number of perfection, and as in first-fruits we make a beginning, so in tithes we are ordered to perfect our work.

In his Scintillae, or common places (xxix.), he quotes from Malachi and other texts in favour of paying tithe; also from the spurious sermon De Tempore, 219 (vide supra Augustine).

Also in a sermon on Luke xvi. (Dom. ix. post Trin.), he urges his hearers to give half their goods, as Zacchaeus, or at least two-tenths, so as to surpass the Jews.

In A.D. 742, Pipin confirms to the abbey of Fulda all grants of tithe past or future; and in A.D. 750 he gives to the church of St. Monon a tithe of land.

There is no foundation for the story that Charles Martel granted the tithes to his knights in A.D. 740, and that they were restored at the synod of Ratisbon, A.D. 742.

A.D. 745, Boniface of Mentz, writing to Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury, speaks of the clergy as receiving tithes.

A.D. 750, the Exceptiones of Egbert, archbishop of York, make mention of tithes. No. 4, the priest is to teach his people to pay tithes of all their property. No. 5, the priests are to receive tithes and write down the names of those who pay them; they are to be divided into three parts—for church ornament, for the poor, for the clergy. No. 99 refers to the Mosaic law of tithe. No. 100 quotes from Augustine a passage exhorting a tithe to be paid of all sources of income.

Though tithes were now generally paid, they were still quite voluntarily, for the canon of Mâcon seems to have become obsolete even in its own province. But it was now determined to coerce the reluctant.

Of the capitularies of Charlemagne many refer to tithe, but most are later than A.D. 800.

A.D. 778, Charles the Great ordered tithes to be paid throughout his kingdom (Capit. v. 123); payment is to be enforced by excommunication or by the civil magistrate (v. 46). Herardus of Tours, at the same time forbids his clergy to use other than the milder methods of persuasion and warning.

Capit. vii. anni xi. A.D. 779—"Concerning tithes, let each man give a tenth, and let it be dispensed at the command of the bishop."

A.D. 787, the council of Calcuith (c. xvii.) quotes the law and Malachi, and orders tithe to be paid of everything.

A.D. 793, Offa, king of the Mercians, gave tithes of all, to expiate the treacherous murder of Ethelbert.

The council of Friuli, A.D. 791 (canon xiv), says that there is no better teaching concerning tithes than Malachi iii.

The council of Frankfort, A.D. 794 (canon xxv.), orders all who hold benefices of the church to pay tithes and ninths, and every man is to pay the lawful tithe to the church.

Yet towards the close of this period Agobard, bishop of Lyons, in a treatise on the dispensation of church revenue (p. 276), expressly denies that before his time any synod or church fathers had determined any fixed quantity as due of necessity. From his position he must have had every opportunity of knowing the canon of Mâcon. About the same time Alcuin (Epist. vii.) presses upon Charles the Great the inexpediency of exacting tithe from such weak Christians as the newly conquered Huns. This he could scarcely do if tithes were generally regarded as of divine obligation.

Though the payment of tithes was always based upon the law of Moses, the duty was extended beyond the Mosaic precept (cf. Luke xviii. 12).

There was no limitation as to the kind of property of which tithes were paid.

Origen speaks only of annual produce; Ambrose, of grain, wine, fruits, cattle, business, hunting; Augustine, of income, of annual fruits, or daily gains. The spurious sermon commands tithes of anything whereby the man lives—warfare, business, or trade. So an epistle of the bishops of the province of Tours, A.D. 567, exhorts payment of tithes of all property, and even of slaves. Eadbert, bishop of Lindisfarne, gave tithes of fruits, quadrupeds, and clothes.

Similarly, whereas the Mosaic law granted tithes to the Levites, in the church they were claimed not for the clergy alone, but for the poor also.

The persons for whose benefit tithes were given were the clergy, says Irenaeus; Jerome, the poor, the priests and Levites. The Apostolic Constitutions claim them for the orphan and the widow, for the poor and the proselyte; "for the other clerics" (the bishops, priests and deacons were to be supported by the first-fruits) and for the virgins. The council of Mâcon decrees them for the clergy, the poor, and for the redemption of captives. In Cassian, we see tithe paid to monks, and in a capitulary of the fourth year of Charlemagne to monasteries.

Thus in two points the advocates of tithes went beyond the law upon which they based their claim.

At what time parochial tithes were separated from the mother church and affixed to the parish church does not appear. Selden (chap. xii. on Tithes) says that in the Saxon times we find "ecclesiae" simply, and not until the Norman dynasty "ecclesiae cum decimis."

See Selden on Tithes; Tillesley's Reply to Selden; Spelman on Tithes and Concilia Anglicana; Thomassin, part iii. lib. i. [J. S.]

TITULUS. (1) In pagan usage an inscription on a stone; later, the stone which marked the boundary of property.

(2) In the time of Trajan it meant the limits of the jurisdiction of presbyters at Rome. This is the germ of that meaning which title bears in ecclesiastical practice.

(3) Sphere of work for orders. [ORDERS, HOLY, p. 1486; PARISH, p. 1556.]

Closely allied to this sense of Titulus is the application of the term to some churches in Rome. Some of the churches there were called tituli, and some were not. Of pope Marcellus (A.D. 308), it is said he appointed in the city of Rome twenty-five "tituli, quasi dioceses." This last expression might suggest a correspondence, with the idea of "mother churches." And this would support Bingham's view, which he takes from Mede (Discourse of Churches), that the name titulus was given to certain churches, because they gave a title of cure or denomination to presbyters to whom they were committed (Bingham, Antiq. viii. i. 10). Succeeding popes, —Silvester, Damasus, Innocent—appointed each a titulus in Rome; so that in the time of Alexander the Third, they are spoken of as being twenty-eight in number (Anast. Vit. Pontif.). Another reason for the name titulus, as applied to the church, is suggested by Baronius (an. 112). The sign of the cross, which was inscribed upon them, was the titulus by which they were known to belong to Christ, just as imperial property was declared to be such by the imperial mark (titulus fiscalis) affixed to it.

From meaning the whole church the term titulus was sometimes applied to a part of the church, (a) a chapel in which the bones of a saint reposed, and (b) the sanctuary (presbyterium, βῆμα) or part which contained the altar. The churches called tituli were distinguished from the others, which were called diaconiae, oratoria; and, as being the principal churches of the city, were called tituli cardinales or simply cardinales, the priests who were attached to them being called presbyteri cardinales. See CARDINAL. [H. T. A.]

TOLEDO, COUNCILS OF (TOLETANA CONCILIA). No less than 21 councils are said to have been held at T[illegible]edo, between A.D. 400 and 701, when they were stopped as abruptly by the invasion of Spain by the Moors, as they had commenced on its conquest by the Visigoths. But the genuineness of the two first, as now given, is more than doubtful, for the reasons which follow. The authorities to be consulted more particularly, besides Mansi and Hefele, are the Collect. Max. Conc. Hisp. by Cardinal Aguirre (Catalan's ed.); Collect. Can. Eccl. Hisp. by Gonzalez, Madrid, 1808: and more recently, with notes by M. Tejada y Ramiro.

(1) A.D. 400, or, as another reading has it, 397, when 19 bishops are said to have met and passed 20 canons. But appended to these canons is, first, a rule of faith followed by 18 anathemas, which, as we shall see, was made by a later and southern council. Some professions come next, which are called the professions of bishops Symphosius and Dictinnius, of happy memory; who certainly would have been dead by then. But, again, the definitive sentence, which comes last of all, must have been passed during their lifetime. Now, the two first documents, necessarily, can have no connexion with a council of this date; nor the third, for another reason, viz. that neither Symphosius nor Dictinnius appear among the subscribers to those 20 canons on discipline that come first. Nor, lastly, can pope Innocent have corresponded with this council, as he is supposed to have done (Mansi, iii. 106 d, et seq.), for he was not pope till two years afterwards. On the other hand, Idatius, bishop of Chaves, who was contemporary with St. Leo, says in his Chronicon (Migne, Patr. 41, 876), that, during the pontificate of Anastasius, "a council of bishops met at Toledo, in which, as stated in its acts, Symphosius and Dictinnius and other bishops of the province of Gallicia with them, subscribed to the condemnation of Priscillian, whom they had once followed; certain observances of ecclesiastical discipline were decreed; and Ortigius, bishop of Celene, who had been exiled by the Priscillianists, was present and took part." This statement lends positive countenance to the third of these documents; but none whatever to the 20 canons that come first; for it is of course quite possible for the council at which Symphosius and Dictinnius were present to have passed canons on discipline, yet not these. True, there is a bishop Ortizius, or Orticius, who subscribes to these; but nothing is said by the president to shew there was anything special in his case. Again, the 14th of these canons bears a close resemblance to the 3rd of the first council of Saragossa, A.D. 381, but it might have been just as well passed 40 years later as 21 years earlier. The mention of the quotidianum sacrificium, in the fifth of them affords a fair presumption that they were framed in Spain (Bingham, Ant. xv. 9, 4), yet there is a curious resemblance between the names of the last bishop subscribing to them, Exuperantius and Exuperius, bishop of Toulouse, with whom Innocent I. corresponded (Mansi, ib. p. 1038), which will at least be worth calling to mind further on. All the pieces are given by Mansi, iii. 997–1015, which the authors of L'Art de Vérifier les Dates only confuse further, in attempting to explain; and which the most recent editor of Spanish canons, M. Tejada y Ramiro, discusses at great length, after cardinal Aguirre, but alike fails to clear up.

(2) A.D. 405, according to Mansi (ib. p. 1161), and Cave (Hist. Lit. i. 470), or 407 according to others, for the mere purpose, that is, of bearing out the letter of Innocent I. already noticed. But as, 1, no such synod occurs in either the Isidorian or the pseudo-Isidorian collections; and 2, no such letter is ascribed to Innocent by Dionysius Exiguus; and further, as, 3, this letter in the Isidorian and pseudo-Isidorian collections is addressed to a synod of Toulouse, and is much shorter and vastly less explicit on disorders in Spain, than the longer version of it published by Sirmondus in his collection of the synods of Gaul, we may well doubt which deserves most credit, the letter, or the synod. The similarity between the names of the last subscriber to the canons of the former council, and the bishop of Toulouse with whom Innocent corresponded has been already pointed out, and is worth considering. According to the Isidorian and pseudo-Isidorian collections, the second council of Toledo was not till A.D. 527, when 8 bishops met and passed 5 canons, but between this and the supposed council of A.D. 405, another of A.D. 447, distinct from or identical with a general council of Spain, supposed to have been held this year, has been inserted (Mansi, vi. 491–494), the only ground for either being another papal letter, which even Cave will not dispute (Hist. Lit. i. 440). But this letter (Ep. xv. of St. Leo, ad Turribium Asturiensem episcopum, according to Mansi, v. 1286) is open to grave doubts, affecting not merely the alleged synod of its own date, but also that of A.D. 527. For the three local accounts of it are far from consistent. 1. Idatius, a contemporary, says in his Chronicon, that the writings of St. Leo against the Priscillianists were brought to the Spanish bishops by Pervincus, deacon of bishop Turribius; among which was a full discourse addressed to Turribius himself, on the observance of the Catholic faith, and on the blasphemies of the heresies; to which some Gallicians, however, gave but a treacherous assent (Migne, ib. 882). 2. Lucretius, president of the first council of Braga, then metropolis of Gallicia, A.D. 563 (Mansi, ix. 774), says that Leo forwarded his writings against the Priscillians to a synod of Gallicia by a notary of his own see, Turribius; and that by his order the bishops of Tarragona, Carthagena, Portugal, and Andalusia, having assembled themselves in council, drew up a rule of faith, with chapters appended, against the Priscillianists, which was sent to Balconius, then bishop of Braga, and read out now. Lucretius thus makes Turribius, not a correspondent, but a courier, of St. Leo; not a bishop, but a notary. He says further, that the writings of St. Leo were addressed not to a bishop, but to a council then sitting in the north; and that, afterwards, a southern, not a general, council was held at his instance, where the rule of faith was drawn up and sent to Braga, which was now read at Braga. But would not the writings of St. Leo have been read out there too, had they been then extant? 3. Montanus, who was bishop of Toledo, and presided in the alleged synod of A.D. 571, speaks, in the first of the epistles ascribed to him, not of any letter of St. Leo, but of books addressed to St. Leo by a most blessed and religious bishop Turribius (in these documents his see is never once named); yet, that the second of the epistles ascribed to Montanus himself is addressed also to a pious bishop Turribius, is proved incontestably by the words vester coepiscopus fecit (Mansi, viii. 791), which cardinal Aguirre must have been napping not to have noticed. This clumsy forgery, which must have been concocted before the middle of the 7th century to have imposed on St. Ildefonsus (de Vir. Illust. c. 3), only makes the inconsistency between the two former accounts doubly perplexing; and it is further enhanced by the fact that while the Isidorian collection includes both the letter of St. Leo and the two letters of Montanus, the pseudo-Isidorian collection ignores all three. Let the author of the false Decretals have credit for superior discernment for once. The letters of Montanus destroy each other without more ado; similarly, that of Leo to Turribius has only to be compared with the alleged letter of Turribius to Ceponius and Idatius (Mansi, v. 1302), and it will be seen that while both affect the papal in tone, one is not really more papal than the other. Baluzius had more reason for his suspicion than he liked to avow (ib. vi. 491), and cardinal Aguirre can find nothing to oppose to it, but the antiquity of a MS. (ib. 492). The main upshot of it all, however, is, that in neither of these collections, nor in any of these documents, is there the smallest evidence for a second synod of Toledo before A.D. 527; and as for the acts of the alleged synod of that date, besides being prejudiced by the two letters ascribed to its president, they betray far too much special pleading for the metropolitan rights of that see to inspire confidence. (Comp. Card. Aguirre, Diss. tom. iii. 48 et seq.; art. GALLICIA, COUNCIL OF, p. 708; and the alleged synod of T. A.D. 610, below.)

(3) A.D. 589. Of this council there can be no doubt whatever, except as to its being the third, and as to its principal ruling having been founded on a misapprehension. As 68 bishops or their representatives subscribed to it, every see, whether of Spain, Portugal, or Narbonne, then in existence, must have been represented there; and as each bishop in subscribing appends the name of his see, the subscriptions are worth a careful study. It is the metropolitan of Merida who subscribes second—perhaps as being the oldest—and the metropolitan of Toledo subscribes third; but he who subscribes first is the king. Reccared, king of the Goths, summoned it to celebrate his own conversion, and that of his queen and people, from Arianism; and he and his queen commence proceedings in it by making profession of their orthodoxy, and reciting the creeds of Nicaea and Constantinople, as the faith professed by the Catholic church throughout the whole world, and then subscribing to them, and to the definition of the council of Chalcedon, in their own names. In reciting the creed of Constantinople, translated into Latin, they insert, according to the reading of some MSS. the words, "and from the Son," in describing the Procession of the Holy Ghost. Eight bishops, a number of presbyters, deacons, and of the high nobility, converts from Arianism, likewise, follow with their profession; in which besides reciting the two creeds, and the definition of Chalcedon, like their sovereign, they anathematise twenty-three different errors, the third of which is that of those who deny the Procession of the Holy Ghost to be from the Father and the Son. Regulations for discipline come next by order of the king, embodied in 23 lengthy canons. Among the subscribers to them, and to the acts of the council in general, are those bishops whose abjuration had just been made, with the king at their head, who subscribes first; and as no king, probably, before or since: "I, king Flavius Reccared, in confirmation of these matters, which with the holy synod we have defined, have subscribed." Each bishop after him meekly says, "I have subscribed assenting to these constitutions." So that this addition to the creed, and doctrine involved in it, was originally defined, in point of fact, by a convert prince at the head of the same council that received his abjuration. On the other hand, in the 2nd of these very canons we read: "The holy synod ordains that throughout all the churches of Spain and Gallicia, according to the form of the oriental churches, the creed of the council of Constantinople, that is, of the 150 fathers be recited, so that, before the reading of the Lord's prayer, it may be intoned in a loud voice by the people before communicating." Thus it would seem, that in anathematising the opponents of the twofold Procession of the Holy Ghost, the council never really contemplated interpolating the creed; but meant in all honesty to adhere to the form of it then used in the East. If, therefore, the interpolation of the creed dates from this council, it was as ignorant an interpolation as its defence has been. At the same time the doctrine meant to be expressed by it had been previously laid down in the rule of faith transmitted to Balconius, and endorsed in the so-called letter of Leo to Turribius; unless these documents have likewise received additions. But how, on the other hand, is the omission of all reference to the fifth council by Reccared and his bishops to be explained? Having been held A.D. 553, it was then thirty-six years old. And the pen of St. Gregory the Great with which he congratulated his friend Leander on the conversion of Reccared (Ep. i. 43, Indict. ix.), must have been dipped in the same ink with which he wrote to the Eastern patriarchs shortly before: "Quintum concilium pariter veneror" (ib. Ep. 25). Leander was in all probability grandson of Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, and educated in his dominions. He may thus have aided with the bishops of Aquileia and Istria on that subject, rather than with Rome. At all events, neither at this, nor any subsequent council of Toledo, was the fifth council so much as named. Proceedings were wound up by a glowing review of them in the shape of a homily from Leander, metropolitan of Seville, who had acted as tutor to the king, and corresponded with pope Gregory whom he had known at Constantinople (Mansi, ix. 997–1010).

A.D. 597, where Massona, metropolitan of Merida, subscribes first again; the metropolitan of Narbonne, second; the metropolitan of Toledo, third. It is called a council of 16 bishops, but only 13 subscribe. And it passed only 2 canons, the 1st of which, relating to the celibacy of the clergy, cardinal Aguirre says, "difficillimus intellectu est," but he omits to add that this council is unknown both to the Isidorian and pseudo-Isidorian collections, and has not been known anywhere as the fourth council. It is transcribed from Loaisa by Mansi without comment (x. 477).

A.D. 610. But this, again, with the alleged edict of Gundemar confirming it, is unknown to both Isidorian collections, like the last, besides which, the plea set forth in it for the metropolitan rights of this see shews too palpably the use which it was designed to serve, and this its reference to the alleged council under Montanus only further confirms, so that even Mansi says its genuineness is a question which he leaves to the most learned to decide (x. 511). Nothing else purports to have been discussed at it; the petitions appended to it are, therefore, beyond explanation.

(4) A.D. 633, which is called everywhere the fourth council. Here the metropolitan of Toledo subscribes only fifth, and the metropolitan of Merida third, after the metropolitan of Narbonne; while the metropolitan of Seville, St. Isidore, who had succeeded his brother Leander in that see, presides. It passed no less than 75 canons, and no less than 69 bishops or their representatives subscribed to them. The first, headed "De evidenti Catholicae fidei veritate," dogmatises on the Trinity and Incarnation in language that every now and then exhibits phrases common to the Athanasian creed, and ends similarly, "Haec est Catholicae ecclesiae fides: hanc confessionem conservamus atque tenemus, quam quisquis firmissime custodierit, perpetuam salutem habebit. . . ." The provision made by the next for divine service is no less noteworthy—"Unus ordo orandi atque psallendi a nobis per omnem Hispaniam atque Galliam conservetur, unus modus in missarum solemnitatibus, unus in vespertinis matutinisque officiis; nec diversa sit ultra in nobis ecclesiastica consuetudo, qui in una fide continemur et regno, hoc enim et antiqui canones decreverunt: ut unaquaque provincia et psallendi et ministrandi parem consuetudinem teneat. . . ." There is no reference whatever to the customs or the tenets of the church of any country besides their own in either canon. If, owing to circumstances, says the 3rd, councils cannot meet twice a year—juxta antiqua patrum decreta—they should at least be held once, general or provincial, as the case may require. All the other canons are conceived in the same spirit. Of the last book of the Bible the 17th says: "Apocalypsis librum multorum conciliorum auctoritas, et synodica sanctorum praesulum Romanorum decreta Joannis evangelistae esse praescribunt, et inter divinos libros recipiendum constituerunt. . . ." The 21st, entitled, "De castitate sacerdotum," leaves the question of marriage untouched, and is content to say, "Inoffensos igitur et immaculatos decet Dei existere sacerdotes, nec ullo eos fornicationis contagio pollui. . . ." The 57th commences a series of ordinances about Jews in these words: "De Judaeis hoc praecepit sancta synodus: nemini deinceps ad credendum vim inferre . . . non enim tales inviti salvandi sunt, sed volentes; ut integra sit forma justitiae. . ." And the seventy-second says of those slaves who have been emancipated, "A cujuslibet insolentiâ protegantur; sive in statu libertatis eorum, seu in peculio quod habere noscuntur. . . ." The writings of St. Isidore afford the best clue to the comprehensive character of these enactments (Mansi, x. 611–50). Compare, for instance, can. 57 with what is said of Sisebute (Chron. aera DCL.).

(5) A.D. 636, "Diversis ex provinciis Hispaniae" is what they say of themselves; and it is a fact that 2 or 3 bishops of the provinces of Tarragona, Portugal, and Narbonne figure among the subscribers to it; but all the rest of the 24 subscribing or represented bishops were suffragans of Toledo, whose metropolitan, Eugenius, is found, for the first time, subscribing first. The "diversis ex provinciis," whether regular or not, few or many, did homage to the occasion. No rival metropolitan was present. Eugenius subscribed himself: "Dei miseratione Toletanae ecclesiae provinciae Carthaginis metropolitanus," a style contrasting with his meek subscription but two years afterwards, when his see was again eclipsed. All of the 9 canons now passed have reference to existing disorders in the state (Mansi, x. 6538–8).

(6) A.D. 638, when the metropolitan of Narbonne presided, and Eugenius subscribed third, after the metropolitan of Braga, but before the then metropolitan of Seville, Honoratus. No less than 53 bishops, or their representatives, subscribe to the 18 canons now passed, the first of which is entitled, "De plenitudine fidei Catholicae," and embodies a disquisition on the Trinity and Incarnation about three times as long as the 1st canon of the tenth council under St. Isidore, yet borrowing on the Procession from his account of the third council under Reccared (Chron. aera DCXXIV.) as clearly as their 3rd canon—"De custodiâ fidei Judaeorum" departs from his spirit. Of the rest about half concern the state rather than the church, and the thanks of the council are voted to king Chintila for having called them together (Mansi, x. 659–674).

(7) A.D. 646, under king Chindasvinda, who dethroned the son of the summoner of the previous council. Here the metropolitan of Merida presides, and Eugenius of Toledo (unaccountably left out in Mansi) subscribes third once more, but this time after the metropolitan of Seville (Antonius), who had succeeded Honoratus since the previous council, and therefore must have been his junior. Thus the hypothesis of cardinal Aguirre making precedence depend on seniority breaks down here; for it was not Eugenius II. but Eugenius I. who was present, as we learn from St. Ildefonse (Vir. Illust. c. 13). But 8 canons were passed on this occasion, and the 1st of them, instead of expounding the faith, is headed, "De refugis atque perfidis clericis sive laicis," whose case is discussed at very great length. The rest are not of more lasting interest. Forty-one bishops or their representatives subscribe to them. (Mansi, x. 763–74.) Another council is appended by him to this in the next page, on no better evidence than because certain duties ascribed to archdeacons and other functionaries in the first book of Decretals (tit. 23–4), are there headed, "Ex concilio Toletano." But on this, see Bingham, ii. 21, 8.

(8) A.D. 653, where the metropolitan of Merida presides again, and a second Eugenius of Toledo subscribes third, after Antonius of Seville. Abbats here subscribed for the first time, signing between bishops and their representatives, and laymen of rank similarly for the first time, signing last. Twelve lengthy canons, in the 1st of which the creed of Constantinople is professed in its interpolated form, were passed, "d'un style si diffus et si figuré, qu'il n'est point aisé de les entendre," as the authors of L'Art de Vérifier les Dates truly say; 62 bishops or their representatives subscribed to them. King Recesvinda heads them with a lengthy profession of his own to which he subscribes himself, and the bishops supplement them with a decree respecting his goods and chattels, which he finally confirms (Mansi, x. 1205–1228).

(9) A.D. 655, where the second Eugenius subscribes first, adopting a new style, "Regiae urbis metropolitanus episcopus"; and from this time, whether it was a general or provincial gathering, the metropolitan of Toledo presides always at councils held in his own metropolis, and signs first. On this occasion, indeed, no other metropolitan was present. Seventeen canons, all on discipline, were passed, and signed by 16 bishops and the representative of a 17th; 8 abbats and 4 counts complete the list. The heading of the last canon, "Ut baptizati Judaei cum episcopis celebrent dies festos," shews what course legislation had taken on that subject since the days of St. Isidore (Mansi, xi. 23–32).

(10) A.D. 656, when 3 metropolitans were present, and the second Eugenius again presides and signs first. This was the first general council at which this had occurred. Only 7 canons were passed, and 20 bishops and 25 episcopal representatives alone subscribe to them. Yet this council deposed Potamius, metropolitan of Braga, whose name appears among the subscribers to the eighth council, on his own confession of a crime committed by him, and appointed Fructuosus, one of his suffragans, in his stead. It also transferred the festival of the Annunciation to Dec. 18, by an express canon, on the ground that it clashed so frequently with Lent or Easter that its due observance was compromised (Mansi, xi. 32–46).

(11) A.D. 675, at an interval of nineteen years from the preceding one, during nine years of which the see of Toledo was filled by St. Ildefonso, nephew to the last prelate, and pupil of St. Isidore. Why no council should have met in his day is a question to which more than one answer might be returned. This, however, is what the 16 bishops who met under his successor, Quiricius, on this occasion, say on the subject: "Eramus huc usque pro labentis seculi colluvione instabiles, quia annosa series temporum, subtractâ luce conciliorum, non tam vitia auxerat, quam matrem omnium errorum ignorantiam otiosis mentibus ingerebat." This is in the preface to their own proceedings, which ends with a lengthy paraphrase of the faith of the first four councils, and is followed by 16 canons, the 6th of which begins as follows: "His a quibus Domini sacramenta tractanda sunt, judicium sanguinis agitare non licet." Yet the very next canon contemplates bishops pronouncing sentences of exile and prison against offenders, if nothing worse (Mansi, xi. 129–152).

(12) A.D. 681, at which king Ervigius was present to open proceedings and make known his wishes, Julian metropolitan of Toledo subscribing first, the metropolitans of Seville, Braga, and Merida, being present, and subscribing after him to 13 canons then passed: in the 1st of which, after a profession of the faith of the first four councils, and a recital of the interpolated creed, the resignation of king Wamba and the accession of king Ervigius is declared to have been duly received and authenticated. Whereupon both acts are confirmed by the council, and all who had taken oaths of allegiance to the one are released from them in favour of the other; "Le premier exemple d'une pareille entreprise des évêques," as the authors of L'Art de Vérifier les Dates say of it. The pendant to it is contained in the 6th canon, whose title runs thus: "De concessâ Toletano pontifici generalis synodi potestate, ut episcopi alterius provinciae cum conniventiâ principum in urbe regiâ ordinentur." The 9th canon enumerates and ordains a series of severe enactments against the Jews to be made more stringent than ever. By the 10th protection is assured to all who have taken sanctuary; the 11th shews that worshippers of idols were by no means extinct in Spain at that date. Thirty-five bishops, 3 representatives of absent bishops and abbats, and 15 nobles, subscribe to them. Afterwards, in the editions of councils, follows an edict of king Ervigius confirming them all. But in the Isidorian collection the first part of this edict is omitted, and appended to the second is the long edict of king Gundemar, said to have been issued in confirmation of the alleged council of A.D. 610, neither of which, as stated already, were before given in this collection, each setting forth the privileges of this see. In the pseudo-Isidorian collection only the second part of the edict of king Ervigius follows these canons, and that of Gundemar appears nowhere (Mansi, xi. 1023–1044).

(13) A.D. 683, when king Ervigius was again present, and retired after stating his wishes and handing in his address. Thirteen canons or chapters, as they are called from the tenth council onwards—and their length alone warrants the distinction—were then passed, after the faith of the first four councils had been professed and the interpolated creed recited, determining civil questions with as much freedom as ecclesiastical, and beginning with them in fact. Canon 5, which concludes this branch, forbids anybody to marry the widow of the king. Canon 9 confirms the twelfth council anew, while reciting the confirmation given to it at the time by Ervigius. The subscription to them of Julian, who subscribes first, is peculiar: "Ego Julianus indignus sanctae ecclesiae Toletanae metropolitanus episcopus instituta a nobis definita subscripsi." All the rest, 3 metropolitans and 44 bishops, merely subscribe their names and sees. Eight abbats, 27 representatives of absent bishops, 2 of whom were metropolitans, and 26 nobles complete the list. King Flavius Ervigius follows with his ratification (Mansi, xi. 1059–1082).

(14) A.D. 684, when 16 bishops of the province of Carthagena met under Julian of Toledo, their metropolitan; 6 abbats, and 2 representatives from each of the metropolitans of Tarragona, Narbonne, and Merida; 1 from each of the metropolitans of Braga and Seville, and 2 from absent suffragans of Toledo, being also present and subscribing. They had been ordered by king Ervigius, as they say in their 1st canon, to assemble thus, ob confutandum Apollinaris dogma pestiferum, concerning which a communication had reached them, a Romano praesule; so that whatever they might decide thereon the metropolitans of other provinces, apprised of it by their representatives, might be able to enforce by means of their own provincial synods throughout Spain and Gallicia. They therefore proceed to discuss this question in all its bearings, quibus Romanae sedis jueramus literis invitati. The 2nd canon adds that the courier of the Roman prelate had also brought with him the acts of a council held at Constantinople under the then Emperor Constantine; and that by the courteous letter of the pontiff of ancient Rome they were invited, ut praedicta synodalia instituta quae miserat, nostri etiam vigoris manerent auctoritate suffulta; omnibusque per nos sub regno Hispaniae consistentibus patescerent divulganda. This task is accordingly taken in hand by them forthwith; and finding these acts, on examination, to be quite consistent with the faith of the four first councils, they resolve as follows in their 7th canon: "Post Chalcedonense concilium haec debito honore, loco, et ordine, collocanda sunt: ut cujus glorioso themate fulgent, ei et loci et ordinis coaptentur honore." Even so, they cannot let the opportunity slip of dogmatising on the same points themselves, which occupies five more canons, to the exclusion of every other subject. It is difficult to say which is found the greater crux by Roman Catholics of modern times, this council or the papal epistles that gave rise to it. From this council we learn—1. That gesta synodalia of the sixth council were duly received in Spain from the then pope, Leo II., which of course necessitates their having been translated into Latin under his auspices, as his own letter contemplates and his own biographer expressly states (Mansi, xi. 1047, 1052). 2. That this council considered itself free to examine and only receive them on their being found orthodox. 3. That this council, by its manner of receiving them, distinctly testified its continued non-acceptance of the fifth council, though the pope, in his epistle to the bishops of Spain, had called them particularly the acts of the sixth council, and named five universal councils in addition (see above, council under Reccared, A.D. 589). From the papal epistles we learn that the Spanish bishops and their king Ervigius had the condemnation of Honorius of Rome by the sixth council formally notified to them by his then successor. G. Loaisa dares not impugn the genuineness of these letters; on the contrary, the MS. containing them has others, according to him, of the next pope, Benedict II., no less useful for throwing light on this council. If so, why were they not all published? Mansi prints but one and passes off one of the letters of Leo for another (ib. 1085–1086). Cardinal Aguirre reprints them timidly without a word from himself. Others content themselves with pronouncing them spurious or interpolated in general terms (Mansi, ib. 1050–1058, and CONSTANTINOPLE, COUNCILS OF, p. 446). No confirmation of this council by the king is appended to it (Mansi, ib. 1085–1092).

(15) A.D. 688, when king Egica was present, opened proceedings, and handed in an address on withdrawing; after which the bishops reiterate their adherence to the faith of the first four councils, and recite the interpolated creed. They then proceed to their real business, which is curious in the extreme. Julian, their president, had sent a work entitled Liber de tribus Substantiis, to Rome, which the then pope, Benedict II., had criticised in detail and pronounced against. He had likewise condemned one expression in their own dogmatic profession which had accompanied it. The council unhesitatingly vindicates both by passages from the fathers, and in re-affirming them observes with caustic vein: sicut nos non pudebit quae vera sunt defendere, hinc forsan quosdam pudebit quae vera sunt ignorare. This matter ended, another is settled in the same breath, and with equal freedom, relating to the king. He is formally released from intricacies in the conditions to which the late king had bound him on marrying his daughter. And then 5 metropolitans, 55 bishops, the representatives of 1 metropolitan and 4 more bishops, 8 abbats, 3 superior clergy, and 17 nobles subscribe to its rulings on each head. Naturally king Egica confirms them by a special edict (Mansi, xii. 7–26).

(16) A.D. 693, when king Egica was again present, opened proceedings, and handed in an address on withdrawing, after which the bishops, without any previous reference to the faith or the creed of councils, put forth a long dogmatic statement of their own, in which the points criticised by pope Benedict are once more re-affirmed. At its close, those who depart from the communion of the church or have never joined it, or who reject the faith and decrees of the first councils, are anathematised; and 13 chapters on matters relating to church and state follow. Of these the 1st is headed De Judacorum perfidiâ, and refers in high terms of praise to a late ordinance of the king having for its object, quatenus aut convertantur ad fidem, aut in perfidiâ perdurantes, acrioribus sedule mulctentur stimulis. The 6th, which is the last on ecclesiastical matters, is curious for the light it throws on the bread still commonly then used for the Eucharist, and for its own ruling thereon. The 8th is De munimine prolis regiæ; the 9th, De Sigeberto episcopo—that is to say, the late metropolitan of Toledo, who had been incarcerated for having conspired against the king. The council therefore deposed him, translating Felix from the see of Seville to succeed him, Faustinus from the see of Braga to succeed Felix, another Felix from the see of Portugal to succeed Faustinus, as the 12th canon relates; and the last canon orders that the metropolitan of Narbonne, who was prevented from being present, should lose no time in convening his suffragans to subscribe to these chapters, which king Egica thereupon confirms. All the newly-appointed metropolitans, with Felix at their head, and the metropolitan of Merida, who alone went as he came, 54 bishops, 5 abbats, 3 representatives of absent bishops, and 16 nobles subscribe to them (Mansi, xii. 59–88).

(17) A.D. 694, when king Egica was once more present, opened proceedings, and handed in an address as before. After this, the bishops commence their part, by reciting the interpolated creed, and proclaiming their adhesion to it. In their 1st canon they further decree that the first three days of every council shall be spent as fasts, and occupied wholly with matters relating to the faith and other spiritual or ecclesiastical matters, to the exclusion of secular persons. Indeed, of the 8 canons now passed, only the 7th, which is headed De munitione conjugis atque prolis regiæ, deals with anything else. By the 2nd baptisteries are to be kept locked in Lent, and not opened except for some grave cause. By the 3rd the washing of the feet on Maundy Thursday, which had been intermitted in some churches, is ordered to be revived and everywhere duly performed. By the 5th a pernicious custom of using a mass intended for the repose of the dead on behalf of the living, in order to imperil their lives, is to be punished with lifelong excommunication and imprisonment. By the 6th the general use of litanies in every month of the year decreed of old, is made special for Spain in these terms: "Ut deinceps per totum annum in cunctis duodecim mensibus, per universæ Hispaniæ et Galliarum provincias, pro statu ecclesiæ Dei, pro incolumitate principis nostri atque salvatione populi, et indulgentiâ totius peccati, et a cunctorum fidelium cordibus expulsione diaboli, exomologesis votis gliscentibus celebretur. . . ." with which St. Isidore, de Etym. vi. c. 75–81, may be profitably compared. The heading of the 8th is De Judaeorum damnatione. The usual confirmation of these canons by the king follows; but there are no subscriptions to them (Mansi, xii. 93–108).

(18) A.D. 701. — But there is no earlier authority for it than that of Roderic, archbishop of Toledo in the 13th century; who merely mentions it to add, tamen in corpore canonum non habetur, without giving any particulars of it himself (Mansi, xii. 163–164). After this there is but one more real or conjectural council of Toledo till A.D. 1086, at the earliest, and this is vaguely called by most a "council of Spain;" but as it had Elipandus of Toledo for its president, Mansi thinks it may have been held in his metropolis. The date assigned to it by him is A.D. 793, and it is said to have declared in favour of the views of its president on Adoptionism, and to have defended them by testimonies from the fathers in a synodical epistle addressed to the bishops of France, subsequently refuted at Frankfort (Mansi, xiii. 857–858). TOLERATION, EDICT OF [MARTYR, p. 1125].

TOMBS, TOMBSTONES. From the earliest times the bodies of Christians were interred in places open to the sky (CEMETERY) and in subterranean burial-places[a] (CATACOMBS). The forms and arrangements of the tombs in the catacombs of Rome and also of Naples are sufficiently described in the latter article. Those in the catacombs of Syracuse, Taormina, Malta, Canopus, and Alexandria,[b] are likewise alluded to and hardly require further mention here.[c] In the following article an endeavour will be made briefly to notice—

(A) Various kinds of tombs, excluding those mentioned above, found in different countries.[d]

(B) Objects found therein.

(C) Select sepulchral inscriptions of all kinds, wherever found.

[a] M. de Rossi (Rom. Sott. Crist. t. i. p. 87, Rom. 1864) announces his preparation for a general work on Christian tombs of both these classes. This most important work has not yet appeared, so far as the writer is aware.

[b] Christian catacombs occur also in Milo (Melos), in which vermilion inscriptions, probably of the 4th century, as well as a small stèle, have been found. (Böckh, C. I. G., nos. 9288–9290.)

[c] It should perhaps just be mentioned that in countries where catacombs were unknown, some few sepulchral chambers have been discovered underground. De Rossi mentions one found at Rheims in 1738, adorned with pictures, which have perished; and another at the same place which was found and destroyed in 1817 (Rom. Sott. t. i. p. 100): see also Le Blant (Manuel, c. ix.) for a subterranean chamber at Montmartre, under a martyrium. In Palestine, again, we have an example of the same sort; a subterranean chamber thirty feet long, twelve wide, and eight high was discovered in 1854 near Saida (Sidon). On the interior of its whited walls various figures were drawn in red, and an inscription was written all round below their upper edge, which recorded that the chamber was made "for the memory and the repose of Anarbas and his brother John;" with two passages quoted from Ps. xxiii. and 1 Cor. xv. The date also given in the inscription is rather mutilated, but probably corresponds to A.D. 642 (Böckh, C. I. G., no. 9153).

[d] Inscriptions in connexion with the particular tombs mentioned are included under this section.

It may be advisable, however, to make a few preliminary remarks.

The ancient Roman laws of the twelve tables and those of imperial times, from Hadrian to Diocletian, strictly forbade burials to take place in Rome and in cities generally (see the laws quoted by Bingham, Antiq. XXIII. i. § 2). The Christians do not appear ever to have been charged with transgressing these laws, but rather objected the transgression of them to the heathen. It must consequently follow that we cannot expect to find tombs in city churches or in any grounds contiguous to them during the first three centuries. [CHURCHYARDS.] There is, in fact, as yet no literary or archaeological evidence to shew that any Christian burial took place in a church, or that any sepulchral monument was placed in or even near to a church before the death of Constantine (Bingham, u. s.; Muratori, Anecd. t. i., Dissert. xvii. pp. 185–189).[e]

Neither does there appear to be a single well-authenticated instance of any burial, nor of any tomb properly so called, in any city whatever during the same period. For although it is stated by Eusebius, following Hegesippus (Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. c. 23), that James the Just, the brother of our Lord, had a tombstone (στήλη)[f] erected to him close by the Temple at Jerusalem, on the spot where he was martyred, yet it is far more probable that he was buried on the Mount of Olives, at no great distance indeed, but outside the city walls. This was the opinion of others mentioned by St. Jerome (lib. de Vir. Ill. c. 2); and it appears from the Gospels that it was the custom of the Jews to bury outside the precincts of cities. (Luke vii. 12; John xix. 42; coll. Heb. xiii. 12.)

For these three centuries we have very few sepulchral monuments remaining, with the exception of those in the Roman catacombs, though

[e] De Rossi's work on the Roman inscriptions of the first six centuries shews no sepulchral slab placed, or presumed to have been ever placed, in a church or basilica during the first three centuries. There are, however, many epitaphs of the 4th century now or lately to be seen in Roman churches or basilicas, but very few can be counted upon as being in their original sites. One in marble slab was found adhering to its sepulchre on the pavement of the basilica of St. Alexander on the Via Nomentana (A.D. 396), and another (A.D. 402) on that of the subterranean basilica of St. Hermes (De Rossi, Nos. 438, 507). Some appear to have been taken from the catacombs (see Nos. 80, 153, 182, 186, 221); but De Rossi considers that this is not the case with others (Nos. 149, 184). The greatest number have occurred in the pavement of the basilica of St. Paul on the Via Ostiensis; it was built, according to Hübsch, A.D. 386, but some of the slabs bear earlier dates, the earliest being A.D. 345 (see Nos. 88, 98, 204, 209, 246, 316, 371), consequently the slabs have been moved from their original sites. This may also have been the case in many other instances.

An early example of a burial in an African basilica will be found in the mosaic of Reparatus, A.D. 475 (see below).

Slabs beautifully decorated with foliage, flowers, etc. occur in the church of Briord, A.D. 487 (Le Blant, no. 379, pl. 43), and in the nave of the cathedral of Vaison, A.D. 515 (Le Blant, no. 492, pl. 66).

[f] For the form of the στήλη see Dict. Gr. and Rom. Ant. s. v. "Funus;" but the word appears to be used somewhat vaguely.

there is abundant evidence that open-air burial-places of various kinds were then in use in many parts of the Christian world. Many of these monuments were doubtless destroyed during the times of persecution (Euseb. H. E. viii. 6). Even of the few which remain some appear to be restorations made in the time of the peace of the church. De Rossi thinks that the celebrated Autun inscription (see Vol. I. p. 806) is one of these. That of Caesarea in Mauretania (Vol. I. p. 848) is unquestionably so. (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. t. i. § iii. I Cemeteri sopra terra.)

At Rome, and indeed everywhere else for several centuries,[g] many tombs, among which some were Christian, were erected in the suburbs by the sides of the principal roads leading into the city. Thus according to Sidonius Apollinaris (Epist. i. 5, ed. Sirm.) the burial-place of St. Peter was outside the walls of Rome, a church being still, in his time (A.D. 470), standing over it. St. Jerome says that that apostle was buried in the Via Triumphalis beyond the Tiber, and that St. Paul was buried in the Via Ostiensis, three miles without the gates of the city (u. s. c. 1 and c. 5). Caius, a presbyter of the church of Rome, about the year 210, speaks of these tombs as "the trophies of the apostles" (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. ii. 25). They were removed about the year 258 into the catacombs, lest some indignity might be offered to them at that time of persecution (Dep. Mart. ap. Pearson, Annal. Cyprian. p. 62). The very fact of their removal shews that they could not have been of very considerable size. They may probably have been cippi bearing inscriptions. Some other monuments belonging to open-air burial-places in the neighbourhood of Rome, which have come down to our times, will be noticed below under Italy.

"Quum antiquitus," says Onuphrius Panvinius (Rit. Sep. Mort. c. vii. ed. Col. 1568), "tantum extra urbem in coemiteriis hominum corpora sepelirentur, pace ecclesiae data intra urbes ad templorum limina, postea in ipsis templis sepeliri mos invaluit." He then gives many examples of burials in or close to churches, which we proceed to cite: the emperor Constantine was buried in the porch of the temple of the apostles at Constantinople, and this is probably the earliest known example of the kind; the emperor Honorius was laid in the porch of St. Peter's church at Rome, and his espoused wife Maria inside the same church; Rotharis, king of the Lombards, was buried in the church of St. John the Baptist at Pavia; king Clotharius in the basilica of St. Vincentius at Paris; Brunichildis, queen of the Franks, in the church of St. Martin at Autun; Charles Martel and his son Pepin in the church of St. Denis at Paris; Charlemagne in the church of St. Mary at Aachen, where a large tombstone bearing his name only, CAROLO MAGNO, is still to be seen. Pope Leo the Great, and many popes after him, were buried in St. Peter's at Rome; St. Benedict, abbot of Casino, in the basilica of St. John the Baptist. But of the character of their tombs, which were probably in most cases of great magnificence, we are unable, with scarcely an exception, to say anything. It may be suspected that some of them were marble sarcophagi, placed either above the ground or possibly below it, of which we have many fine Christian examples yet remaining from the 4th century downwards, more or less elaborately sculptured. [SCULPTURE.] Notwithstanding the examples above named, and some others which might be mentioned [CUBICULUM; OBSEQUIES OF THE DEAD, § xiv.], there were several laws of emperors of the 4th and following centuries, and several canons of councils from the 6th century onwards, down to the Council of Mentz in the time of Charlemagne, which distinctly prohibited burials in churches, this last council, however, making certain exceptions (Gretser, de Fun. Christ. ii. 8; Bingham, XXIII. i. §§ 4, 6, 7, 8). There is no doubt that about this time many persons considered it advantageous to their souls to be buried in churches, and Gregory the Great in the 6th century sanctions this opinion. "When heavy sins do not press men down, it is profitable for the dead if they be buried in churches, because their friends, as often as they come thither, remember those whose sepulchres they behold, and offer prayers to the Lord for them" (Dial. lib. iv. c. 50). In spite of this opinion in its favour prohibitions continued to be made not only, as has been said, down to the time of Charlemagne's death, but also as late as A.D. 1076, when a council of Winchester under Lanfranc laid down in its ninth canon that "In ecclesiis corpora defunctorum non sepeliantur." Nor was it until the time of Boniface VIII., about the close of the 13th century, that it was spoken of as a customary thing for men to be buried in a church where their ancestors lay. From his decretals, as Bingham thinks, "may be dated the ruin of the old laws" (u. s. § 9).[h]

In what follows little will be said of any tombs which do not now exist, or have not lately been in existence.

(A) General Character of Christian Tombs, exclusive of Catacombs, in various Countries.

ITALY.—Christian tombs of a very early period have been found above ground in Tusculum and elsewhere in the neighbourhood of Rome. De Rossi (Bull. di Arch. Crist. for 1872) has a memoir entitled Il Tusculo, le Ville Tusculane e [g] πᾶσα πόλις, καὶ πᾶσα κώμη πρὸ τῶν εἰσόδων τάφους ἔχει (Pseudo-Chrysost. de Fide et Lege Nat. t. i. p. 829, ed. Bened.).

[h] Muratori (u. s. p. 188) holds a brief to shew that burials in churches, in country places at least, had never been regarded as unlawful, and explains away the church canons and imperial laws above referred to as merely designed to prevent overcrowded burials in churches: "quia nimis in aedibus sacris tumulorum cadaverumque moles augebantur, ut propterea coercendi, ex parte fuerint Christiani." But, to say nothing of the fact that the laws and councils make no distinction between town and country churches, the Council of Braga in Spain, about A.D. 563, expressly assigns a very different reason for the prohibition (see can. 18, quoted in OBSEQUIES OF THE DEAD, § xvi.). The principal passages on which Muratori relies are from Paulinus (both quoted in CUBICULA) and from St. Ambrose, who desired to be and was buried under the altar in the basilica which he had built at Milan. "Dignum est enim ut ibi requiescat sacerdos, ubi offerre consuerit." (Orat. in SS. Gerv. et Prot. The true reference is to Epist. xxii. p. 877, ed. Bened.) None of his authorities are earlier than the end of the 4th century.

le loro antiche memorie Cristiane, in which he says that he was desirous to find a cippus which had been transcribed by Fabretti, and had been seen many years later, not bearing the patera and simpulum so frequent on pagan cippi, but two anchors, symbolical of Christian hope, a device found on the tombs of the Catacombs. It runs thus: Cl. Irenico | filio dulcis | simo cl. Eety | ches avs et cl. Po | thumenvs pa | ter et Decia Rv | fina mater fecervnt (p. 98). It had been found at Ciampino, in the vicinity of Tusculum. The account of his successful exploration is very interesting (pp. 99, 100).

De Rossi is acquainted with only one other cippus bearing the Christian symbol of the anchor. It seems now to be known merely by the description contained in a MS. of the Vatican (6039, f. 252 verso): Cippus in hortulis S. Sebastiani extra muros P. V. (Petrus Victorius) scripsit. It reads: Marcellae | sanctissi | mae femin | ae Alvmni | anvs frate | r. Below which are two anchors, that on the left being reversed. "The cippus form of the monument," remarks De Rossi (u. s. p. 99), "if, according to all ordinary rules, it excludes a subterranean origin, does not necessarily exclude its Christianity, because we know that Christian sepulchres still exist above ground which are in the form of cippi" (Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1864, pp. 25–32).

But besides isolated tombs in fields or vineyards or by the sides of the public ways, we have in the suburbs of Rome several cemeteries around basilicas which were apparently executed about the 4th century. De Rossi has observed traces of such in various states of preservation in the field above the cemetery of St. Callistus, and in the Agro Verano above that of St. Cyriaca, and in other places. He describes at length and gives a figure of the necropolis above ground under which is the catacomb of St. Callistus (Rom. Sott. lib. iii. pp. 393 sqq. tav. xxxix.). It consists of an assemblage of deep oblong chambers of different dimensions formed by walls made of mixed tufa and brick, intersecting each other at right angles, the tops of which are on the level of the ground. The covers and the bottoms of these chambers were sometimes composed of marble or granite slabs, the lateral walls being left rough; within them bodies were placed one above another in different manners, which De Rossi describes. Sometimes they were only separated by a stone slab, sometimes the bodies were placed in distinct sarcophagi; eight or nine corpses were ordinarily placed one above another. It would appear that only a very few inscriptions, unimportant and undated, have hitherto been found; but the cemetery may be referred to the fourth or fifth century from the style of the work of its walls.[1] He also found above the crypts of St. Lucina a few chambers or fosses, not subdivided like these into horizontal planes and receiving the corpses in their empty spaces, but left open like a well and having loculi excavated in their sides, precisely as in the Catacombs (u. s. p. 404). He gives in fine an account, in the first volume of his Inscript. Christ. Urb. Rom. p. 108), of a cemetery attached to the Vatican basilica, which was accidentally discovered in the following manner. On September 6, 1689, a horse trod upon and broke the stone which covered the opening to the graves below. Beneath was found a white marble sarcophagus, between seven and eight feet long, three feet broad and three feet deep, composed of several pieces joined by mortar; the body, placed therein on its back, was swathed and embalmed. Below this, divided from it by a partition about nine inches thick, was discovered another coffin of the same size and with similar contents. On the inside of the lid of the latter was found an inscription, whose date corresponds with A.D. 369. Other coffins again were discovered below this, but the excavations were not thoroughly carried out. The stone, as frequently happens, was broken in pieces and part of it built into a wall. De Rossi describes the whole inscription from Ciampini, and indicates by his plate the small portion still surviving (see his no. 211, p. 108). He also gives (Rom. Sott. t. i. p. [illegible] gram illustrating this mode of sepulture. Coffins thus placed one above another in strata have not, so far as De Rossi is aware, been observed in Africa, or in Upper Italy or in France, or in any other country where subterranean cemeteries were unknown.[2] The arrangement indeed is substantially the same as that which is adopted in the catacombs of Rome [CATACOMBS, in Vol. I. p. 313].

Some very singular tombs have been found in the north of Italy, at Brescia, Verona, and especially at Milan, below the floor of the basilica of Fausta. Contrary to the rule which obtains in the Roman catacombs, the tombs are decorated with paintings in the interior; they are constructed of masonry, and their narrow walls are adorned on the inside with images and symbols traced in colours. They have been assigned to the ages of persecution, but although this opinion can hardly be maintained, their style is in all likelihood a survival from the times when it was dangerous to allow signs of Christianity to be seen outwardly (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. t. i. pp. 100–101, and references).

A few words should be said in conclusion of the two principal forms of the sarcophagus which are found in Italy, and also in other countries: (1) the oblong chest or coffin type, with flat lid; the ends are generally square (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. tom. i. tav. xxx., two examples—one sarcophagus is quite plain; the other slightly ornamented) or more rarely rounded (D'Agincourt, Hist. de l'Art, Sculpture, pl. iv. nos. 2 and 3, both sculptured); (2) the cottage type (a capanna of the Italian antiquaries), with lid like a roof, (Le Blant, Inscr. Chrét. Gaule, pl. 78, quite plain); the roof ridge is sometimes truncated to admit of an inscription being placed thereon (Le Blant, u. s. pl. 22, no. 139, nearly plain; D'Agin court, u. s. pl. iv., sculpture 1), instead of being written on the end (Le Blant, u. s. pl. 69) or on the side (Böckh, C. I. G. no. 9163, pl. xv.). The base of the triangular end of the lid is sometimes ornamented with acroteria, like a temple. (Böckh, u. s.) The chest and lid may each be of a single stone, or of many; bricks and tiles were also used in the construction of the meaner sort. See various examples of sarcophagi given in SCULPTURE.

[1] With this necropolis De Rossi compares a very perfect example of an above-ground cemetery which has lately been found at Portogruaro, the ancient Julia Concordia, in Venetia, the excavations of which had not in 1877 been completed. Sarcophagi lie on the surface of the ground, and the inscriptions at present discovered appear to be of the fourth century. For some account of it see De Rossi (Bull. 1873, pp. 80–82; and for 1874, p. 133 sqq. tav. ix. and Rom. Sott. (1877), tom. iii. p. 395).

[2] He mentions, however, as an exception, the disposition of the sarcophagi in the church of Vienne. St. Gervais furnishes another exception. (For both these see below.) Still he thinks it not improbable that this mode of burial may have been introduced into other parts of the Roman Christian world.

FRANCE.—After Italy this is the country which most abounds with Christian sepulchral stones and slabs. But of those which are preserved comparatively few tell their full story. The circumstances under which they were found are frequently unknown. M. Le Blant, partly by his own observations and partly by examinations of books and figures, comes to the conclusion that there were three forms of Christian burial in ancient Gaul accompanied by inscriptions. (1) Isolated tombs; (2) cemeteries, where the tombs were either below the surface of the ground, or resting on the soil; or (3) tombs clustered about sanctuaries of saints, or placed in churches (Manuel, pp. 144, 145). Of each of these one or two examples shall now be adduced. It must be borne in mind that no Christian sepulchral inscription of Gaul whose date is known is earlier than the 4th century.

(1) Isolated Tombs.—An example of this isolation was to be seen in the monument of Adelphius, at Sainte-Croix-du-Mont. The date is A.D. 405. It bears the following inscription:

Depositio Adelfi . . . . | anorem N. III mensivm | et tridvo P. C. Dom. ntri | Honori Avgusti | Sex a ☧ ω posvit | pater Maursvivs et Vrsa m | ? (mater ?).

It is now in the museum at Bordeaux (Le Blant, Ins. Chr. G. t. ii. p. 384, no. 591).

"Elle (l'inscription) était," says M. Jouannet, "encore en place il y a quelques années au pied des côteaux de Viole dans les vignes du Peyrat, près de la voie publique. Elle était encastrée sur la grande face d'un tombeau construit en moëllons à chaux et à sable, et qui renfermait encore un squelette" (quoted by Le Blant, u. s.).

It would appear probable that a considerable number of the smaller extant inscriptions on marble of square or oblong form have been let into the tombs or sarcophagi, or into the wall near them, both in France and in various other countries (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. t. i. pp. 95, 96).

Another and a very curious instance of an isolated tomb occurs near Charmes, which was visited in the 17th century, when Spon saw it, as the burial-place of a saint. The inscription is in elegiacs, and the name of the person buried, Alethius, is read in acrostic. It is singular that it contains no evidence of distinctly Christian feeling. The last line, which is prose, probably indicated the date of the consulate of Paulinus, A.D. 534, when the Franks invaded Burgundy, to which allusion seems to be made in line seven. The lid of the sarcophagus, containing the inscription enclosed in a label of a common form, is figured by Le Blant (u. s. p. 196, pl. 64, no. 391), and he says that the form of the sarcophagus is exactly like one given by M. de Boissieu (Inscr. Ant. de Lyon, no. cvii. p. 524).

The epitaph runs thus:

Aevi ingens genvs egresivm atq ordine princeps
Lvgdvni procervm nobile consilivm
Exacto vitae transcendit ad aethera cvrsv
Ter . . . avm tvmvlo dans animam svperis

If the last distich is rightly restored the initial letters C V will probably stand, as M. Léon Renier thinks, for Clarissimus Vir; his proper title seems to be required.

(2) Cemeteries.

(a) Where the earth received the sepultures.—At St. Gervais a cemetery was discovered not many years ago, in making a cutting for the Vienne railroad. A great part of the inscriptions found therein are supposed by M. Le Blant to belong to the 5th century. Among the sarcophagi some were made out of one block, but the majority were composed of tiles and old fragments; in several instances the tombs had been placed one above another, and some corpses had been deposited between their lateral walls. With the exception of one which faced the south, they were regularly turned towards the east, after the usual Christian manner. Although the cemetery had never been violated, none of the epitaphs were placed symmetrically; they were found as it were thrown hap-hazard (comme jetées par hasard) upon the tombs, or in the inside or near them. A hasty sketch, by M. Girard, shews the irregular disposition of the tombs (Le Blant, u. s. tom. ii. pp. 52–53, with a figure).

Recent excavations in an ancient cemetery of the church of St. Jean-des-Vignes, near Châlons-sur-Saône, have revealed sarcophagi of free-stone (grès) placed one above another two or three deep. They are supposed to be of the Merovingian age (Le Blant, u. s. t. ii. pp. 543–4).

At Lyons, in 1731, in making a trench for laying down pipes, a cemetery was discovered which served at once for Christian and pagan burials. The excavations were not pursued further than was necessary for making the conduit. Of the inscribed stones which turned up by chance the greater number were dated, and among them was found the earliest dated inscription yet discovered in France, being of A.D. 334 (Le Blant, u. s. t. i. p. 139, no. 62; and Manuel, pp. 211, 212).

The inscription was sometimes written in the inside of the sarcophagus, on a slab forming its bottom. Two such were found at Briord, one being made of stones and bricks, the other having its sides and lid composed of tiles and undressed fragments (non-tailles). They are at least as early as the beginning of the sixth century (Le Blant, u. s. t. ii. p. ?, no. 374; also p. 20, no. 381).

(b) Where the Sarcophagi were resting on the Soil.—Such occur at Aliscamps, near Arles, in great numbers. Le Blant (Manuel, p. 145) observes that the mass of tombs here struck the eyes of Dante and Ariosto with ornament. (Inf. ix. 112, 115; Orl. Fur. xxxix. st. 72.)

Le Blant mentions an inscription engraved "sur le versant du couvercle d'un sarcophage de pierre." This cover, in form of a roof, is also marked with a cross pattée rudely traced with the point (u. s. t. ii. p. 271, no. 535). It is undated. Another inscription from the same place belongs to A.D. 541 (Le Blant, u. s. p. 272, no. 537). De Rossi also mentions having seen at Aliscamps coffins of calcareous stone with covers of the same shape incised with the chrisma and various forms of crosses, as well as lead coffins to contain the body (Rom. Sott. t. i. p. 95). When Mr. Fairholt visited Aliscamps in 1856, he remarked that, in spite of the numbers of sarcophagi that have been carried thence, hundreds still remain; and that for nearly a mile, as the visitor walks from Arles to the old church, he passes between rows of Roman tombs lying three and four deep on each side of him. The best tombs have been carried to the museums; a few of those that remain have sculptured inscriptions; some bear the insignia of the profession of the dead which they contained, as where the carpenter's adze and the mason's plumb and line appear; but the larger number have the Christian monogram only. A sketch of the general appearance of a part of the cemetery is given (C. R. Smith's Collect. Ant. vol. v. pp. 43, 44).

At Sivaux coffins or sarcophagi, engraved with a cross or chrisma and bearing a simple name, have been found on an old burying-ground (champ de sépulture). They seem to be of the 6th century, or thereabouts, and among them are some which appear to be pagan (Le Blant, u. s. t. ii. pp. 357–359; nos. 576 A–576 B). Some of the monuments of Aliscamps and of Sivaux have been drawn by Beauméné, but not very correctly (Le Blant, u. s. t. i. p. 25).

(3) Burials in Churches and Sanctuaries.—From the apse to the middle of the nave of the ancient church of St. Peter of Vienne have been found beneath the surface an important series of Christian tombs, and more recently others reaching down to the threshold between the church and the porch. Towards the altar, where the relics of the martyrs were preserved, they were more numerous, and in the choir were two or three deep; but not so near the entrance. The coffins had been old pagan sarcophagi, or made out of the débris of ancient buildings. The inscriptions, mostly cut in marble, have often been let into the stone which re-covered the tombs (Le Blant, u. s. ii. p. 581; see also De Rossi, Rom. Sott. t. i. p. 95, and the reference). They belong, certainly in part, and probably all, to the 6th century. Among these broken relics was found a piece of the epitaph of Sylvia, wife of the patrician Celsus (A.D. 579), of which a complete copy exists in a MS. of the 9th century (Le Blant, u. s. p. 582, and Manuel, p. 219). A great number of Gaulish inscriptions shew that tombs were placed under the protection of the graves of martyrs (Le Blant, u. s. t. i. p. 397; see also his Manuel, pp. 146–148).

The tomb of Hilary, bishop of Arles, who died in 449, was formerly in a subterranean chapel of the church of St. Honoratus at that place. It is a sarcophagus of white marble, and the inscription is written on the triangular end of the lid. It is now preserved in the museum. It reads: Sacro | sanctae le | gis antestis | (followed by a leaf) Hilarius (between two doves) hic quiescit (preceded by chrisma, followed by vase) | (Le Blant, u. s. t. ii. p. 252, no. 515. pl. 69, no. 416). De Rossi remarks on the beauty of the marble sarcophagi with Christian sculptures, representing scenes of the Old and New Testaments, which are to be seen at Marseilles, Arles, Nismes, Avignon, and other cities in the south of France (u. s. p. 95).

Zacharias, third bishop of Lyons, in the beginning of the 3rd century, laid the first foundation of a cella known as the church of the Maccabees, and in after-times as the church of St. Justus. It was originally underground, being a kind of crypt which was carefully concealed from the knowledge of the pagans; therein were deposited the remains of the illustrious martyrs of Lyons, with St. Irenaeus at their head. In the ruins of this church were found in the year 1730 several Christian sepulchral slabs of marble belonging in part or entirely to the 5th century (Le Blant, u. s. t. i. pp. 39 sqq.). The two following are among the most important:—

(1) Flavivs Flori [nvs] | ex tribvnis qvi vixit | octoginta et | septim militavi (sic) ann. | trijinta et novem positv (sic) | est ad sanctos et pro | batvs annorvm decim | et octo hic commemo | ra [tio fit] santa in eclesia Lvgdvnensi a | i d Calendas Aug. (Le Blant, no. 41).

Date probably of the 5th century, the a i d (ante diem primum) for pridie being a formula of that age. (See Le Blant, u. s. p. 338.)

To Florinus, a tribune, buried beside the tombs of the saints or martyrs of Lyons; entered as a military probationer, when eighteen years of age; mentioned during divine service in the diptychs, or list of benefactors to the church.

This inscription is interesting as mentioning the military profession of a Christian. Others have been diligently collected by Le Blant (u. s.).

(2) In hvo loov (for hvno locvm) reqvievit Levcadia | deo sacrata pvella qui (sic) vitam | svam provt proposverat | gessit qvi vixit annos xvi tantvm | beatior in dno condedit mentem | pst consv Thevdosi xiii. The chrisma between two doves facing each other (Le Blant, no. 44).

Post consulatum Theodosii xiii. gives A.D. 430 for the date.

The qui twice occurring as feminine marks the transition to the French qui.

Le Blant's remarks on the three forms of Christian burial in France apply to sepulchres in France of an earlier date than the 8th century.

There is however another class of tombstones which he does not notice, belonging, in part at least, to a somewhat later time, but not altogether too late to be noticed in the present work. Le Men (in Revue Arch. vol. xxix. p. 89, for 1875) observes that at an ancient period, about the 8th, 9th, or 10th century, it was customary in Lower Brittany to mark the graves of important persons by a long stone set in the ground, having the form of a pyramid or truncated cone, often channelled from top to bottom, sometimes surmounted by a cross of stone, and frequently having a cross pattée incised on one face.[1] They rarely bore any inscription, but some few record the names of the deceased. They are very numerous in the departments of Morbihan and Finisterre. Messrs. Haddan and Stubbs (Councils, vol. ii. pp. 97, 98) give an account of some of these tombstones and inscriptions, one or two of which appear to be even as early as the 6th century; but they observe that they all "need sifting and careful examination to ascertain their real dates."

SPAIN.—A very large proportion of the sepulchral inscriptions now remaining have been removed from their original sites, and the circumstances under which they were found have not been recorded. It is probable, however, that the modes of interment which prevailed throughout the country were much the same as in France. All the three kinds mentioned by Le Blant occur here also. Thus, an isolated tomb of one Oppilianus was found in 1821 in an olive-yard in Villafranca de Cordoba. It was a sarcophagus constructed of stones, covered with a large marble slab, bearing an inscription in twelve lines, dated by the Spanish era 680, i.e. A.D. 642 (Hübner, Inscr. Christ. Hisp. p. 36, no. 123). A Christian cemetery was discovered near Asquerosa, about half a league from Pinos de la Puente (Ilurco). Full particulars of an inscribed slab brought thence, probably of the 5th or 6th century, are to be found in Hübner (u. s. no. 116). We have an example of a tomb placed in a sanctuary at Alcala del Rio (Ilipa), where there is an ornamental cippus erected in honour of bishop Gregory, A.D. 544. At the top is the chrisma, combined with the α and ω, enclosed in a circle. On either side are two quatrefoils, one above another. The inscription, which commences with the words "In hoc tvmvlo iacet," shews that the cippus was once placed in immediate connexion with the grave. It is now standing in the chapel, dedicated in the 15th century by king Ferdinand to this Gregory, which was probably erected on the same site as a more ancient chapel (Hübner, u. s. no. 60). Fine sarcophagi, sculptured with scriptural subjects, probably of the 5th or 6th century, have been found in the crypt of a ruined church at Saragossa (Hübner, u. s. no. 152).

GERMANY.—For the few notices of tombs which follow, we are indebted mostly to De Rossi. At Augsburg there is a sepulchral area or "hortus, quem dudum Afra comparaverat et in quo mausoleum sibi suisque esse decreverat," as a writer of the 15th century expresses it, perhaps following some more ancient authority. She lies buried in a sarcophagus of calcareous stone similar to those of Aliscamps. At the beginning of the present century her coffin was found to contain a plate of lead inscribed AFRA in good Roman uncial characters, but without any indication of Christianity. She and her companions suffered in the Diocletian persecution, according to Ruinart on August 7, A.D. 304. There are sarcophagi of the same kind without any inscription whatever at Cologne, in the crypt of St. Gereon and in the basilica of St. Ursula. At Trier likewise were found in the basilicas of SS. Paulinus and Matthias a large number of sarcophagi similar to those of Vienne, mentioned above (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. t. i. pp. 87, 95, 98, and the references). At the same place, as Le Blant observes, occurred a cemetery in which Christian and pagan tombs were mixed: on one of the former an inscribed tablet of white marble was let into a thick stone slab, which was placed against the side of the lid; this tomb was made in the form of a roof turned upside down (u. s. t. i. p. 380).

The ancient Franks, and perhaps the Germanic tribes generally, buried the dead in a wooden coffin (the nefus of their ancient laws, see Ducange, s. v.) or in a stone chest (petra), placing thereover small wooden structures covered with drapery (the aristato or staplum of the same laws, see Ducange, s. v.). The Christians adopted this usage; we read of corpses "pallis ac naufis exornata" (Greg. Turon. de Glor. Conf. c. 20); and from it our modern pall seems to have descended. Sometimes the structures of wood were larger (porticulus, atriolum, or basilica), and were of an oblong form, having four columns and being open on all sides; these also were used by the Christians. Wendelin in his Salic Glossary observes that up to the year 1000 almost all basilicas in Burgundy were made of wood (see Chiflet, Anast. Childr. Regis, pp. 78–80).

GREAT BRITAIN.—In the Celtic parts—that is to say, in Cornwall, Devonshire, Wales, and Scottish and English Cumbria—pillar-stones, generally very rudely formed, were erected over the graves of the deceased. They vary in height from about two feet and a half to twelve feet, the most usual height being about four or five feet or a little more; they are four-sided, for the most part of nearly the same breadth throughout their whole length, usually rounded at the top, but occasionally sloping from the base to a point or cut square (Hübner, Inscr. Brit. Christ. nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 10, 15, 18, 19, 30, 71, &c.; Berlin, 1876).[1] A great many of these bear no signs of Christianity, though they are presumed to be Christian by Hübner and others; but upon some few of them such signs are manifest in the chrisma (the only symbol save the cross which occurs), or in words, as Christianus, in pace, &c. It is exceedingly difficult to assign most of them to any particular period; some however are regarded as probably belonging to the 5th, while others are referred to various succeeding centuries. The inscriptions are mostly very short, often giving the name only, or "Here lies (hic jacet, more commonly ic jacit) such an one." In some cases the corpse was certainly buried under a heap of stones and the pillar placed at the top (Hübner, u. s. no. 136); such monuments were probably solitary. More usually the burials were in churchyards, or in cemeteries attached to religious houses, many pillar-stones having been found in such places or built into the walls of churches and priories (Hübner, u. s. passim). These rude cippi are often found not in situ, some having been converted into gate-posts (Hübner, u. s. nos. 14, 21, 102, 148), or used for stiles, or bridges, or door-sills (Hübner, u. s. nos. 17, 29, 101).

The number of Cornish pillar-stones bearing inscriptions falling within our period, whose Christianity can be counted upon, is extremely small. (See Hübner, u. s. nos. 1–22; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, vol. i. pp. 162 and 163.) In Devonshire there are no stones indubitably Christian bearing inscriptions; but stone crosses not inscribed, which are considered to be Christian, occur in several places here and in Cornwall.

In Wales, pillar-stones with Christian inscriptions are much more numerous. On one of them Paulinus is commemorated in two barbarous hexameters; he is presumed to be the bishop of that name who lived about the middle of the 6th century, and who taught St. David and St. Tilo at his college of Whitland. Another mentions Idnert, who is supposed to be the same as the last bishop of Llanbadarn in the first part of the 8th century (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, vol. i. pp. 164–169, 625).

In Scottish and English Cumbria there are very few inscribed tombstones whose Christianity is certain, but uninscribed crosses, some ornamented, have been found in churchyards in Cumberland, in Wigtonshire, and about Glasgow. At Kirkmadrine in Wigtonshire, however, there was in the old churchyard a stone bearing the chrisma on the upper part of both back and front. On the front the A ET ω is placed above the chrisma, which is enclosed in a circle, and below it, "Here lie the holy and principal priests, i.e. Viventius and Majorius." It is probable that it is of the 5th century, and commemorates priests connected with St. Ninian. This stone, and another bearing the chrisma and the name of Florentius, were lately used as gate-posts in the wall of the burying-ground (Hübner, u. s. nos. 205, 206; Haddan and Stubbs, u. s. vol. ii. pp. 51, 52).

The Bewcastle Cross. (Stephens.)

There are very few pillar-shaped monuments inscribed in the Anglo-Saxon language; one, apparently sepulchral, has been found near Camelford in Cornwall, but the meaning of the inscription has not been ascertained (Hübner, u. s. no. 16). The Saxon tombstones are principally of two kinds—stone crosses with long stem and short arms near the top, sometimes highly ornamented with interlacing patterns, &c., inscribed with Runes; or slabs bearing incised crosses very similar in style to the Irish (see below), and with Latin or Runic characters. Splendid Runic crosses have been erected to more than one of our early kings: one, now mutilated, to Oswin king of Deira, about A.D. 651, now reads only "After (to) Oswini, King;" it is at Collingham, Yorkshire. Another, at Bewcastle, Cumberland, was erected to king Alcfrith about A.D. 670. The top and both arms of the cross have been broken off; its present height is fourteen feet and a half, and it is conjectured to have been originally more than twenty feet high. Upon it are figures of John the Baptist with lamb, of the Saviour, and of another holding a bird (hawk?). On three of the four sides are vine-branches and grapes; two of these have also Runic inscriptions, as has also the fourth, where the figures are seen in relief. The longest inscription on this side tells us that this beacon (pillar) was erected by three persons named "after (to) Alcfrith, some time king and son of Oswy." The last sentence, to which a cross is prefixed, is "Pray for his soul's great sin." A third, the latest belonging to our period, is to Eadulf (A.D. 705), of which a small fragment only remains. It appears to read: "This is King Eadulf's grave; pray for his soul. Myrcfah made me, Hludwyg inscribed me" (see Stephens' Runic Monuments, pp. 390, 398, 461). A more humble, but better preserved cross than any of the foregoing, was found at Lancaster in a churchyard by some men who were digging a grave. Its date is supposed to lie between 600 and 700, and it reads in Runes: "Pray for Cynibalth; God bless him." A fragment of another cross, about A.D. 700, to Hroetberht, found at Falstone Northumberland, has a Saxon inscription written twice, in Runic and also in Roman characters; and a small piece of a cross found at Dewsbury in Yorkshire bears a Saxon inscription, written in Roman characters; it probably belongs to the 7th or 8th century. (See fig. p. 1987.) Both inscriptions request prayers for the soul of the dead (Stephens, u. s. pp. 375, 456, 464).

Sarcophagi were not unknown to the Anglo-Saxons;[m] one of the capanna type, bearing a Greek cross on the side of one end, was found at Dewsbury (Fosbroke, Encycl. of Ant. vol. i. p. 132, with fig. from Gent. Mag. 1836, ii. p. 38). The lid of another, rounded at both ends, and bearing a peculiarly formed cross, on which is inscribed in Runes, Kitil Urna lieth here, was discovered at Dover (Stephens, u. s. p. 465).

At Hartlepool, in Durham, was found in July, 1833, the cemetery which belonged to the ancient church of St. Hilda. Several small slabs (cent. 7?), some with Runes and some with Latin inscriptions, were dug up about one hundred and thirty yards distant from the church. They bore crosses, with or without A and ω, and either the name of the dead only, or with the addition of a request for prayer on his behalf. Some are said to have been found three feet and a half below the surface of the soil, each like a pillow under the head of a skeleton placed north and south. The largest of these was only a foot square, the smallest seven and a half by five and a half inches. Bede (Lib. iv. c. 11) mentions that the Saxons sometimes buried the dead in stone coffins, and may perhaps allude to a pillow-stone in his account of the burial of Sebbi, king of the East Saxons (Stephens, u. s. pp. 392–397). It is strange, if true, that stones inscribed "Pray for such a one," should be originally placed underground.[n]

Saxon tombstones with Latin inscriptions have occurred in various parts of England, mostly in Yorkshire. On two fragments, perhaps pieces of a cross, we have the name of Aedilburga, abbess of Hackness; on both pieces prayers are invoked for her repose. They are of the beginning of the 8th century (Hübner, u. s. nos. 182, 183). For the remaining tombstones it must be sufficient to refer to Hübner (pp. 61–73).

IRELAND.—A small number of four-sided pillars have been found in ancient Irish cemeteries, which are of the same general character as those of Wales and other parts of Great Britain. Most of these have been found in the county of Kerry; they bear incised crosses, which are sometimes accompanied by the letters DNS, DNI, DNO, for Dominus, Domini, Domino.[o] Dr. Petrie considered that they were "unquestionably of the 5th, or, at the latest, of the 6th century" (Stokes, Irish Christ. Inscr. vol. ii. p. 6). Other square pillars, bearing crosses of various forms, have been found at Killpeacan (now Puckawn), in the county of Tipperary, standing close together near the ruins of an old church.[p] These last bear every appearance of being sepulchral. Some of those of Kerry, in Miss Stokes's opinion, viz. those bearing letters as above, do not appear to have been sepulchral, but were rather signs set up as terminal crosses to mark the boundaries of the sanctuary (u. s. vol. ii. p. 133). There is a fine quadrangular pillar-stone at Killnasaggart in the county of Armagh, which certainly seems, from the inscription, to have been erected for the latter purpose (cf. the Whithorn Inscription, Hübner, u. s. no. 207).

By much the greater number of sepulchral monuments consist of flat slabs, which have been sometimes found in situ. The earliest which can be approximately dated are of the 7th century, and there are others of the 8th and of the 9th. There is little doubt that they were

[m] For two Roman sarcophagi in England, presumed to be Christian, see SCULPTURE.

[n] May not these little slabs have originally been set in sarcophagi above ground, or in the walls or floor of the monastery? Similar small slabs have been found in the catacombs of Rome (Stephens, u. s. p. 394, from Burgon).

[o] The letters DNS are inscribed on one side of an ornamented cross in the churchyard at Nevern in Pembrokeshire; it is supposed to be of the 8th century. The letters on the other side, ANHEH (?), have not been explained (Hübner, u. s. no. 103).

[p] At Killeen Cormac, in the county of Kildare, there is a cemetery about the ruins of a very ancient church which was on the summit of a mound. "Pillar stones," says Dr. S. Ferguson, "fragments of crosses, and the débris of the walls, which formerly supported the terraces, give an appearance of singularity and antiquity to the place which it is difficult to describe." A sketch accompanies this notice in Stokes, u. s. vol. ii. p. 2, but it does not clearly appear whether the pillar-stones bear crosses or not; one of them has an Ogham inscription, with no certain mark of Christianity.

always laid flat upon the surface of the soil, or in the floor of a church or other sacred building over the body of the deceased. The brief request which most of them contain to pray for the deceased seems to shew that they could not have been buried along with the corpse, but must have been visible to the eye. The greater part of them have been broken, so that it is impossible to ascertain the dimensions accurately. A few are nearly perfect, and their dimensions are approximately as follows:—27 inches by 20 (vol. i. pl. xviii. fig. 47); 32 inches by 18 (pl. xix. fig. 49); 40 inches by 20 (pl. xliii. fig. 108); 58 inches by 20 (vol. ii. pl. xv. fig. 30); 33 inches by 12 (pl. xvi. fig. 34). The great ancient cemetery of Ireland was at Clonmacnois, or Cluain, in King's County, and princes and nobles desired to be buried there for the sake of the intercession of the patron saint Ciaran, who built the monastery at that place about the year 544. An ancient Irish poem speaks of men "sleeping under the flags of Cluain." Many of these flags of fine work have been met with in digging graves and during recent excavations (Stokes, u. s. vol. i. pp. 4, 5). Another singularly beautiful stone, probably of about the 9th century, the time "when Irish art was at the highest point, still lies half-buried in grass in the churchyard of Durrow" in the same county (Stokes, u. s. vol. ii. p. 57). At Termonfechin, near Drogheda, in the county of Louth, a native stone was found in the clay floor of the church when it was excavated about ten years ago. It bears a Greek cross, and a very early Celtic inscription, entreating prayers for two persons named, "who made the stone fort" (Stokes, u. s. vol. ii. p. 70). Some sepulchral stones were discovered in a church of the 12th century at Mona-incha in the county of Tipperary, which appear to be greatly older than the building itself, and may have been laid on the floor of an earlier structure on the site (Stokes, u. s. vol. ii. pp. 35–37). Miss Stokes remarks that "while the standing crosses" (none earlier than the 10th century, as it would appear) "throughout Ireland are much alike, there is a marked dissimilarity in the sepulchral slabs found in the different ancient burial-grounds throughout the country" (Stokes, u. s. vol. i. p. 8). These were, in perhaps every instance, marked with a cross of some kind. Sometimes a simple Greek cross precedes a proper name, as that of Colman at Clonmacnois, who died A.D. 661. The Ogham following the name answers to the Irish word bocht, i.e. poor (Stokes, u. s. vol. i. p. 16). Sometimes an ornamented Greek cross has a circle about the centre, and each arm is terminated by a semicircle, as that of Colomban, who died A.D. 628 (Stokes, u. s. vol. i. pp. 15, 16, pl. i. fig. 3; see also Vol. I. p. 847). But the peculiarly Irish form is the Latin cross having a circle about the centre, of which the earliest dated example is seen on the slab of Cuindless at Clonmacnois; he died A.D. 724 (Stokes, u. s. vol. i. p. 18). Crosses, both Greek and Latin, are sometimes enclosed in parallelograms. For the various details of ornamentation, see Stokes, u. s. vol. ii. pp. 138–146.

Respecting the tombs of other countries, a very few words must suffice. In most of them they appear to be of much the same general character as those which have been already mentioned. There are cippi in Egypt (Boeckh, no. 9131), in Asia Minor (id. no. 9165), as well as in Greece and the adjacent islands (id. no. 9311 sqq. nos. 9292, 9299). Sarcophagi appear to have been general throughout Asia Minor (id. nos. 9206, 9264, 9283), and have been found in considerable numbers in the cemeteries of Corycus in Cilicia (id. no. 9163, with fig., sqq.). They occur also in Africa, one sculptured with the Good Shepherd between sheep (Renier, Inscr. Rom. de l'Algérie, nos. 2293, 4031).

It is curious to observe that the columns of the peristyle of the Parthenon have been converted, so to say, into Christian tombstones. Upon them are inscribed in situ a great number of Christian epitaphs, the earliest of which appear to be of the 7th and 8th centuries, while they go down as low as the 14th (id. nos. 9350–9421). Their genuineness, however, has been denied (Ritter, de. Comp. Tit. Christ. p. 2).

Cemeteries were attached to churches or monasteries in Nubia (id. no. 9122) and in Asia Minor (id. nos. 9249, 9268).[q] Burials in churches perhaps occurred at Constantinople and in Thessaly (id. 9447, 9424),[r] but appear to have been rare throughout the East generally, at all events in early times.

Tombs excavated in rocks occur at Jerusalem and elsewhere. On the side of the mountain called the Hill of Offence facing Mount Zion, a series of subterranean chambers have been cut out, each containing one or more repositories for the dead, carved in the rock of the sides of those chambers. M. Clermont Ganneau has lately discovered here several small sarcophagi, or rather ossuary chests, some bearing Hebrew and some Greek inscriptions, in which the name of the deceased is accompanied by a cross; the he thinks, are almost coeval with Christianity in Palestine (De Rossi, Bull. 1874, pp. 155–158; Quart. Statem. Pal. Expl. Fund, 1874). Over the entrance of some of the sepulchres are Greek inscriptions, to which crosses are usually prefixed. One of these is over the door of the chamber appropriated to Jeremiah, a monk of the monastery of The (id. no. 9139). These tombs are without ornament, and are supposed to be earlier than some other sepulchres at no great distance from them at Aceldama. In some of these last, which may probably be of about the 4th or 5th century, are ancient paintings upon the sides and roof of the chambers, representing the apostles and others with nimbi about their heads (Clarke's Travels, vol. ii. pp. 549–571; Boeckh, u. s. pp. 441–443). Sepulchral caves occur also in North Syria (Boeckh, u. s. no. 9102), in various parts of Asia Minor (id. nos. 9211, 9259), and in Malta (no. 9450).[a]

We have said nothing of certain architectural monuments of a sepulchral character erected in memory of Christian princes, such as the tomb of the empress Helena outside Rome, the mausoleum at Rome of Constantia, a daughter of the emperor Constantine, both circular buildings with domes; of the cruciform funeral chapel of Galla Placidia at Ravenna, or of the splendid mausoleum of Theodoric the Great at the same place: for these see CHAPEL, CHURCH, also the well-known works of Hübsch, Quast and Fergusson, where figures will be found. The ruins of a very few others still survive. One known as the mausoleum of St. Soteris, of circular form and of gigantic size, stands beside the Appian Way, not far from the above-ground cemetery of St. Callistus (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. tom. i. tav. I; tom. iii. p. 465). Another, which De Rossi considers to belong to the martyr Tibertius and other companions of St. Cecilia, is to be seen above the cemetery of Praetextatus; it is of hexagonal form and having six apses (De Rossi, u. s. p. 501). He points out that a martyrium described by St. Gregory Nyssen was of octagonal form surmounted by a dome (u. s. pp. 459–472). It can hardly be doubted that many more Christian sepulchral monuments of an architectural character have perished. There are several imperial laws of the 4th and 5th centuries (for which see Bingham, XXIII. c. 4) directed against the violation of tombs in general; one of Constans condemns the abstraction of columns and marbles, and another of Constantius the transferring of the materials of sepulchral buildings to private houses. These laws were issued to protect such sepulchres without religious distinction, and rich Christians spared no expense in the erection of these edifices; see the passage from St. Basil quoted above.

B. Objects found in Tombs.

The Christians, in common with their heathen neighbours, were in the habit of placing a variety of objects in the tombs of their departed friends. A Christian motive is sometimes evident in their selection, although for the most part it has not been influenced by any such consideration. Many of them have been already incidentally mentioned [OBSEQUIES OF THE DEAD, p. 1433]; a variety of personal ornaments and articles of the toilet are amongst the objects most commonly found. The waste to which the custom thus placing gold and silver ornaments led became indeed everywhere so excessive that an imperial edict, though not always enforced, was issued to check the custom. [BURIAL OF THE DEAD, Vol. I. p. 253.] The most remarkable example is the large marble coffin of the child Maria, who had been affianced to the emperor Honorius, which was placed in the Basilica of St. Peter of Rome; it was found, when it was opened in 1544, to contain an immense quantity of jewellery among many other things, as will be seen by the following epitome of its contents: a vest, cloak, &c., made of silk and cloth of gold, from which forty pounds of gold were extracted by melting; a large silver box containing many vases and articles in crystal, great and small, one in the shape of a nautilus fitted up with gold settings for a lamp; other vases and little animals in agate and in gold, little vessels of gold, a gold heart, gold buckles adorned with gems, rings and hoops of gold of various patterns, gold pendants, and perhaps the remains of a rattle (crepundia), crosses made of red and green gems, crosses of gold set with gems, earrings of precious stone, necklaces of gold and gems, gold bracelets, a gold pin bearing the names of Maria and Honorius, a silver pin and many fragments of precious stones, besides other articles. (Chiflet, Anast. Child. Regis, pp. 55, 56, quoting Surius; King, Gnostics, pp. 123–125, quoting Fanno; De Rossi, Bull. 1863, pp. 53 sqq.) With this may be compared the objects found in 1653 in the tomb of the pagan king Childeric at Tournai, enumerated by Chiflet (u. s. pp. 37–39, 188, 189). For the splendid contents of the Christian tombs of Helena, mother of Constantine, of Narses, duke of Italy (who died 568), of Clovis, and of Charlemagne, see Chiflet, u. s. pp. 59, 60, 91, and compare Archaeologia, vol. iii. pp. 389–80. So far as the Roman catacombs are concerned, these objects are enumerated under CATACOMBS, Vol. I. p. 314. See also Martigny, Dict. Ant. Chrét. under "Objets trouvés dans les Tombeaux Chrétiens," and De Rossi, Rom. Sott. t. iii. p. 305, for impressions of letters remaining in the exterior mortar of the loculi. They have also been found, though not in equal numbers in other countries, particularly in Gaul (Cochet, La Normandie Souterraine, passim and plates). Some of these occasionally bear Christian devices, more especially rings (see RINGS; GEMS). Fibulae have also occurred in tombs of the Merovingian age, on which Daniel is seen between two lions: in one instance his name is added (Le Blant, u. s., pl. 42, 87). The abbé Greppo possessed a silver hair-pin of six faces above, on the first of which was written ROMULA (the name of the owner), on the third VIVAS IN DEO, on the fifth SEMPER; it was probably found in the catacombs of Rome (Perret, Catac. vol. iv. pl. 20, no. 5, and vol. vi. p. 120; Martigny, u. s.). A pendant, composed of two onyx-stones joined together by a circle of gold ornamented on the edge with four emeralds and ten rubies, was discovered in the tomb of Maria. On one face was inscribed HONORI | MARIA | STILICHO | SERENA | VIVATIS, on the other STILICHO | SERENA | THERMANTIA | EUCHERI | VIVATIS |, with the chrisma (☧) in the centre of each side (Perret, u. s. pl. 16, no. 78). The comb of St. Lupus (died 623), preserved in the treasury of the cathedral of Sens, was probably placed in his tomb with a religious feeling, as priests were accustomed to comb their hair before celebrating the Eucharist (Martigny, u. s.; Ducange, s. v. Pecten).

[a] De Rossi mentions that pictures like those in the catacombs of Rome are to be seen in a Christian cavern in the Cyrenaica, and that a similarly painted vault occurs in a chamber excavated in a rock in the Crimea (Rom. Sott. vol. i. p. 100). Probably these were sepulchral.

Vestments are also frequently found in tombs: for Maria see above; for Constantine, who was placed in a gold coffin, clothed in the imperial purple and having a diadem on his head, see Eus. Vit. Const. lib. iv. c. 66; and for Charlemagne, who was dressed in his imperial robes, see Archaeologia, u. s. Military men were buried in military garments: St. Gereon was clothed in a soldier's purple cloak and black leather belt (Chiflet, u. s. pp. 95, 197). See more on this subject generally under OBSEQUIES OF THE DEAD, § v. p. 1428.

The insignia of office of those interred therein have often been found in tombs. Sebert, king of the East Angles, was buried with his royal robes and thumb-ring set with a ruby; while Charlemagne had his sword girt at his side, and opposite to him were suspended his golden sceptre and golden shield, which had been consecrated by pope Leo III. (Archaeologia, u. s.). Ecclesiastics were also sometimes buried with the symbols of their office. In the last century the tomb at Clonmacnois of St. Ciaran (died A.D. 544) was opened, and amongst other things his chalice and crozier were found therein (Stokes, Irish Christ. Inscr. vol. i. pp. 1, 3). A pectoral cross of lead and a small chalice were found among other objects in the grave of Birinus, bishop of Dorchester, who died A.D. 650 (Surius, de Vit. Sanct. Dec. 3, vol. vi. p. 220, Ven. 1681). And when the tomb of St. Cuthbert, who died 687, was opened in the 12th century, an onyx chalice was discovered beside his body [CHALICE]. To descend to people of lower rank, implements of handicraft, some of which have been mistaken for instruments of torture, have been found in the loculi of the catacombs [CATACOMBS, Vol. i. p. 314].

Lamps, pottery, and glass of various kinds have occurred both in the inside and outside of tombs in many parts of the Christian world [CATACOMBS, u. s.; LAMPS, POTTERY, GLASS]. Bay leaves have also been found under the head of the corpse or elsewhere in the coffin; they were placed there in token of triumph over death (Martigny, u. s.).

The instruments by which their sufferings were inflicted were sometimes placed within the tombs of martyrs [see OBSEQUIES, p. 1434]. Martigny has collected references to other instances. Leaden rolls containing the acts of their passion have also been found buried with martyrs (Boldetti, Cimit. pp. 322–324, and tav. ii. no. 3).

Perhaps the only other objects discovered in tombs which need be mentioned here are coins and medals. The first Christians, says Bosio, when they buried martyrs, were accustomed to bury with them the coins of the emperor under whom they suffered (Rom. Subt. lib. iv. c. 31). This may explain the finding of coins of Diocletian in the tomb of Caius, bishop of Rome (A.D. 283–296. Boldetti, Cimit. pp. 102–3). But in a single tomb of the cemetery of St. Agnes, Buonarotti counted more than ten coins of different emperors of different times (Buon. Vetri orn. di Fig. Pref. p. xi.). Roman money of various periods has also been found in the Christian tombs of Gaul and Germany (Le Blant, Insc. Chrét. de la Gaule, t. i. pp. 210, 345; Boldetti, Cimit. p. 644). Coins and medals have likewise been seen fixed on the outside of tombs in the catacombs, perhaps for the sake of recognition only (Buon. Osservaz. sopra alc. Medagl. referred to by Martigny, u. s. among other authorities). Their impressions have sometimes remained on the mortar, clearly shewing the types, after the coins have vanished (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. t. iii. pp. 305, 309).

C. Select Sepulchral Inscriptions.

(See also CATACOMBS, Vol. I. pp. 303–4–7–8–11.)

The small collection here given has immediate reference to the article on INSCRIPTIONS (Vol. I. pp. 841–862). Those which are there figured (pp. 846, 847) will all be found written out and in some cases translated below. They were selected mostly with a view to illustrate the different styles of palaeography and the different symbols exhibited in different epitaphs. They likewise serve to illustrate the general subject of the present article, which contains a few additional figures; one having symbols not mentioned or represented above (pp. 847, 848). The following selection and the examples already cited in this article have been chosen to illustrate, so far as could be done by a limited number, the various points of interest which epitaphs present, such as their different ages, styles, grammatical peculiarities, contractions of words and modes of dating, as well as for their intrinsic historical, ecclesiastical, or doctrinal importance. Thus the three earliest known dated inscriptions, all in Rome, are here given, as well as the earliest of those in our own country, which belong to the latter part of the period comprised in this work. Examples of the varied forms of composition will here be found, including the most ancient, which have much in common with pagan epitaphs, and those of several definite Christian types which differ in different countries. A few instances of the solecisms, incorrect spellings, and peculiar uses of words as well as of the contractions of words (see INSCRIPTIONS, §§ v. vii.), occur in the epitaphs now given at length. The different modes of dating by consulates, post-consulates, indictions, eras of provinces, reigns of kings, or cyclic periods of time, will also here be exemplified (see u. s. § vi.).

SERVILIA . ANNORVM . XIII .
PIS . ET . BOL . COSS .

Servilia, 13 years old, (buried) in the consulate of Piso and Bolanus.—Piso and Bolanus were consuls A.D. 111. The earliest complete Christian inscription yet found.[1] The place of finding, the omission of D . M ., and the simplicity of the diction, unite in proving that the epitaph is Christian. After this no dated Christian inscription of Rome (or indeed of any place whatever) has been found until A.D. 204.

[1] Only two earlier are given by De Rossi, both very incomplete: one, A.D. 71, a fragment recording two burials in one tomb, from the Catacombs, reading only [KAL? A]VG . VESPASIANO III COS. ‖ . . . . [KAL?] IAN. (p. 1). The other, A.D. 107, from the cemetery of Lucina, reading in one (the last) line N. (i.e. ann[orum]) XXX. SVRA . ET . SENEC . COSS . (p. 3).

A fish and an anchor below. Maximus and Urbanus were consuls A.D. 234. Tiberius Claudius Marcianus is an example of the trianomina; they have not been hitherto found on any Christian epitaph known to be later than the 3rd century. This is the earliest inscription bearing Christian symbols.

3. (De Rossi, u. s. no. 11, p. 18. Engraved in INSCRIPTIONS, Vol. I. p. 846.) Rome, from the cemetery of Saturninus; letters not incised, but painted in vermilion: the points do not indicate separations of words.

In the consulship of Claudius and Paternus, on the nones of November, on the day of Venus (i.e. Friday, Nov. 5), the twenty-fourth of the moon, Leuces (Lucens?) erected this to his dearest daughter, Severa, and to thy holy soul. She died, aged fifty-five years, eleven months and ten days. Date A.D. 269.

"The inflexions of this epitaph, some of which, appear also in an epitaph of the year 291, betray its Greek origin, almost as plainly as the characters in which it is written" (Edinb. Rev. July 1864, p. 233). The transition from ejus to tuo has its parallel in pagan inscriptions. See McCaul, Christian Epitaphs, p. 23.

This inscription has been rendered famous by Lupi's special treatise thereon.

For the mode of dating, see De Rossi's notes and Prolegom. cap. De Cyclicis Temporum, notes.

[a] The mention of the persons who made the tomb is general in pagan inscriptions, but fell before long into disuse among Christians.

4. (De Rossi, u. s. no. 23, p. 27. Engraved in Vol. I. p. 846.) Found in the cemetery of St. Laurentius, Rome, in 1699; the tablet was affixed to the loculus, to which a bloody (?) vessel [GLASS] was attached.

Σιμπλικία, ἡ καὶ καλόνυμος, ἔζησεν ἔτη ια ἡμέρας κγ. ἐτελεύτησεν πρὸ ιγ καλ. Νοβεμβρίων Φαύστῳ καὶ Γάλλῳ ὑπάτοις.

Simplicia, who was also well named (i.e. as being of a simple disposition), died on the thirteenth day before the Calends of November (Oct. 20), in the consulship of Faustus and Gallus (i.e. A.D. 298).

A very early example of a Greek Christian inscription with a date. For the play on the name see INSCRIPTIONS, Vol. I. p. 852.

5. (De Rossi, u. s. no. 1192.) Fragment of a Roman catacomb-stone, "tabula coemeterialis," now at Velitrae.

D M
LEOPARDVS QVI VIXIT [ANNOS . . .]
ET. MENSES N (numero) XI DEO R (reddidit)
S (spiritum) SA[NCTVM]
ELATVS EST VIII IDVS AVG. [CONS . . .]
AVG

The great interest attaching to the fragment is the occurrence of D . M (for Dis Manibus) on a Christian inscription. A few other examples of the same kind are found; nearly all, like the present, supposed to be earlier than the 4th century. (See Vol. I. p. 851; McCaul, u. s. p. 60; Martigny, Dict. s. v. D. M.) It has been variously explained; either as being engraved by stonecutters on the blank stones in advance before they were sold for actual use, or as repeated by Christians by the force of pagan example and habit without definite meaning attached, or as implying a certain fusion of heathenism with Christianity. Such a fusion in respect of this very matter appears in a Christian epitaph (quoted by McCaul, u. s. p. 63), sanctique tui manes petentibus adsint. In one example the chrisma is on either side of D. M. (De Rossi, Bull. 1873, tav. xi.) Deo reddidit spiritum sanctum is an expression found only on Christian monuments. Elatus est is very rarely met with except in pagan epitaphs. The date, now lost, is from the consulate of some emperor.

6. (De Rossi, u. s. no. 48. Engraved in Vol. I. p. 847.) From the cemetery of Callistus and Praetextatus, Rome. A marble tablet, which had once been the side of a sarcophagus; the original inscription having been obliterated:—

Eq(uitius) Heraclius, qui fuit in saeculum (saeculo) an(nos) xix, m(enses) vii, d(ies) xx, lector r(egionis) sec(undae). Fecerun(t) (sc. parentes) sibi et filio suo benemerenti in p(ace). Decesit (sic) vii Irus (Idus) Februarias, Urso et Polemio conss (consulibus) (i.e. Feb. 7, A.D. 338).

Rome was divided into seven ecclesiastical districts or regions, and Heraclius was attached as a reader to the second of these.

This inscription shews examples of the various leaves, points, and marks which are frequent in Christian inscriptions, besides the symbols of the chrisma (of unusual form), the dove, and palm-branches.

7. (De Rossi, u. s. no. 55. Engraved in Vol. I. p. 846.) From the cemetery of Theodora.

Constantio Aug. II. et Constanti Aug. [Conss] Nonis Decemb. Claudianus dormit in [pace] (i.e. Dec. 5, A.D. 339).

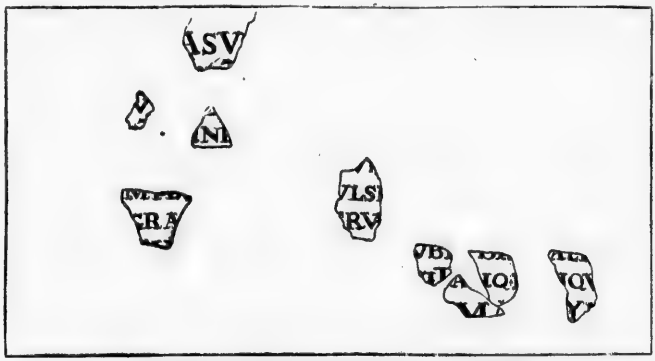
Principally remarkable as a piece of rude and hasty palaeography on mortar.

8. (De Rossi, Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1863, p. 17. Engraved in Vol. I. p. 847.) Discovered in front of the square crypt in the cemetery of Praetextatus, Rome.

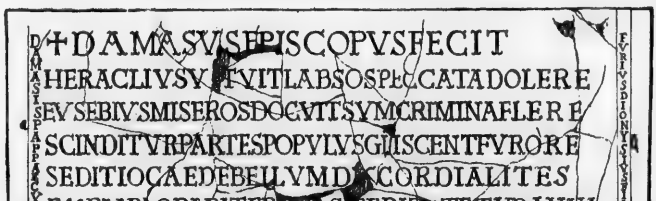
Beatissimo Martyri Januario Damasus Episcopus fec t.

Date of inscription determined by the pontificate of Damasus (A.D. 366–384). (Januarius was martyred in 305.)

From a few fragments De Rossi happily restores this inscription, which is written in the beautiful Damasine character.



Fragments of original Damasine Inscription to Eusebius. (De Rossi.)



The same Inscription restored. (De Rossi.)

9. (De Rossi, Roma Sott. vol. ii. p. 191 sqq. tav. iii. iv.; Brownlow and Northcote, Rom. Sott. p. 170, pl. ii. iii.).

Epitaph of St. Eusebius, bishop of Rome (A.D. 310), composed by Damasus, but restored at some later period by Pope Symmachus or Vigilius, or John III. (A.D. 498–573), found in the cemetery of St. Callistus.

The restored inscription itself, beautifully written in vermilion, required the restoring hand of De Rossi, who has pieced all the fragments together, and has thus obtained the whole epitaph, with scarcely the loss of a single letter. In addition to this, nine morsels of the original inscription written in the splendid calligraphy of Damasus, or rather of his artist Philocalus, were obtained, and their places were of course at once determined from the restored inscription (De Rossi, u. s. t. iii.). This was one of those epitaphs which was known in MSS. from the transcripts of Alcuin's scholars.

The restored inscription is bounded on all sides by two others, in the second of which the letters are placed columnwise below each other. Above and below we have:—

Furius Dionysius Filocalus scribsit (scripsit) | Damasis pappae cvltor atqve amatot (amator).

For Damasis pappae De Rossi suggests Damasi sui papae, a phrase confirmed by other authorities (u. s. p. 200).

The text of the restored inscription, a little corrupt, runs thus when corrected; the errors are given below: the letters in brackets are omitted on the stone.

"Heraclivs vetvit lapsos[a] peccata dolere,
Evsebivs miseros docvit sva[b] crimina flere;
Scinditvr [in][c] partes popvlvs gliscente fvrore, Seditio, caedes,[d] bellvm, discordia, lites.
Exemplo pariter pvlsi feritate tyranni,
Integra cvm rector servaret foedera pacis.
Pertvlit exilivm [d]omino[e] sub ivdice laetvs;
Litore T[r]inacrio[f] mvndvm vitamq. reliqvit."

(a) labsos. (b) sum. (c) in, omitted here, occurs in the Damasine fragments. (d) caede only now visible, possibly originally caedē. (e) d may have been obliterated. (f) Tinacrio.

The whole may be expressed in English as follows:

"Damasus, Bishop, set up this to Eusebius, Bishop and Martyr."

"Furius Dionysius Filocalus, a worshipper and lover of Pope Damasus, wrote this."

"Heraclius forbad the lapsed to grieve for their sins. Eusebius taught those unhappy ones to weep for their crimes. The people were rent into parties, and with increasing fury began sedition, slaughter, fighting, discord, and strife. Straightway both [the pope and the heretic] were banished by the cruelty of the tyrant, although the pope was preserving the bonds of peace inviolate. He bore his exile with joy, looking to the Lord as his judge, and on the shore of Sicily gave up the world and his life."

The inscription (translated as above by Messrs. Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 170) refers to the severity of Heraclius, who following Novatian would fain close the door of reconciliation to apostates, in contrast with the merciful conduct of Eusebius, and to the excited feelings of the populace about the matter in dispute.

10. (De Rossi, Inscr. Urb. Rom. no. 251. Engraved in Vol. I. p. 847.) From the cemetery of Commodilla, Rome.

Petronias dignae cojugi (sic) que (quae) vixit annis (annos) xxi. et fecit cum compare m(enses) x. dies v. [Deposita est] Kal. Nob. (Novembribus) pos (post) conss (consulatus) Gratiani t·r et Equiti. Ursus maritus sibi et innocenti compari fecit. Cesquet (quiescit) in pace.

The year after the consulate of Equitius, and the year after Gratian's third consulate, falls under 375 A.D., when there were no consuls (De Rossi, u. s. Prolegg. p. xxx.). The two doves symbolise conjugal affection; the figure between them is an orante.

11. (De Rossi, Inscr. Urb. Rom. no. 376.) From the ruins of the basilica of St. Paul in the Via Ostiensis.

GAVDENTIVS PRESB. SIBI
ET CONIVGI SVAE SEVERAE CASTAE HAC (i.e. ac)
SANC[TAE]
FEMINAE QVAE VIXIT ANN. XLII. M. III. D. X.
DEP (depositus) III. NON. APRIL. TIMASIO ET PROMOTO [CONSS].

Gaudentius, a presbyter, made this tomb for himself and his wife Severa, a chaste and holy woman, who lived 42 years, 3 months, and 10 days. Buried April 2, in the consulship of Timasius and Promotus (i.e. A.D. 389).

Allusion to the marriages of ecclesiastics are not unfrequent in epitaphs. Thus in an epitaph in Rome, in which Petronia the wife of a deacon is the speaker, occur the beautiful lines—

Levitae conjunx Petronia, forma pudoris,
His mea deponens sedibus ossa loco,
Parcite vos lacrimis, dulces cum conjuge natae,
Viventemque Deo credite flere nefas.

I, Petronia, a deacon's (lit. Levite's) wife, a model of modesty, lay down and place my bones in this resting-place. Refrain from tears, my sweet daughters and husband, and believe that it is sinful to weep for one who lives in God.

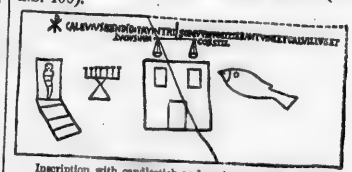
The remaining lines in prose tell us that her burial took place Oct. 5, A.D. 472, and that her daughter Paula and her son Gordian were buried in the same tomb in A.D. 484 and A.D. 485, as well as Aemiliana, 'sacra virgo,' probably also a daughter, in A.D. 489 (De Rossi, u. s. no. 843; McCaul, Christ. Epist. no. 65). A lengthy inscription, probably found at Narbonne, recording the reparation of the church in A.D. 445, tells of a married bishop, Rusticus episcopus, episcopi Bonosi filius (Le Blant, u. s. no. 617).

12. (De Rossi, Inscr. Urb. Rom. no. 489.) From the cemetery of SS. Quartus and Quintus, Rome.

CALEVIVS BENDIDIT AVIN[IO] TRISOMV[M]
VBI POSITI ERANT VINI (bini) ET CALVILIVS
ET LVCIVS IN PA[CE] COS (consule) STIL[ICHONE].

Calevius sold to Avinius a place for three bodies, where both Calvilius and Lucius had already been placed in peace in the consulship of Stilicho (i.e. A.D. 400).



Inscription with candlestick and various other symbols.

Remarkable for the accompanying symbols: the chrisma, the balance (cf. Dan. v. 27), the fish, the Jewish candlestick (a Jewish funeral ornament), the house (the last dwelling-place of the departed), and the mummy (Lazarus?) approached by steps, awaiting its resurrection. See McCaul (u. s. p. 49).

13. (De Rossi, u. s. n. 847. Figured in Vol. I. p. 847.) Engraved in a small tabella coemeterialis, found in situ attached to the loculus in the cemetery of St. Zoticus on the Labican Way, Rome.

This barbarous inscription may be thus rendered—

Lepusculus Leo, qui vixit annum et menses undecim, et dies decem et novem, perit septimo calendas Augustas, Honorio sexies Augusto.

Sexies, sc. consule, i.e. A.D. 404. Perit is probably a preterite: but τελευτᾷ occurs in a Syracusan inscription, A.D. 408. It is one of several pagan words which survived in Christian times.

De Rossi does not give the size of this little slab, whose breadth does not very much exceed its height. Mr. Burgon remarks on the great difference in size of the early Christian grave-slabs in the catacombs of Rome, "some three or four feet long, yet ranging in height from a few inches to two or three feet, and some only a few inches across, either way" (Letters from Rome, p. 175).

Remarkable no less for its rustic palaeography than for its rustic spelling.

2. FRANCE.

1. (Le Blant, Inscr. Chrét. de la Gaule, no. 58.) Lyons, in the underground chapel of St. Irenaeus:—

PROCVLA . CL. FEMINA
FAMVLA . DEI .
A . TERRA . AD MARTYRES

Considered to be of the 4th century; punctuation capricious.

Famula Dei. This expression, though occurring elsewhere (see Vol. I. p. 848, b), is found in the epitaphs of Gaul and Spain only, and seems to be therein applied exclusively to the dead (Le Blant, Manuel, pp. 10, 11). The last line indicates that she has joined in glory the martyrs beside whom she lies buried.

2. (Le Blant, u. s. no. 145.) From St. Eloi in Upper Normandy, where eight other Runic inscriptions have been found:—

INGOMIR : SEN : HAGEN[S]
IN : FRIEDE :
KONOUNG : CLOUDOOUIG
CONSOUL :
(In Runic characters.)

Ingomar, son of Hagen, in peace. King Clovis being Consul.

The date is A.D. 510. A confirmation of the statement of Gregory of Tours: "Igitur Chlodovechus ab Anastasio imperatore codicillos de consulatu accepit" (Hist. Franc. lib. ii. c. 38). The absence of the name of Clovis from the Consular Fasti had caused Gregory's accuracy to be doubted (Le Blant, u. s.). Perhaps the earliest Christian Runic inscription whose date is known.

Runic Epitaph, dated by the Consulate of Clovis

3. SPAIN.

(Hübner, u. s. no. 117. Figured in Vol. I. p. 847.) A long marble tablet formed in an ancient wall near Arjona in Spain: remarkable for the manifold ligatures of the characters composed.

+ Maria, a faithful servant of Christ, who loved this place (a church?) in her life, and there at last remains and reposes (read requiescens rather than rebus), overlived fourteen years by one * * * (month or day). She departed with penitence in peace on the ninth of March, in the second year of Reccisvintus the prince reigning with his father (Chindasvindus), i.e. A.D. 650.

This appears to be the sense of this puzzling inscription. The second line may possibly be corrupt; in the third is some omission.

4. GERMANY.

1. (Le Blant, u. s. no. 226.) Found at Trier, now in the Museum of Porta Nigra:—

HIC AMAN
TIAE IN PACE
HOSPITA C
ARO IACET.

Two doves facing, the chrisma enclosed in a wreath between them.

Here the pilgrim body of Amantia lies in peace.

The letters are neatly formed, and also the birds: perhaps of the 4th or 5th century.

For Amantia see Vol. I. p. 853. The beautiful expression hospita caro implies that heaven is the Christian's true home: and the same thing is more directly said in the Ad coelum praemisit opes in an epitaph suspected to be written by Venantius Fortunatus, who uses various equivalent expressions (Le Blant, u. s. no. 218).

5. GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

1. (Haddan and Stubbs, Counc. and Eccl. Doc. i. 164; Hübner, Inscr. Brit. Christ. no. 82.) On a stone found at Pont y Polion, Cardiganshire, in five lines:—

SERVATVR FIDAEI
PATRIEQVE SEMPER
AMATOR HIC PAVLIN
VS IACIT CVLTOR PIENTI
SIMVS AEQVI.

Meant for two hexameters. Paulinus, the instructor of St. David, was present at a synod in Wales held before A.D. 569. An inscription in Old Welsh relating to St. Cadfan and king Cyngen is in a similar style and about the same date (Haddan and Stubbs, u. s.).

The other early Welsh Christian inscriptions, presumed to lie between A.D. 500 and 700, are very short and mostly barbarous. No prayers for the dead in any shape occur in any of them; little more than a hic jacet (often barbarized) and the name of the person buried, the name of the father being sometimes added. The stone sometimes has a cross within a circle. Three will suffice for this place:—(1) Porius |

hic in tumulo jacit | homo Christianus fuit. (2) On a stone bearing a cross within a circle (accompanied by a long stem running down the centre of the stone, and with an equivalent (?) inscription in Ogham characters): Cunocenni filius | Cunoceni (sic) hic jacet. (3) Chrisma of peculiar form. Carausius hic jacit | in hoc (sic) con|geries la|pidum. We have also the name (Pascent) only. (Haddan and Stubbs, u. s. pp. 164, 169; Hübner, u. s. pp. 14–55.)

2. (Bentham's Ely, p. 51. Figured in Vol. I. p. 846.)

"Found some years since at Hadenham, near Ely; the stone which seems to have been the base of a cross is square, 2½ feet in diameter, and 14 in. thick; in the middle of the upper part is a square mortise, into which is fixed with lead another stone erect, about 4 feet high, and then broke off, which probably terminated in a cross. The inscription which fills one side of the stone is this:—

+ LVCEM . TVAM . OVINO .
DA . DEVS . ET . REQVIE .
. AMEN .

. . . Only one letter e is of the Saxon cast, the rest being purely Roman" (Bentham, u. s.). Now in Ely Cathedral. Ovinus or Winn (monachus magni meriti) was the steward of Etheldreda, whom he accompanied from East Anglia on her first marriage about A.D. 652 (Beda, H. E. iv. 3). Hübner, apparently without reason, thinks this inscription much later (n. 169).

3. (Archaeologia, vol. xxxiv. p. 437, pl. xxxv.; . . T. Fowler in Yorks. Arch. and Topogr. Journ. with more correct figure.)

Saxon Epitaph at Dewsbury. (Fowler.)

Found some years ago near the church of Dewsbury, Yorkshire, now in the possession of Dr. Hemingway. Fragment of the upper arm of a cross (apparently) with the top edge broken off; four inches across in widest part. Reads in Saxon (modified Roman) letters in seven lines:

. . . RHTAE BE | CUN AEFT | ER BEOR | NAE GIBI | DDAD D | AER SA | ULE.

M. or N. set up this in memory of . . .] rht, a beacon (monument), after (on account of) the bairn. Pray for the soul.

The proper name is imperfect. Probably of the 7th century or somewhat later. Stephens (u. s. p. 464) observes that old North-English inscriptions in these letters are still rarer than those written in Runes.

4. (Christian Inscriptions in the Irish Language. Chiefly collected by G. Petrie. Edited by M. Stokes, vol. i. p. 15, pl. 1. Engraved, Vol. I. p. 847.)

At Clonmacnois, in King's County, now placed as a head-stone to a recent grave.

OR̄ DO CHOLUMBON.
i.e. Pray for Colomban.

Or̄ for oroit, equivalent to the Latin orate, which also occurs at length (p. 74). The form of the cross and character of the letters belong to the earliest period of Christian art in Ireland. There is little doubt that this is the Columbanus whose death in A.D. 624 is thus recorded in the Annals of Ulster: "Pausa Columbani, filii Barddaeni, Abbatis Clono," i.e. of Clonmacnois, where a monastery was founded about A.D. 544. The formula here used is frequent in the Irish inscriptions: thus we have Or̄ ar Chuindless (u. s. p. 18), Or̄ do Comgán (u. s. p. 19), both at Clonmacnois; the former supposed to be the epitaph of an abbat who died A.D. 724, the latter belonging to a person not clearly identified. We have it also in the epitaphs found at Fuerty,[x] Inismurray, &c. In one of the Aran islands occurs, or̄ ar. ii. canoin, i.e. pray for two canons (u. s. vol. ii. p. 21). Much more rarely the good wish takes this form, Bendachd for anmainn Joseph, i.e. a blessing on the soul of Joseph, who seems to have died in A.D. 811 at Roscommon, where the inscription is to be seen (u. s. vol. ii. p. 11; see also p. 31, bis).

The eternal house of Agatho, a reader, and of Euphennia in two graves, one for each of us. But if any of our own or any one else dare to place a body here except us two, may he give an account to God; and let him be anathema maranatha.

Perhaps of the 4th or 5th century: see domus aeterna in a Christian Roman inscription, A.D. 363 (De Rossi, I. U. R. n. 159). For similar pagan sentiments in Greek inscriptions see Ritter, De Comp. Tit. Christ. p. 24 (Berlin, 1877); and for similar execrations, pi[illegible]–39.

Calocærus made this for Macedon and Sosigenia, his sweetest parents, as their resting-place (lit. cemetery) till the resurrection.

The form of the letters (often ligated and scarcely capable of being represented by types) and the style of this beautiful inscription are considered to point to the 2nd or 3rd century.

Corycus in Cilicia in a cemetery, on the lid of a sarcophagus, upon which are four crosses.

θήκη διαφέρου‖σαΓεωργίου‖κυρτοκα‖πήλου (corrected text). διαφέρουσα is often joined to θήκη and σωματοθήκη in various Asiatic tituli; it appears to mean particular or peculiar, i.e. in which no other body must be laid. κυρτοκάπηλος is a fishing-tackle seller. The trade of the person buried is frequently named in the sepulchral inscriptions of Cilicia and other provinces of Asia; thus we have a brazier, an oil-seller, a potter, a seaman, and several others. The inscriptions of Corycus appear to be of the 5th and 6th centuries.

The most curious example is from Ancyra in Galatia, where Theodorus is described as being at once a presbyter and a silversmith (Bockh, C. I. G. n. 9258). Dr. McCaul gives Latin examples from the catacombs of Rome of the mention of the secular position of various persons buried there, as count of the household troops (comes domesticorum), lawyer, prefect of the city, physician, baker, gardener, ex-quaestor, prefect of the market, keeper of a public granary (Christ. Epitaphs, pp. 28–36). M. Le Blant, therefore, must be understood with considerable limitations, "Des indications courantes sur les épitaphes des païens, la filiation, la patrie, la condition sociale, la profession . . . ne figurent point, pour ainsi dire, sur les inscriptions chrétiennes de langue latine" (Manuel, p. 20). The inscriptions, however, where a profession is named, seem to be nearly, if not always, later than Constantine.

Representations of tools belonging to particular trades have been mentioned above as occurring at Arles, and there are other examples in the Catacombs at Rome (Martigny, Dict. s. v. Instruments).

Slaves and freedmen are occasionally mentioned in Christian inscriptions, some of which appear to be very ancient, one is certainly before Constantine (Le Blant, I. C. G. tom. i. pp. 119–121. De Rossi, J. C. U. R. n. 5, dated A.D. 217. Edinburgh Review, u. s. p. 240).

Here lies the blessed Thisauril. She was made perfect on the fourth day of the month Athyr, in the eighth indiction. O God, rest her soul in the bosoms of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. So let it be! Amen.

Probably of the 5th or 6th century. Another very similar inscription from Nubia (n. 9120), gives the date (mutilated) taken from the era of the martyrs, probably corresponding to A.D. 489. The Egyptian epitaphs generally contain these prayerful hopes for the dead taken from the ancient liturgies. Ritter (u. s. pp. 31, 32) considers that these inscriptions are almost or quite peculiar to Egypt and Nubia, and are of Judaeo-Christian origin. [C. B.]

TONSURE. The cutting off of the hair of the head wholly or partially, in some one of the modes to be hereafter mentioned, has been from the earliest times a preparatory step to taking holy orders, or to embracing the monastic life, and an outward mark of the placing of those persons who submitted to the operation under ecclesiastical law. Numerous mystical interpretations of the tonsure are mentioned by early ritualists (Amalarius, de Eccles. Off. ii. 5, iv. 39; Isidor. de Eccles. Off. i. 4; Raban. Maur. de Institut. Cleric. i. 3). The usual circular shape was believed to be an imitation of the crown of thorns. Bede speaks of St. Cuthbert "receiving the yoke of Christ and the Petrine tonsure resembling the thorny crown which encircled the head of Christ" (Vit. S. Cuthberti). Other fanciful reasons which are supposed to have induced St. Peter to institute the tonsure are given by Raban. Maur. (Lib. de Institut. Cler. i. 3, ad finem).

The act of tonsure was solemnly performed by the bishop in the case of clergy, by the abbat in the case of a monk entering a monastery, the monakish corona being somewhat larger than that of a secular priest. Instances are on record of the performance of the tonsure by the officiating priest of the church within which the ceremony took place (in the church of St. Martin of Tours), and even by the candidate for holy orders himself (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iii. 18). In Egypt and Syria it was the custom in St. Jerome's time to shave the heads of virgins on their entering the monastic profession (Hieron. Ep. 48, cont. Sabinianum); but such a custom never became prevalent in the West, and was condemned by a law of Theodosius the Great (Lib. xvi. tit. 2, de Episc. Leg. 27). [ORDERS, HOLY, p. 1491.]

It has been stated that regulations with reference to the clerical cut of hair date from a very early period, and are almost coeval with the Christian church. But the earlier of these regulations do not describe the tonsure in the later and technical sense of the term, but are merely injunctions to the clergy not to wear long hair, and have been erroneously pressed into service by eager advocates of the antiquity of the coronal tonsure. Such are the directions attributed to Anicetus A.D. 167 (Anast. in Vita; Migne, Bib. Pat. Lat. cxxvii. p. 1203), and of pope Damasus (Ep. viii.) A.D. 366–84; iv. Concil. Carthag. can. 44; Optatus, c. Parmen. lib. ii. p. 58; Hieron. xiii. in Ezek. cap. 44; Prudentius's description of St. Cyprian on his reception by the clergy at Carthage:

"Defuns caesaries compescitur ad breves capillos," Peristeph. xiii.

Socrates's description of the cutting of Julian the Apostate's hair, when he pretended to be a monk, ἐν χρῷ κειράμενος (Hist. Ec. iii. 1); Evagrius's description of the ordination of Marcianus (Hist. Ec. iii. 26); the account of the admission to holy orders of St. Germanus of Auxerre in the 5th century (Vit. S. German. ap. Surium, 31 Jul.); and of St. Caesarius of Arles in the 6th century (ibid. 27. Aug.) The phraseology of some of these passages is consistent with, but does not necessarily prove the employment of the coronal tonsure, the first indisputable evidence for which is a 6th-century mosaic representation of St. Apollinaris of Ravenna (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. 27) and can. 41 of the fourth council of Toledo (A.D. 633), which ordered that "omnes clerici, detonso superius capite toto, inferius solam circuli coronam relinquant." A similar direction is given in Concil. Quinisext. A.D. 692, can. xxxiii.

The custom of the tonsure is said by most ritualists to have been derived by the Apostles from the Nazarites, in order that those who dedicated themselves to God's service might be distinguished likewise by the tonsure of the hair. The resemblance is not very complete, as the Nazarites cut off their hair at the close instead of at the commencement of a vow (Isidore, de Div. Off. i. 4; Alcuin, de Div. Off. edit. Hittorp. p. 61; Raban. Maur. Lib. de Institut. Cleric. i. 3). Gregory of Tours attributed its introduction to St. Peter, as a sign of humility (de Glor. Mart. i. 28), a theory which is criticised by Amalarius as possible but not proved, and he concludes by wisely leaving the origin of the tonsure an open question like the authorship of the book of Job (de Eccles. Off. ii. 5, iv. 39). It is of course most improbable that either the apostles or their successors during the period of heathen persecutions, should have received an outward mark which might at any moment lead to their detection and identification as the leaders of a religious body, the members of which were liable to the punishment of torture or of death. We have the express testimony of Hegesippus to the contrary in the case of St. James, "upon whose head no razor was ever passed" (Euseb. Hist. Ec. ii. 23).

There were three distinct varieties of ecclesiastical tonsure.

(a) The Roman tonsure, associated with the name of St. Peter, which was formed by the top of the head being shaved close, and a circle or crown of hair being left to grow round it. In breadth this coronal tonsure was said "to be like the golden crown which is placed on the head of kings" (Isidore, de Div. Off. ii. 4).

(b) The Eastern or Greek tonsure, styled St. Paul's, which was total. When Theodore was selected to be archbishop of Canterbury (A.D. 668) he was obliged to wait four months to let his hair grow in such a manner as would enable him to receive the coronal tonsure in the Roman manner, "for he had previously, as suodeacon, received the tonsure of St. Paul, according to the manner of the Easterns" (Bede, Hist. Ec. iv. 1).

(c) The Celtic tonsure, known as St. John's, in use in the Celtic church of Great Britain and Ireland. It consisted in shaving all the hair in front of a line drawn over the top of the head from ear to ear. The Anglo-Saxon church attributed this form of tonsure in use among their opponents to Simon Magus. Abbat Ceolfrid discussed the subject at length in his letter to Nectan, king of the Picts, A.D. 710 (Bede, Hist. Ec. v. 21). Although not brought forward by St. Augustine either at Augustine's Oak or at Bangor this question of the shape of the tonsure formed the subject of the most frequent and violent controversy in England during the 7th and 8th centuries. There are traces of the same controversy in France, where a Saxon colony at Bayeux had copied the Celtic tonsure from the Bretons before A.D. 590 (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. x. 9), and in Spain, where a tonsure like the Celtic was condemned by Conc. Tolet. iv. A.D. 633, can. xli. [Further details are given by Bede, H. E. iv. 1; Gildas, Epist. ii.; Aldhelm, Epist. ad Geruntium in Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, &c. iii. 288; Mabillon, Ann. Benedict. i. 528; Act. SS. ord. Bened. saec. ii. pp. 119–20; Chamillard, de Corona tonsura et habitu cleric.; Martene, de Antiq. Eccles. Rit. tom. ii. p. 14, edit. 1788.] [F. E. W.]

TORMENT, PLACE OF (IN ART). The only representations of any place of bodily punishment, beyond the grave and in the spiritual state, which the writer knows of as possibly within our period, are the hell of the Torcello mosaics, and the numerous pits or rapidly sketched infernos, generally with ministering demons, found in the Utrecht Psalter. [See RESURRECTION.] The writer counted eighteen in the first half of that extraordinary work (see woodcut). But the dates of both these documents are very doubtful. It is particularly curious in the Utrecht Psalter, that there (for the first time in Christian imagery as far as he knows) the mouth of hell is sometimes an actual mouth, belonging most frequently to a monstrous head, sometimes quasi-human, sometimes nearer the fish or serpent-monster of the Giottesque infernos. The idea may be derived from the vision of Er, in Plato's Republic, bk. x. The souls in that allegory who have passed round the circle of the rivers of punishment are allowed to try to leave Tartarus by its mouth; which lets them pass, if their purgation is complete. If not, it roars horribly, and the sinner has to go back and repeat his circuit of Phlegethon and Cocytus. But this subject is not really a part of Christian iconography, even of the first millennium. It came into prominence with races like the Lombard, accustomed to every form of slaughter and terror, and also full of inventive genius. [R. S. T. T.]

TOURS, COUNCILS OF (TURONENSIA CONCILIA), A.D. 461 and A.D. 567. Both remarkable for the length of their disciplinary canons; the first, at which thirteen were passed, to which Perpetuus, bishop of Tours, and seven bishops, a blind bishop through his presbyter, and Thalassius, bishop of Angers, on their being communicated to him, subscribed (Mansi, vii. 943–8); the second, at which no less than twenty-seven were passed, and subscribed to by Euphronius, bishop of Tours, and eight others (Mansi, ix. 789–814). Both were celebrated in honour of St Martin, but the latter was held in his church, as though it had been finished in the interval between them. [E. S. Ff.]

TOWER. We have now so long been accustomed to see a tower either attached to or immediately adjoining a church, that many persons would be disposed to make the presence of a tower the distinctive mark of a church, and its absence that of a chapel. Such, however, would be a very great mistake as regards the churches of the earlier centuries of Christianity. Until bells came to be in general use a tower would have served no other purpose in connexion with a church than that of a place of security for the servants and treasures of the church in the event of an attack from brigands or enemies. Towers, therefore, did not in the earlier ages invariably form part of the design of a church.

In the centre of cruciform churches towers may, however, have been erected rather for æsthetic reasons than for any special use, as the raising the central part of such a church obviously greatly adds to its beauty and dignity. The germ of the central tower may perhaps be found in such buildings as the sepulchral chapel of SS. Nazzaro and Celso at Ravenna [CHAPEL, p. 346], built before A.D. 450, where the intersection of nave, transepts, and chancel is covered by a dome enclosed in a low square tower.

It has been shewn in the article BELL that bells, and probably bells of considerable size, were well known in Gaul and England in the 6th and 7th centuries, and in Italy doubtless they were known as early, if not even earlier. Towers were of course familiar objects, and it may easily have occurred to some ecclesiastic or architect that a tower adjacent or annexed to a church would afford a convenient means of so hanging bells that their sound would travel freely.

The earliest examples of towers connected with, or adjacent to, churches would seem to be the towers of some of the churches at Ravenna. Hübsch (Altchristl. Kirchen) asserts that the lower part of the tower at the cathedral shews that it is of the same date as the adjacent baptistery (attributed to A.D. 425), by the fact that the quality and form of the bricks, and the manner in which they are laid, are identical in the two structures. On like grounds he considers that the square tower of S. Francesco (see woodcut) and the circular one at S. Giovanni Evangelista date from the latter part of the 5th century, and that at S. Apollinare in Classe (v. CHURCH, p. 376) from the period of the building of the church (A.D. 568).

On similar evidence the same writer thinks that part of the towers of S. Pudenziana and S. Lorenzo at Rome are as early as the 7th century. Certainly no one who knows how safe a guide the character of brickwork at Rome is as to the dates of buildings will be disposed to disregard the opinion expressed by Herr Hübsch, but the earliest documentary evidence of the building of a tower in connexion with a church at Rome would appear to be the mention in the Liber Pontificalis of the tower built by pope Stephen III. (A.D. 768-772) at St. Peter's, in which three bells were placed "to call together the clergy and people to the service of God." This passage is given by Ducange, but does not appear in all editions of the Liber Pontif. If genuine, it certainly seems to point to the introduction of a practice which had something of novelty about it.

Tower of S. Francesco, Ravenna.
(From Hübsch's Altchristl. Kirchen.)

In the life of pope Leo IV. (A.D. 847-855) in the Liber Pontif., it is stated that he at the church of St. Andrew the Apostle "fecit campanile et posuit campanam cum malleo aereo," as if there were something rather unusual and remarkable in the fact of a hammer being used to strike the bell. The fact that while at Rome there are nearly thirty churches, portions of which are of earlier date than A.D. 800, while the existing bell-towers are, with very doubtful exceptions, of later date, and that no early mention of the construction of towers is to be found in the Liber Pontif., which enters into such full detail upon the works done by the successive popes to the various churches, would seem to make it almost certain that, as has been said before, it was not until a comparatively late date that a tower was deemed to be at all an essential adjunct to a church; and, indeed, many of the older churches in that city remain to the present day unfurnished with such an appendage. Two churches (built 827-824), Sta. Cecilia and Sta. Prassede, shew clearly that a tower did not form part of the original plans; in the first case, it is awkwardly wedged in in a corner; in the latter it has been raised on the end of a transept.

The early examples above mentioned are all detached from the neighbouring churches, but towers forming internal parts of churches of very early date are to be found in central Syria. The annexed woodcut of a part of the front of the church at Taftkha, from Comte de la Vogüé's work, shews the three-storied tower which forms part of the façade. This church, Comte de la Vogüé says, is probably of the 4th, but cannot be later in date than the 5th, century. At Tourmanin, in the same country, are remains of a church which the same authority attributes to the 9th century; here are two western towers, which, however, do not rise above the roof.

Towers were, it would seem, built as portions of churches in England at an early date, for a square tower annexed to the nave is to be found at Brixworth in Northamptonshire, which there is some historical ground for believing to have been built before A.D. 700 (v. the Basilica, &c., by the Rev. C. F. Watkins, and Britton, Chron. Hist. of Christian Architecture, p. 192). That the existing building is really of an early date is the more probable as the head of an original window in the wall between the tower and the nave has been altered by the insertion of a window of three lights, divided by two balusters; this alteration is supposed to have been a part of the repairs effected after A.D. 870, when the monastery was devastated by the Danes.

Another early example of a tower is afforded by the church in Dover Castle; in this case the tower is in the centre, resting on four semicircular arches. No historical or documentary date from which the period of the erection of this church can be inferred have been brought forward, but the character of the architecture is much the same as that of Brixworth, the arches in both cases being square-edged, and constructed chiefly with large flat tiles; in Brixworth of Roman make, and at Dover, it would seem, imitative of that manufacture, being much inferior in quality to those of which the adjacent pharos is built.

Another feature these churches have in common, viz. windows of large size, measuring, at Dover, 7 ft. 2 in. by 3 ft. 8 in., and at Brixworth 5 ft. 10 in. by 3 ft. 6 in.; these dimensions much exceed those of windows of churches of the same proportions of the 11th or 12th centuries, and this is what is just to be found in the churches at Rome earlier than A.D. 1000. Windows may be seen in some of these, e.g. the clerestory of S. Lorenzo fuor le Mura (772-795 ?), and the windows in the transept of St. Prassede (817-824); which approach very closely in size, proportion, and construction, to those of Brixworth and Dover. In Rome the great window spaces were filled with pierced marble slabs (v. Churches in Rome before A.D. 1000, Archaeologia, vol. xl.). In England wood may probably have served in place of marble, and the apertures in the wooden slabs filled with horn, or other semi-transparent substances, or even with glass, the use of which for such purposes was, as we are told by Bede, introduced by Benedict, bishop about A.D. 675. It is possible that in both these cases the towers may have been built with the view not only of hanging bells, but also as affording places of security for the treasures of the church and its ministers; some of the latter may even have dwelt in them, as was so frequently the case in Ireland during the middle ages.

The history of the detached slender circular towers with conical caps, which are peculiar to Ireland, was very carefully investigated by the late Earl of Dunraven, and his notes and conclusions have been well edited and commented on by Miss Stokes, who expresses an opinion based mainly on the character of the masonry of the towers, and its correspondence with that of buildings, the date of which can be approximatively fixed, that none of these towers now existing in Ireland can be believed to date from an earlier period than the latter part of the 9th century. But see ROUND TOWERS.

The foundations of two circular towers, one on each side of the altar end of the old cathedral at Brescia, still exist; the date of this church has not been ascertained, but it may be as early as the 8th century. Hübsch (Alt - Christliche Kirchen) places it between 600 and 750.

According to the restoration suggested by the same author the original plan of S. Lorenzo at Milan comprised four towers at the angles of the buildings; this church is not later than the 6th century.

In the church of Romain Motier in Switzerland, which was dedicated in 753, is a low but perfectly-developed central tower, and it seems not unlikely that if we had more examples of this century in existence we should find that then or afterwards, on this side of the Alps at any rate, a tower, either central or at the west end, frequently, if not even generally, formed a portion of every important church. We find, however, in the plan prepared for the monastery of St. Gall [CHURCH, p. 383] about 820, only two circular towers, one on each side of one of the apses, and connected with the church only by narrow passages.

In the dome at Aix-la-Chapelle we have at the west end a tower-like building flanked by two circular towers containing staircases.

Several churches in France of about the same date as St. Martin at Angers, founded in 819, and Germigny-sur-Loire, dedicated in 806, have central towers.

In the countries where the Eastern church was predominant towers do not appear to have been built in connexion with churches until a late period. An exceptional instance is that of the erection of a bell-tower at St. Sophia, in Constantinople, between 867 and 880, by the emperor Basil, to receive bells sent to him by Orso, Doge of Venice; at no time do they appear to have been commonly built. The central cupola is, however, in the mediæval churches of the Byzantine type so much elevated as to present something of the appearance of an octagonal tower. [A. N.]

TRACT. [GRADUAL, § v. p. 747.]

TRACTORIAE. [COUNCIL, p. 475.]

TRACTUS. [PSALMODY, p. 1745.]

TRADES (including PROFESSIONS). The only pursuits absolutely interdicted by the church were those associated with idolatry, such as statuary and painting (so far as they involved the fashioning of idols or the representation of false divinities), or those of a directly immoral tendency, such as the theatrical profession, as practised in these times. [ACTORS, THEATRE.] Tertullian (de Idololat. c. 6), in condemning the trade in idols, replies to the supposed excuse: "Facio, sed non colo," by asking how it is possible "to disavow in speech what we confess with the hand, to destroy with words what we construct by our actions, to proclaim but one God and to make many?" The artificer, he affirms, is even more culpable than the priest: "plus es illis quam sacerdos, cum per te habeant sacerdotem" (Migne, i. 668). On like grounds, he condemns with equal severity the trade in incense, a peculiarly lucrative one in his day; and he concludes that every art, profession, and trade which ministers to idol worship is itself a species of idolatry.

As regarded other ordinary modes of money-making, they were in no way looked upon by the early church as incompatible with the duties of the Christian life. Tertullian, when repudiating the notion that Christianity involved a withdrawal from ordinary society, says (Apol. c. 42), "we carry on trades among you" (i.e. among the pagan world of the 3rd century). Eusebius (Dem. Evang. i. 8; Migne, Series Graeca, xxii. 30) says that the pursuits of agriculture, of the market-place, and of civic industry generally, are perfectly compatible with a God-fearing life. The only requirements of the church, indeed, in these relations, appear to have been honesty and moderation. Tertullian (de Patientiâ, c. 7) contrasts the impatience of the pagan trader under losses, and the eager desire of gain which seemed to hold it preferable to life itself, with the Christian view which teaches us to prefer our spiritual welfare to the acquirement of wealth (Migne, i. 1262; Cyprian, de Orat. Dom. c. 20). Cyprian (de Lapsis, c. 6) states that many bishops in his time had abandoned their sacred profession to seek the acquirement of wealth in distant provinces, attending markets, and even lending out money on usury: "negotiationis quaestuosae nundinas aucupari . . . . . usuris multiplicantibus foenus augere" (Migne, iv. 183).

It is, however, to be remembered that, according to the traditions of the empire, all trades were looked upon as unworthy of a free citizen and, to some extent, disreputable. It is probable, therefore, that in the earlier centuries they were largely carried on by Christians. Justin Martyr (ad Zenam et Serenam, c. 17) repudiates the notion that Christians should be ashamed to labour for fear of sinking in public estimation. The Apostolic Constitutions (iv. 11) enjoin that children shall be taught some useful art. The legislation of the state, after the recognition of Christianity, does not appear to indicate a juster sense of the dignity of labour; and the removal of the capital to Constantinople was followed by a marked decline in the commercial prosperity of the empire. "The humble and honest occupation of the shopkeeper," says Finlay, "was treated as a dishonourable profession, and his condition was rendered doubly contemptible. He was made the serf of the corporation in which he was inscribed, and his industry was fettered by restrictions which compelled him to remain in poverty" (Hist. of Greece, ed. Tozer, i. 117; Cod. Theod. IX. xxiii. 1). St. Basil (Hom. 3 in Hexaemeron) says in one of his sermons that he is aware that there are present among his audience a good many artisans (τεχνῖται τῶν βαναύσων τεχνῶν) who are wanting to get away to their work, and are consequently anxious for him to shorten his discourse (Migne, S. G. xxix. 22). It is evident, however, that the untruthfulness in which traders habitually indulged often made commercial pursuits difficult for a Christian. Augustine, in commenting on the 15th verse of Psalm lxxi. (Septuag. Vers. No. lxx.), and adopting the reading of the Septuagint—"for I am not acquainted with the ways of men"—renders the Greek word πραγματείας by "negotiatores," and says: "Audiant negotiatores, et mutent vitam." He then proceeds to point out that trading and truth-telling are not incompatible. He supposes the "negotiator" to urge in his defence that the labourer is worthy of his hire; and that bringing, as he does, his wares from a distance to supply a public want, he is entitled to a profit. But this, replies Augustine, is not the point in question, "agitur de mendacio, de perjurio;" and he maintains that the vice is not inherent in the transaction, but is the fault of the vendor. He advises him to confess candidly what he has given for his wares, and to state what he demands as his fair profit: "Possem enim dicere, Tanto emi, sed tanto vendam; si placet, eme." He thinks that tradesmen who acted thus would greatly increase their custom. He also rebukes with severity another common phase of mercantile disingenuousness; as, for example, when a shoemaker, on receiving an order for a pair of shoes, promises them by a certain time; but, on receiving further orders, puts the first order aside and disappoints his customer (Migne, xxxvii. 886).

In the West, by a series of changes which cannot be very clearly discerned, we find that in the 5th century a remarkable change had taken place in the respect paid to labour. Trades and crafts formerly carried on almost exclusively by slaves are to be found, especially in the municipal cities of Gaul, in the hands of free men who united themselves in corporations for the protection of their interests (Guizot, Hist. de la Civilisat. i. 52).

The following examples are given by Martigny from various collections of inscriptions in the catacombs and elsewhere, which illustrate the occupations pursued by Christians in the earlier centuries:—

Of a "rationalis," or collector of taxes (Aringhi, i. 406); of a "scutarius," or maker of shields (ib. 117); of dealers in purple (cf. Acts xvi. 14), of silversmiths, blacksmiths, carpenters, lapidaries, potters, tanners, tent-makers, weavers, colliers, and fishermen (see Lami, de Erudit. Apost. p. 184). Marchi (Monumenti delle Arte Crist. p. 26) gives an epitaph of a female vendor of barley, and (p. 28) that of a "lintearius," or linen-weaver. De Rossi (i. 212) furnishes us with that of a baker—BITALIS PISTOR; and that of a "pastellarius," or maker of rolls, is found after the 5th century; that of one Marcellus, patron of the corporation of the "pastellarii," is given by Muratori (527, v). We find also epitaphs of one Lucilius Victorinus, a manufacturer of dice—ARTIS TESSALARIE LUSORIE (Boldetti, p. 416); of a "confectorarius," or pork butcher (Muratori, cmliv. 5), and find from Gruter (cccixi. 5) that the "confectorarii" formed a corporation along with the "suarii," or dealers in swine; of a "capsarius" (Marchi, p. 27), or keeper of the clothes at a public bath; of a sculptor, with design of his chisel and puncheon (Rossi, i. 188); of a painter, with similar designs of compass, puncheon, and brushes (Marangoni, Acta S. Vict. p. 125); of a public measurer of corn, accompanied by designs of a "modius" full of wheat, and a measuring rod (Lupi, Sev. Epitaph. p. 51); of a "faber," with the design of a shovel; of a Christian lady, SEVERA SELEUCIANE, on whose tomb there is the design of a weaving loom (Lupi, Opp. Laud. pp. 28, 29); designs of combs (ib. pp. 22, 29, 30) designate "lanarius pectinarius." Fabretti (Insc. Ant. Explic. p. 574) shews us a poor "colonus" named Leon. Perret (V. lii.) gives us the representation of a sower. Marini (Iscriz. Alban. p. 188) supplies us with the only known example of a "pincerna," or cupbearer, though Lami (de Erud. Apost. p. 230) says that this was an office often filled by Christians. The "fossores," who prepared the tombs in the catacombs, are frequently represented by a spade, or some other implement of their profession (Boldetti, pp. 53, 59, 65; Perret, i. 30). Boldetti (p. 184) gives a design which he supposed to represent an instrument of martyrdom, but which De Rossi (Bollettino, 1864, p. 36) has explained as designed for a dentist's instrument for extracting teeth with an extracted tooth by the side.

The evidence with respect to professions has an almost entirely different significance. The military profession and those of the "grammaticus," the "rhetor," and the jurist, were generally held in high honour, and instances of Christians in these, during the earlier centuries, are comparatively rare. In the legal profession there occur the names of Minucius Felix, the senators Hippolytus and Apollonius (Baldin. Praef. in Minuc. Fel.), and Tertullian, according to Eusebius (H. E. v. 21), was distinguished by his knowledge of Roman law. De Rossi (i. 64) gives an inscription on the tomb of a Christian jurisconsult, which records that he was honoured by the friendship of Constantine during the emperor's sojourn in Rome. The profession of the healing art, often adopted by slaves, appears to have been far more common among Christians. The name of St. Luke at once suggests itself. Boldetti (p. 416 et pass.) gives a large number of inscriptions of this class. Reinesius gives the epitaph of one Alexander, a physician, who is said to have been ΧΡΙΣΤΙΑΝΟΣ ΚΑΙ ΠΝΕΥΜΑΤΙΚΟΣ (Syntag. 898, v.), the latter probably denoting that he belonged to a class of empirics who in their diagnosis profess to refer every symptom to the πνεῦμα. Aringhi (i. 415) gives the epitaph of one Timothy, an "archiatrus" or "princeps medicorum," an officer who was also physician in ordinary to the emperor. Christian freedmen appear as discharging, in the service of the emperor or of senators, the offices of secretary "commentariensis" (Lami, de Erudit. Apost. p. 250), of "librarius" or copyist; of "tabellarius" or courier who carried despatches (Passionei, 124, n. 84), of "arcarius" or treasurer, and "cubicularius" or groom of the bedchamber. Lucian, head of the "cubicularii" of Diocletian's palace, was instrumental in the conversion of many to the Christian faith (Tillemont, Hist. Eccl. v. 7, 8, 180). An instance of a Christian holding the office of "scrinarius" or keeper of the archives, an important function, and one involving considerable attainments, occurs in Aringhi (i. 415). The father of St. Basil was a teacher of rhetoric equally famed for his eloquence and his Christian virtues. The profession of a "grammaticus" was not common among the earlier Christians, probably on account of its association with pagan observances (see SCHOOLS). De Rossi (i. 1242) gives us the epitaph of a "magister ludi" and also (i. 1167) that of a "magister ludi litterarii." The military profession, though often disavowed by certain sects and by individuals, does not appear, at any time, to have been actually forbidden by the church (see WAR, and, for other points connected with the whole subject, COMMERCE). [J. B. M.]

TRADITIO SYMBOLI, the solemn delivery of the creed to the catechumens as their baptism drew nigh. We only read of it in connexion with the more numerous baptisms of Easter Eve, but it is certain that a similar discipline prevailed with reference to those of Whitsun Eve. At Rome it took place on a day appointed by notice in the fourth week of Lent (Ordo Scrutinii, 6, in Mus. Ital. ii. 79). Wednesday was the usual day (Assemani, Codex Liturg. i. 93, "feria quarta, seu illa feria;" see Amalarius, de Eccl. Off. i. 8; Ordo Rom. in Hittorp, Eccl. Cath. Off. 31, ed. 1). At Milan the [illegible] was given on Saturday in Passion-week (See SABBATUM, &c., p. 1827). In Gaul, before the Roman scrutinium and other rites were forced on the national churches (Capit. Reg. Franc. v. 372), Palm Sunday was the day universally observed. This appears from the internal evidence of the "Missae in Symboli Traditione" in the Gallican sacramentaries, which refer to the entry into Jerusalem (Miss. Goth. in Lit. Gall. 235; Miss. Gall. Vet. ib. 346; Sacram. Gall. in Mus. Ital. i. 314), and from the thirteenth canon of Agde, A.D. 506. The lessons or Palm Sunday in the Gallican lectionary (Lit. Gall. 127) are obviously chosen with an eye to this rite (Jer. xxx. 1–34; Heb. x. 3–34; John xii. 1–24). In Gothic Spain it took place on the same day (Isid. Hispal. de Eccl. Off. i. 27), but not everywhere in Spain; for the council of Braga (now in Portugal) in 572 (can. 1) says that the creed is to be taught the catechumens "in the twenty days" before their baptism. The traditio, then, was some three weeks before Easter, in which the church of western Spain seems to have agreed, or nearly agreed, with the churches of Greece and Asia. There has been a controversy about the time of the traditio in proconsular Africa. The Benedictine editors of St. Augustine infer from his language in Serm. 212 "in Traditione Symboli," that it took place "die ante Pascha serius ocius quinto decimo" (note u. s.), while Martene argues from the same premises that it was "sabbato ante dominicam quartam quadragesimae" (De Ant. Eccl. Rit. I. i. 11, n. 11). The redditio or repetition of it to the bishop was eight days later when the catechumens received the Lord's Prayer, and again on Easter Eve before their baptism (Aug. Serm. 58, §§ 1, 13).

We have also less precise information on the practice of the Greek and Oriental churches than on those of Gaul, Spain and Italy. St. Jerome, A.D. 397, writing in Palestine, says, "Consuetudo autem apud nos istiusmodi est, ut his qui baptizandi sunt per xl. dies publice tradamus sanctam et adorandam Trinitatem." From this we should infer that the creed was delivered at the beginning of Lent, unless, which seems improbable, it was only imparted piecemeal during the whole course of it. We find Cyril of Jerusalem, A.D. 347, explaining the first article of it in his fourth catechetical lecture delivered not far from the beginning of that season, and in the fourteen that follow dealing with doctrines exclusively Christian.

The only early notice of time in the church of Constantinople with which I am able to meet occurs in the statement of Theodorus Lector, that before the time of Timotheus, A.D. 511, the Nicene creed was "recited only once in the year, viz. on the holy day of preparation (parasceve) of the divine Passion at the time of the catechisings held by the bishop" (Hist. Eccl. ii. 32). We can only suggest that the Apostles' creed was used in earlier catechisings by the priests.

The delivery of the creed was in the Latin church preceded by a short address, "praefatio symboli" (Sacram. Gelas.; Assemani, Codex Liturg. i. 11; Ord. Scrut. 6, u. s.; Miss. Gall. Vet. in Lit. Gall. 339; Sacram. Gall. in Mus. Ital. i. 310. Comp. Catech. Graec. Ass. 111).

It was afterwards explained in detail (Aug. Serm. 214; the Sacramentaries, u. s.). St. Augustine has three sermons (212, 213, 214) "in Traditione Symboli;" but the office books give forms to be used on the occasion.

According to the earlier Roman ritual the creed was said in Greek over the male candidates, and in Latin over the female (Martene, u. s., I. i. 12, ord. 2 (MS. Gellon); Pontif. Pictav. ib. ord. 3; ord. 4, ad Scrut. MS. Wertin. ib. &c.). In the Gallican it was said in Latin only, but over each sex (Miss. Gall. Vet. u. s. 340; Jesse Ambianensis, de Baptismo, § 1). In the Gelasian Sacramentary, as we have it, it is given both in Latin and Greek, but both are said over all the candidates.

The day on which the delivery took place was called by the Latins "Dies in Apertione Aurium" (Sacram. Gelas. i. 34; Murat. i. 537; Miss. Gall. Vet. in Lit. Gall. 342; Jesse Amb. u. s., &c.) It had a proper mass, "Missa in Symboli Traditione" (Miss. Goth. u. s. 235; Gall. Vet. 346; Sacram. Gall. u. s. 314; Miss. Ambros. u. s. 336).

The creed used was at first everywhere a form identical with or closely akin to the Apostles' creed (Miss. Gall. Vet. u. s. 348; Sacr. Gall. u. s. 312; Isid. Hispal. de Eccl. Off. ii. 22; Raban. Maur. de Instit. Cler. i. 27; Ord. Rom. Bernoldi in Hittorp. de Eccl. Off. 32, ed. 1; Ordd. 9, 10 in Martene, u. s., "Credo in Deum," &c.); but when the Nicene creed was generally adopted into the liturgies it was also chosen in many churches for the instruction and profession of catechumens (see for the Latin, Sacram. Gelas. Assem. u. s. 11; Greg. ib. 22; Ord. Scrut. 97; Ord. 5 in Martene, u. s.; for the Greek, Assem. u. s. 114, 138; Armenian, ib. 172; Syrian, 212, 238, 252, 271). There is early evidence of the Greek use of this creed, as in the statement of Theodore already quoted. The council of Constantinople, A.D. 518, speak of it as "the holy symbol in which we were baptized and do baptize" (Epist. Sym. ad Joan., Labb. Conc. v. 166). Some monks memorialising a later council at the same place (A.D. 536) express themselves in the same manner (ib. 172). Similarly, Caesar Basiliscus writing to Timothy Aelurus, "The symbol of the 318 fathers . . . into which we and all who have believed before us have been baptized" (Evagrius, Hist. Eccl. iii. 4). The Copts use a short form declaring belief in the Three Persons of the Trinity (Assem. i. 159). In one Latin Ordo an option is given, "Credo in Deum" or "Credo in Unum Deum" (Martene, a. s. ord. 4). [W. E. S.]

TRADITORES. Those who in the time of the Diocletian persecution delivered up their Bibles, and sacred utensils for destruction: "Post Cypriani mortem 40 annis peractis traditio codicum facta est, unde coeperunt appellari traditores" (Aug. de Bapt. contr. Donat. vii. 2). The charge of betraying sacred books was urged in turn against the Catholics and the Donatists (Aug. Epp. l., clxii., clxiv., De Verb. Dom. xviii. 19; Contra Cresconium. iii. 27). The first council of Arles, A.D. 314 (c. 13), held immediately after the persecution, decreed that any clergyman convicted, not by hearsay but by manifest acts, of having betrayed either the sacred Scriptures or the church vessels or the names of the brethren, was to be deposed. TRANSENNA. In classical usage "transenna" stands for any piece of reticulated work, either a net or snare for catching birds (Plaut. Bacchis, iv. 6, 22; Persa, iv. 3, 11; Rudens, iv. 7, 10), or a wicker hurdle, or lattice, or anything imitating that form. In this sense it was applied to a carved grating filling up the aperture of a window, admitting the light, but hindering those outside from looking in, called by the Greeks δικτυωτόν. An example of this arrangement is to be seen in the church of Sylvester, below that of St. Martino ai Monti, in Rome. "Per transennam aspicere" was a common Latin proverb found in Cicero (de Oratore, lib. i. c. 35).

Paulinus of Nola also describes the "transenna" as adapted to a window opening, "laetissimo vero conspectu tota haec basilica, aperitur tribus arcubus paribus perlucente transenna" (Epist. 12, ad Sever.).

In Christian Antiquities "transenna" is applied to the carved marble gratings used both to fill up the openings of the "cancelli" in the churches and oratories (precisely as in those of the secular basilicas, of which an excellent example has been found in the recently excavated "basilica Jovis" on the Palatine Hill), and to protect the shrines of the martyrs from too rude handling, while they afforded a distant and mysterious view of the sacred treasures, and allowed handkerchiefs and napkins called "brandea" to be put through the lattice work, and bring back healing virtue from contact with the consecrated coffer. A "transenna" in this last sense was completed of pure silver by Sixtus III. about the tomb of St. Lawrence, "ornavit transennam et altare et confessionem sancti martyris Laurentii" (Anastas. in Sixto III. § 65). The design of a "transenna" discovered in the cemetery of St. Callistus is given by Boldetti (Osservaz. p. 35). One published by De Rossi (Inscr. Christian. tom. i. proleg. cxv. Northcote, ed. 2, pl. ix.) bears a curious inscription of the end of the 3rd century, together with an earlier one partially obliterated. From the former we learn that it was originally prepared by a heathen lady for the reception of her own epitaph. It was subsequently taken possession of, as the later inscription records, by a deacon named Severus, who clumsily set it horizontally instead of vertically, to guard the aperture of a "cubiculum duplex cum arcosolio et luminare" constructed for himself and his family by the permission of pope Marcellinus. This "transenna," which is one of elegant design, measures 6 feet by 3 feet. The inscriptions are on a plain oblong slab in the centre. The design of the "transennae" of the "cancelli" and of the altar of what is known as the papal crypt in the cemetery of St. Callistus, has been faithfully restored by De Rossi from the fragments discovered, and the supposed arrangement is given (tav. I, A. of the second volume of his Roma Sotterranea. See woodcut). The use of the "transenna" to fence in the "confessio" is still seen at St. Clement's. Perret gives beautiful examples from St. Priscilla and St. Helena.

Transenna. (Roma Sotterranea (pl. ix. new edition).

The life of Stephen IV. (Anastas. § 274) affords an instance of the use of the word in its first meaning as a fence. A presbyter named Waldepertus, who had fled for refuge to the church of St. Mary ad Martyres, was dragged out and thrown "juxta transennam campi Laterani," where his eyes were dug out.

TRANSFIGURATION (IN ART). This event in our Lord's history had no place in the ordinary cycles of art representations in the early church. It occurs, however, two or three times in mosaics, and has been found in some minor works of art. The most remarkable is that of the 6th century at St. Apollinare in Classe, already described in the article MOSAICS (p. 1333). Here the representation is almost entirely symbolical. A jewelled cross within a circle of glory occupies the central place, on either side demi-figures of Moses and Elias float in clouds, while three sheep among the trees on the hill below represent the apostles. The Transfiguration is also depicted in a mosaic of the 6th century in the chapel of the convent of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai (La Borde, Voyage dans l'Arabie), and in an ill-designed clumsy work of the 8th century in the church of SS. Nereus and Achilleus at Rome (MOSAICS, p. 1333). Martigny states that Millin mentions the subject being found on a sarcophagus at Ostia, but he gives no reference to the place. Raoul Rochette speaks of it as being seen on a lamp discovered in a catacomb at Corneto (see also D'Agincourt, Sculpt. lxii. no. 24, 28). [E. V.]

TRANSFIGURATION OF CHRIST, commemorated July 14 (Cal. Armen.); Aug. 6 (Cal. Byzant.; Cal. Ethiop.; Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 265; Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

TRANSITORIUM, the anthem sung after the communion (see COMMUNIO, p. 412) in the Ambrosian liturgy (Radulphus Tungr. de Canonum Observ. Prop. 23, in Max. Bibloth. Vet. Patr. xxvi. 319). It is so called because, while it is being sung, the priest leaves his place and "transfert missale ad aliam partem altaris" (Rubr. in Missali Ambr. A.D. 1669; Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. I. iv. 12, n. 3). See an example in Pamelius, Liturgica, i. 305. [W. E. S.]

TREASURER. [OECONOMUS.]

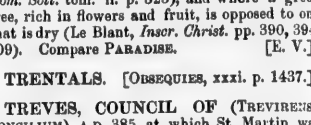
TRECENSE CONCILIUM. [TROYES.]

TREES IN ART. The trees so frequently seen in the early Christian mosaics and frescoes, and on gilded glasses, sarcophagi, and other objects of art, are commonly, as Bosio acknowledges (lib. iv. c. 44), simply ornamental accessories devoid of any symbolical meaning, though in some cases it is probable that we may not be wrong in regarding them as typical of the Tree of Life, an emblem of immortality, and of Christians as trees of the Lord's planting. This is certainly the case with the palm-tree. [PALM TREE.] The trees between which the Good Shepherd is often placed, sometimes with the adjuncts of birds and a milk-pail (Perret, Catacombes, V. pl. xlviii., lxxvii.; Agincourt, iv. vii. 10), may be safely regarded as decorative, though a symbolical meaning may be easily read into them. The same may be said of the trees which accompany the raising of Lazarus, sometimes growing out of the tomb (Buonarruoti, tav. vii. 2) or in part of it (Bottari, tav. vii. 2), and of those between which the "orantes" often stand; sometimes with a lamb on either side (Perret, V. v.). St. Agnes is so depicted (Buonarruoti, tav. xviii.–xxi.; Bottari, tav. xcvii. 4). The symbolical reference is more unmistakable when a tree or a branch is depicted between A and Ω (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. tom. ii. p. 323), and where a green tree, rich in flowers and fruit, is opposed to one that is dry (Le Blant, Inscr. Christ. pp. 390, 394, 409). Compare PARADISE. [E. V.]

TRENTALS. [OBSEQUIES, xxxi. p. 1437.]

TREVES, COUNCIL OF (TREVIRENSE CONCILIUM), A.D. 385, at which St. Martin was beguiled into being present, when Ithacius, the accuser of Priscillian, was acquitted, and Felix ordained bishop of Treves. (Mansi, iii. 679–84.) [E. S. Ff.]

TRIANGLE. For this emblem, which is rarely used in the early church, and has been little noticed in consequence, Martigny refers almost entirely to a learned article by M. de Rossi, in the Spicilegium Solesmense, vol. iv. p. 497, on some inscriptions from Carthage.



Triangle. (Martigny, p. 641.)

These examples are almost the only ones known. [See MONOGRAM.] The first will be found in Aringhi (Rom. Subt. i. p. 605), the second and third are Lupi's (Sev. Epitaph. pp. 64, 102), the fourth in Boldetti's Cimit. p. 402. The fifth and sixth, with the monogram and enclosing the A and ω were found by De Rossi in a MS. of the Barberini library, and published by M. E. Le Blant (Inscr. chrét. de la Gaule, t. i. p. 107), the last is on the fifth of the former's African marbles (in the Spicilegium).

Three fishes arranged in the form of a triangle are represented in Munter's Sinnbilder, p. 49, tab. i. 26. And, as Martigny observes, all the triangles are closely connected with the Monogram, the special symbol or name of the Second Person of the Holy Trinity. [R. St. J. T.]

TRIBIMAEUS, Mar. 1, martyr at Perga with Nestor under Decius (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

TRIBUNAL. [IMMUNITIES; JURISDICTION; LAW.]

TRIFORIUM. It is defined by Ducange as a kind of gallery or arcade, which is carried all round a church, in order to furnish means of circulation about the church above the principal arcade. The same writer derives the name from the fact that in the earlier forms of the triforium the wall had a triple perforation between each pair of the great columns below. Structurally the triforium is the roof-space of a lean-to aisle. It is pronounced by Viollet-le-Duc (Dictionnaire de l'Architecture, s. v.) to be a tradition of the gallery (ambulatorium) of the first story of the Roman basilica. The name he says was introduced into the vocabulary of architecture by English archaeologists. Besides its purpose of a passage to which Ducange appears to limit the triforium, Viollet-le-Duc speaks of its being used for the congregation in the larger cathedrals on the occasion of a great solemnity.

[H. T. A.]

TRINITY, THE HOLY (IN ART). The early Christians shrank from representing God the Father in human form, much more from a pictorial representation of the Holy Trinity. The TRIANGLE was used to symbolize it, but even of this early examples are not common.

But the appearance of the three angels to Abraham (Gen. xviii.) was commonly regarded by the ancients as a manifestation of the Holy Trinity, and it is no doubt as such that it is represented in a mosaic of S. Maria Maggiore, a work of the 5th century (Ciampini, Vet. Monim. I. tab. li. 1).

In representations of the baptism of the Lord by St. John, the presence of the Father is frequently indicated by a hand appearing from a cloud, while the Holy Spirit appears as a dove [DOVE, p. 576]. Such a picture Paulinus describes in the church of St. Felix at Nola. The abbé Martigny sees also a representation of the Trinity in a mosaic of the 6th century in the church of SS. Cosmas and Damian (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. tab. xvi.), where the Lord stands teaching; a hand from above suspends a crown over His head, while a dove, the head surrounded with rays, flies towards him. On a sarcophagus recently discovered, and now in the Lateran Museum, three bearded persons — probably representing the Trinity—are engaged in the creation of Eve. This is said to be of the latter half of the 4th century (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v. Trinité). [C.]

TRIODION (Τριῴδιον). One of the ecclesiastical books of the Eastern church containing the offices from Septuagesima Sunday to Easter-Eve. It derives its name from the fact that while hymns in honour of our Lord, the B. V. M., and other saints had usually nine strophes (ὠδαί), during this period of the year they have only three. Hence lxx. Sunday is sometimes called simply "Triodium." A detailed and hostile examination of the contents of this book has been written by the Roman Catholic Leo Allatius de Lib. Eccles. Graec. Hamburgi, 1712; Neale (J. M.), Holy Eastern Church, Introd. p. 857. [F. E. W.]

TRIPHO. [TRYPHO.]

TRIPHONIA, wife of Decius Caesar, commemorated on Oct 18 (Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Wand., Notker.). [C. H.]

TRIPODES, June 10, martyr with Basilides and Madales under Aurelian at Rome (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom.). [C. H.]

TRIPODIUM. This word occurs in a description of a Gospel procession in a passage quoted by Martene (de Antiq. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. v. 2) from an ancient Tours ritual. It was probably a triangular stand, on which the Evangelistarium rested while the Gospel was being read.

[F. E. W.]

TRISAGION (Τρισάγιον). A hymn sung in the Eastern liturgies during the Little Entrance. It derives its name from the nature of its wording, "Ἅγιος ὁ Θεός, "Ἅγιος Ἰσχυρός, "Ἅγιος ἀθάνατος ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς. It is also called τοῦ τρισαγίου δοξολογία, and τριαδὴ τοῦ ἁγιασμοῦ τῆς θείας ὑμνολογίας ἐκβόησις. It is said to have been first introduced into the Liturgy in the reign of the younger Theodosius (408–450), but it is probably much older. The legend of its being supernaturally communicated to the terror-stricken population of Constantinople during an earthquake in the episcopate of St. Proclus (A.D. 434) is preserved by many writers (Joan. Damasc. de Fid. Orthodox. iii. 10). Peter the Fuller at Antioch (ob. 477) added the words ὁ σταυρωθεὶς δι' ἡμᾶς. His successor neutralised this Patripassian addition by inserting Χριστὲ βασιλεῦ; but neither phrase obtained a permanent footing, although the emperor Anastasius (A.D. 491–518) tried to impose the acceptance of Peter's heretical formula which was adopted by the Syrian Monophysites (Bingham, Antiq. xiv. ii. 3; Robertson, (J. C.) Hist. of the Christian Church, i. 527, ed. 1864; Martene, de Antiq. Eccl. Rit. lib. iv. c. 23). In the West it forms part of the Improperia on Good Friday, where it is placed in some of the earliest extant service books of Troyes, Poictiers (ὐ.). The Εὐχὴ τοῦ Τρισαγίου was the prayer said by the priest (μυστικῶς, secrete), while the trisagion was being sung. For the Latin Sanctus or Tersanctus, with which the Trisagion is sometimes confused, see PREFACE, p. 1696.

[F. E. W.]

TRIUMPHAL ARCH. The name given to the large arch at the altar end of the nave in the early basilicas, separating it from the transept or from the sacrarium. Of this arrangement we have examples in the basilicas of St. Paul's outside the walls, St. Praxedes, and in the original church of St. Peter's. The application of the name is also extended to the great arch of the apse. These arches are often supported with lofty columns of precious marbles, and have the spandrils and soffites richly decorated with mosaic pictures. [E. V.]

TROJANUS, bishop of Saintes, commemorated on Nov. 30 (Mart. Usuard., Adon.); Feb. 10 (Notker.). [C. H.]

TROPARION (τροπάριον). A generic name for all the short hymns which abound in the offices of the Eastern church (Neale, J. M., Eastern Church, Introd. pp. 832, 918).

[F. E. W.]

TROPHIMUS (1), Apr. 14, commemorated with Aristarchus and Pudens, "apostles" (Cal. Byzant.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.); Apr. 15 (Basil. Menol.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 257); Dec. 29 as bishop of Arles (Mart. Usuard., Vet. Rom., Wand., Rom.).

(2) Martyr with Thalaeus or Thalus under Diocletian, commemorated on Mar. 11 (Menol. Graec.; Mart. Rom.); Mar. 16 (Basil. Menol.).

(3) July 23, martyr with Theophilus under Diocletian (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet. Mart. Rom.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 264).

(4) Sept. 19, martyr with Serapion, or Saoeatius, and Dorymedon, under Probus (Cal. Byzant.; Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec.; Mart. Rom.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 269). [C. H.]

TROYES, COUNCIL OF (TRECENSE CONCILIUM), A.D. 429, from which Lupus, bishop of Troyes, and Germanus, bishop of Auxerre, were sent, at a request of the British church, on a mission into Great Britain to assist in confuting Pelagianism. (Mansi, iv. 543; Haddan and Stubbs, COUNCILS, etc. i. 16–18.) [E. S. Ff.]

TRUDO (ST. TRUYEN), presbyter and confessor at Hasbanium (Haspengaw), commemorated on Nov. 23 (Mart. Usuard., Hieron., Wand., Rom.). [C. H.]

TRULLUS, a Latinised form of the low Greek τροῦλλα or τροῦλλος = θόλος, a hemispherical roof or dome. The covering of the cupola of the church of SS. Cosmas and Damian at Rome by pope Sergius I. is thus recorded in Anastasius (§ 163), "trullum ejusdem ecclesiae fusis chartis plumbeis cooperuit et munivit." The anonymous writer (de locis Hierosol. § 1) describes the church of the Holy Sepulchre as being στρογγυλοειδής, and as having τροὺλλας δύο. The Quinisext council has gained the name of "Trullan" or "in trullo" from having been held in a large domed hall in the imperial palace at Constantinople (cf. Ducange, Constantinop. Christiana, lib. ii. c. 4, § 20; lib. iii. c. 33). [CONSTANTINOPLE, COUNCIL OF (34), p. 444.] Codinus gives the name "trulla" to the silk cap or turban worn by the chief imperial secretary (De Offic. c. iv. p. 22, ed. Bonn). [E. V.]

TRUMPET. The Egyptian monks appear to have used a trumpet as the call to prayer, probably in imitation of the trumpets by which the Israelites were summoned to their solemn assemblies. Thus Pachomius (Regula, c. 3) bids every monk to leave his cell as soon as he heard the sound of the trumpet summoning him to divine service. And the same usage is mentioned by Joannes Climacus (Scala Paradisi, Grad. 19) as prevailing at the convent on Mount Sinai in the 6th century. Perhaps the custom was then general in Egypt and Palestine (Bingham, Antiq. VIII. viii. 15; Martene, de Rit. Antiq. IV. ii. 9). [C.]

TRYPHO (TRIPHO) (1), Jan. 4, martyr in Africa with Aquilinus and others (Mart. Usuard., Hieron., Adon., Notker., Rom.).

(2) Feb. 1, martyr in Phrygia under Decius (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec.). At Constantinople were two churches dedicated to him by Justinian and Justin II. respectively (Codinus, de Aedif. p. 5, p. 100, Bonn; Procop. de Aedif. lib. i. cap. 9, p. 201, Bonn; Du Cange, Cpolis. Christ. lib. iv. 140), and in 536 a monastery is mentioned (Mansi, viii. 907 c).

(3) July 3, martyr with ten others at Alexandria (Mart. Usuard., Hieron., Rom.). [C. H.]

TULLENSE CONCILIUM. [TOUL.]

TUNICA. Any description of the tunica in its ordinary classical sense is foreign to our purpose; and its diminutive tunicella (whence the English tunicle, and less correctly tunacle) does not occur within our assigned period, it's later special use being for the vestment of the subdeacon at the Eucharist (see e.g. Durandus, Rat. Div. Off. iii. 11. 3).

One or two instances, however, of the word tunica in early Christian writings must be noticed. The tunica was one of the articles of dress provided by the Rule of St. Benedict for his monks (c. 55, Patrol. lxvi. 771). It seems to have been much the same as the Colobion (see the article), a tight-fitting garment, short-sleeved or sleeveless. Later on, we find the tunica as an article of sacerdotal dress. Here it is a kind of upper shirt, worn over the camisia, and of course under the casula. Two tunicae might be worn, an upper and an under one (Amalarius, de Div. Off. ii. 22; Patrol. cv. 1097). The word often occurs in the Vulgate as a translation of χιτὼν, and thus our Lord's "coat without seam" becomes tunica inconsutilis. For the legend in connexion with this, see e.g. Greg. Turon. de Gloria Martyrum, i. 8; Fredegarius, Chronicon, c. 11 (Patrol. lxxi. 712, 614). [R. S.]

TUNSIO PECTORIS. (1) St. Augustine more than once alludes to the beating of the breast by priests and people at the recital of the petition of the Lord's Prayer, "Forgive us our trespasses" [LORD'S PRAYER, p. 1058].

(2) It was also usual in some churches to beat the breast when the Agnus Dei was said (Martene, de Rit. Antiq. i. 158, ed. Venet. 1783). [C.]

TURBO, Jan. 17, martyr with Speusipppus and his brothers (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

TURIANUS, bishop and confessor in Brittany, commemorated on July 13 (Mart. Usuard., Rom.). [C. H.]

TURIN, COUNCIL OF (TAURINE[illegible] CILIUM), A.D. 400 or 401, assembled[illegible] request of the bishops of France, for c[illegible] a difference between the metropolitans of Arles and Vienne respecting the primacy which each claimed. Eight canons are embodied in their synodical letter. (Mansi, iii. 859–66.) [E. S. Ff.]

TURRIS, a pix of precious metal for the reservation of the consecrated bread in the Eucharist, formed in the shape of a tower, as other similar vessels were fashioned in the shape of a dove (DOVE, EUCHARISTIC). In the Greek church πύργος was used for the ciborium (Ducange, Const. Christ. iii. 62). Paulus Silentiarius writes of St. Sophia (ii. 303), > χρυσείῃς δ' ἐφύπερθε πανάχραντοιο τραπέζης

> ἄσπετος εὐρυπέλαυθον ἐς ἤερα πύργος ἀνέστη.

Smaller towers were employed as reliquaries. Not unfrequently the dove and the tower were conjoined. Conical vessels surmounted by a dove appear in the 6th century mosaics at St. Apollinare in Classe at Ravenna (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. c. 12). There is also a doubtful example on a sarcophagus (Bottari, tav. xix.). The two are constantly united in the catalogues of presents to the Roman churches in Anastasius; e.g. Hilary gave to the Lateran "turrim argenteam et columbam auream." Martene states that towers were hanging in his time in some of the Roman basilicas (de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i.). Gregory of Tours has (de Glor. Martyr. i. 86) "accepta turre diaconus, in qua mysterium Dominici corporis habebatur, ferre coepit ad ostium, ingressusque templum ut eam altari superponeret." The will of St. Aredius (Mabillon, Analect. tom. ii.) enumerates "turres," together with silver chalices and velvet coverings, among essential church furniture. The exposition of the ancient Gallican liturgy given by Martene (Anecdot. tom. v. col. 95) says that the body of the Lord is carried in towers, "quia monumentum Domini in similitudinem turris fuit scissum in petra," a sufficiently far-fetched and unintelligible reason. Mabillon (Mus. Ital. tom. i. p. 389) furnishes the "benedictio calicis et patenae, et turris in qua celebraturi sumus sacrosancta mysteria," and supplies a reference to the will of St. Remigius desiring "turriculam et imaginatum calicem fabricari" (Flodoard. Hist. Rem. i. 18, ii. 6).

TUSDRUM, THYSDRUS, or TISDRUS, COUNCIL OF (TUSDRENSE, or, as in the marginal references to Ferrandus, THUSDRITANUM CONCILIUM), A.D. 417, inferred from the marginal references to canons 76 and 77 in Ferrandus, and from words in the preface to the council of Telepte, A.D. 418; but see that council.

[E. S. Ff.]

TYANA, COUNCIL OF (TYANENSE CONCILIUM), A.D. 366, at which Eustathius of Sebaste, deposed at the synod of Melitena, sought to be restored to his see, which was done; but it was only followed by his relapse. (Mansi, iii. 393–8.)

[E. S. Ff.]

TYCHICUS, deacon, disciple of St. Paul, commemorated at Paphos on Apr. 29 (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Rom.); Dec. 9 with Sosthenes, Apollos, Cephas, and others (Basil. Menol.).

[C. H.]

TYPICON (τυπικόν) [=Lat. Ordinarium]. (a) One of the ecclesiastical books of the Eastern church containing the regulations and rubrics for the performance of divine service, including the Liturgy, the Hours, and other offices, with the variations to be observed on festal and ferial days throughout the year. Every church possessed its own typicum, but the edition most widely accepted was that drawn up by St. Saba for the monks at Jerusalem, and afterwards revised by Sophronius, patriarch of Constantinople and John of Damascus. A full description is given by L. Allatius (de Lib. Eccles. Graecorum Dissert. p. 1, Hamburg, 1722; Neale, J. M., Eastern Church, Introd. p. 848).

(b) Typica is also the name applied to verses selected from the Psalms to be sung on certain festivals observed in the Greek church in honour of our Lord and the B. V. M. called Despotica. Full directions are given in Goar's Euchologion, pp. 124, 186.

[F. E. W.]

TYRANNIO, Feb. 20, martyr with Silvanus, Peleus, and others under Diocletian (Mart. Usuard., Notker., Rom.).

[C. H.]

TYRE, COUNCILS OF (TYRIA or TYRIENSIA CONCILIA), A.D. 335, A.D. 449, and A.D. 518). Of these the first has become notorious for having deposed St. Athanasius on charges that turned out utterly false; but that it could have been summoned for no other purpose than to condemn him must have been clear at the time from the fact that it was chiefly composed of his enemies. All the documents relating to it are given in Mansi (ii. 1123–54), and its proceedings told clearest in Cave (Hist. Lit. i. 353). At the second Ibas, bishop of Edessa, charged by four of his presbyters with Nestorianism, was, after a full hearing, acquitted. The documents relating to it were rehearsed at the ninth and tenth sessions of the council of Chalcedon (Mansi, vi. 497, and vii. 197 et seq.). At the third the orthodox acts of a council of Constantinople three months earlier were confirmed. The synodical letter of Epiphanius, bishop of Tyre, and the other bishops with him, was rehearsed at the fifth session of a later council of Constantinople under Mennas, A.D. 558. (Mansi, viii. 577 and 1073–82; comp. art. COUNCILS OF C.)

[E. S. Ff.]

TYRSUS. [THYRSUS.]

TZANGAE (also tzancae, zanchae, zancae, zangae; τζάγγαι, τζαγγία), a kind of high boot, first apparently mentioned (with the spelling zanchae) in the letter of the emperor Gallienus (ob. A.D. 268) quoted by Trebellius Pollio, in which he enumerates a list of presents he had sent to Claudius, who afterwards succeeded him. Among these we find "Zanchas de nostris Parthicis (al. Parthicas) paria tria" (Vita Claudii, c. 17; where see Salmasius' note). Thus their foreign origin may be inferred; and probably it is on this ground that the Theodosian Code prohibits their use in Rome. A law of Honorius, promulgated in A.D. 397, threatens those who wear tzangae and braccae, intra urbem, with confiscation of property and perpetual exile (lib. xiv. tit. 10, l. 2, where see Gothofredus's note). Two years later the same law was re-issued (ib. l. 3).

This prohibition refers to persons generally, inclusive that is of laics, but at a later time we find the prohibition specially laid down for monks. The first council of Orleans (A.D. 511) forbids the use of orarii [STOLE] and tzangae to monks (can. 20; Labbe, iv. 1408). Akin to this is the order of the first council of Mâcon (A.D. 581) that the clergy shall not use "calceamenta saecularia" (can. 5; Labbe, v. 968).[a]

The Greek words often occur in Byzantine writers for boots worn by persons of high rank, especially the emperor. Codinus Curopalata (de Officiis, c. 5) describes those worn by the emperor when walking or on state occasions (πρακύψεις),[b] adding that the workman who made them for the emperor was called τζαγγάριος, not τζαγγάριος, as in the case of other people. See also Chronicon Paschale, p. 614, ed. Dindorf; Theophanes, vol. i. pp. 260, 484, 705, ed. Bekker.

The etymology of the word is quite unknown. Salmasius suggests that it is to be viewed as equivalent to a supposed form διάγχη, derived from ἄγχω, which seems most improbable.

[a] Ducange (Glossary, s.v.) cites a capitulary of Charlemagne ordering "ut clerici pampis ut tzangis vel armis non utantur" in the text, however, as given by Baluzius is read "pompis aut sagis" (Lib. vii. 398; vol. i. 1112); and, further, the whole of this part of the capitularies is considered by Pertz as spurious (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Legum, tom. ii. p. 127 in spuriis).

[b] This word literally means a kind of raised throne. See Ducange, Gloss. Graec. s.v.

Sophocles (Greek Lex. of Roman and Byzantine periods, s. v.) derives it from the Teutonic word, which appears in English in the form shank. For further notices, see Ducange's Glossaries, s. vv. [R. S.]

U

UNCTION. I. Of Persons.

(1) Of Catechumens.—(a) The practice of anointing catechumens in Africa on their first reception appears to be implied by St. Augustine when he says, in reference to the anointing with clay in John ix. 6, "When He anointed him, He perchance made him a catechumen. . . . (Tract. 44. in S. Joan. Ev. § 2). A Roman council assigned to the age of Innocent (402–416) decides, in reply to a question of some Gallican bishops, that it is sufficient to use the "exorcised oil" once before the day of baptism, viz. "at the third scrutinium" (can. 8). In Spain, Isidore of Seville, 610, who distinguishes between the catechumens and competentes, says of the former, "These are first exorcised, then they receive the salt, and are anointed" (De Eccl. Off. ii. 20). So Ildefonsus of Toledo, 657 (De Cognit. Bapt. i. 29; see Hincmar, Epist. de Baptismo, 7; Hard. Conc. v. 417). There is no trace of this rite in any extant Ordo Scrutinii. See the collection in Assemanus, Codex Liturg. i. 53–104. Only one Ordo ad faciendum Catechumenum out of ten printed by Martene (De Ant. Eccl. Rit. I. i. 7) preserves this unction (Ord. 6); but there not the ears but the breast and shoulders are touched, as in the later pre-baptismal unction.

(b) In the East we early hear of an unction with exorcised oil immediately before baptism. Thus in the Apostolical Constitutions (vii. 22): "Thou shalt first anoint him with holy oil and afterwards baptize him with water" (compare iii. 16). St. Cyril of Jerusalem, A.D. 350: "Being stripped, ye were anointed with exorcised oil from the hair on your head to the soles of your feet. After that ye were led by the hand to the holy font of baptism" (Catech. Myst. ii. 3, 4). So Chrysostom (Hom. vi. in Ep. ad Coloss. § 4); Pseudo-Dionysius (de Eccl. Hier. ii. 7). the Recognitions of Pseudo-Clement (iii. 67). This "anointing with holy oil" before the baptism is mentioned in an Egyptian story told by John Moschus, 630 (Pratum Spirit. 3).

In the Greek church there is still but one unction with exorcised oil, which takes place immediately before the baptism (Goar, Euchol. 354; Assem. ii. 141). With this agrees the Arabic office of the Greek Melchites (Assem. ii. 149). The Armenians have no such unction now. They had it, however, in the 8th century, as appears from a canon of John the Catholic printed by Mai, in which "the oil of catechumens" is expressly mentioned (Nova Collectio Script. Vet. x. ii. 304). In the Coptic church, when its constitutions were compiled, there was clearly but one unction with exorcised oil during the previous part of the baptismal office (Apost. Constit. Copt. ii. 46; Tattam's ed. 57; Boetticher's Gr. Tr. in Bunsen's Anal. Antenic. ii. 467); but in the Coptic order of baptism, as we have it, there are two (Assemani, Codex Liturg. i. 148, 163). The Abyssinians use the same order. There are two also in those of the Nestorians (ibid. i. 204; ii. 211), of the Syrians (i. 239, 254, 272, and ii. 224, 234, 240; ii. 253, 259, 285, 296, 302, 304), and of the Maronites (ii, 332, 349). In the former of these unctions the Syrian priest uses his thumb (i. 239; ii. 285).

We infer from the narrative of John Moschus that both sexes were anointed over the whole body (Prat. Spir. u. s.); and the rituals make no distinction when they prescribe the unction of the whole. See Goar, Euchol. Gr. 354; Ordo Nestor. Assem. ii. 211; Syr. 224 (Antioch.), 234 (Hieros.); 240, 259, 296, 304, 349 (Maron.). The Office of Philoxenus (240) expressly orders it in the case of females.

The unction of which we are now speaking appears to have been of much later introduction in the West. It is not noticed by the Spanish writers (Isidore, 610, De Bapt. in Eccl. Off. ii. 24; Ildefonse, 657, De Cogn. Bapt. i. 111, in Baluz. Misc. Sacra, tom. ii.). The earliest witness in Gaul is Caesarius, who died in 542: "All who are presented to the church for saving baptism receive both the chrism and the oil of benediction" (Serm. 22, § 2). Germanus of Paris, 555, mentions an unction that took place when the creed was given at baptism, but he is singular in speaking of it as an unction with proper chrism: "Catechumenis (sic) chrismate unguetur." This he expressly says was made with balsam (Epist. ii. Migne, lxxii. 96). The mistake in using chrism implies that the rite was quite recently adopted. We next read of this unction in the Besançon sacramentary found at Bobio, which is assigned to the 7th century (Mus. Ital. i. 324). Another probable Gallican witness is the author De Sacramentis: "Thou didst enter . . . Thou wast anointed as an athlete of Christ" (i. 2). This dates from about 745, if Ambrose of Cahors be the writer. It appears, however, in the Gelasian sacramentary (Liturg. Rom. Vet. Murat. i. 563), our copy of which is of the time of Charlemagne, and in some copies of the Gregorian of the 9th century (Murat. u. s. ii. 61; Pamel. Liturgicon, ii. 264; Gerbert, Monum. Vet. Liturg. Alem. i. 83; not in Ménard, Opp. Greg. Ben. iii. 70, or Rocca, Opp. Greg. 1615, v. 111). We find frequent mention of it by Gallican bishops using the Roman rites at the close of the 8th century; as Theodulf of Orleans, 794 (De Ord. Bapt. 10); Leidrad of Lyons, 798 (De Sacram. Bapt. 2); Jesse of Amiens (Epist. de Bapt. c. De Unct. Pect. &c.); Magnus of Sens (de Myst. Bapt. ad Car. Magn. printed in Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. i. 17).

This unction, as we have already mentioned, is prescribed in some of the Roman Orders of Baptism. It appears also in the Ordo ad Scrutinium printed by Assem. Cod. Lit. i. 102, and the earliest Ordo Romanus by Mabillon, Mus. Ital. ii. 24. It is found in the modern office of Milan, but as it comes before the exorcism of the child and the giving of the salt, it is rather in the place of the ancient unction of the catechumen than of that of the competent. See Assem. u. s. ii. 44. As we might expect from the silence of Isidore and Ildephonsus, it is not prescribed in the ritual of the Goths of Spain (Miss. Mozar. Leslie, 182), nor do we find it in the Gothic Gallican missal (Liturg. Gall. 248), nor in the Old Gallican (ibid. 364). The only Gallican book in which it appears is the Romanizing sacramentary of Besançon (Mus. Ital. i. 324). We remark, too, that whereas a law of Carloman in 742 only directs presbyters to obtain "new chrism" from their bishop (Cap. 3, Capit. Reg. Fr. i. 147), Pepin, who desired conformity with Rome, in 744 orders them to apply to him for both "chrism and oil" (c. 4, ibid. 158).

For the formulae used at this unction we must refer generally to the collections of Martene and Assemani as above, contenting ourselves with that anciently employed at Rome: "I anoint thee with the oil of salvation in Jesus Christ our Lord unto life everlasting" (Assem. u. s. i. 102).

(2) The Unction of the Baptized with Chrism.—According to the older Coptic rite, when the deacon and the neophyte "came out of the water, the presbyter anointed him (the neophyte) with the oil of thanksgiving, saying, I anoint thee with an anointing, with holy oil, in the name of Jesus Christ" (Constit. Eccl. Aegypt. ii. 46, Boetticher's Gr. Tr. in Bunsen, Analecta Antenic. ii. 467, or Tatham's Apost. Constit. Copt. 59). This is the only authority, if we mistake not, for this practice in the East. An unction by the officiant immediately after baptism is mentioned by Latin writers, long before we hear from them of that which immediately preceded it. It is probable that pure oil was used (as evidently in Egypt, for in the canons above cited no distinction is made between the material exorcised and that blessed for chrism), the chrism being termed oil merely by several early writers who will be quoted; but ere long a compound (μύρον) was introduced from the East,[a] which soon appropriated to itself the name of "chrisma."

The first Latin witness to this unction is Tertullian, 192: "Having come out of the font, we are thoroughly anointed with a blessed unction, after the ancient rite, in which they were wont to be anointed unto the priesthood with oil from a horn" (De Bapt. 7; see Exod. xxix. 30, &c.). (comp. Adv. Marc. i. 14; De Resurr. 8). St. Cyprian: "It is also needful that the baptized person be anointed, that having received the chrism, i.e. the unction, he may be an anointed of God, and have the grace of Christ. Moreover, that is a thank-offering (eucharistia: comp. the titles of the prayers over oil and μύρον in Constit. Apost. vii. 27, 42, 44, &c.), from which those who are baptized are anointed, viz. the oil hallowed on the altar" (Epist. 70). Compare De Mysteriis, the work ascribed to St. Ambrose (v. 29); Jerome (Dial. adv. Lucif. § 9); Augustine (de Bapt. Don. v. 20, § 23; Serm. 324; de Trin. xv. 22, § 46); Pseudo-Innocent of Rome (Epist. i. 3); Isidore of Seville (de Eccl. Off. ii. 25); Ildefonsus of Toledo (de Cogn. Bapt. i. 123); Caesarius (d. 542) (Serm. 22, § 2); Fortunatus (living in 600) (i. v. 5; Opp. ed. 1786); Pseudo-Ambrose (de Sacram. iii. 2, § 8); Theodulph (de Ord. Bapt. 15); Leidrad (de Sacram. Bapt. 7); Jesse (Epist. ad Sacerd. c. De Unctione Capitis); Magnus (Martene u. s. i. i. 17; sim. Anon. Tract. de Sacr. Bapt. ibid.); Alcuin (Ep. 90 ad. Lugd. and De Bapt. Cuerem. ad Oduin. Opusc. 4); Smaragdus (Coll. in Epist. in Sabb. Pentec. u. s. 321). From Aquileia we have the testimony of Maxentius (Collect. Dicta app. Epist. de Signif. Rit. Bapt. § 8); from Metz, of Amalarius the chorepiscopus (de Eccl. Off. i. 27); from Treves of Amalarius the archbishop (de Sacr. Bapt. u. s. 897); from Mentz, of Rabanus Maurus (de Instit. Cler. i. 28); from Rome, of John the deacon (Epist. ad. Senar. 6, u. s.).

This unction, as we have learnt from Theodulph, was on the head. So other authorities; Sacram. Gelas. in Murat. i. 570, "on the brain;" Greg. ii. 65; Codex Elig. Greg. in Opp. Gr. iii. 73, ed. Ben., and Cod. Vatic. Rocca Opp. Gr. v. 111, ed. 1615, "on the crown;" a Gregorian Order for the Sick, Mur. ii. 264, Assem. ii. 10; the Milanese Office, "the crown" (Ass. ii. 47). The Besançon Sacramentary (ibid. 42) is peculiar in having "in frontes ejus." This unction was with the thumbs. See the Ordo Ambros. Assem. u. s. 47; Sacram. Gellon. ibid. 54; Remig. 59; Codex Elig. Greg. u. s.; Cod. Vat. u. s.; &c.

(3) Oil of Chrism (μύρον) used at Confirmation.—An unction, generally on the forehead, distinct from the unction of the head which immediately followed baptism, came to be practised in the church. This is not mentioned by the earlier Latin writers who speak of the imposition of hands. See Tertullian, de Baptismo, viii.; Cyprian, Epist. 72 ad Steph. and the council of Carthage, A.D. 256, cc. 5, 24; that of Elvira, about 300, can. 38 (to be inferred also from 57), the author De Haeret. Bapt. in App. ad Opera Cypr. 23, ed. 1690. The date of Pseudo-Innocent is not known, but as we certainly hear of the rite in Italy in the 5th century we may give his testimony here. His statement is that presbyters ought not to sign the forehead of the baptized with the oil of chrism, "for that is the privilege of bishops only, when they give, the Holy Ghost" (Epist. Inn. i. § 3). Cassiodorus, 514: "Our forehead has been anointed with the unction of the sacred chrism" (Comm. in Ps. cxxxviii. v. 2, E.V.). Fortunatus, 560, is the first Gallican writer who is a contemporary witness to the rite in France; but we may infer from a passage in the remains of St. Patrick, who received Gallican consecration and was closely connected with the church in Gaul, that it was practised there in the middle of the 5th century. Some of his Irish neophytes were murdered by Welsh invaders, "while still in their white robes, the day after they had been anointed with chrism, and while it was yet visible on their foreheads" (Epistle to Coroticus, Olden's tr. 93). The frontal chrismation at confirmation is mentioned by Fortunatus in a hymn (Opera, i. ii. 9). Gregory of Tours, 573, says that Chlodovaeus was baptized (in 496), and "anointed with the sacred chrism, with the sign of the cross of Christ" (Hist. Franc. ii. 31). In the 6th century the rite was probably universal in the West. The gift of the Holy Ghost is also connected with the imposition of hands and unction of chrism by Ildefonso of Toledo, 657 (De Cogn. Bapt. i. 128-131). Later witnesses towards the close of our period and beyond it are Theodulf (de Ord. Bapt. 17); Leidrad (de Bapt. 7); Jesse (de Bapt. c. De Conf. Episc.); Amalarius of Metz (de Eccl. Off. i. 27); Rabanus Maurus (de Instit. Cler. i. 30).

In France the general adoption of this practice met with a check from the council of Orange in 441: "Inter nos placuit semel chrismari."[c] If the chrism had been from any necessary cause omitted at baptism, the bishop was to be informed that he might supply the omission "Nam inter quoslibet (al. nos) chrismatis ipsius non nisi una benedictio est; non ut praejudicans quicquam (al. dico), sed ut non necessaria habeatur repetita chrismatio" (can. 2). This decree was adopted by the council of Arles in 452 (can. 127). The testimonies of Fortunatus of Poitiers and Gregory of Tours shew that the rule of Orange did not prevail over France. That it obtained largely and survived to the time of Charlemagne may be inferred from the silence of certain authors, who speak only of the imposition of hands in their description of confirmation. Thus Alcuin, after an account of the rites of baptism: "Novissime per impositionem manus a summo sacerdote septiformis gratiae Spiritum accipit" (Epist. 90; sim. De Bapt. Cuerem. ad Oduin.). So Magnus of Sens, using here the same words as Alcuin, but adding much of his own (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. 17), and an anonymous copier of Alcuin (ibid.).

We see from several of the foregoing authorities that the forehead was anointed at confirmation. This was done both in the East and West, but in the East other parts are anointed also; as the eyes, nostrils, ears, breast, hands, and feet among the Greeks (Goar, Euchol. 355, 6). or, as in some MSS., the eyes, nostrils, and ears only (359, 360); one omits the feet only (362); another omits the hands and feet, but prescribes an unction of the back (368). Cyril of Jerusalem mentions the forehead, ears, nostrils, and breast (Catech. Myst. iii. 3). The Copts and Abyssinians anoint the forehead, eyes, mouth, ears, hand, breast, knees, feet (the soles), back, arms, and shoulders (Assem. iii. 83;—compare a purely Abyssinian order, 111); the Armenians the forehead, ears, eyes, nostrils, mouth, hands (together), breast, shoulder, feet, shoulder-blades, saying a proper sentence over each (ibid. 119; see Vartanes, Resp. 2 in Mai, Script. Vet. Nov. Coll. x. ii. 271). Most of the Syro-Jacobite orders prescribe an unction of the whole body in both sexes, but they all begin with the forehead (154, 160, 163, 169, 175, 184); one (148) mentions the forehead and windpipe only. The Maronite bishop anoints the forehead, the priest the head only (187). The Melchites, the forehead, ears, hands, feet, breast, shoulders, nostrils, palms, knees, legs, back (227). The apostolic imposition of hands is lost in every Syrian order. On the other hand the Nestorian books do not prescribe the unction at all (ibid. 138; Badger, Nestorians, ii. 209); from which we infer that this unction was not universal when they left the church in 451. When this rite found its way into the West the frontal unction only was adopted, probably because none other was then practised, at least over the greater part of the East. See Sacram. Gelas. Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. i. 571; Sacram. Gregor. Codd. Elig. in Opp. Greg. iii. 74, ed. Ben., Cod. Vat. u. s. 112; Pontif. Egbert; Surtees Soc. no. 27, p. 7; &c.

The Romans used the thumb in this unction (Sacram. Greg. Codd. Elig. Vat. u. s.), as they and the United Maronites (Assem. iii. 187) do now. In theory the minister of this rite was the bishop. In the West it is expressly confined to him by the author of the Epistle to Decentius (Epp. Innoc. I. i. 3), Gregory I. (Ep. iii. 9), the Council of Seville 619 (can. 7), Ildefonso of Toledo 657 (De Cognit. Bapt. i. 131); Theodore of Canterbury (Poenitentiale, iii. 8, in Stubbs and Haddan's Councils, iii. 193), Theodulf of Orleans (de Ord. Bapt. 17), &c.; and recognised as his proper office by all, as e. g. Cornelius, A.D. 251 (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 43), St. Jerome (c. Lucif. 4), Isidore of Seville (De Eccl. Off. ii. 26), Jesse of Amiens (u. s.), &c. See also the Sacramentaries.

Nevertheless some liberty was allowed even at Rome. In Sardinia it had been the custom for priests to anoint the head after baptism. Gregory I. forbade this, but afterwards, in 593, modified his prohibition which had given offence: "We acted indeed according to the old custom of the church, but if any are really distressed about this matter, where bishops are wanting, we permit presbyters also duly to touch the baptized on their foreheads with the chrism" (Epist. iii. 26). In Spain the council of Toledo, so early as 400, had allowed the presbyter to do this in the bishop's absence; and even before him, if he commanded it (can. 20). The latter liberty is also given by a canon in the collection of Martin of Braga, A.D. 569 (c. 52). In France, as we have seen above, the unction by the bishop was from the 5th century to the 9th considered a needless repetition of that by the priest immediately after baptism. Pseudo-Baeda (in Psalmo 26 v. 1, Comment.) asserts that the unction "quae per manuum impositionem ab episcopis" is the same with that last mentioned, adding "propter arrogantiam tamen non concessa est singulis sacerdotibus sicut et multa alia" (Baed. Opp. viii. 558, ed. 1563). That one of the chrismations was originally regarded as a substitute for the other, or otherwise connected with it, may also be inferred from the tradition that Sylvester, A.D. 314, permitted priests to use the chrism after baptism, lest the person should die without any chrismation (Anastas. Biblioth. Vit. Pont. 34).

In the East, also, the bishop was considered the proper minister of this unction (see Dionys. Hier. Eccl. iv. 10; Maximus, Scholia in H. E. ii. 78); but there the liberty which Gregory I. permitted in a special case was extended to all

[c] A couplet from an inscription to the memory of a bishop named Mareas found in a church in Rome (Gruter, Corpus Inscrip. 1176) has been quoted in the same sense:—

> "Tuque sacerdotes docuisti chrismate sancto > Tangere bis nullum judice posse Deo."

It is, however, difficult to believe that an unsuccessful attempt to introduce the Gallican restriction into the suburbicarian dioceses would have been recorded with approbation in Rome itself; and as the context speaks of conflict with misbelievers, we rather understand that Mareas maintained the Roman rule not to give unction to heretics who joined the church. See Morinus, de Sacram. Poenit. ix. 10.

priests. Hilary the Deacon, 351 (Comm. in Epist. ad Eph. iv. 11), tells us that "among the Egyptians presbyters give the seal if a bishop be not present" (comp. MS. Colbert, cf. Quaest. Vet. et Nov. Test. 101, probably by the same writer). In the Apostolical Constitutions the priest, no less than the bishop is commanded, to "seal with μύρον" after baptizing (vii. 22). In the 9th century Photius affirms the right of priests to give the unction of confirmation as freely as to baptize (Epist. Encycl. i. 13, § 7). Gabriel of Philadelphia, while aware that this was at first the privilege of bishops, says that "the Eastern Church considerately permits it not to bishops only, but to presbyters also after the sacred rite of baptism" (in Assem. Cod. Liturg. iii. lxxxi.). The bishop is, however, in every case the real minister of the rite, because the chrism which the priest applies has been consecrated by him [CHRISM]. To the authorities there given add Damasus, Epist. 5; Conc. Vasense, A.D. 442, can. 3; Gelasius, 494, Ep. ad Episc. Lucan. 4; Conc. Hispal. 619, cap. 7; Synod. Regiat. 850, can. 7; Conc. Wormat. 868, can. 2.

Information respecting the several unctions of which we have treated above, and the oils used in them, may be found in the following books and many others. Jos. Vicecomes, *de Ant. Bapt. (4) Unction of Heretics.—Heretics whose baptism was considered invalid, on whatever grounds, were baptized and confirmed on their admission into the church. This was ruled unanimously by the council of Carthage, A.D. 256, in the case of heretics whose baptism was afterwards allowed by the church. See BAPTISM, ITERATION OF, p. 172.

There were some, however, whose baptism was admitted, but who were not confirmed. The Novatians "did not confer the most holy chrism on those whom they baptized; on which account," says Theodoret, "the most highly esteemed fathers gave command to anoint those who are joined to the church from this heresy" (Haer. Fabul. iii. 5).

Those whose baptism and confirmation were considered valid were of two classes; i. those who had received those rites in the church, before they lapsed into heresy; and ii. those who had received them from heretics.

i. The former were regarded as penitents (HERESY, 4, i. p. 768; PENITENCE), and readmitted with the simple laying of hands, as in the absolution of other penitents (Conc. Carth. 256, cc. 4 and 22). So Cyprian (Epist. 71, ad Quint.; Ep. 74, ad Pomp. in fine). Even those who had been rebaptized by heretics were thus readmitted as penitents (Leo. I. Epist. 159, ad Nicet. c. 6, ed. Ballerin. Comp. Innocent I. A.D. 402. Ep. 18 ad Alex. § 3; Vigilius, 538, Ep. ii. § 3).

ii. A different language was held with regard to those converts who had been baptized by heretics only. These from the time of St. Augustine, supposing that the proper matter and right form had been employed, were received at first with imposition of the hand simply (see Stephen in Cyprian Epist. 74; De Bapt. Haeret. in App. ad Opp. Cypr.; Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 2; Leo M. Ep. 166 ad Neon. 2, Ep. 167 ad Rust. Resp. 18), afterwards with imposition and unction. The earliest witness to the change is the council of Laodicea, which some place so early as 314; others so late as 372. This council directs that Novatians, Photinians, and Quartodecimans joining the church, "having learnt thoroughly the symbols of the faith and been anointed with the holy chrism, shall thus communicate of the holy mystery" (can. 7). So St. Basil directs the Cathari, Encratites, Aquarii, and Apotactites to be "anointed by the faithful and so approach the mysteries" (Ep. ad Amphil. can. 1). Pseudo-Justin: "Let the fall of the heretic who comes to the orthodox faith be remedied, as to his heterodoxy by a change of mind, as to his baptism by the unction of the holy μύρον, as to his ordination by the imposition of hands" (Quaest. et Resp. ad Orthod. R. 14). The council of Constantinople, 381, decreed that Eunomians, Montanists, and Sabellians should after a long catechumenate be rebaptized, because it regarded their baptisms as defective in form; but it only required that Arians, Macedonians, Sabbatians and other Novatians, Quartodecimans and Apollinarians, should be "first sealed or anointed with the holy μύρον, on the forehead and eyes, and nostrils and mouth and ears" (can. 7). The council adds, "And while sealing them we say, The seal of the gift of the Holy Ghost,"—thus making it an act of confirmation. Converts from these five sects are mentioned as requiring the unction only by Timotheus C. P. (Epist. de Recept. Haeret. in Coteler. Eccles. Graec. Monum. iii. 392–396), and Theodorus Studita (Epist. ad Naucrat. i. 40). The council in Trullo, A.D. 691, reaffirmed the decree of 381, only adding the Pauliani to the number of those who were to be rebaptized (can. 95). See also the Arabic Nicene canon in the article on HERESY, 4, ii. (p. 768), and the Eastern form of admission (ibid. iv. p. 769).

It is probable that this unction was never introduced at Rome; for we find Gregory I. saying in 600, "the West restores Arians by the laying on of the hand, but the East by the unction of the holy chrism, on their entrance into the holy Catholic church." Some, he tells us, as the Monophysites, were received on a profession of faith only (Epist. ix. 61). In Gaul, however, this rite had already been observed for more than a century and a half. For the council of Orange in 441 says, "It is decreed that heretics in danger of death and desiring to become Catholics be sealed by the presbyters with chrism and benediction (i.e. imposition of hands), if the bishop be not present" (can. 1). The council of Arles, 452, ordered Photinians or Paulianists to be baptized "secundum patrum (Conc. Nic. 19, &c.) statuta"; but Bonosiani (a subdivision of the same sect), because they baptized in the name of the Trinity, were to be received into the church "with chrism and imposition of the hand" (canon. 16, 17). Faustus of Rhegium, 475 (De Grat. Dei et Lib. Arb i. 15), taught that one thus baptized was to be "judged to be so washed by the operation of grace, that he need only to be clothed with the benediction of the chrism." The author De Ecclesiasticis Dogmaticis (22 al. 52), supposed to be Gennadius of Marseilles, 495, says that all who have been baptized in due form and matter by heretics should, if able to answer for themselves, "being already purged by the soundness of their faith, be confirmed by imposition of the hand;" but that those who cannot answer for themselves should be presented by sponsors as at baptism, "and so being fortified by imposition of the hand and the chrism, be admitted to the mysteries of the Eucharist." The Gallican council of Epaone, A.D. 517: "We require the presbyters for the safety of souls, which we desire in all, to assist with the chrism heretics who are given over and confined to bed, if they seek a sudden conversion. Which let all desiring to turn know that they must, if in health, seek from the bishop" (can. 16). Examples of such chrismation in France are found in Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. ii. 31; 34; iv. 27, 28). The same discipline prevailed in Spain. "Herctics," says Isidore, "if they are proved to have received baptism in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, are not to be baptized a second time, but are to be purged by chrism only and imposition of the hand" (De Eccl. Off. ii. 24). The council of Seville in 619 says that it is not lawful for presbyters to sign the forehead of the baptized with chrism (can. 7). For instances of the practice see Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 39; ix. 15; and Reccared at the council of Toledo, 589 (Conc. Hard. iii. 471). In the 9th century we hear of the same rule from Walafrid Strabo (de Reb. Eccl. 26).

(5) Unction of the Sick.—The Apostles anointed many for whose recovery they prayed (St. Mark vi. 13), and St. James (v. 14, 15) recommends the same practice to "the elders of the church." It was followed by very many, both laymen and women, in every part of the church. E.g. a female saint, Eugenia, is said to have healed a sick woman by anointing her with oil (Vita, 11, in Rosweyd, 343). We need not stop to prove this at length; as it will be conceded that they who could do the greater, viz. bless the oil (of which see many instances in OIL, USES OF (3), p. 1455, could certainly do the less, viz. apply it when blessed. The oil blessed by St. Monegund on her death-bed was necessarily used by others. It is more important to shew that this liberty remained, when the oil was no longer blessed by laymen and women. Thus Pseudo-Innocent (Ep. ad Decent. § 8): "Being made by the bishop it is lawful, not for priests only, but for all Christians to use it in anointing in their own need, or that of their friends." Caesarius of Arles, 502: "Let him who is sick receive the body and blood of Christ, and then let him anoint his body" (Serm. 66, § 3). In an epidemic he recommends a person to "anoint both himself and family with blessed oil" (Serm. 89, § 5). St. Eligius, 640: "Let him faithfully seek the blessed oil from the church, wherewith to anoint his body in the name of Christ" (De Rect. Cathol. Convers. 5). This liberty is recognised in an old pontifical of Rouen, in which the bishop is said to "bless the oil for the sick and for the people" (Note 282 in Lib. Sacram. Gregor. Ménard). Notices of the rite in the 8th and 9th centuries sometimes leave it uncertain whether the priest anoints the sick himself, though the unction and communion are both mentioned. E.g. Theodulf of Orleans, 794: "When the sick man shall have been anointed, with prayers, &c., then let the priest give him the peace and communicate him" (Capitulare ii. in Baluz.; Miscell. ii. 104, ed. Mansi). With this compare Conc. Aquisgr. 836 (De Vita Infer. Ord. c. 5); Conc. Mogunt. 847, can. 26; Herard. Turon. 858, cap. 21; Isaac Lingon. 859, Canones, i. 23; Capit. Reg. Franc. vi. 75; the articles of visitation (n. 18) preserved by Regino (De Discipl. Eccl. p. 23, ed. Baluz.); "Bede" cited ibid. i. 119; &c. Not till the middle of the 9th century, if I mistake not, do we meet with any express injunction to the priest to perform the unction himself. Then Hincmar, 852, says to his clergy, "Let him himself both anoint them with the sacred oil and communicate them" (Capit. 5, Labb. Conc. viii. 578). Riculfus of Soissons, 889: "It is the duty of presbyters to anoint their sick with holy oil" (c. 10, ibid. ix. 419). So Leo iv. 847 (De Cura Pastorali, ib. viii. 34), and Ratherius of Verona after him, 928 (Synodica, ib. ix. 1271): "Oleo sancto inungite et propria manu communicate"), and the three Admonitiones Synodales printed by Baluze in App. to Regino (De Discipl. Eccles. 603, 608, 612).

The restraint of the unction to the priest had momentous consequences. The original intention of it in relation to the healing of the body was practically forgotten, and the rite came to be regarded as part of a Christian's immediate preparation for death. Hence, in the 12th century, it acquired the name of the last unction, "unctio extrema," (Peter Lomb. Sentent. iv. 23), i.e. as the Catechism of Trent asserts (P. 2, De Ext. Unct. 3), the last of those which a man received from the church. In the 13th it was placed by schoolmen among the seven rites to which they then limited the application of the term "sacrament" (Thomas Aquin. Summa, suppl. ad P. iii. qu. 29). See Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. I. vii. 1, § 2; Notitia Eucharistica, 1011, 2nd ed.

The order in which the sick were anointed and communicated was changed more than once. The earliest extant notices (Conc. Turon. in Regino, i. 116; Caesarius. u.s.; Eligius, u. s.; &c.) put the communion before the unction. This is what we might expect; for when recovery from sickness was the object of the unction, the sufferer would naturally prepare for it by communicating. On the other hand, when they had recourse to it only at the supposed approach of death, it was put at first before the communion, because that had always been regarded as the proper VIATICUM, the last preparation for departure. This was the common order in the 9th and 10th centuries, as we learn from "Bede" in Regino, Leo, Hincmar, &c. already quoted, and from nearly every Ordo Ungendi in Martene, de Ant. Rit. Eccl. I. vii. 4. See also the first Admonitio Synodalis cited above. At length, however, extrema unctio was supposed to mean unctio in extremis, and men returned to the original order from a new motive. As unction is still notoriously the last rite of the dying, we need give no proof of this; but we may mention, as an interesting illustration, that the clauses ordering unction and communion in the first form of the Admonitio Synodalis (above) are in the two later inverted with a view to this change. Their reading is, "Propria manu communicet, et oleo sacro inungat" (Regino, 808, 812). The earliest ordo given by Martene which follows this rule is an Amiens Pontifical not 600 years old (I. vii. 4 ord. 27). It was never adopted in the Church of England. An early example occurs in the life of St. Hildegund of the 12th century, "Corpore Dominico sibi dato, sancto eam inungi fecit oleo" (Vita, v. 30; Bolland. Apr. 20).

It has been common both in the East and West for more than one priest to be present at this rite; but there is no evidence that the Greeks or Orientals observed such a custom before the 9th century. See Leo Allatius, de Consensu utriusque Ecclesiae, iii. 16, § 15; Arcudius, de Concord. Eccl. Occ. et Or. iv. 3). In the West, however, examples occur from an early period. E.g. St. Clotilda, 554, was "secundum Apostolum inuncta sacerdotibus" (Acta Chrotildis, iii. § 19, Boll. June 3). Several were present at the unction of St. Hunegund, A.D. 690 (Vita, iii. 20, Boll. Aug. 25). Theodulf requires three (u.s.). In 850 the synod of Ticino ordered that "the presbyter of the place . . . should invite the neighbouring presbyters also" (Syn. Regiatic. can. 8); and traces of the custom are found in some of the ancient offices (Mart. u.s. Ord. 13, "unus ex sacerdotibus"; Ord. 14, "singuli sacerdotes").

The Greeks in the 8th century made only three crosses with the oil which they "poured out of the ampulla crosswise on the head and dress and whole body of the sick man" (Theodulf, u.s.). The French bishop who tells us this also informs us that the Latin practice was to anoint the eyebrows, ears, nostrils, lips, the back of the hands, the feet, throat, breast, neck, shoulder-blades, navel, or the seat of pain (ib.). The same details are given in an old English pontifical of about A.D 800 (MS. Gemmet. Mart. u. s. Ord. 1), and in that of Prudentius of Troyes, 850 (Ord. 3); only the former omits the throat, the latter the breast. A cross was made with the oil on every part.

We need hardly mention that a public penitent could not be anointed in sickness until he had been "reconciled by the communion of the body and blood of Christ" (Conc. Regiatic. can. 8).

On Maundy Thursday, while the other oils were provided beforehand by the clergy, offerings of oil for the sick were brought by the people, who probably, as we infer from their use of it, took much of it home with them after it had been blessed. The earliest Ordo Romanus, about 730, says, "Benedicitur oleum quod populus offert" (§ 30, Mus. Ital. ii. 20). The Gelasian Sacramentary has "Benedictio olei ad populum" (Liturg. Rom. Vet. Murat. i. 555). The Gregorian: "Ampullae quas offerunt populi" (ibid. ii. 55).

On some points connected with this subject we are at a disadvantage in consulting Roman Catholic authors, as they draw no clear line between the primitive use of oil with prayer and the medieval priestly rite; but we may mention Edm. Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. I. c. 7 in several editions; Jo. Launoius, de Sacram. Unctionis Infirmorum, Par. 1673; J. C. Trombellius, Tract. de Sacram. Extr. Unct. Bonon. 1776; and on the other side, Jo. Dallaeus, de Extremis, ut vocant, Unctione, Genev. 1659.

II. UNCTION OF THINGS.—Pseudo-Dionysius, perhaps about 520, tells us that altars were consecrated by the affusion of μύρον (Hier. Eccl. iv. iii. 12). An Armenian Catholicus of the 8th century says of the chrism, "The priest ought to receive this oil from the bishops, and with it anoint altars, temples and churches" (Joannis can. 9; Mai, Nova Coll. Script. x. ii. 304). The Coptic priest signs the new paten, chalice, and SPOON, and the black corporal as well as the altar itself with chrism when he consecrates them. See the Benedictions in Renaud. Liturg. Orient. i. 54, 55. In the Syrian rite an altar is consecrated by a bishop only, who "signs the slab by anointing it with chrism in which he dips his thumb, drawing it over the same lines which he had before described in the form of a cross, and that he does thrice, reciting meanwhile versicles from the psalms, hymns, and responsories." After which he says, "This altar set before us hath been signed, anointed, and sealed in the Name," &c. (ibid. ii. 57). The practice has descended to the modern Greeks, whose office directs the bishop at the dedication of a church to pour μύρον on the slab, and cross it thrice with the same, and then beginning at the crosses to anoint the whole upper surface. The pillars and sides of the altar are then thrice crossed with chrism. A cross is also made with it on every column and pilaster in the church (Goar. Euch. 837–8). The chrism is also used at the consecration of Antimensia before as well as after being mixed with relics and ceromastic (ibid. 848). We hear of the same use of oil in the West from the latter part of the 5th century downward, if indeed the Homily on the 4th Sunday after Pentecost ascribed to Eusebius Emissenus be really written by Faustus of Rhegium, who is said to have assumed that name, A.D. 472; for there we read, "By oil a church is hallowed" (Hom. Euseb. E. 151; Par. 1554). The council of Agde, 506, says, "It is decreed that altars be hallowed not only by the unction of chrism, but also by a sacerdotal (i.e. episcopal) benediction" (can. 14). The council of Epaone, 517: "Altaria nisi lapidea chrismatis unguine non sacrentur" (can. 26). Yet the Frankish missal, of about 560, only orders a sprinkling with wine and water, mixed (Lit. Rom. Vet. Murat. ii. 677). The canon of Epaone was adopted by Egbert of York, A.D. 732–766 (can. 51; Hard. Conc. iii. 1966). The rite is not, however, mentioned by the council of Cealchythe, 816, when it prescribes the mode of dedicating a church. In Spain, Isidore of Seville, about 630, says, "Ad episcopum pertinet basilicarum consecratio, unctio altaris, confectio chrismatis" (Ad Leudef. § 10). It was thought to be done in the case of the altar in imitation of Jacob (Gen. xxviii. 18, xxxv. 14). The council of Aix la Chapelle, in 836, after citing his action, says, "The Christian religion, taking example from the ancient tradition of the fathers, . . . erects altars, and pours oil on them, and anoints them with the most holy chrism, and from the acts and vows of the aforesaid Jacob sings a melody to Christ" (lib. iii. cap. 23). Compare Rabanus Maurus de Instit. Cleric. ii. 45, and Walafr. Strabo, de Reb. Eccl. 9. This notion is preserved in the old English pontificals. See Remigius of Auxerre (de Dedic. Eccles. 8) on the question, "Quid signetur in variis Unctione Altaris?" After the unction of the altar, the bishop going round the church signs the walls with chrism, using his thumb (Pontif. Egberti Ebor. in Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. ii. 13, Ord. 2). Comp. the English pontifical preserved at Jumièges (ibid. Ord. 3), that of Dunstan (Ord. 4), and the Gallican Pontificals of Rheims, Noyon (Ordd. 5, 6), &c. Egbert gives a form for consecrating a paten and chalice with unction (Mart. u. s., but at length in the Surtees Society's edition, p. 47. Comp. Mart. Ordd. 1, 3, 4, &c.). The blessing of the chalice follows, and here Dunstan only of those whom we have cited orders it to be anointed. Bells were also anointed with chrism when blessed (Surt. Soc. 118; Mart. u.s. Ord. 3).

USURY. In the early church, the austere morality inculcated by its teachers and the comparative seclusion of its members from intercourse with the world and participation in the more equivocal methods of acquiring wealth, combined to cause the calling of the usurer, and even the occasional lending of money for purposes of gain (whether to fellow Christians or to strangers), alike to be regarded as unlawful. Such procedure, whether systematic or exceptional, was accordingly altogether condemned; passages such as Exod. xxii. 24; Levit. xxv. 36, 37; Deut. xxiii. 20, 21; Neh. v. 7, 10, 11; Ps. xiv. 4, 5; liv. 12; St. Luke, vi. 34, 35; &c., being regarded as decisive of the Scriptural teaching on the subject. This view continued, for the most part, to prevail long after the 8th century. The schoolmen unanimously raised their voice against usury in any form (Bonaventura, ad Sent. iv. xv. 2, art. 2, quaest. 1, 4; Aquinas, Summa, II. ii. 78, art. 1). The passage in the New Testament (Luke xix. 23) which appears to countenance the practice was explained away by Aquinas by supposing that money as referred to in this parable is to be understood only in a metaphorical and spiritual sense. The Reformers (Luther, Melanchthon, &c.) also held that the teaching of the Mosaic law left no doubt as to the obligations of Christians in this matter.

The practice of usury under the Empire offered however peculiar temptations to the clergy, from the fact that it required no previous acquaintance with any craft and but little knowledge of commercial affairs. On the other hand, it was liable to abuse which involved great moral wrong: the legal rate of interest was fixed at twelve per cent.—"usura centesima,"[a]—but in the time of [a] I.e. one per cent. per month. This law was re-enacted by Constantine only a month before the council of Nicaea, a fact which, as Professor Funk observes, shews that the prohibition of the church could have had but very partial effect (Cod. Theod. I. ii. 23; Funk, Gesch. des Kirchlichen Zinsverbotes, p. 9).

Chrysostom there were many who demanded as much as fifty. He denounces this as καινὰ γένη τόκων, καὶ οὐδὲ τοῖς Ἕλλησιν νόμοις νενομισμένα,—"a new rate of interest unauthorised even by the laws of the pagans," and yet, he says, the usurer will exact it from a poor man who has a wife and children and gets his living by thrashing corn or treading the wine-press (in Matt. Hom. li.; Migne, Patrol. Graec. lviii. 588).

Apollonius (Euseb. E. H. v. 18) enumerates the lending of money at interest as one among other unlawful practices indulged in by the teachers of the Cataphrygians. Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. ii. 18) says, "the law" (i.e. the Mosaic law) "forbids thee to lend money at interest to thy brother;" and he interprets "brother" as including ὃς ἂν ὁμόφυλος ᾖ, ὁμογνώμων τε καὶ τοῦ αὐτοῦ λόγου κεκοινωνηκώς (Migne, ib. viii. 171). Tertullian quotes Ezekiel (xviii. 8), and says that the prohibition of the Old Testament is ratified by that of the New (adv. Marcion. iv. 17). Cyprian (Testim. iii. 48) cites the same passage, and also Ps. xiv. and Deut. xxiii. 20. Commodianus (Instruct. adv. Gent. Deos, c. 65) declares that the alms of the usurer find no favour in God's sight, even though he bestow in charity twice the amount that the legal rate of interest would enable him to give,—"duplicem centesima numerum" (Migne, v. 251). Lactantius (Div. Inst. vi. 18) classes it as one of the "man lata Dei" that no man shall receive interest for money lent to another who is in necessity, otherwise, he says, the kindly act loses its value, and the lender is as one who profits by his neighbour's trouble, —"quod qui facit insidiatur quomodo, ut ex alterius necessitate praedetur" (ib. vi. 699).

But while it is not unreasonable to suppose that in the practice of the austere morality inculcated by the early church these views found corresponding observance among a certain minority, the evidence plainly shews that they were frequently disregarded. If, for example, we accept the account given by Hippolytus of Callistus, both Callistus and his Christian master Carpophorus pursued the calling of money-lenders (Bunsen, Anal. Ante-Nicaea, i. 371). Cyprian, in his treatise de Lapsis (c. 6), complains that many bishops among the "Lapsi," neglecting their divine office, "divina procuratione contempta," had turned their attention to worldly gain, and were wandering about in other provinces, attending markets for the sake of lucre and increasing their capital by lending it out at compound interest,—"negotiationis quaestuosae nundinas aucupari . . . . usuris multiplicantibus foenus augere" (Migne, iv. 183).

It is supposed by Hefele (Beiträge, i. 38) that we may infer from this that there existed in Cyprian's time no formal declaration from the church on the lawfulness of the practice. It appears, however, more reasonable to conclude that the above bishops had repudiated all further ecclesiastical control. The first canonical decision of which we have evidence relating to the subject is that of the council of Arles (A.D. 314), which directs that all priests practising usury are to be debarred from communion,—"eos juxta formam divinitus datam a communione abstineri" (Mansi, Conc. ii. 472). At the council of Laodicea (? ann. 320) it was decreed, "Non oportere hominem sacratum foenerari, et usuras, et quae dicuntur sesquialteras[b] accipere" (ib. ii. 564). This canon was re-enacted with yet greater stringency at the council of Nicaea, when it was decreed that whoever of the clergy should be found indulging in the practice in his dealings with another or demanding "sesquialterne," should be deposed from his office and excommunicated; "si quis inventus post statutum usuras ex mutuo (ἐκ μεταχειρίσεως) sumere, vel eam rem aliter persequi, vel sesquialteras exigere, vel aliquid aliud excogitare turpis quaestus gratia, e clero deponatur et sit alienus a canone" (Mansi, ii. 675; ib. iv. 413). The forty-fourth of the Apostolical Canons similarly requires that any "bishop, priest, or deacon" who demands interest from a debtor shall be deprived of his office (Cotelerius, i. 448).

Although the conditions of the mercantile community in the East and the West differed materially in some respects, the fathers of the two churches are equally explicit and systematic in their condemnation of the practice of usury. Among those belonging to the Greek church we find Athanasius (Expos. in Ps. xiv.); Basil the Great (Hom. in Ps. xiv.), Gregory of Nazianzum (Orat. xvi. in Patrem tacentem), Gregory of Nyssa (Orat. cont. Usurarios), Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. iv. c. 37), Epiphanius (adv. Haeres. Epilog. c. 24), Chrysostom (Hom. xli. in Genes.), and Theodoret (Interpr. in Ps. xiv. 5, and liv. 11). Among those belonging to the Latin church, Hilary of Poitiers (in Ps. xiv.), Ambrose (de Tobia liber unus), Jerome (in Ezech. vi. 18), Augustine (de Baptismo contr. Donatistas, iv. 19), Leo the Great (Epist. iii. 4), and Cassiodorus (in Ps. xiv. 10). Among these writers some evince less disposition to appeal exclusively to the Mosaic law; Basil, for example, cites Luke vi. 34, 35; Chrysostom, Matth. v. 42; Gregory of Nyssa, the fate of the unmerciful servant in the parable (Matth. xviii. 23–35), and the fifth petition in the Lord's Prayer. Ambrose, whose treatise de Tobia is entirely devoted to the condemnation of usury, quotes the sentiment of Cato,—"foenerare est hominem occidere," and inveighs strongly against the cruelty involved in the practice. "The borrower," he says to the usurers, "asks of you medicine, and you give him poison; bread, and you proffer him a sword; liberty, and you condemn him to slavery!" Referring to the technical term "centesima," he asks whether it might not better serve to recall to our recollection Him who came to seek the hundredth lost sheep? (Migne, xiv. 591–622). Christ, he says, came to fulfil the law, not to destroy it, consequently the Mosaic prohibition is still in force. Leo the Great, in his letter to the bishops of Campania and Picenum, implies that the clergy sometimes evaded the prohibition by lending their money in the name of another, and declares this to be equally forbidden. He laments that even laymen, who wish to be considered Christians, should practise the usurer's calling,—"quod et in laicos cadere, qui Christianos se dici cupiunt, condolemus" (Epist. 5; Migne, liv. 615). Chrysostom refers to the legislation which forbade senators (τοὺς . . . . εἰς τὴν μεγάλην τελοῦντας βουλήν, ἣν σύγκλητον καλοῦσι) to take interest for loans, and contrasts the usurer's craft with that of the husbandman, the grazier, or the artisan, affirming that his gain is a harvest reaped without the aid of soil, plough or rain (in Matt. Hom. lvii.; Migne, Patrol. Graec. lviii. 557).

[b] "Sesquialterae" or ἡμιόλιαι, a Byzantine term for interest half as much as the capital, or 150 per cent.

The conditions of modern society and commercial life have involved such a revolution in the conceptions respecting the employment of capital, that the arguments whereby it was sought to justify the Mosaic condemnation of usury now appear scarcely intelligible. It was objected that usury was an infringement of equal dealing, because more was given by the borrower than he received,—that it was ruinous to many, while serviceable to but few,—that it was oppression of the poor man under the guise of rendering him a service (August. in Ps. xxxvi. Serm. 3; Ambrose, de Offic. iii. 3; Chrysost. in Matth. Hom. 56). When it was asked, as an extreme case, whether the man who lent a bushel of corn to his neighbour, from which the latter reaped tenfold, might not justly claim to share equally in the gain, Jerome replied by citing Gal. vi. 7, and by a quibble worthy only of a professed dialectician (ad Ezech. vi. 18; Opera, ed. Migne, vi. 176). This excess of stringency produced its natural results and evasion was frequently resorted to. Ambrose (de Tobia, c. 14) states that it was a common practice for those who lent money (especially the wealthy) to receive the interest in the form of goods.

The canons of later councils differ materially in relation to this subject, and indicate a distinct tendency to mitigate the rigour of the Nicaean interdict. That of the council of Carthage of the year 348 enforces the original prohibition, but without the penalty, and grounds the veto on both Old and New Testament authority, "nemo contra prophetas, nemo contra evangelia facit sine periculo" (Mansi, iii. 158). The language, however, when compared with that of the council of Carthage of the year 419, serves to suggest that, in the interval, the lower clergy had occasionally been found having recourse to the forbidden practice, for the general terms of the earlier canon, "ut non liceat clericis fenerari," are enforced with greater particularity in the latter, "Nec omnino cuiquam clericorum liceat de qualibet re foenus accipere" (Mansi, iv. 423). This supposition is supported by the language of the council of Orleans (A.D. 538), which appears to imply that deacons were not prohibited from lending money at interest, "Et clericus a diaconatu, et supra, pecuniam non commodet ad usuras" (ib. ix. 18). Similarly, at the second council of Trullanum (A.D. 692) a like liberty would appear to have been recognised among the lower clergy (Hardouin, iii. 1663). While, again, the Nicaean canon requires the immediate deposition of the ecclesiastic found guilty of the practice, the Apostolical canon enjoins that such deposition is to take place only after he has been admonished and has disregarded the admonition.

On the other hand, at the second council of Arles (A.D. 452), we find that such an offence on the part of an ecclesiastic was required to be punished not only by deposition but also by excommunication, "depositus a communione alienus fiat" (Mansi, vii. 880).

Generally speaking, the evidence points to the conclusion that the church imposed no penalty on the layman. St. Basil (Epist. clxxxviii. can. 12), says that a usurer may even be admitted to orders, provided he gives his acquired wealth to the poor and abstains for the future from the pursuit of gain (Migne, Patrol. Graec. xxxii 275). Gregory of Nyssa says that usury, unlike theft, the desecration of tombs, and sacrilege (ἱεροσυλία), is allowed to pass unpunished, although among the things forbidden by Scripture, nor is a candidate at ordination ever asked whether or no he has been guilty of the practice[a] (Migne, ib. xlv. 233). A letter of Sidonius Apollinaris (Epist. vi. 24) relating an experience of his friend Maximus, appears to imply that no blame attached to lending money at the legal rate of interest, and that even a bishop might be a creditor on those terms. We find also Desideratus, bishop of Verdun, when applying for a loan to king Theodebert, for the relief of his impoverished diocese, promising repayment, "cum usuris legitimis," an expression which would seem to imply that in the Gallican church usury was recognised as lawful under certain conditions (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iii. 34). So again a letter (Epist. ix. 38) of Gregory the Great seems to shew that he did not regard the payment of interest for money advanced by one layman to another as unlawful. But, on the other hand, we find in what is known as archbishop Theodore's Penitential (circ. A.D. 690) what appears to be a general law on the subject, enjoining "Si quis usuras undecunque exegerit . . . tres annos in pane et aqua" (c. xxv. 3); a penance again enjoined in the Penitential of Egbert of York (c. ii. 30). In like manner, the legates, George and Theophylact, in reporting their proceedings in England to pope Adrian I. (A.D. 787), state that they have prohibited "usurers," and cite the authority of the Psalmist and St. Augustine (Haddan and Stubbs, Conc. iii. 457). The councils of Mayence, Rheims, and Châlons, in the year 813, and that of Anchen in the year 816, seem to have laid down the same prohibition as binding both on the clergy and the laity (Hardouin, Conc. iv. 1011, 1020, 1033, 1100).

Muratori, in his dissertation on the subject (Antichità, vol. i.), observes that "we do not know exactly how commerce was transacted in the five preceding centuries," and consequently are ignorant as to the terms on which loans of money were effected. A later period shews us, to use the language of Mr. Pearson, "the moral guides of society, on the one hand, endeavouring to enforce a law which was, without abatement, the law prescribed originally for the Hebrews in Palestine; while, on the other, foreign wars, foreign commerce, and the perfectly unequal division of land, were introducing entirely new conditions of life, which could not be satisfied by the provisions designed for a nation living under totally different circumstances" (Theories on Usury, p. 16). See also Funk, Gesch. des Kirchlichen Zinsverbotes, Tübingen, 1876.

[a] A canon of the council of Agde (A.D. 506): "Sed dionarios nunquam ordinandos, sicut nec usurarios," etc., probably points to a distinction drawn by the church between the professional usurer and those who only occasionally practised usury (Mansi, viii. 336).

V

VACANCY. The voidance of a see by a bishop's death was often the occasion of abuse and outrage, which the church in various parts made successive and (it may be added) not unsuccessful efforts to restrain.

There are three factors which must be kept distinct in any discussion about the property of a vacant benefice, bishopric or other. There is (1) the property of the deceased (spolia); (2) the revenue of the benefice in the interval (deportus) and (3) the income at the beginning—a year or half a year—of the new incumbency (annata).

The twenty-eighth canon of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, stands thus: "That it is not lawful for clergymen after the death of their bishop to seize what belongs to him, as has been forbidden by the canons of old time" (sc. Can. Apost. 40; Can. Antioch. 24). A reference to the Antiochene canon here quoted shews that it is the private property of the bishop, and not the estate of the see which the canon was designed to protect.

A canon such as the following shews what sometimes took place on the voidance of a see. "This also is determined, that on a bishop's being summoned from this world at the Lord's bidding, clerics keep rapacious hands from all furniture or whatever is in the church house or belongs to the bishop, in books, valuables (speciebus), utensils, vessels, produce, flocks, animals or all property altogether, and plunder nothing like robbers." (Conc. Valentinum Hispan. cap. 2, A.D. 524).

By the following chapter of the same council, the kindred of a bishop dying intestate were forbidden to touch anything without the sanction of the metropolitan or four provincial bishops. They were required to wait for the ordination of his successor. The reason assigned is lest they should touch some of the official property, which might have got mixed with what would descend to his heirs. Other precautions to the same effect are laid down both in the seventh and the ninth councils of Toledo. The Visigothic law (l. 5, t. i. c. 2) even directs that every bishop should at the commencement of his episcopate verify the inventory made by his predecessor.

The second council of Orleans (A.D. 533) enacted that the bishop who came for the funeral should demand "praeter expensam necessariam nihil pretii pro fatigatione." The same council also provided that he should call the presbyters together and, going to the bishop's residence (domum ecclesiae), should leave it when inventoried (descriptam) to the custody of fit persons. So strict were the directions afterwards issued by Gregory the Great that not even the cost of the inventory might be taken out of the episcopal property.

From a canon of the Trullan Council (c. 35) it appears that on the death of a bishop his own goods and those of his church were under the custody of the clergy, or in default of that under the custody of the metropolitan, who shall give them to the successor in the see.

Besides the visiting bishop or the clergy the archdeacon is often named as the proper guardian of the vacant see. "Patrimonio ecclesiae in gubernatione archidiaconi ejusdem ecclesiae constituto," says (Ep. 7) pope Agapetus († 536). The same arrangement is enjoined in France by the council of Paris in 615 (can. 7). For the form of appointing a bishop to take temporary charge of a vacant diocese, see Liber Diurnus, c. iii. tit. 11.

From the seventh and eighth canons of the same council of Paris Thomassin (Discipline de l'Eglise, pt. ii. Liv. iv. c. 25, 4) draws the following conclusions as to the state of the church under this head at the beginning of the 7th century. 1. Other churches besides cathedrals were despoiled at the death of their incumbent. 2. Bishops and archdeacons seized the "spoil" of abbeys and other benefices. 3. This was done under specious pretences, as that all other churches were but offshoots from the cathedral. 4. The "spoils" went to the commonalty of the clergy (sc. the cathedral body), and not to the bishop or the archdeacon in particular. 5. The council condemns the abuse. 6. Both the revenues of the vacant church and the private property of the deceased incumbent were despoiled. 7. The spoliation took place under the authority of sovereigns, magistrates, and magnates. 8. Archdeacons are recognised as the proper guardians of all the property of the vacant bishopric and of other vacant churches. 9. The clergy are associated with them in this charge. 10. That these ancient outrages, being so condemned, lend no colour of justification to any pretended rights of spoliation, which in later times have been based upon them. 11. But most important of all (says Thomassin) is this deduction from the language of the canons—that temporal princes were not yet put in possession of the guardianship of the vacant sees or abbeys. Yet it must be observed that Clothaire the Second, when confirming by an edict the decrees of this council of Paris, seems to reserve to himself the right of making certain donations (praeceptiones nostrae) from the goods of a vacant see.

The lengths to which the outrage of "spoliation" sometimes went may be gathered from a story told by Gregory of Tours (lib. 6, c. 13). The clergy of Marseilles combined with the governor against their bishop. The bishop was arrested, and the clergy themselves pillaged the residences of the bishop, and made a raid upon his property, just (adds the narrative) as if the bishop were already dead. This licence, however, must not be supposed universal, as there is a marked absence of any allusion to it in the letters of Gregory the Great about the property of vacant sees. The first recorded instance in Rome is that recorded by Anastasius (A.D. 638) of the pillage of the church of St. John Lateran on the accession of Severinus.

The great point to be established upon the subject is that in early days the sovereign did not pretend to have any rights either upon the property of deceased bishops or upon the proceeds of vacant sees. This appears conclusively from two examples, also given by Gregory of Tours (l. 10, c. 19). Giles, the bishop of Rheims, was deposed and exiled. In his chests large sums of money were found. The king confiscated that portion of it which had been gotten by illicit means; the rest was left. Again, Baudin the sixteenth bishop of Tours, was enabled to distribute amongst the poor a very large sum of money ("amplius quàm viginti millia solidorum"), which his predecessor had left, and which clearly had not escheated to the crown.

The letter of Gregory the Great to the clergy and people of Hortona (lib. iii. Ep. 39) is a good specimen of his action during a vacancy. "We solemnly delegate the visitation of the destitute church to our brother and co-bishop, Barbarus. To whom we have given in charge 'ut nihil de redditu, ornatu, ministeriisque a quoquam usurpari patiatur'. . . . We have given him licence to ordain priests and deacons, if need be," &c. In another case (Lib. iv. Ep. 12) he directs that the bishop-visitor of the church of Agrigentum should receive the same income for his services as the regular bishop would receive. At times the arrival of the visitor-bishop was the occasion of a squabble. How pope Gregory dealt with such a difficulty may be seen in his letter to Leontius, who was made bishop-visitor of Rimini (Lib. iv. Ep. 42). [VISITATOR.]

In reply to the claim that has at times been made of the right of the pope to the "spoil" of a vacant see, Thomassin quotes words of Gregory the Great addressed to Constantius, bishop of Palermo, who was made visitor of the church of Terracina (lib. vii. Ep. 75): "Mobile vero praedictae ecclesiae facta subtiliter volumus describi notitia, nobisque transmitti, ut ex hoc quid fieri debeat, auctore Domino, disponamus." The French writer argues that Gregory would not have considered at his leisure how it should be disposed of, if it had belonged of right to his own church; and he concludes that all the "spoil" of a deceased bishop, and all the revenue of the vacancy belongs to the clergy in common, and the succeeding bishop, whilst ecclesiastical superiors and worldly magnates can pretend to no other glory than that of giving protection to the canons and liberties of the church. Bishops lost neither spolia nor deportus nor annatae; and bishops in their turn preserved the deportus of vacant parochial cures, handing them faithfully to the new incumbents (Discipline de l'Eglise, pt. ii. Liv. iv. c. 26).

That portion of the episcopal revenue which fell to the crown during a vacancy was known by the name of regalia (Ducange, s. v.). When the bishop was dead, it was said to be aperta ("regalia est aperta"), and it so continued until his successor was appointed, when it became clausa. The act of homage or allegiance on the part of the successor preceded the delivery of the regalia to him. [H. T. A.]

VACANTIVI, or, in the Greek form, βακάντιβοι, were clergy who were found in other dioceses than that in which they were first ordained, with letters from their bishop. Against such frequent decrees were made. The council of Agde (c. 52) forbids communion to be given to such wandering clerks, and this is repeated by the council of Epaon (c. 6); the council of Valentia (C. Valentin. c. 5) orders such wanderers, if contumacious, to be deprived both of communion and of orders (Bingham, Antiq. VI. iv. 5). [C.]

VAISON, COUNCILS OF (VASENSIA CONCILIA), A.D. 442 and A.D. 529. Formerly there were thought to have been three. 1. Which some make the second, "apud Auspicium episcopum ecclesiae catholicae," says the title, which was the favourite style of the bishops of Rome, when ten canons on discipline were passed, but no subscriptions to them have been preserved (Mansi, vi. 451–60). 2. Which some make the third; where four interesting canons on ritual—one relating to the reading of homilies of the fathers by deacons when no presbyter could be got to preach; another to the saying of the Kyrie eleison, the Sanctus, Sanctus, Sanctus, the Sicut erat of the Doxology, and recital of the name of the pope for the time being in divine service—follow the first on discipline, with the names of St. Caesarius of Arles and eleven other bishops affixed to them. (Ib. viii. 725–8.) [E. S. Ff.]

VAKASS. The vakass is a vestment or ornament peculiar to the Armenian church. It bears a certain resemblance to the amice, but has a breastplate attached to it, as in the case of the Jewish high-priest; the names or figures of the twelve apostles replacing those of the twelve tribes (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 306; Malan, Liturgy of the Armenian Church). It is doubtful whether we are to view this as a direct imitation of the Jewish ephod, or as really a modification of the Western amice. The Armenians themselves maintain the Jewish origin of the vestment, but the Armenians have borrowed so much from the Roman church that the latter is by many thought the more probable view. In a recent work by a Melchitarist of St. Lazare, and therefore of the Roman communion, the vakass is described as "a large collar of precious stuff, to which is attached the amice" (Issaverdens, The Armenian Church, p. 413). [R. S.]

VALENCE, COUNCILS OF (VALENTINA CONCILIA), A.D. 374, A.D. 530, and A.D. 586. 1. When thirty bishops, according to some MSS., met—it is not clear under whose presidency—passed four canons on discipline, and addressed two synodical letters, one to the bishops of France, the other to the clergy and people of Fréjus, inviting attention to their fourth canon respecting candidates for the episcopate, priesthood, or diaconate (Mansi, iii. 491–500). 2. Where the doctrines of freewill and grace were discussed with reference to St. Caesarius of Arles, who was prevented from attending it by ill-health, but deputed able representatives to express and defend his opinions (ib. viii. 723–6). 3. When the donations of king Guntramn and of his wife and daughters to different churches were confirmed by seventeen bishops (Ib. ix. 645–8). [E. S. Ff.]

VALENS, Feb. 16, deacon, martyr with Pamphilus, Seleucius, and Paulus, at Caesarea under Diocletian (Basil. Menol.; Mart. Hieron.). [C. H.]

VALENTIA, COUNCIL OF (VALENTINUM CONCILIUM), A.D. 546, where six chapters on discipline were drawn up by six bishops, and an archdeacon representing a seventh. (Mansi, viii. 619–24; but he suggests a later date for it on the next page.) [E. S. Ff.]

VALENTINA, martyr with Thea and Paulus at Caesarea, under Maximin; commemorated on July 15 (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Siriet.); July 25 (Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

VALENTINUS (1), Feb. 14, presbyter, martyr at Rome under Claudius (Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Notker., Rom.). According to Baronius (Mart. Rom. Feb. 14, note) it is this Valentinus who is commemorated on this day in the Gregorian Sacramentary, which names him in the collect and super-oblata. He is also celebrated in the Liber Responsalis of Gregory, p. 757; and he is probably the Valentinus commemorated in the Liber Antiphonarius of Gregory, p. 865. Pope Theodorus erected a church in his honour at Rome on the Via Flaminia near the Milvian bridge (Anastas. Biblioth. de Vitis Rom. Pontif. art. THEODORUS, num. 128; Mart. Rom. sub Feb. 14, ed. Baron. note; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 751). On the distinction between this Valentinus and the following see Sollerius's Obss. under Feb. 14 in Usuard.

(2) Feb. 14, bishop of Interamnia, martyr (Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon., Hieron., Notker., Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 754). According to Baronius (l. c.) it is this Valentinus who is commemorated on Feb. 14 with Vitalis and Felicula in the Gelasian Sacramentary, which names them in the collect, the secreta, and the post-communion. The name Valentinus, but undistinguished, occurs briefly in the metrical martyrologies of Bede and Wandalbert. In the latter case it is the bishop according to Baronius (l. c.). For other saints of the same name commemorated on this day see Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. pp. 742, 762, 783.

(3) Nov. 13, martyr, commemorated at Ravenna with Solutor and Victor (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Hieron., Vet. Rom., Rom.).

(4) Dec. 10, martyr, commemorated at Ravenna with Navalis and Agricola (Mart. Usuard., Hieron. Rom.). [C. H.]

VALENTIO (VALENTINUS), martyr, commemorated with Pasicrates at Duro-torum in Moesia by the Latins on May 25 (Mart. Usuard., Notker., Rom.); by the Greeks on Apr. 24 (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.). [C. H.]

VALERIANUS (1), Jan. 20, martyr of Trapezus with Candidus and Aquila under Diocletian (Basil. Menol.); Jan. 20, 21 (Cal. Byzant.); Jan. 21 (Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 251).

(2) April 14, commemorated with Tiburtius and Maximus at Rome on the Via Appia in the cemetery of Praetextatus (Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon., Hieron., Vet. Rom., Notker., Rom.); Nov. 24 (Basil. Menol.); Nov. 22 (Menol. Graec. Sirlet.).

(3) Sept. 15, martyr in the reign of Antoninus Verus, commemorated at Tournus in the territory of Châlons-sur-Saône (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Hieron. Notker., Rom.).

(4) Sept. 17, martyr, commemorated at Nividunum (Nyon) with Macrinus and Gordianus (Mart. Usuard., Adon.); or at Noviodunum (Notker., Rom.).

(5) Dec. 15, bishop, confessor in Africa under Genseric (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Rom.). [C. H.]

VALERIUS (1), Jan. 29, bishop of Trèves, reputed disciple of St. Peter (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Hieron., Notker., Wand., Rom.).

(2) June 14, martyr with Rufinus near Soissons under Diocletian (Mart. Usuard., Flor., Wand., Rom.). [C. H.]

VANNES, COUNCIL OF (VENETICUM or VENETENSE CONCILIUM), A.D. 465, or, as Pagi 461, when sixteen canons on discipline were passed by Perpetuus, bishop of Tours, and five others, and sent, with a synodical letter in their name, to the absent bishops of that province. (Mansi, vii. 951–8.) [E. S. Ff.]

VARUS AEGYPTICUS, soldier, martyr under Maximian, commemorated on Oct. 19 (Menol. Graec. Sirlet.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 272); Oct. 25 (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

VEDASTUS (VAAST), bishop of Arras, commemorated with bishop Amandus on Feb. 6 (Mart. Usuard., Flor., Rom.); Oct. 26 (Notker., Wand.). [C. H.]

VEILS, Eucharistic, in the Eastern church. The Eucharistic veils in use by the Greek church were three in number: (1) the paten veil (διακονικόν, called in the Syriac ritual Anaphar or Anaphora), for covering the holy bread; (2) the chalice veil; (3) a very thin, transparent veil, known as ἀήρ, or κρέπη, spread over both (Renaudot, Lit. Or. i. 304; ii. 61). They were always of the finest and best materials procurable. The disk-veils at St. Sophia's were of cloth of gold, embroidered with pearls (Descript. S. Soph. Anon. apud Du Cange). According to the mystical interpretation of Germanus, the disk-veil represented the napkin that was about our Lord's head; and the ἀήρ either the shining cloud at the Transfiguration, or the stone which closed the door of the sepulchre (Goar, Euchol. 124, 838). To these should be added the εἱλητόν or corporale, called also κατακέκαυμα (Renaudot, i. 195), the altar-cloth covering the Holy Table, on which the paten and chalice stood, which, according to the same authority, symbolised the fine linen cloth in which our Lord's body was wrapped (Goar, Euchol. 101, 130, 838, 849).

The ritual of the veils, as given in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, is as follows. (N.B. The references are to Savile's edition of Chrysostom, vol. vi.) At the prothesis the priest censes the paten veil, and after the asterisk has been placed over the holy bread, covers the whole with it, with words from Ps. 93: "The Lord hath put on glorious apparel, and girded Himself with strength." He then censes the chalice veil and covers the holy cup with it, while he utters (Habakkuk iii. 3), "His glory covered the heavens, and the earth was full of His praise." After this he censes the ἀήρ and spreads it over both paten and chalice with the words (Ps. xvii. 8), "Hide me under the shadow of Thy wings" (p. 986). At the celebration, after the Gospel has been read, the priest takes the εἱλητόν and unfolds it, and places it on the holy table before the ἐπιμανδύα (p. 990). At the great entrance the ἀήρ is placed over the left shoulder of the deacon at the same time that the disk is put on his head (p. 994). The priest then removes the veils from the paten and chalice, and taking the ἀήρ from the deacon's shoulders and censing it covers the holy things with it (p. 995). The deacon then takes the asterisk and puts it crosswise over the disk, and having sponged it on the εἰλητόν, he covers it with the ἄηρ, and if there is no fan he fans the holy things with the paten veil (p. 997). After the priest has communicated he sponges the cup and his own lips with the veil (p. 1002). After the deacon has communicated he sponges the disk over the cup, and covers the cup with the veil, and replaces the asterisk and the veil over the disk (p. 1003). Finally, after the washing of the cup and cleansing of the disk he covers the holy things, the cup and the disk with the veils, according to custom (p. 1004). The form of consecration of disk veils in the Coptic church is given by Renaudot (Liturg. Orient. i. 304). [E. V.]

VENANTIUS (1), Apr. 1, bishop, martyr (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Notker., Rom.). There was a monastery bearing the name of Venantius at Constantinople in the 6th century (Mansi, viii. 1056 B; Du Cange, Cpolis. Christ. lib. iv. p. 162). The oratory of St. Stephen in the Vatican basilica is said to have been called also that of Venantius (Rasponi, de Basilica Vaticana, p. 234; Ciampini, de Sacr. Aedif. p. 17).

(2) Abbat, commemorated at Tours on Oct. 11 (Mart. Flor.); Oct. 13 (Mart. Usuard., Mart. Rom.); Oct. 23 (Notker.). [C. H.]

VENETICUM CONCILIUM. [VANNES.]

VENITE. [INVITATORIUM.]

VENTRILOQUUS. The "master of obh" was frequently called ventriloquus, ἐγγαστρίμυθος, ἐγγαστρίμαντις, στερνόμαντις; though the Hebrews, according to Bochart, "ariolum id genus non ex ventre, sed ex axillis vocem emisisse somniant" (Hieroz. iii. 5). To prove this he cites the Talmud in Sanhedrim 7, the gloss on it, and Rabb. Selomo on Deut. xviii. 11. Maimonides (de Idol. vi. 2) says that these diviners after certain ceremonies appear to be "consulting another person, who speaks with them and answers their questions from the earth in a very low voice, which they cannot hear with their ears, but only perceive in their mind"; or they "fumigate the skull of a dead man and sing charms, until they hear a voice going before them coming out of their armpits, and an answer is given them." It is evident, at least, that the voice was generally traced to some part of the person. Thus Plutarch says that "the ventriloqui [formerly called Eurycleitae, from Eurycles a soothsayer; see Hesychius, Suidas] are now called pythons" (de Orac. Defectu, Reiske, vii. 632). The italic version of Lev. xx. 27 gives "ventriloquus" (Sabatier); that of Isaiah viii. 19, "Qui de terra loquuntur, qui de ventre clamitant." So the LXX render obh by ἐγγαστρίμυθος in Lev. xix. 31; xx. 6, 27; 1 Sam. xxviii. 7, 9; Isaiah xliv. 25; &c. That such diviners were ventriloqui in the common belief appears also from various ancient writers. Origen affirms that some "from the earliest age have been under the influence of a demon, whom they call python, i.e. a ventriloquus" (de Princip. iii. § 5); an opinion noted by St. Jerome as unsound (Ep. 124, ad Avit. 8), but only as to the early possession, for the latter himself paraphrases Is. viii. 9, thus, "Quaerite ventriloquos, quos pythonas intelligimus" (Comment. in loc.). Gregory Nyss. says, referring to the witch of Endor, "One form of deceit was that of the ventriloquus, whose magic art was skilled to drag back to the life above the souls of the departed" (de Pythonissa Ep. i. 869). See also Tertullian (de Anima, 57); Jerome in Ezek. xiii. 1–9; Quaest. Christ. et Resp. inter Opp. Just. M. 52; Plonius in Ruinart, Acta Sinc. Mart. 124; Isidore, iii. 370; Eustathius Antioch. de Engastrim. 30. [W. E. S.]

VENUSTIANUS, Dec. 30, martyr with his wife and children under Maximian; commemorated at Spoleto with bishop Sabinus (Mart. Usuard.; Mart. Vet. Rom. which states that his passion was on Dec. 7, and the festival of his sepulture on Dec. 30). [C. H.]

VENUSTUS, May 6, martyr, commemorated with Heliodorus in Africa (Mart. Usuard.; Mart. Rom.). In Mart. Hieron. both names occur on this day in a numerous list, Venustus at Milan and Heliodorus in Africa. [C. H.]

VERANUS, bishop, commemorated at Lyons on Nov. 11 (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Hieron., Rom.). [C. H.]

VERBERIES, COUNCIL OF (VERMERIENSE CONCILIUM), A.D. 753. Several canons on discipline are found in Gratian and elsewhere given to a council at this place, which is thought to have met in the first year of king Pepin, and been attended by him. (Mansi, xii. 365–8.) [E. S. Ff.]

VERIANUS, Aug. 9, martyr at Colonia in Etruria under Decius, commemorated with Secundianus and Marcellianus (Mart. Usuard., Notker., Rom.). [C. H.]

VERISSIMUS, Oct. 1, martyr at Olisepona (Lisbon) with his sisters Maxima and Julia (Mart. Usuard., Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

VERN or VER, COUNCIL OF (VERNENSE CONCILIUM), A.D. 755, held by order of king Pepin in his palace there, when twenty-five canons on discipline were published. (Mansi, xii. 577–86, who thinks, however, it should be dated A.D. 756). [E. S. Ff.]

VEROLUS, Feb. 21, martyr, commemorated at Adrumetum with Secundinus, Servulus, and others (Mart. Usuard., Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

VERONICA, commemorated at Antioch on Apr. 20 with Prosdocius and Romanus (Mart. Syr.); Apr. 15 at Antioch with Prosducus (Hieron.); July 11 at Antioch with Prodixa and Speciosa (Mart. Hieron.); the matron of Jerusalem so called is said to have been commemorated at Rome on Feb. 4 (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. i. 451 F). [C. H.]

VERSE, VERSICLE. A short verse or text said by the priest in the course of the liturgy or the divine office, to which the congregation replied in another short verse or text called a Response. Some of these versicles, as the Sursum Corda in the liturgy, and the "Deus in adjutorium," which occurs at the commencement of all the Hours, are of great antiquity. The latter is mentioned by Cassian (Collat. x. 10), and in the rule of St. Benedict (cap. x.). Mediaeval Monastic Consuetudinaries contained elaborate regulations for their use, of which a specimen may be seen in the Antiq. Consuetudines Canon. Regularium, S. Victoris, Paris., printed by Martene (de Antiq. Eccles. Rit. tom. iii. p. 279, edit. 1788). Their rationale and the ritual reason why are described at length by Amalarius, de Eccles. Off. iv. 13, et passim. Technical names were applied to some of these versicles. "O Lord, open thou our lips," with which nocturns opened (Amalar. de Eccl. Offic. iv. c. 9), was called "Versus Apertionis," and the verse "Let us bless the Lord," with which most offices concluded, was hence called "Versus Clusor."

VESTMENTS. On this subject there have been two leading theories: the one viewing Christian vestments as a direct imitation of the Levitical, the other deriving these from the dress of ordinary life prevalent in the early ages of Christianity. The former theory does not probably meet with any wide-spread acceptance at the present day. Some of the most characteristic features of the Jewish dress are unrepresented in the Christian. Thus, whereas in the Levitical priestly dress the element of colour is strongly marked, we have every reason to believe that the dress worn by the ministers in primitive times was simply white [COLOUR]. Again, the head-dress of Jewish priests, to say nothing of the more striking cap of the high priest, with its golden πέταλον, had for a long time nothing to answer to it among Christian vestments; for, as we have already shewn [MITRE], any satisfactory traces of a use of an official head-dress on the part of the Christian clergy are hardly to be found for the first thousand years. So too the coloured girdle of the Jewish priest fails to reappear, for the GIRDLE is not met with as a recognised Christian vestment till the 8th century. Conversely the Christian vestment par excellence, the chasuble [CASULA], is utterly unlike anything in the Jewish dress.

Now, on the other hand, when we come to consider the nature of the secular dress worn under the empire in the early times of Christianity, we are at once met with a large amount of coincidence in the form of the dresses and in the names.

A Roman gentleman in the 1st century and later wears his tunic with some form of supervestment, lacerna, pallium, or the like, over it, the toga being now rather old-fashioned. If we take as our stand-point for Christian vestments the records of the fourth council of Toledo (A.D. 633), to which we have often referred already, we have mention made of alb, planeta, and orarium. Here, then, we have the tunic in the ALB, the super-vestment in the PLANETA, and an ornament, whose secular origin is absolutely demonstrable in the orarium. [STOLE.] The planeta does not under that name meet us as a secular dress used by heathens, though we do find it worn by Christian laymen; still its shape is practically the same as the paenula, which meets us again and again in heathen writers, and which is identical in name with the Eastern equivalent of the chasuble, the φενόλιον. [PAENULA.] The casula, another variety of the same dress, whose name has given rise to the modern chasuble, is itself found in use by Christian laymen. As regards other varieties of the tunic, the DALMATIC is first met with as in use by a Roman emperor; the Greek στοιχάριον [STICHARION] is first mentioned in connexion with the dress of ordinary life. Another form of supervestment, the COPE, has certainly had a similar origin. The STOLE and the MANIPLE, again, were both, as has been already shewn, in their origin of the nature of handkerchiefs, carried in the hand; nor can there be any reasonable doubt that in such things as the OMOPHORION, archiepiscopal PALLIUM, &c., are mere modifications of what in its simplest form we know as the stole.

On the general subject of the history of Christian vestments reference may be made to Marriott, Vestiarium Christianum; Hefele, Die Liturgischen Gewänder in his Beiträge zur Kirchengeschichte Archäologie und Liturgik, vol. ii.; Rock, The Church of our Fathers, London, 1848; Bock, Die Liturgischen Gewänder des Mittelalters, &c.

VESTRY. (Secretarium, secretaria, sacristia, sacrarium, vestiarium. Διακονικόν, Βεστιάριον.) Among the exedrae of an ancient church was an apartment to which these terms were applied. Some writers take it for a part of the church itself, whilst others are of opinion that it was a distinct building. (See Bingham, Antiq. VIII. vii. 7.)

We find that in early, as in modern days, not only the vestments but also the treasures of the church were sometimes kept in the vestry [SCEUOPHYLACIUM]. Sacred vessels were kept there (in secretario), no one being allowed to touch them except the subdeacon or acolyte (Capitula Martini Brac. c. 41. cent. vi.). Besides eucharistic vessels, a gold cross of six pounds weight is given by pope John III. († 573), "ex sacro nostro vestiario." Gregory the Great, when he would give six coins to the angel who appeared to him in the guise of a shipwrecked sailor, was informed that there were no coins in his vestry (Joh. Diac. Vita S. Greg. Mag. lib. i. c. 10). In these passages, however, as well as in several others quoted by Ducange, it may be doubted whether the vestiarium was an attachment of a church. It seems rather to have formed a portion of a royal or pontifical establishment.

Another point of resemblance between the ancient and the modern use of the vestry is found in the fact that it was used as a place of meeting. From this it may be inferred that the vestry was sometimes a place of considerable size. The third, fourth, and fifth councils of Carthage were spoken of as in secretario basilicae restitutae. The synod of Arles was held "in secretario ecclesiae." The same is true of a multitude of other councils. Just as the modern word vestry means both the place where a meeting is held, and also the assembly or session that takes place there, so we find a similar transition in the Latin word secretarium, which at times means a part of a church, and at times a session of a council held in that part. Hence we get such phrases as "secretarium venturum" for the "coming session" (see Conc. Rom. ii. act. 1 ad fin.).

There were some other uses to which the vestry was at times appropriated. Du Cange (in Paul. Silent. p. 594) shews that it was sometimes used as a place of confinement for delinquent ecclesiastics, and pope Gregory II. in a letter to the emperor Isaurus contrasts the actions of a secular with that of a spiritual judge. The former confiscates, hangs, beheads; but the latter places the gospel and the cross about the culprit's neck, shuts him in the vestry, and puts fasting in his stomach, vigil in his eyes and doxology in his mouth.

Sometimes the vestry became the lodging of an ecclesiastic. Sulpicius Severus relates that St. Martin had his lodging "in secretario ecclesiae," and that after his decease all the Virgins burst into the apartment, licked the several spots where the saint had sat or stood, and appropriated the straw upon which he had lain. Bingham (Antiq. VIII. vii. 8) shews that the vestry was also called receptorium and salutatorium, as being the scene of pastoral intercourse between clergy and people. [H. T. A.]

VEXILLUM. (1) The principal Christian banner has already been described under LABARUM. From an ancient period banners were carried in processions, the bearers of which were called DRACONARII or vexilliferi. When Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. v. 4) speaks of a procession to a basilica "post crucem praecedentibus signis," we are no doubt to understand that a cross headed the procession, followed by banners. Similarly Honorius of Autun (Gemma Animae, i. 72) says, "ante nos crux et vexilla geruntur." An old use of Sarum ordered a banner of sackcloth to be carried in the procession at the Reconciliation of Penitents. (2) The word vexillum is sometimes applied to the processional cross itself (Durandus, Innocent III.) [C.]

VIATICUM. This word, which occurs frequently in classical authors denoting "provision for a journey," is, together with its Greek equivalent ἐφόδιον, often used in early Christian writings to denote the Eucharist, generally, but not always, as the communion given to a sick person before impending death. "This mystery is sometimes called 'viaticum,' because, if any one enjoys it on the way, he will arrive at that life which he already has within himself" (Car. Mag. lib. vii. 101). "This word 'viaticum' is the name of communion, that is to say, 'the guardianship of the way,' for it guards the soul until it shall stand before the judgment-seat of Christ" (Synodus Hibernensis, lib. ii. c. 16, Wasserschleben's edit. p. 20).

The phrase τὰ ἐφόδια τοῦ Θεοῦ is used by St. Clement in a passage (Ep. 1 ad Cor. cap. ii.) which need not necessarily bear, although it is not incapable of bearing, a Eucharistic reference, but which is usually interpreted as involving a general reference to the "doctrines and means of salvation," as where the same phrase is used by St. Basil (Ep. lvii., cxlix. ad Melet. tom. iii. pp. 157, 384) and by St. Cyril of Jerusalem, of faith (Hom. Catechet. v. § 12). The phrase ἐφόδιον ζωῆς αἰδίου is employed by St. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. 33), which is like the words ἐφόδιον ζωῆς αἰωνίου, which occur in the liturgies of St. James, St. Basil, and St. Mark, with a necessarily Eucharistic meaning (in the Prayer of Thanksgiving, Hammond, Liturgies, etc. p. 191). Bede, in his account of the death-bed of Caedmon, speaks of his last communion as "caeleste viaticum" (H. E. iv. 24), and describes its reception in his hand. Amalarius speaks of the "viaticum morientis" (de Eccl. Off. iii. 35). The expression ἐφόδιον τῆς σωτηρίας occurs in an Eastern formula of indulgence (Goar, Euchолog. p. 682). The earliest extant conciliar direction on the subject is can. xiii. of the council of Nice, ordaining that "none, even of the lapsed, shall be deprived of the last and most necessary viaticum (τοῦ τελευταίου καὶ ἀναγκαιοτάτου ἐφοδίου), but let the old canonical law be observed . . . let the bishop, upon examination, give the oblation to all who desire to partake of the Eucharist upon the point of death." This direction is re-enforced in varying phraseology by the following councils: iv. Carth. cc. 76, 77, 79; i. Araus. c. 3; ii. Vasens. c. 2; Gerundens. c. 9; ii. Arelat. c. 28; Agath. c. 15; Epaon. c. 36; iii. Aurel. c. 6; i. Matisc. 12; xi. Tolet. c. 11. By all these canons the administration of the viaticum is enjoined, even to apostates and parricides, without waiting for the fulfilment of the incurred course of penitential discipline, although stipulating for its completion in case of recovery. Another relaxation of church rule lay in the fact that it was permitted to be received by persons not fasting. Cardinal Bona calls this exemption a "praxis ecclesiae ubique recepta," but gives no authorities for his statement (Rer. Lit. i. c. xxi. § 2). Alcuin refers to its immediate administration in such cases as a "lex antiqua regularisque" (de Div. Off. p. 79, edit. Hittorp.), but the abolition of this formal pre-requisite of fasting seems to be a tacit inference or unwritten custom rather than an explicit dispensation resting on conciliar enactment.

The language of the canons recently quoted throws no light on the question whether the death-bed Eucharist involved reservation or otherwise; but there is plentiful evidence from other sources that the dying person was usually communicated from the reserved sacrament [RESERVATION]. It was carried in a vessel called a CHRISMAL [p. 356], and various penalties were assigned by St. Columbanus for dropping it accidentally, or leaving it behind through negligence (Reg. Coenob. xv.). The capitularies of Charlemagne order that "the priest should always have the Eucharist in readiness, that if any one is ill, and if a child is ill, he may communicate him at once, that he may not die without communion" (lib. i. c. 161). Sometimes, but rarely, there seems to have been a private and special celebration of the Eucharist in a sick man's house. Paulinus, bishop of Nola (409–31), had an altar in his sick chamber, at which he consecrated the Eucharist not long before his death (Uranius, Vit. Paulin. § 2). Such was possibly the object of the invitation to St. Ambrose to offer the sacrifice in a private house at Rome (Paulin. Vit. Ambros. as quoted by Bingham without further reference, but in chap. xlvii. Paulinus evidently refers to the reserved Eucharist).

It has been a subject of discussion whether the viaticum was administered in one or in both kinds. Bede describes a dying boy as refreshed "viatico Dominici corporis et sanguinis accepto," although the words which describe his act of communion have been sometimes interpreted to refer to one kind only, "simul et infirmanti puero de eodem sacrificio Dominicae oblationis particulam deferri mandavit" (H. E. iv. 14). The same inference has been drawn from the language in which the communion of Serapion is described by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 44). But if the decision of the question is to turn upon the use of the singular or plural number, counter evidence is supplied by the description of the reserved Eucharist found on St. Cuthbert's body, "oblatis super sanctum corpus positis" (Lingard, Anglo-Saxon Church, ii. p. 44, edit. 1858). This tallies with other and direct evidence that a sick person was usually communicated in both species (Concil. Tolet. c. xi. Reginon. lib. 1, de Eccles. Discip. cap. 119). The decolorization of the reserved sacrament alluded to as a test of its corruption in the Regula S. Columbani, c. xv. possibly points to the twofold but conjoint reservation of both elements. The Eastern custom of the simultaneous administration of both reserved elements is implied in the wording of the formulae in several ancient Western service-books, e.g. in the offices for the Communion of the Sick in the Celtic books of Deer, Dimma, and Moling: "Corpus et sanguis Domini nostri Jesu Christi filii Dei vivi conservet animam tuam in vitam perpetuam" (Book of Dimma, fol. 53 b). "Corpus cum sanguine Domini nostri Jesu Christi sanctus sit tibi in vitam aeternam" [perpetuam et salutem, Book of Deer] (Book of Moling, ad fin. Ev. S. Mat.).

The formula in an ancient Ambrosian ordo, quoted by Gerbertus (Liturg. Aleman. ii. 487), is still more explicit: "Corpus Domini nostri Jesu Christi, sanguine suo inlitum intinctum, mundet te ab omni peccato."

Here there is a literal compliance with an order of the council of Tours (A.D. 813), which enacted in reference to the viaticum that "sacra oblatio intincta debet esse in sanguine Christi, ut veraciter presbyter possit dicere infirmo, corpus et sanguis Domini proficiat tibi," &c. (Gerbert, de Liturg. Aleman. disquis. v. c. iii. § 4). There was a curious provision sometimes made (iv. Conc. Carthag. can. 76; xi. Toled. can. xi.), that in case of extreme infirmity the sick person might be communicated in one kind only, from the chalice, its liquid contents being poured into his mouth when he was unable to swallow solid food.

It was the office of the deacon to convey the viaticum to the dying, as it was his duty to take the Eucharist to the absent in Justin Martyr's time (Apol. i. 65); but in cases of emergency any ordinary messenger might be despatched with it, as in the case of that sent to the dying Serapion under the circumstances described by Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, and recorded by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 44). This permission to employ any agent was afterwards abolished as derogatory to the dignity of the Eucharist (Concil. Remens. A.D. 813, Regino, lib. i. de Eccles. Discip. cap. 120), but several later visitation articles and episcopal inquiries prove that the custom became by no means immediately extinct.

In cases where the sick man was both anointed and communicated, the unction seems usually to have preceded the viaticum (Ivo Carnotens. Decret. p. xv. c. 35; Martene, lib. i. c. vii. art. 2, and the early ritual offices preserved there), but this was not always or necessarily the case. Sometimes the order was inverted (Caesarii Serm. 265, in appendice S. Aug. Op. tom. v.; Migne, Bib. Pat. Lat. tom. xxxix.), but the evidence for early usage on this point is deficient, the earliest ordines "visitandi infirmum" or "ungendi infirmos" not belonging in their present form to a period before the 9th century (Mabillon, Lit. Gall. lib. i. c. 9; Gerbert, Vet. Lit. Aleman. pars ii. Disquis. 5; Martene, de Antig. Eccles. Rit. lib. i. c. vii. art. vii.). Compare UNCTION, p. 2004.

ii. A title (ἐφόδιον) sometimes given to baptism in allusion to that sacrament being the spiritual provision for Christians in their way through this life (Basil. Hom. xiii. de Bapt. p. 480, edit. Paris, 1618). To administer the rite of baptism is termed ἐφοδιάζειν by Greg. Naz. (Orat. xl. de Bapt. p. 644, edit. 1630; Suiceri Thes. Eccles. sub voc.) [F. E. W.]

VICAR. Though the term vicarius, or vicarius generalis, is later than the period with which we are concerned, it is, from the nature of the case, probable that bishops who were either infirm or oppressed by extraordinary labours must sometimes have had an assistant, who corresponded more or less to the "Vicar-General" of modern times. In fact, Touttée (Cyrilli Opp., Vita S. Cyr. Diss. i. c. 3, p. 8) does not scruple to call Cyril, who had acted as assistant to his predecessor in catechising and other episcopal offices, the Vicar-General of Jerusalem. So Vincentius (Ruinart, Acta MM. p. 366, ed. 1713) acted as the vicar of Valerius, bishop of Saragossa, so far as preaching was concerned. Paulinus (in Ruinart, p. 251) describes the presbyter Felix of Nola as assisting the successive bishops Maximus and Quintus. Gregory of Nazianzus, as he himself declares (Oratio xviii. p. 327), while still a presbyter, assisted his father, who was bishop of the same see, and afterwards performed similar offices towards Basil the Great at Caesarea. Basil had himself performed similar services for Eusebius (Greg. Naz. Orat. xx. p. 340). In Constantinople the CHARTOPHYLAX was a kind of vicar-general to the patriarch. For episcopal assistants, see COADJUTOR, p. 398. (Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, Bd. I. Th. ii. p. 415 ff.; Altaserrae Asceticon, ii. 13). [C.]

VIGILIUS, Jan. 31, bishop of Trent, martyr (Mart. Usuard., Vet. Rom.); Jun. 26 (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. v. 165). [C. H.]

VIGILS (Vigiliae). (1) For the custom of waking in the night for prayer and psalmody, see HOURS OF PRAYER, p. 798.

(2) As a preparation for the greater festivals, vigils were observed in churches for the whole or the greater part of the night. These were called by the Greeks παννυχίδες, by the Latins Pervigilia, or Pernoctationes. Of such Chrysostom speaks (Hom. 4, de Verbis Esaiae; vi. 121 B, ed. Montfaucon). "See the holy night-long vigils linking day to day." Such vigils preceded not only the great festivals, such as Easter and Pentecost, but also the Sabbath and the Lord's Day (Socrates, H. E. vi. 8). But especially in the case of a martyr it was the custom of the faithful to pass the night preceding his festival in the church which covered his remains, or in one dedicated to him. Thus Chrysostom (Hom. de Martyr. ii. 668 D) says that on the eve of a martyr's festival the faithful had turned night into day by their holy watchings (διὰ τῶν παννυχίδων τῶν ἱερῶν). Against such watchings at the end of the 4th century Vigilantius (Hieron. c. Vigilant. p. 395, Vallarsi) protested, as giving occasion for riot and disorder, and Jerome defended them with his accustomed vigour. Sidonius Apollinaris (Epist. v. 17, in Sirmondi Opp. Var. i. 569) describing the celebration of the anniversary of St. Justus at Lyons, mentions the preceding vigil. "We went to the church," he says, "before dawn; there was a concourse of both sexes, greater than the spacious church would hold. After the vigil-office, which was sung antiphonally by the monks and clergy, we separated, going however to no great distance, to be ready for the third hour [nine o'clock in the morning], when we were to join with the priests in the divine office." Here the vigil appears to have begun at an early hour in the morning, not on the evening preceding the festival. Such vigil-offices consisted of prayers, LECTIONS [see p. 252] and psalms, and at least occasionally included preaching (Caesarius of Arles, Sermon. 285 and 300, in Augustine's Works).

The interval which Sidonius mentions between the vigil and the service of the day was a cause of great disorder. There was often dancing and singing, not only in the neighbouring houses, but in the out-buildings of the church, and even in the church itself. As early as the year 305 the council of Eliberis (c. 35) prohibited women from keeping vigil in cemeteries on account of their excesses. A constitution of king Childebert (Hardouin, Concilia, iii. 334) notices the riots which took place at vigils. Binterim (Denkwürdigkeiten, V. ii. 154) quotes an article of inquiry from Theodore of Canterbury, complaining of the indecent sports which were sometimes practised in vigils.

There is in early times no indication that fasting was a condition of a vigil. Chrysostom, indeed, in the homily delivered at Antioch after the earthquake (ii. 718 B.), seems to speak as if fasting was connected with the vigil; but this was on a very special occasion of humiliation. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. x. 31) says that Perpetuus, in the latter half of the 5th century, arranged the fasts and vigils which were to be observed throughout the year, but there is nothing to indicate that the fasts and the vigils were identical. Nicetus, however (De Vigiliis, c. 4, in D'Achery's Spicilegium, iii. 6), does warn his monks to prepare themselves by abstinence for a vigil as for a divine mystery. Pope Nicholas I. (858–867) in his Responsio ad Bulgaros (Mansi, xv. 420) enjoins a fast before the Assumption of the Virgin Mary and before the Nativity of the Lord. Regino (Concil. Germ. ii. 482) quotes a canon of uncertain date, in which presbyters are desired to give notice to the people not only of festivals to be observed but also of vigil-fasts (jejunia vigilarum). We may say therefore that the observance of a vigil by fasting came to be usual not later than the 9th century. Vigils are of rare occurrence in the oldest calendars. [CALENDAR, p. 258.]

VINE (IN ART). (See John xv. 1; Psalm lxxix.; Isaiah v.). The vine is the most ancient subject of Christian art, perhaps without excepting the Good Shepherd, with which it is so frequently combined [see SHEPHERD, THE GOOD]. It is one of the foremost of the symbols chosen by our Lord Himself from the natural things around Him, as the ancient vines on Mount Olivet still remind the traveller. Its earliest examples in Christian fresco are probably the vine of St. Domitilla [FRESCO, p. 693], and those of St. Praetextatus (ib.). The stuccoes of the tomb on the Latin Way, woodcut No. 1 (Bottari, tav.

xciii.; Aringhi, ii. 29), certainly existed in Bosio's time, though now unknown, and seem to have been of the 2nd century. The great vine of the Callixtine Cemetery (woodcut No. 2) is probably of high antiquity, and is the best-known instance of the graceful naturalism of the Christian classic style of decoration (Bottari, tav. lxxiv.; Aringhi, i. 569). In mosaic, the vines of St. Constantia in Rome are perhaps the earliest example (see Parker's Mosaics of Rome and Ravenna, and a fine fac-simile in the South Kensington Museum). The vine of Galla Placidia's tomb, woodcut No. 3 (combined, like most of the others, with the Good or Royal Shepherd), dates about A.D. 450, and is highly interesting as compared with the stuccoes and also with the Callixtine vine.

The three modes of treatment are so distinctly related to each other and to the Domitilla example, and give so clear an illustration of the progress or retrogress from classic naturalism to Byzantine formalism of the highest order, still retaining classic beauty, that woodcuts are given here to illustrate them.

It is surprising to see how far the vine has shared the fate of the Good Shepherd, so as to exist no more as a sacred emblem after the first five or six centuries. Its heathen or ethnic or human use went on; but the use of the vine becomes idly decorative, in churches and houses alike. However, its sculpture is a little later than its painting, and as important. The porphyry sarcophagus of St. Constantia (Aringhi, ii. p. 157) has been photographed by Mr. Parker. See Aringhi, i. 307–9, for vines on unquestionably Christian sarcophagi, St. Constantia's being by no means certain. See also Parker, No. 2917, for a quaint and beautiful sarcophagus, evidently by some zealous and ingenious workman, perhaps of the 3rd century, who cared more for his subject than for the exemplaria Graeca of his art. Again, Bottari, i. p. 1. There was, in 1871, a curious sarcophagus in St. Vitale at Ravenna, where the mind of the sculptor seemed to have been bent on the vine and the acanthus at the same moment. The vine of the columns of Torcello is a late type of Graeco-Byzantine work of the highest order (Stones of Venice, ii. plate 3).

For the vine or grapes on lamps, see Aringhi, i. 517, for two examples, also ii. 648, with the Good Shepherd. Grapes are cut on tombs of various kinds (Lupi, Sev. Epitaph, p. 182; Fabretti, 581). Martigny points to a strong resemblance between certain carvings of this kind at Lyons (De Boissieu, Inscr. Antiq. de Lyons, 1846–54) and Jewish coins in Calmet's Dict. of the Bible, li. pl. 3, pp. 17–19. From this he infers that both Jews and Christians used the symbol each in their own sense, with reference to a Promised Land. This is confirmed by a glass in Garrucci (Vetri, tav. li. No. 9), with the inscription, "In Deo, Anima Dulcis, Pie Zeses," which would certainly connect the sacramental and historical senses of the symbol. See also Millin, Midi de la France, pl. lix. 3, xxxviii. 8, for Gallic sarcophagi.

Nevertheless, as Martigny remarks with obvious truth, the eucharistic meaning of the vine or its fruit is later than its original or historic symbolism of the person of our Lord. The first written evidence on this point, he says, is that of Paschasius in the 9th century, De Corpore et Sanguine Christi, c. x. t. ix. Bibl. Patrum, ed. Colon. He mentions a sculpture in which genii with ears of corn are combined with others bearing grapes, of about the same date. It is an Arles sarcophagus (Millin, Midi de la France, pl. lviii. No. 5). There is an amethyst in the Royal Library at Turin (Perret, iv. pl. xvi. No. 52) with a vine-stock and grapes, having corn-ears on each side. Both these may point to the elements. But the real meaning of the vine of Christian symbolism is that assigned it by our Lord's words in St. John xv. He is the vine, His servants are the branches, bearing fruit only while they abide in Him.

VIRGINS. It is clear that in the course of the 2nd century there arose a strong current of feeling in favour of abstinence from marriage on the part of both men and women. This tendency is not found in Clement of Rome, nor in the Epistle of Barnabas, but it is apparent, though under allegorical forms, in the Shepherd of Hermas (Sim. 9, 10, 11). Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 15) speaks of "many men and women of sixty and seventy years old who have been disciples of Christ since infancy, and have kept themselves uncorrupted." Athenagoras (Legat. c. 32) uses almost similar language. Tatian (adv. Graecos, 32, 33) flings back upon the Gentiles their taunts at Christian virginity. At the end of the century the whole question of the relation of Christianity to marriage was brought prominently into discussion by the rise and prevalence of Montanism; and in the treatises of Tertullian, de Velandis Virginibus and de Exhortatione Castitatis, the Montanist view is set forth by a zealous advocate. In the next generation Origen (c. Cels. 7, 48) contrasts the Christians who dedicated themselves to a life of virginity for the sake of virginity itself with the pagan priestesses who did so only for the sake of worldly honour. In Cyprian we find, probably for the first time, the expression of the idea that virginity is in itself higher than marriage. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 3, p. 558) and Tertullian (ad Uxor. 1, 8) appear to agree with those who place married continence or widowhood above virginity on the ground that "facile est non appetere quod nescias;" but Cyprian gives the higher rank to virginity (e. g. De Habitu Virg. c. 23; De Mortalit. c. 26).

In the Apostolical Constitutions the same relative rank appears to be implied in the metaphor, that whereas widows are the θυσιαστήριον, or altar of sacrifice, virgins are the θυμιατήριον, the altar upon which was offered the purer offering of incense (Const. Apost. 2, 26; 4, 3; it may be noted as one of the differences between the earlier and later books of the Apostolical Constitutions that in 2, 25 the order is 1, widows; 2, virgins; whereas in the third and later books the order is reversed). Athanasius speaks of the fact that girls of tender years took vows of perpetual virginity as a proof of the power of Christ in fostering the virtue of continence (De Incarnat. Verb. c. 51); and Cyril of Jerusalem (Catéches. 4, 24, p. 64), following Cyprian (de Habitu Virgin. c. 22; so also Pseudo-Cyprian de Bono Pudicitiae, c. 7; S. Hieron. Epist. 107 (57) ad Letam, c. 13, S. August. Epist. 150), speaks of those who had taken such vows as living a life like that of the angels; but with the exception of the curious Convivium decem Virginum of Methodius (printed in Migne P. G. vol. xviii. 27 sqq.) the exaggerated praises of virginity which characterise some later literature are almost altogether absent from the genuine and orthodox writings of the first four centuries; those writings undoubtedly contain the germ of the later developments, but it is a significant fact that, when those later developments required the support of the earlier fathers, spurious treatises had to be manufactured, e. g. those of St. Athanasius de Virginitate, Migne, P. G. vol. xxviii. 251, and of St. Basil, Op. ed. Bened. vol. i. p. 618. The more sober view of the church seems to be expressed in the language which the Apostolical Constitutions put into the mouth of the apostles: "About virginity we have received no commandment; but we permit it as a vow to those who wish it, only urging this upon them—that they make not any profession rashly. . . . For one who has made a profession, doing works that are worthy of her profession, must shew that her profession is true, and that it is made to give her leisure for religion, and not to cast a slur upon marriage" (Const. Apost. 4, 14).

Those girls or women who thus devoted themselves to lives of virginity came in time to form a separate class or "ordo" in the church. In the single passage of the genuine, or approximately genuine, letters of Ignatius which refers to them, they are apparently co-ordinated with widows (ad Smyrn. c. 13. The text of the passage is obscure, and has given rise to much discussion; the view here taken is that of Zahn in Gebhardt and Harnack's Patres Apostolici, fasc. ii. p. 95, which is strongly confirmed by the gloss on the corresponding passage in the interpolated epistle, and also by Pseudo-Ignat. ad Philipp. c. 15). Polycarp (ad Philipp. c. 4, 5) treats in succession of wives, widows, young men, and virgins, which may be taken as an indication that virgins had not as yet acquired the distinct status which they ultimately had; nor do they appear to have had such a status at the time when the earlier books of the Apostolical Constitutions were written; nor is there any certain evidence of their being regarded as a distinct "ordo" until the 4th century. This order of "holy virgins," or "church virgins" (παρθένοι ἅγιαι or ἐκκλησιαστικαί), is found at Jerusalem (Sozom. H. E. 2, 2; Socrat. H. E. 1, 17), where the empress Helena assembled them and drained on them at supper; in Persia (Sozom. 2, 11, 12); at Alexandria, where Constantine "placed after the death of Arius, to the clerks and holy virgins," enjoining quietness (ibid. 2, 31); and at Nicomedia (ibid. 3, 25). Their existence is also implied by the fact that Constantine directed provincial governors to make an annual provision for them as well as for widows (Incert. Auct. de Constant. ap. Haenel, Corpus Legum, p. 196). The extent of their existence may be measured by the violence of the Arian reaction against them; whatever was prized by the Catholic party was profaned by the Arian party; and this comparatively new institution of an order of holy virgins seems to have excited an especial spirit of antagonism. The indignities to which the virgins were subjected are mentioned by many contemporary writers, e. g. St. Athanas. Epist. Encycl. c. 3, Apol. ad Constant. Imp. c. 33; Socrat. H. E. 2, 28; S. Hilar. Pictav. ad Constant. Aug. i. 6, and Fragm. Hist. 2, 3; 3, 9, ap. Migne, P. L. vol. x. pp. 561, 633, 665; S. Greg. Nazianz. Orat. 43 in laud. Basil. M. c. 48, p. 805; and Orat. 33, c. Arianos, c. 3, p. 605. A similar inference may be drawn from the pagan reaction under Julian; that part of that reaction was directed against this institution of virgins is clear from S. Greg. Nazianz. Orat. 4; c. Julian. c. 87, p. 121, and Sozom. H. E. 5, 5. who mentions that Julian went so far as to require virgins and widows who, under the regulation of Constantine, had received allowances from the state to refund them. After this time the references to them are frequent. Basil (Epist. Canon. 2 ad Amphiloch. c. 18) and Cyril of Jerusalem (Cateches. 4, 24, p. 64) speak of τὸ τάγμα τῶν παρθένων; and, probably about the same time, the spurious epistles of Ignatius speak of τὸ σύστημα τῶν παρθένων (ad Philipp. c. 15) and exhort Christians to honour them as consecrated to Christ (ad Tars. c. 9). As an "ordo" or class they were τὸ τάγμα τῶν παρθένων (S. Basil, Epist. Canon. 2, ad Amphiloch. c. 18; S. Cyrill. Hierosol. Cateches. 4, 24, p. 64; so, probably about the same time, τὸ σύστημα τῶν παρθένων Pseudo-Ignat. ad Philipp. c. 15. As individuals, they were, like the Virgin Mary who was constantly held before them as their pattern, "handmaids of the Lord" (δούλη τοῦ Θεοῦ on a tombstone at Smyrna, A.D. 540; Corpus Inscr. Graec. no. 9277; cf. ibid. nos. 9286, 9324, 9448; so in the West "puella Dei," 1 Conc. Tolet. c. 6).

It is not clear by what external signs the vow of virginity was indicated in the first three centuries. There is no mention of any special ceremony, and the fact of Cyprian writing an exhortatory treatise, De Habitu Virginum, in which he urges those who had taken such a vow to have nothing to do with worldly ornaments ("quid istae cum terreno cultu et cum ornamentis," c. 5), shews that as yet there was no special dress. But in the course of the fourth century two external signs of the vow came to be adopted, the wearing of a dark-coloured dress, and the ceremony of veiling with a veil. The first of these was but gradually adopted in the time of Jerome: "solemus quidem cum futuram virginem sponponderit, pulla tunica eam induere et furvo operire pallio, auferre linteamenta; . . . . aliis vero e contra videtur" (S. Hieron. Epist. 128 (98) ad Gaudent. vol. i. p. 961, ed. Vallars.; cf. id. Epist. 107 (57) ad Letam, c. 5, vol. i. p. 683; Epist. 96 (21) ad Marcellam, vol. i. p. 129). A few years later Leo the Great speaks of "virginitatis propositum atque habitum," as though by that time the adoption of a special dress had become usual (S. Leon. M. Epist. 167, ad Rustic. Narbon. c. 15, vol. i. p. 1426). Such a change of dress was not only a voluntary act, but was not necessarily attended by any special ceremony: a Spanish council of the seventh century forbids any who have adopted it to return to the secular life (10 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 656, c. 5), but this stern rule does not appear elsewhere, and the fact of its being enacted and of the severe penalties by which it had to be enforced, shews that it had not up to that time been universally recognised even in Spain. The second mark of the adoption of a vow of virginity seems to have arisen out of the metaphor which is found as early as the time of Cyprian (e.g. Epist. 4 (62), p. 472, ed. Hartel), and which is treated as a common expression by Athanasius (Apol. ad Constantin. Imp. c. 33), that a girl who had vowed virginity was a "bride of Christ." The poetry of the metaphor (which survives e.g. in Methodius, Conviv. Dec. Virg. Orat. 11, c. 1, p. 207, where the virgins sing a hymn with the beautiful refrain, νυμφίε, ὑπαντάνω σοι) was translated into visible acts. The virgin was publicly vested with the bridal veil (" flammeum Christi," S. Hieron. Epist. 147 (93) ad Sabinian. vol. i. p. 1090; Epist. 108 (86) ad Eustoch. vol. i. p. 723). This was a solemn and irrevocable act. It could only be performed (a) by a bishop, and, (b) apparently, on a great festival; for the latter point, cf. Ambros. Exhort. Virgin. c. 7, vol. ii. p. 288, " venit paschae dies, in toto orbe baptismi sacramenta celebrantur, velantur sacrae virgines;" Gelasius, Epist. ad Episc. Lucan. = Decret. General. c. 14, ap. Hinschius, p. 652, allows Epiphany, Easter, or the Nativity of an apostle; for the former point cf. S. Hieron. Epist. 130 (97) ad Demetriad. vol. i. p. 976, scio quod ad imprecationem pontificis flammeum virginalem sanctum operuerit caput; the absolute restriction of the veiling of a virgin to a bishop belongs to an African council of uncertain date, 2 Conc. Carthag. c. 3, and to later times, 2 Conc. Hispal. A.D. 618, c. 7, Conc. Rotom. A.D. 650, c. 9, 6 Conc. Paris, A.D. 829, lib. i. c. 41, 43, in all of which presbyters are prohibited; Caroli M. Capit. Aquisgran. A.D. 789, c. 75, prohibits abbesses; on the other hand 3 Conc. Carth. c. 36, allows presbyters to act with the consent of the bishop. The reason for this restriction to bishops was probably the desire to uphold the dignity of the profession of chastity; it was fitting that the " sanctiores purioresque hostiae," who were thus offered upon the altar of God, should be offered " per summum sacerdotem " (Epist. ad Claudium sororem de Virginitate, c. 1, ascribed erroneously to Sulpicius Servius, and printed by Halm as an appendix to his works in the Vienna Corpus Script. Lat. vol. i.).

The act of veiling came to be accompanied with ceremonies. Basil speaks of the vow being taken " before God and angels and men, the venerable gathering of clergy, the holy band of virgins, the assembly of the Lord and the church of the saints " (S. Basil. Epist. 46 (5) ad Virg. Laps. p. 136). Augustine seems to imply that there was a feast (Epist. 150 ad Prob. et Julian. ap Migne, P. L. vol. xxxiii. 645, "relationis apophoretum gratissime accepimus," but the expression may be metaphorical). The treatise De Lapsu Virginis consecratae, c. 5 (sometimes ascribed to Ambrose, and printed in his works, vol. ii. p. 305; more recently, on the strength of an Epinal MS. of the eighth century, ascribed to Nicetas, bishop of Romaciana in Servia; see De Lisle, Comptes Rendus de l'Académie des Inscriptions, 1877, p. 274), gives a vivid account of the ceremonies which had taken place when the lapsed (i.e. married) sister had taken her vow "in tanto tamque solemni conventu ecclesiae Dei [sc. at Easter], inter lumina neophytorum splendida, inter candidatus regni coelestis quasi Regi nuptura processeras;" the epithalamium of Solomon, Psalm xiv., had been sung over her; and the prayers of the assembled people in their shouted "Amen" had been, as it were, her spiritual dowry. The earliest of the later rituals is probably that of the Missale Francorum ap. Muratori Lit. Rom. Vet. vol. iii. p. 460, which for the most part coincides with the Leonine Sacramentary, ibid. vol. i. p. 719, the Gelasian Sacramentary, ibid. vol. ii. p. 222, and the Gregorian Sacramentary, ibid. vol. ii. p. 786; the ritual of Hittorp's Ordo Romanus, p. 141, contains the same prayers with others, and with some rubrical directions; that of the Codex Maffeianus (Muratori, vol. iii. p. 103) is different.

There was the further distinction between those who had "changed their dress" and those who had "taken the veil," that for the latter there was a limit of age. Basil (Epist. Canon. 2 ad Amphiloch. c. 18) allows it at the age of sixteen or seventeen. Ambrose mentions that in his time there was a controversy whether the veiling of virgins should not be deferred until they were of mature years, and decides that it is a question of sobriety of character and not of lapse of time (S. Ambros. de Virginitate, c. 7, vol. ii. p. 223). But in the course of the fifth century the civil law disallows the veiling of virgins until they are forty years old, and enacts that any one who causes a virgin to be veiled before that age is to be fined a third of his goods (Novell. Majorian, tit. 6, c. 1, § 1, 2, A.D. 458, ed. Haenel, p. 306; so Conc. Caesaraugust. A.D. 381? c. 8). The council of Agde (A.D. 506 c. 19) and the Liber Pontificalis (Vit. S. Leon. M. p. 67) fix a still later period, viz., that of sixty years of age; but the African code (Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 16) and in later times the Carolingian capitularies (Capit. Francofurt. A.D. 794, c. 46, ap. Pertz. M. H. G. Legum, vol. i. p. 74, Hludowici I. Capit. Aquisgran. A.D. 817, c. 26 ap. Pertz, M. H. G. Legum, vol. i. p. 209) fix the age at twenty-five. Later canonists made a distinction between (1) the "velum professionis," which might be taken at twelve years of age; (2) "velum consecrationis" at twenty-five; (3) "velum ordinationis" at forty; (4) "velum praelationis" at sixty; (5) "velum continentiae," which was proper to widows, and for which no age is specified (Silvester Prierias, i.e. Mazolinus, Silvestrina Summa, s.v. Consecratio, ed. Antwerp, 1581, p. 173; Durandus, Rationale, ii. 1, 45, puts these in a different order).

In order to protect the virginity of those who had taken the vow arose the custom of secluding them. The custom existed as early as the time of Tertullian, who speaks of it as one which prevailed in some churches of both Greece and Africa (de Veland. Virg. c. 2). The first mention of special houses in which such virgins lived together is in the middle of the fourth century; Eleusius was banished by Julian for having founded παρθενῶνας at Cyzicus (Sozom. H. E. v. 15); Basil is said to have founded παρθενῶνας (S. Gregor. Naz. Orat. 43 in laud. S. Basil. M. c. 62, vol. i. p. 817); and Ambrose speaks of a "sacrarium virginitatis" as existing at Bologna (de Virginibus, i. 10, vol. ii. p. 160). In these houses an organization prevailed; Sozomen (H. E. 8 23) speaks of the virgin Nicarete, whom he praises as the best woman he ever knew, as having refused frequent solicitations to preside over the church virgins; and of Matrona as having been τῶν ἱερῶν παρθένων ἡγουμένη; so also Athanasius in his life of the monk Anthony speaks of his sister as having been placed early in life in a παρθεῶνι, where she afterwards became καθηγουμένη τῶν ἄλλων παρθένων (S. Athanas. Vit. S. Anton. c. 2, 54, vol. i. pp. 634, 668).

Ultimately this seclusion became the rule; those who vowed virginity, whether they had merely "changed their dress" and were "professae," or whether they had received the veil and were "velatae," or "consecratae," lived in monasteries and were nuns. For their history and organization reference must be made to other articles (NUN; MONASTERY).

A virgin who married after taking a vow was subject always to censure, and sometimes to penalties. Cyprian spoke of such an one as "non mariti sed Christi adultera" (de Habitu Virgin. c. 20 and Epist. 4 (62), ed. Hartel, p. 476), and the phrase was often repeated, e. g. by Basil, Epist. 46 (5) ad Virginem lapsam, p. 138; but Augustine repudiates it, and will not allow that marriage after a vow of continence is adultery (de Bono Viduitatis, c. 10). Leo the Great treats it as a case of "praevaricatio" or double-dealing (Epist. 167 ad Rustic. Narbon. c. 15); but both Jerome (adv. Jovin. lib. i. 15, vol. ii. p. 258, ed. Vallars.) and Gelasius (Epist. 9. ad Episc. Lucan. c. 22) apply to it the stronger term "incest." The civil law made marriage with a dedicated virgin penal; Constantinus in 354 (Cod. Theodos. 9. 25, 1) enacted a severe penalty upon those who made attempts on the chastity of virgins, whether with or without their consent; ten years later Jovian, in the counter reaction against what had happened under Julian, went so far as to enact that even the solicitation of a virgin or widow, willing or unwilling, was not merely penal but capital (Cod. Theodos. 9. 25. 2, Sozom. H. E. 6. 3); but the enactment, though preserved in Cod. Justin. 1. 3. 5, probably failed from excessive severity, since in 420 Honorius and Theodosius imposed the milder, though still severe, penalty of confiscation and deportation; but Majorian, Novell. tit. 6. 1. 4, re-enacted the penalty of Jovian, with the addition of confiscation. The Barbarian Codes follow the principle of the Civil Law; the Interpretatio and two Epitomes of the Visigothic Code punish the virgin or widow as well as the man (Lex Romana Visigothorum, ed. Haenel, p. 195); the laws of Luitprand make forfeiture the penalty of marriage even with one who has been dedicated by her parents, or herself taken a vow, without having been veiled (Leges Luitprandi, c. 30, A.D. 723, in Gengler's Germanische Rechtsdenkmäler, p. 556); the Bavarian code makes the penalty for such marriage twice the ordinary composition for the abduction of a married woman (Lex Baiuwariorum i. 11, textus primus, ap. Pertz, Legum, vol. iii. p. 276); in the Frankish domain, Lothair I. simply forbad such marriages (Chlothacharii I. Constitut. c. 8, A.D. 560, Pertz, Legum, vol. i. p. 2); but Lothair II. made even the attempt to marry capital (Chlothacharii II. Edict. c. 18, A.D. 614, Pertz, vol. i. p. 15). The ecclesiastical penalty for virgins who married was excommunication, for a longer or shorter period. The leading enactment of a general council is that of Chalcedon, c. 16; of local Western councils the chief enactments are the following. The council of Elvira A.D. 305, c. 13, condemns them to perpetual excommunication; the first council of Valence, A.D. 374, c. 2, will not admit them to penance until after the lapse of a long time; the first council of Toledo, A.D. 398, c. 16, will not readmit the offender to communion unless she lives, even during her husband's lifetime, a life of continence; the first council of Orange, A.D. 441, c. 28, treats the offence, as Leo the Great had done, as a case of "praevaricatio;" the second council of Arles, A.D. 451, limits the excommunication to those who were above "twenty-five" years of age; the council of Vannes, A.D. 465, c. 4, treats such a marriage as adultery; the council of Lerida, A.D. 523, c. 6, treats it as "stuprum;" the third council of Orleans, A.D. 538, c. 16, treats it as "raptus," and makes the excommunication perpetual: so also the second council of Tours, A.D. 567, c. 20, the first of Mâcon, A.D. 581, c. 12, and the fifth of Paris, A.D. 615, c. 13. So also in Spain; the sixth council of Toledo, A.D. 638, c. 6 directs those who persist in such a marriage to be "banished from all Christian society, so that not even talk be had with them." (The canons seem always to avoid the honourable word for marriage to be used in reference to such cases; but that "rapere" is used not in its ordinary civil sense, but only to cast a stigma upon such marriages is shewn, e.g. by the council of Reims, A.D. 625, c. 23, which implies that the "raptor" sometimes had the king's consent, or was supported by other legitimate authority.

VIRGINS, THE WISE AND FOOLISH. A curious painting of an arcosolium, in which the part of the parable relating to the wise virgins is unquestionably treated, was found by Bosio in the cemetery of St. Agnes at Rome (Bottari, Scult. e Pitt. &c. tav. cxlviii.). In the centre is a woman in the attitude of prayer, probably intended for the person buried in the tomb, robed in a dalmatic, with two bands of purple down the front. At her feet, representing the soul of the deceased, is a dove with outspread wings, and as if listening for the voice of her mate (Cantic. ii. 10). On the right of this female figure stand the five wise virgins, similarly clad in dalmatics with purple bands, each bearing in her right hand a torch, and carrying in her left by the handle a vessel of oil (St. Matt. xxv. 4). The leader of the five, who is knocking at the door of the room where the feast is going on, has her torch lighted. On the left of the praying figure five other women, also intended no doubt for the wise virgins, are seated at a table on which are two dishes, a flagon, and two loaves.

There is also in the cemetery of Cyriaca, a painting in fresco of the same subject, more fully treated, the foolish virgins being also represented. They are standing on the left hand of the Saviour, easily recognizable by their extinguished torches and down-cast looks. Our Lord, turning to the wise virgins, points out to them the heavenly feast to which they are invited (De Rossi, Roma Sott. p. 76). De Rossi thinks that this fresco, so far unique of its kind, indicates that the tomb is that of a virgin consecrated to heaven; a conjecture deriving much probability from a trustworthy tradition of a convent on the same spot. The sarcophagus under the fresco exhibits on its front face a figure in the attitude of prayer, while two other figures of saints, thought to be intended for SS. Peter and Paul, are drawing back a curtain and ushering the soul into paradise (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v. 'Vierges Folles,' &c.). [E. C. H.]

VISITATION. The right of personal visitation appears to have been considered as inherent in every office that conferred authority or imposed responsibility for the maintenance of discipline. Thus it belonged (i) to metropolitans in their provinces. Bingham (Antiquities, ii. c. 16, § 18) thinks that the right of visitation is implied in the ninth canon of the council of Antioch, A.D. 341, which asserts that the metropolitan received the care (τὴν φροντίδα ἀναδέχεσθαι) of all the dioceses in his province. But the wording of the canon, which goes on to assign as a reason that all men who had any business in hand visited the metropolitan city to transact it, seems rather to point to some supreme power of jurisdiction to be exercised in the metropolis itself, as having been in the minds of the framers of the canon (cf. Bracar. II. c. 4; Bruns, Conc. ii. p. 44). Clearer language is employed by the council of Turin, A.D. 401 (Conc. Taurinense, c. 2), which, in deciding between the rival claims of the bishops of Arles and Vienne to the office of metropolitan, decrees that each should visit the churches which were contiguous to his own see (eas ecclesias visitet quas oppidis suis vicinas magis esse constituat). The council of Lertina, A.D. 743, or Boniface (Ep. lxx.), decrees that it is the duty assigned by the canons to metropolitans to look into the lives of the bishops of his province and the way in which they discharged their duties. Occasional notices of metropolitan visitations are met with in early writers. Thus Possidonius (Vit. August. c. 8) speaks of Megalius, primate of Numidia, arriving at Hippo in the course of his visitation tour, and Bede (Hist. Eccl. iv. 2) speaks of Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, as passing through the whole island, ordaining bishops where they were needed and setting right all things which he found in disorder.

(ii) But the duty of visitation especially belonged to bishops in their dioceses. [BISHOP, p. 232.] The councils were continually laying down rules for the punctual performance of this duty and defining the business to be transacted.

(a) Visitations were to be held yearly in every parish. The council of Lugo, A.D. 569 (Conc. Lucense, Labbe, Conc. t. v. p. 874) orders a new division of the dioceses in Gallicia, on the ground that in their present condition they were too large to admit of a yearly visitation. The council of Tarragona, A.D. 516 (c. 8), orders that the bishop should make yearly visitations to provide for the reparation of such churches as had fallen into bad repair. The second council of Braga, A.D. 572, c. i. (Bruns, Conc. ii. 39), orders that the bishop should visit every parish in his diocese, and, on the first day, inquire how the clergy performed their duty, in order that where it was necessary he might instruct those who were ignorant, especially with reference to the canonical rules for the exorcism and instruction of catechumens during the twenty-one days before their baptism. On the second day he was to assemble the people and instruct them in their duties, both as to belief and practice. No express mention is here made of an annual visitation, but it appears implied. Probably the expenses of a visitation extending over two days were found oppressive to the clergy, for the seventh council of Toledo, A.D. 646 (c. 4), enacts, amongst other precautions to prevent extortion, that no bishop shall remain in any parish during his visitation for more than a single day. Probably many parishes were desirous of altogether avoiding the expenses of the visitation, since the council of Merida, A.D. 666 (Conc. Emerit c. 11), speaks of certain abbats and presbyters who had obtained exemptions (absolutionem) from former bishops, and orders that whenever a bishop arrives for the purpose of visitation he should be received with due honour, and a reasonable provision for expenses. The annual visitation is provided for in the fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633 (c. 36), which orders that a bishop shall visit each of the parishes in his diocese every year, for the purpose of seeing that the churches are in proper repair; but if he himself is prevented by ill-health or by the pressure of other duties, the visitation might be performed by one of his presbyters or deacons, who should inquire into the condition of the churches and the lives of the clergy. This permission of visiting by deputy appears to have led to abuses, for we find the council of Meaux (Conc. Meldense, c. 29), A.D. 815, speaking in terms of the strongest condemnation of an iniquitous custom (reprehensibilis et damnabilis consuetudo) which had arisen among some bishops, of never, or scarcely ever, visiting in person the parishes under their jurisdiction.

(b) The canons above quoted speak of the objects of the bishops' visitations as consisting chiefly in the inspection of the fabric of the churches, and the maintenance of discipline among the clergy. Other duties were added at a later period. The council of Leptina, above quoted, decrees that the bishop's visitation should be held annually, for the purposes of administering confirmation, instructing the people, inquiring into the morals of the clergy, and searching out and prohibiting all pagan customs. To add weight to his authority in this last duty, it was provided that he should be accompanied by the graphio, or count, who filled the office of "defensor ecclesiae" in his diocese, "Gravione, qui defensor ejus ecclesiæ est" (Labbe, Concilia, vi. p. 1534; see Advocatus Ecclesiae, p. 34). The capitularies of Charlemagne, vii. cc. 94, 95, 129, 365 provide that the bishop shall visit every parish in his diocese for the purpose of administering confirmation, of inquiring into the morals of his people, and extirpating any pagan practices that yet lingered among the people, and (Addit. iii. 65) of correcting any oppression or corruption on the part of the nobles or judges. Offenders were first to be reproved and admonished by the bishop, and if this failed to produce reformation to be reported to the emperor.

(c) These visitations appear to have been conducted with large and occasionally extravagant expenditure. Some exceptions are recorded. Severus Sulpitius (Dialog. 2) writes of St. Martin that he went round his diocese clad in a ragged dress and a black cloak and riding upon an ass. Bede (Hist. Eccl. iii. 28) narrates that St. Chad went round his diocese on his feet, especially noting that he visited all the country districts, the farms and villages and castles. But these are evidently noted as exceptional instances. Athanasius, on the other hand (Apolog. ii. § 74), is said to have been invariably attended while on his visitation not only by priests and deacons, but by a considerable number of the laity, "non paucos ex plebe." For the measures taken by later councils to check the oppressions and exactions for which visitations were made the excuse, see PROCURATIONS.

(iii) Archdeacons also had the power of holding visitations, but the practice seems to have been of gradual growth. Isidore of Seville (Epist. ad Ludifred), after defining the ordinary duties of an archdeacon, adds that he investigates in person, "ipse inquirit," the condition of the fabric and ornaments of the churches and other parish matters, and sends his report to the bishop, but notes that this is done by special commission "cum jussione episcopi." Hincmar of Rheims, however, in his Precepts to Archdeacons, c. 1 (Opp. ii. p. 728), speaks of their visits to country parishes, either in his company, or by themselves, as if such visitations were part of their regular duty (see ARCHDEACON, p. 138, and PROCURATIONS).

(iv) The right of visitation appears to have been claimed in some instances by the civil authorities. The council of Châlons (Conc. Cabillon (c. 11) speaks with great indignation of the conduct of certain judges who claimed a right of visitation over all parishes and monasteries subject to episcopal superintendence, and demanded provision for their expenses. Probably this claim arose from the practice above mentioned of associating the civil "defensor ecclesiae" with the bishop, in order to provide for the more effectual suppression of pagan customs. VISITATION OF THE SICK. [UNCTION, p. 2000; VIATICUM.]

VISITATOR. A bishop temporarily appointed to perform the duties of a vacant see, or to act in the place of another bishop when incapacitated by illness or lying under ecclesiastical censure. See INTERCESSOR. An old formulary relating to the election of a bishop, quoted by Du Cange from the Spicilegium Acheriense, tom. viii. p. 154, provides that the bishop who had been in charge of the funeral of a deceased prelate ("tumulator") should be the "visitator" of the vacant see, and take charge of the property in or belonging to the church, the appointment to be made by the metropolitan. The council of Riez, A.D. 439 (Conc. Reg. c. 6), orders that in case of the death of a bishop, no other bishop should approach the cathedral church at the time of the funeral, except one from a neighbouring see, who should take charge of the see in the capacity of a "visitator"—"visitatoris vice." The use of the word seems especially to belong to the Western church. It is of frequent occurrence in the writings of Gregory the Great. Thus (Ep. ii. 25) he appoints Leontius to be "visitator" of the see of Rimini in consequence of the ill-health of the bishop, and (I. 15) commands Balbinus, and (I. 51) Felix to go as visitatores to certain churches, mentioning that their chief duty was to provide for the ordination of the clergy. Hincmar of Rheims, in his epistle to the bishop of Laon, expressly claims the right, as metropolitan, of appointing a visitator" to the care of a vacant see (see Thomassin, Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. ii. 2, c. 21, § 9). The word περιοδευτής is sometimes translated visitator (see Bruns, Canon. note in Conc. Laodic. c. 57), but the offices were essentially distinct. VOLUME. The "roll of a book" (volumen) was composed of leaves of papyrus or parchment, glued, or otherwise fastened, end to end, and rolled, as its name implies, round an axis. Libri and codices, on the other hand, derived their names from the material of which they were formed, and were put together as books are now. Donati (de' Dittici degli Ant. p. 17) gives a drawing of a volume rolled up and fitted with all requisites for use and protection. The fittings of a volume, as seen in a drawing given by Montfaucon, were a stick to roll it on, with a boss or knob at the left hand of the MS., and projecting a little way beyond the right side of it, so as to furnish a handle; a cover of vellum fastened with strings or straps at either end, and a slip of thinner vellum glued on, with the title of the book written on it. Volumes were sometimes called by a name of similar origin, rotulae (Durand. Ration. Div. Off. i. c. 3, n. 11).

I. Among the Greeks and Romans, a volume in the hand was the mark of an orator. Polyhymnia, the muse of rhetoric, is always represented in this way, and the same mark of distinction is given in statues and bas-reliefs to senators and other great men. In the museum of the Vatican there is a statue of Augustus, with a volume in the left hand, and making a rhetorical gesture with the right. Among the early Christians the use of the volume as a symbol seems to have been more general, though apparently always confined to persons of distinction, and its significance more varied and subtle.

1. It was used in representations of the first person of the Trinity. Bottari (Scult. e Pitt. lxxxiv.) gives a drawing of a sarcophagus from the catacombs, in which the Father appears as an old man standing up, with a volume in his left hand, and his right stretched out after the classical manner, and representing an orator towards Moses, whom he is ordering to put off his shoes before he approaches the burning bush.

The hand alone bearing a volume is sometimes met with as a symbol of the Father, as in a bas-relief of the 6th century representing the baptism of Agilulfus, king of the Lombards (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. tab. v.)

2. The patriarchs and prophets of the Old Testament are represented with the volume in hand (Durand, quoted above). Moses appears on sarcophagi thus represented (Bottari, Scult. e Pitt. xlix. et pass.) only when he is striking the rock, which looks as if the volume were intended as a mark of the divine power granted to him to work miracles for the people. In some engravings the volume is not in his hand, but in the space behind his head (Garrucci, Vetri Orn. &c. tav. ii. 10).

3. Our Saviour is almost always represented in mosaics and in the bas-reliefs of sarcophagi with a volume in his left hand. The volume is shewn unrolled (a) when he is addressing St. Peter (as on a great number of sarcophagi), and there is a remarkably clear example of this treatment in the mosaic of St. Constance, thought to be due to the munificence of Constantine (Ciampini, de Sacr. Aedif. tab. xxxii.); the phylactery which he presents to St. Peter is also shewn unrolled, and inscribed with the words Dominus pacem dat, intended, of course, as the apostle's commission as preacher of the gospel of peace (Eph. vi. 15). (b) Our Lord also bears the volume when he is teaching (Bottari, Scult. e Pitt. &c. cxxxiii.; Allegranza, Sacr. Mon. di Milano, tav. i.), and when he is disputing with the doctors (Aringhi, Roma. Subt. i. 579; ii. 213) [DOCTORS, CHRIST WITH THE]; and on this occasion he has a casket at his feet, supposed to contain the books of the Old Testament, to which he may make reference in his discussion. When a miracle is being wrought the volume is always represented rolled up, as in the healing of the man born blind (Bottari, Scult. e Pitt. cxxxvii.); of the paralytic (ib. lxxxviii.); the changing of water into wine (ib. lxxxix.); the healing of the woman with the issue of blood (ib.). But in some representations of the raising of Lazarus (Bottari, Scult. e Pitt. xxxii. xxxvi.) the volume is unrolled, with the probable intention of symbolizing the revelation of the glory of God (St. John xi. 4), and of "life and immortality through the gospel" (2 Tim. i. 10). But, for some reason as yet undiscovered, the volume, which is an invariable accompaniment of a miracle in the sculptures of sarcophagi, does not appear on glass or in the paintings of the catacombs. In the museum of the Vatican there is a beautiful fresco brought from the catacombs exhibiting, as far as is known, the only ancient representation of the Last Supper, and in this the Saviour appears with the rolled-up volume in his hand.

4. Where a volume appears in the hand of St. Peter or St. Paul, it is supposed to represent his own writings; but when, as sometimes on ancient gilded glass, a volume is placed between these two apostles, it is supposed to symbolize the unanimity of these apostles and the identity of the gospel preached by them. The golden crown by which it is generally surmounted is probably intended to indicate its royal origin as the good news of the kingdom of heaven (St. Matt. iv. 23). Mosaics often exhibit these apostles with the volume unrolled and showing extracts from Scripture referring to some remarkable event in their lives; thus, in the apse of the ancient Vatican, St. Peter is represented (Ciampini, de Sacr. Aedif. tab. xiii.) with a phylactery in his hand inscribed with his memorable confession (St. Matt. xvi. 16). In the same mosaic St. Paul appears standing by the seated figure of the Saviour with a volume in his hand, bearing the words "Mihi vivere Christus est" (Philipp. i. 21).

5. The apostles, as a body, are found represented both on mosaics and bas-reliefs with this sign of their commission to preach the gospel (Aringhi, Rom. Subt. passim; Bosio, Rom. Sott. passim; Ciampini, Vet. Mon. t. i. tab. lxvi.), and the Saviour commonly stands in the midst as if he were teaching them (Millin, Midi de la France, p. lix.).

6. In the more ancient monuments bishops, as depositaries of the word, bear the roll in the left hand; but in mosaics (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. tab. xxiv.), diptychs (Paciaudi, de Cult. Joan. Bapt. pp. 230–260), and paintings of a later age, a square book richly bound. A representation on glass of the figure of St. Cyprian (spelt Cripranus) from the catacombs has the roll in hand, and, besides, a volume standing on end at the feet (Garrucci, Vet. Ornat. xx. 6). Representations of Justin and Timothy may be cited as instances of similar treatment (ib. xxiv. 3), the latter having always on ancient glass a second volume behind him—a possible allusion to the two epistles addressed to him by St. Paul.

7. Deacons are also represented bearing in the left hand the same badge of their ministry. Buonarotti (Vet. Ornat. tav. xvi. 2) gives a drawing of St. Lawrence from a glass bearing the volume, and seated between SS. Peter and Paul, who appear to be teaching him.

8. Readers, in token of their office, as readers of the Scriptures to the congregation, always appear with the volume. A gilded glass, given by Buonarotti (ib. tav. xvii. 2), preserves what appears to be a representation of the ordination of two youths as readers, who both bear the volume in their hands.

9. In some sepulchral monuments, especially bas-reliefs of double sarcophagi, in which the marriage ceremonies of the deceased are commemorated (Bottari, Scult. e Pitt. &c. tav. cxxxvii.; Maffei, Veron. Illust. part iii. p. 54) the bridegroom holds a volume in his hand supposed to be the nuptial contract. Sometimes three or four volumes stand on end at his feet, possibly indicating the various offices or magistracies he may have held. Volumes of this kind are said to have been borne by slaves after patricians at Rome; and when they appear, as they sometimes do, on glass (Buonar. Scult. e Pitt. tav. xxviii.; Garrucci, Vet. Ornat. xxvii. 1), and on the shields and sarcophagi, it is probable that they are merely a mark of the dignity of the person commemorated, as he has almost always, in such cases, the senatorial badge of the broad purple band.

II. Besides these volumes borne in the hand by divers personages and for various reasons, a great many are found on ancient glass (Garrucci, Vet. Ornat. xviii. 5, 6; xvii. i. 5, &c.) to which it is difficult to assign any certain significance. Buonarotti (tav. xx.) gives a representation of St. Felicitas and her seven sons between two volumes supposed to signify the two volumes of Scripture, for the truth of which martyrs shed their blood; and Bottari (Scult. e Pitt. tav. xix.)

preserves a figure in the attitude of prayer, with two volumes tied together on one side and an eucharistic cup on the other—a symbolism of which the meaning is obvious enough.

III. Although books, as we understand the term, soon began to be used for the reading of the gospel in churches, volumes, strictly so-called, were, for some time, retained for the prayers and ritual of certain ecclesiastical functions. Cardinal Cassanata had some of these volumes of as late a date as the 9th and 10th centuries, containing the forms of the ordination service, the ritual of baptism, of the blessing of the font, and of the paschal candle (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v. 'Volume'). [E. C. H.]

VOTIVE OFFERINGS, "votiva," "quae sanctis ex voto aut veneratione offerebantur" (Muratori). The custom of bringing offerings to Christian churches in acknowledgment of some signal deliverance from peril or illness or of some other answer to prayer, with the design of perpetuating the remembrance of these divine favours, became widely prevalent in both the Eastern and Western churches at a very early period. While the observance undoubtedly offers a strong resemblance to the same custom as known to pagan antiquity, it was held to be sanctioned by Scripture; e.g. in such passages as Exodus xvii. 4; Ps. cxi. 4. It ultimately became closely associated with the veneration of the tombs and relics of martyrs, whose intercession and aid were frequently implored. Augustine seems to have sought to divest the practice of the superstitious notions with which it was already becoming connected in his time, by pointing out that such offerings, "apud memorias sanctorum martyrum," ought to be looked upon as really offered to God (Serm. 273; Migne, Patrol. xxxviii. 1251).

The same father is the first who distinctly lays down the theory that such offerings must be made in churches. As quoted by Prosper of Aquitaine, he says that the best offering we can make to God is that of ourselves, and as the image of Caesar was to be given to Caesar, so the image of the Deity is to be consecrated to Him. We have however not only to consider what we can offer and to whom, but also where our offering should be made, "quia veri sacrificii extra catholicam ecclesiam non est" (Opera, ed. Migne, x. 1860). It is in harmony with this view that we find the 20th canon of the collection ascribed to the council of Nantes (A.D. 660) forbidding the offering of vows or presenting of candles or any other offering for the restoration of health in any other place except Christian churches: "Nullus votum faciat aut candelam vel aliquod munus pro sanitate sua rogaturus alibi deferat nisi ad ecclesiam Domino Deo suo" (Mansi, Concilia, xi. 59–61; Migne, lxi. 846).

Similar offerings were made by virgins on the occasion of their consecration to the service of the altar, with the prayer that they might be enabled to keep inviolate their vow of virginity. In the ancient Sacramentarium attributed to St. Leo (Migne, lv. 38), we find in the appointed service for such occasions, "Offerimus tibi, Domine, preces et munera." Gregory the Great, in his Liber Sacramentorum, speaks of the relics of a martyr (those of St. Laurentius) as themselves a kind of offering, "votiva martyria" (ib. lxxviii. 1251); and on another occasion, when referring to an instance of a wife who presented offerings at the altar for her husband's recovery from sickness, styles them a "sacrificium" (Dial. iv. 57).

The extent to which the practice prevailed both in the East and in the West in the 5th century, is sufficiently proved by two writers—Theodoret and Paulinus of Nola. Of these, the former, in a remarkable passage, exultingly describes the honours paid to the tombs of the martyrs in his time—and the tombs themselves as objects of universal admiration, splendidly adorned, and radiant in every part. "To these," he says, "we repair not once or twice a year, or five times only, but frequently and in great multitudes (πανηγύρεις), addressing often, each day, hymns to Him who is their Lord. And those who are in health pray that their health may be preserved; those in sickness, for relief from their malady; the childless, for children; the barren women, for offspring; while those already thus blessed, pray that their sons and daughters may be endowed with desirable gifts." He then goes on to describe some of the offerings (ἀναθήματα), as consisting of models of arms, legs, eyes, &c., according to the affected part, and fashioned out of gold, silver, or wood—"for the Lord," he says, "accepts both small and costly gifts, estimating them by the capacity of the giver." He describes other offerings (probably tablets) as recording the virtues of the martyrs, "but their virtues," he says, "prove that He who was their God was the true God,"—ἡ δὲ τούτων δύναμις τὸν τούτων Θεὸν ἀληθινὸν ἀποφαίνει Θεόν (Graecarum Affect. Curat.; Migne, Pat. Graec. lxxxiii. 922). At the council of Lestines (A.D. 743) the offering of models, such as those which he describes, was condemned as a pagan usage (see PAGANISM, III. ii.).

The references to the practice in Paulinus give evidence of a still more superstitious conception of its efficacy. He describes in his fourteenth poem (de S. Felice Natalitium Carm. iii.) the assembling throngs and the donors as hanging their votive offerings to the pillars of the church. He then proceeds to narrate three stories, which enforce the necessity of faithfully observing such vows. The first is that of an inhabitant of the town of Abellina, who, having vowed a pig to St. Felix, brought his offering to the shrine of the saint, but endeavoured to evade the genuine performance of his vow by killing the pig and simply giving the entrails to the poor of the church, himself carrying off the carcase. On his journey home, however, he was thrown from his horse, and smitten with apparent paralysis, but having been carried back to the church, he there implored the forgiveness of the saint, and ordered the whole carcase to be divided among the poor. Whereupon he was miraculously restored to the complete use of his limbs and to his former health (Migne, lxi. 439–501).

The second instance is that of some peasants of Apulia, who, having reared a fat sow and dedicated it to the same saint, proceeded to drive it to the church. The animal however succumbed to the fatigue of the journey, and was unable to proceed. Full of anxiety lest they should seem unfaithful to their vow, the pious peasants hastened to select one or two pigs of a smaller size, and with these as an offering presented themselves at the church, where to their astonishment they found the sow, which had been miraculously conveyed thither before them.

According to the third story, a heifer had been similarly dedicated to St. Felix from its birth, and when the time came the owner proceeded to yoke it to the cart, when it broke away and escaped. On arriving at the temple however the owners found the animal standing, a seemingly voluntary victim, at the altar of the saint. [J. B. M.]

VOWS (εὐχή, "votum"). "If in Scripture a vow is usually termed εὐχή, being designated as a prayer, we must understand more especially that kind of prayer which we offer when making a vow, i.e. πρὸς εὐχήν. But all things which we offer to God are vowed, and most of all the offering of the holy altar, wherein is implied the greatest of all our vows, whereby we vow to be in Christ, as members of His body" (Augustine, Ep. lix., ad Paulinum).

The earliest example of a Christian vow, a proceeding derived from Old Testament precedent, is that recorded of St. Paul in Acts xviii. 18,—εἶχε γὰρ εὐχήν. Hegesippus (Eusebius, H. E. ii. 25) implies that James the Just was under a similar vow. The tendency in the church, after the 3rd century, would seem to have been at once to encourage the practice of making vows and to attach an increased, and it would seem an exaggerated, importance to their observance. While Cyprian (Epist. iv.), for example, advises young women who feel themselves unable to preserve their vow of virginity, to marry, the 19th canon of the council of Ancyra (A.D. 314) speaks of such vows as of perpetual obligation, and affirms that those who break their vow of virginity might as well commit bigamy, —τὸν τῶν διγάμων ὅρον ἐκπληροῦσαν (Mansi, Conc. ii. 520). Similarly Fulgentius, in his treatise de Fide, lays it down that vows of chastity are of perpetual obligation on both sexes (Migne, Patrol. xl. 769).

Among the principal causes of the tendency above referred to, may be named the increased disposition to assert the superiority of the clergy to the laity, the special sanctity with which it was sought to invest the profession of the monk or the anchorite, the veneration of martyrs and of their relics, and, at a later period, pilgrimages to shrines and masses for the dead. The attacks directed against these new theories and practices by such writers as Aërius, Jovinian, and Vigilantius being recognised as just by the teachers of the church only so far as they applied to excesses and abuses, the theory of the vow with which each was associated seems to have been left untouched, and the lawfulness or expediency of taking vows, under certain conditions, appears never to have been called in question. Ambrose, for example, has a warning against vows, but it is only against such as He to whom they are made could not be expected to approve,—"quod sibi cui promittitur nolit exsolvi" (de Officiis, iii. 12). The Apostolical Constitutions recognise with approval the taking of vows of virginity, simply advising that they should not be hastily assumed (bk. iv. 14; Cotelerius, i. 302).

Vows were distinguished as (1) "vota personalia," or those applying mainly to oneself, (2) as "vota realia," or those having reference to external objects and circumstances; they were also distinguished as "perpetua" and "temporalia," or vows taken for a specified time. Among the "vota personalia" the most common were those of abstinence, chastity, and fasting. Hilary of Poitiers says, "Deo vovenda sunt contemptus corporis, castitatis custodia, jejunii tolerantia" (Migne, ix. 184). Augustine urges Christians not to be backward in taking vows, for they will not, he says, be sufficiently inspired by their unaided strength,—"Non sitis pigri ad vovendum; non enim viribus vestris implebitis." He enumerates as ordinary vows in his time, those of married people of conjugal fidelity to each other or of abstinence from sexual intercourse with each other, of the wealthy to extend hospitality to all religious persons approaching their houses, of others, to give all their property to the poor, and take upon themselves the religious life (in Ps. lxxvi.).

The most common form of vow in the earlier centuries would appear to have been that of virginity. Those who assumed this vow had their names entered in records kept by the church, and certain other formalities were observed, calculated to render the ceremony more impressive (Socrates, H. E. i. 13; Chrysost. de Sacerd. iii. 16). The binding nature even of the personal vow was not only insisted upon by the church but sometimes enforced by the law. Thus the 15th canon of the second council of Tours (A.D. 567) invoked the assistance of the law to impose divorce on a monk who had so far violated his monastic vow as to marry,—"etiam judicis auxilio separetur" (Mansi, ix. 760). Generally, however, the non-observance of such vows was a matter to be brought before the episcopal courts, and the bishop was held to have the power of mitigating the penalty according to circumstances (council of Chalced. can. 16; Mansi, viii. 378). As regards the "vota realia," the reader may consult the comments of Ulpian in the Digest (fr. 2, D. 50, tit. 12 de Pollicit.).

Vows appear to have been frequently taken at the tombs of the martyrs, and Eusebius speaks of this as a common custom in his time,—Ὅθεν καὶ ἐπὶ τὰς θήκας αὐτῶν ἔθος ἡμῖν περιέναι, καὶ τὰς εὐχὰς παρὰ ταυταῖς ποιεῖσθαι (Praep. Evang. xiii. 7).

The vow, like the votive offering, was held to be of no efficacy unless taken in a church and accompanied by the observance of certain religious rites. Thus Hilary of Poitiers, when commenting on Ps. lv. (liv.) 1, says that vows are of use only when invested with this character, and that it is only when they are thus offered that the intercession of the Holy Spirit can be looked for in our behalf: "Vota enim tantum ecclesiasticae relligionis utilia sunt. Quae cum et dignis Deo cautionibus et propositae in ecclesia observantiae studio probabuntur, tum digni erimus pro quibus Deum Sanctus Spiritus interpellet" (Migne, ix. 184). WAR. The question of the lawfulness of war, as it presented itself to the early church, assumed a twofold character: (1) whether a Christian prince could rightfully embark in any war; (2) whether a Christian subject was bound to render military service. On both points the decisions of successive teachers of the church exhibit a material difference, a difference mainly to be explained by the altered relations of the church to the civil power

During the first three centuries the consideration of both the above questions was necessarily complicated by the facts, that the soldier in the Roman legions would be compelled to bear arms in the service of a state professedly pagan, and that military service was closely conjoined with the ceremonial of pagan worship. Hence to both questions the more austere teaching of the church rejoined with an unqualified negative, and the words of Christ (Matt. xxvi. 52) were adduced as placing the matter beyond dispute.

If, as some critics maintain (Hefele, Beiträge, i. 21), the language of Justin (Apol. i. 14) and of Athenagoras (Legatio pro Christ. c. 35) does not necessarily imply a general disapproval of the profession of the warrior, the writings of Tertullian, both before and after his conversion to Montanism, contain passages which are sufficiently explicit. "There can," he says (with allusion to ordinary military service) "be no harmony between the divine and the human oath, the standard of Christ and of the devil, the camp of light and the camp of darkness; one soul cannot be claimed by two masters,—by God and by the devil" (de Idol. c. 19). His treatise, de Corona, called forth by the incident of the Christian soldier who refused to adorn himself with the laurel wreath associated with pagan observances, is well known. He there declares that merely to wear the wreath alone constitutes an act of idolatry—"Ita et corona idolothytum efficitur" (de Corona, c. 10). As for the military profession itself, "Can it," he asks, "be lawful to handle the sword, when the Lord Himself hath declared that he who uses the sword shall perish by it? Shall the child of peace engage in battle, when he looks upon even the strife of the law-courts as unseemly? Shall he who avenges not even his own wrongs, consign others to prison and to chains, torture and punish them?" (ib. c. 11). In the same spirit the martyr Maximilian (circ. A.D. 295) says, "Mihi non licet militare, quia Christianus sum" (Ruinart, Acta Martyr. ii. 209). So again Clemens of Alexandria (i. p. 289) asserts that they who seek peace have no need of the sword or the bow.

The opinion of Origen is less distinctly pronounced. In two passages (adv. Cels. v. 33; vii. 26) he appears to support the view of Tertullian, and in a third (ib. viii. 73) he puts forward the theory that Christians, as a race professedly devoted to the service of God, cannot justly be called upon to bear arms. The pagan priests, he urges, are exempt from such service, and, on like grounds, Christians claim a similar immunity. "We could not fight under the emperor," he says, "even if he should seek to constrain us; but we fight for him when in our own camp (ἴδιον στρατόπεδον εὐσεβείας) we offer up prayers on his behalf" (Migne, Patrol. Graec. xi. 797). This argument, it is to be noted, appears as a rejoinder to certain criticisms of Celsus, who, in the opinion of Gibbon (ed. Milman and Smith, ii. 189) had exposed a weak point in the Christian theory: "the pagans very frequently asked, what must be the fate of the empire, attacked on every side by the barbarians, if all mankind should adopt the pusillanimous sentiments of the new sect?" Lactantius condemns war on purely philosophic grounds. The aim of the wise man, he says, should be not to engage in combat, the issue of which must always be doubtful, and thereby to annihilate ("tollere") his foe, but to do away with the cause of disagreement itself (Div. Inst. vi. 18). Origen himself, in a fourth passage, appears to allow that defensive war is justifiable, and somewhat quaintly suggests that the mode in which bees carry on their wars may perhaps serve as an example πρὸς τοὺς δικαίους καὶ τεταγμένους πολέμους (adv. Cels. iv. 82).

It is tolerably certain, indeed, that whatever may have been the prevalent theory of the church during the first three centuries, many Christians at that period served in the armies of the empire. Tertullian's own expressions, "vestra omnia implevimus, urbes, insulas, castella, municipia, conciliabula, castra ipsa" (Apol. c. 37); "navigamus et nos vobiscum militamus" (ib. c. 42); and the story which he tells of the "legio fulminatrix" (ad Scapulam, c. 4), are decisive evidence to this effect. We find again from Eusebius (H. E. viii. 4, x. 8) that in the time of Diocletian the number of Christian soldiers was considerable, and that many officers were consequently called upon by the emperor to choose between a return to paganism and degradation from their posts.

The important evidence afforded by Christian inscriptions might, it is true, seem at first sight to contradict these statements. Aringhi (Antiq. Christianae, i. 430) gives an epitaph of a soldier of the time of Hadrian, and (ii. 170) that of a soldier in the praetorian guard; Boldetti (Osservazioni sopra i cimiteri, &c., p. 432), one of a VETERANUS EX PROTERIORIBUS (? "protectoribus"), and also (p. 415) one "Pyrrho militi," and (p. 416) that of one who is described as "felicissimus miles." Marangoni (Act. S. Vict. p. 102) gives us that of a centurion, and Ruinart (Act. Mart. i. 50) that of two brothers, Getulius and Amantius, who were military tribunes under Hadrian. Le Blant, with the view of arriving at a more precise estimate of the evidence thus afforded, has been at the trouble to compare the results exhibited in three collections of pagan inscriptions taken from three distinct localities (Reinesius, Syntag. Inscript. Antiq.; Steiner, Cod. Inscript. Rom. Rheni; Mommsen, Inscript. Regni Neapol.) with the Christian inscriptions contained in Séguier (Inscript. Antiq. Index). This comparison has shewn that while the pagan epitaphs give, out of an aggregate of 10,050, as many as 545 as those of soldiers, or an average of 5·42 per cent., the Christian epitaphs, amounting to 4734 in number, contain only 27, or about 0·57 per cent. He offers, however, what may be accepted as a reasonable explanation of this disparity, and a sufficient solution of the apparent incompatibility with the historical evidence. The early Christians, he considers, accepted military service much as they did the institution of slavery, namely as a political necessity. As, however, the Christian slave would not suffer the fact of his earthly servitude to be recorded on his tomb, because he regarded himself as first of all SERVUS DEI, as the Christian soldier, who was first of all MILES CHRISTI, shrank from recording in his epitaph that he had been the soldier of man (Le Blant, Inscrip. Chrét. de la Gaule, i. 81–87).

As soon, however, as Christianity received the recognition of the state, much of this early scrupulosity began to disappear. The ☧ inscribed by Constantine on his standard, and the subsequent appearance of the Cross on the imperial eagles, mark the commencement of this change. Some difficulty is indeed presented in the fact that the 13th canon of the council of Nicaea (if we accept the version of Rufinus) imposes thirteen years' penance upon those who, having abandoned the military confession, were induced again to embrace it: "Qui vero propter confessionem militiam abjecerant, et rursum ad hanc abierunt, hos tredecim annis poenitentiam gerere," etc. (Mansi, Conc. ii. 708). Hefele, however, maintains that this canon is to be taken in immediate connexion with that by which it is preceded, and that it refers only to the soldiers under the emperor Licinius, who as Christians resigned their posts rather than take part in pagan sacrifice, but subsequently from mercenary motives returned to the ranks and paid the required homage to the pagan gods (Beiträge, i. 22; Conciliengesch. i. 399).

St. Basil, again (Epist. 188, ad Amphilochium), says that soldiers, after their term of military service has expired, are to be excluded from the sacrament of the communion for three whole years. But Hefele (Beiträge, i. 23) interprets this as referring only to those whose hands had been actually imbrued in the blood of their fellow beings. He looks upon the passage also as conveying rather an expression of opinion on the part of the writer than an express injunction, and maintains that it does not imply that St. Basil held all war to be unjustifiable.

Chrysostom nowhere actually condemns the soldier's calling, although (Hom. in Matt. 61, c. 2) he laments the temptations to violence and the indulgence of the passions to which soldiers are exceptionally exposed.

But by far the most explicit and authoritative declaration on the subject is to be found in the writings of Augustine. In his letter to Marcellinus (Epist. 138), he says that if Christianity demanded the condemnation of all warfare, the soldiers in the New Testament seeking for a knowledge of salvation would have been directed by our Lord to throw aside their arms and altogether renounce their profession; whereas the advice he gave them was to be content with their wages, &c.; and "quibus proprium stipendium sufficere debere praecepit, militare utique non prohibuit" (Migne, xxxiii. 532). In the same letter he says that as a father sometimes severely chastises the son whom he loves, so, in dealing with different nations, the Roman power may be compelled to consider what is for their benefit rather than what they would themselves desire,—"quorum potius utilitati consulendum est quam voluntati" (ib. xxxiii. 531). Elsewhere he says that ambuscades and other deceptive stratagems are quite legitimate in war (Quaest. in Hept. bk. vi.; Migne, xxxiv. 781). He draws also a distinction which subsequently became classical, between just and unjust wars. In the former class he includes wars undertaken to obtain redress for wrongs; as, for instance, when a neighbouring state has neglected to make reparation for injuries inflicted by any of its citizens, or to make restitution of property wrongfully seized. A war entered upon for the purpose of chastising the undue arrogance of another state,—"ad subjugandam mortalium superbiam,"—may even be looked upon as entered upon "Deo auctore" (cont. Faust. c. 75; Migne, xlii. 447). A Christian man may fight even under a sacrilegious king, provided that what is enjoined upon him personally is not "contra Dei praeceptum" (ib.). Augustine encouraged Count Boniface in his valiant struggle against the Vandals by the exhortation not to think that "no one who wages war can please God," and cited for his encouragement the examples of king David and Cornelius, the centurion (Epist. 189; Migne, xxxiii. 855).

These and similar utterances of this father would seem to have determined the theory of the church after his time, and it is easy to understand that the views to which he gives expression would be further enforced by the fact that a large proportion of the wars of Christendom were carried on against the pagan or the infidel, as, for example, those against the Lombards, the Saracens, and the Turks, and thus represented a struggle in which the existence not merely of the state but of Christianity itself was in peril. The words in which he seeks to reassure the conscience of Count Boniface are quoted as authoritative by Hincmar (de Regis persona et regio ministerio, c. 10); and the moral distinction which he draws between different kinds of war is reproduced and further elaborated by Isidorus. The latter, in his Etymologiae (bk. xviii.),—the standard authority, after the 7th century, with respect to the relations of the church to secular matters,—distinguishes wars as of four kinds: (1) just; (2) unjust; (3) civil; (4) "plusquam civile." His definition of the first coincides with that of Augustine, to which he adds, "aut propulsandorum hostium causa." Unjust wars he defines as those undertaken from passion and without adequate cause. No war can be just save that which is undertaken for the purposes of inflicting just punishment ("ulciscendi causa") or in order to repel aggression. As an instance of (3) he cites the war between Sylla and Marius; of (4) that between Caesar and Pompey, who were not only "cives" but also "cognati."

The efforts of the church, after the time of Augustine, were mainly restricted to repressing the far from infrequent endeavours of the clergy themselves, in times of special danger and excitement, to participate in the strife of the battlefield. That such service was wholly unbecoming their profession does not appear to have ever been seriously denied. War was always regarded by the church as distinctively the concern of the laity; and Eusebius (Dem. Evang. i. 8; Migne, Patrol. Graec. xxii. 29–30), in drawing an elaborate comparison between the avocations permissible to the ecclesiastic and to the layman, specifies as among those that belong solely to the latter, the carrying on of just warfare,—τοῖς τε κατὰ τὸ δίκαιον στρατευομένοις. The 74th of the Apostolical Canons requires that any bishop, priest, or deacon devoting himself to military service and aiming at combining it with the duties of his office shall be forthwith degraded from his ecclesiastical rank, on the principle of giving to Caesar the things that are Caesar's and to God the things that are God's (Bunsen, Analect. Ante-Nic. ii. 31). The council of Toulouse (A.D. 633) directs that those of the clergy who venture to take up arms "in quacumque seditione" shall be similarly treated and sent to do penance in a monastery,—"in monasterium poenitentiae contradantur" (Mansi, x. 630). At the council of Meaux (A.D. 845) the clergy were forbidden either to engage in military service or even to carry arms, "armati incedere," under pain of deprivation of office as "sacrorum canonum contemptores et ecclesiasticae sanctitatis profanatores" (ib. xiv. 827).

But notwithstanding these and similar prohibitions, we find pope Nicholas I., in the year 865, remonstrating with Lewis the German and Charles the Bald for allowing many of the Frankish bishops to absent themselves from a synod for the purpose of joining in the defence of the coast against the Northmen,—"Cum militum Christi sit Christo servire, militum vero saeculi, saeculo" (Epist. 83; Migne, cxix. 922).

WASHING. The principal ceremonial ablutions anciently used in the church, besides baptism itself, are: the washing of the heads of the catechumens on Palm Sunday [HOLY WEEK, p. 780], and of their feet, and sometimes of their whole bodies, on MAUNDY THURSDAY [p. 1160]: the washing of the feet of the newly baptized [BAPTISM, p. 164]; the solemn washing of an infant seven days after baptism (Martene, de Rit. Antiq. I. i. 18, Ordo 26); the washing of the hands of those who entered a church for worship and communion, and of the ministrants in the celebration of the holy Eucharist [HANDS, WASHING OF, p. 758; LAVABO, p. 938]. For the ablution of the vessels used in holy communion, so far as it is found within our period, see PURIFICATION OF ALTAR VESSELS, p. 1756.

WATER-VESSELS. HOLY WATER must of course have required some vessel to receive it, and very ancient vessels destined for this use are believed to be still in existence. Boldetti (Osservationi, p. 16) declares that he had seen in the catacombs certain round vessels of marble, terra cotta, or glass, placed on pillars at such a height as to be easily reached by the hand. Such a pillar, which may have supported a water-vessel, is found at the entrance of an ancient subterranean chapel at Chiusi (Cavedoni, Cimit. Chius. p. 20). The well-known palindromic inscription, ΝΙΨΟΝ ΑΝΟΜΗΜΑΤΑ ΜΗ ΜΟΝΑΝ ΟΨΙΝ, which is found on a vase discovered at Constantinople in the last century, and also (in an incorrect form) on one more recently discovered at Autun, is thought to indicate that the vase had been used to hold holy water. There is in the church of SS. Mark and Andrew, in the island of Murano, a well-proportioned urn of Parian marble, brought by the Venetians from Greece, which bears the inscription — ΑΝΤΛΗΣΑΤΑΙ[ϵ] ΥΔΩΡ ΜΕΤΑ ΕΥΦΡΟΣΥΝΗΣ ΟΤΙ ΦΩΝΗ ΚΥ ΕΠΙ ΤΩΝ ΥΔΑΤΩΝ (Isaiah xii. 3; Ps. xxviii. [xxix.] 3). This is also thought to have been a holy water vessel (Paciandi de Bulneis, p. 141; figured in Martigny, p. 263, 2nd ed.). Gori (Thes. Diptych. iii. suppl. pl. xxv.) has figured an ivory vessel, bearing in relief the holy family and the four evangelists, which is believed to have been a portable holy water vessel. But perhaps the most curious of all the vessels of this kind which have been discovered is a leaden vessel, from the district of Tunis, bearing the inscription — ΑΝΤΛΗCΑΤΕ ΥΔΩΡ ΜΕΤ ΕΥΦΡΟCΥΝΗC. Within a border formed partly by the inscription itself, partly by branches of the vine, are two rows of figures. The upper row displays the Good Shepherd between a palm and a gladiator, who takes the wreath of victory from a cippus or low pillar; and a praying figure between a palm and a winged Victory. The lower row shews, twice over, the cross placed on a rock, whence issue the four rivers, at which a sheep and a stag—the Jewish and the Gentile Church—quench their thirst. This vessel is figured in De Rossi's Bulletino, 1867, p. 80, and in Martigny, p. 264. Compare COLYMBION, FOUNTAINS, NYMPHAEUM, PHIALA (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v. Eau Bénite).

For the measurement and notation of time, the Christian communities, as they formed themselves in the various provinces of the Roman empire, had, in the existing local or national method of "dating," all that was needed for ordinary secular purposes. They had but to retain the received calendar names of day and month, and the current notation of the year expressed in terms of an "era," or by name of consuls, and the like. accustomed method and nomenclature. In every city of the Roman empire which had a synagogue, Jews, with proselytes, formed the nucleus round which the church grew; and from these the Gentile believers accepted the Jewish week. Already the seven-day week was widely known by Greeks and Romans, but, for the most part, as a measure of time used by astrologers (Chaldean and Egyptian). The Sabbath, as a Jewish institution, was but one of many superstitions imported into Rome from the East. Christian, Jew, and Gentile alike, whether or not they continued to attach any special sanctity to the SABBATH, appear, from the first, to have celebrated the first day of the week in memory of the Lord's resurrection. [LORD'S DAY.]

Names of the Days of the Week.—The names derived from Jewish usage, μία (or πρώτη), σαββάτων (or σαββάτου), δευτέρα, κ. τ. λ., occur in the New Testament; occasionally in subsequent times, e.g. Tertull. has "quarta et sexta sabbati" (de Jejun. 14, and St. Epiphan. Haer. lxx. 12). But the first day is almost constantly (ἡμέρα) κυριακή or κυρίου, dies dominicus or dominica (Dominicum does not necessarily mean "the Lord's day" in Acta Martyr. S. Saturnini, Ruinart, 9, 10; "non potest intermitti dominicum." Comp. Tertull. de Fuga in Persecutione, c. 14; "quomodo dominica sollemnia celebravimus?") ἡ τοῦ κυρίου ἀναστάσιμος (Const. Apost. c. ii. 59); "dies dominicae resurrectionis" (Tertull. de Orat. 23). The numerical designation, ὀγδόη, eighth day, occurs only in mystical expositions, as St. Barn. Ep. 15; St. Iren. de Ogdoad. fragm.; St. Hilar. Praef. in Explan. Psalm. t. i. 7; St. Augustine, Ep. 119 ad Januar. 10–16.

By the close of the 2nd century, we find the Wednesday and Friday distinguished as fast-days (or semijejunia) under the name dies STATIONUM, στάσεις. The Greek names for these days are τετράς and παρασκευή; for the latter Epiphan. Expos. fid. § 22, has προσάββατον, as St. Mark xv. 42, παρασκευὴ ὅ ἐστι προσάββατον; a law of Constantine (Euseb., Vit. Const. iv. 18) terms the parasceve πρὸ σαββάτου; the Latin, quarta, sexta sabbati (Tertull. u. s.); more commonly feria quarta and parasceve. Comp. Petri Alex. fr. de Paschate, in Routh, Rell. Sac. iii. 343; Constit. Apost. vii. 23. The Greek names most in use for the days of the week are κυριακή, δευτέρα, τρίτη, τετράς, πέμπτη, παρασκευή, σάββατον; the Latin, dies dominicus, feria secunda, f. tertia, f. quarta, f. quinta, parasceve, sabbatum. This ecclesiastical use of the term feria is variously explained. [FERIA.] The present writer conjectures that feria secunda, tertia, &c., came into use as Christianized equivalents for the secunda sabbati, &c., objected to as Jewish. Comp. Rösch in Herzog, R. E. Zeitrechnung, t. xviii. 473).

The planetary names for each day of the week came to the Romans (probably before the Christian era) from Alexandria, as a purely astrological, not a religious institute. The true explanation of these names is undoubtedly this—the second of the two given by Dion Cassius, xxxvii. 18,[a] the locus classicus on this subject (see Ideler, Hdb. der Chron. u. s., and ii. 177; Lobeck, Aglaophamus, p. 142, and J. C. Hare, On the Names of the Days of the Week, in the Cambridge Philological Museum, vol. i.), viz. that each of the twenty-four hours of each day, beginning at sunrise, was assigned to one of the seven "planets," taken in the then-received order, Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Sun, Mercury, Venus, Moon, continued, without interruption, from day to day. Thus, the first hour at starting of the cycle being that of Saturn, that planet is "regent" of the whole day, the eighth, fifteenth, twenty-second hours being also his; the twenty-third has Jupiter; twenty-fourth, Mars; and the twenty-fifth, or first of the following day, comes to sun, who, therefore, as "regent," gives his name to the day. Thus the twenty-second hour being the sun's, the twenty-third and twenty-fourth fall to Mercury and Venus, and the first hour of the following day to Moon, whence dies Lunae; and so on to the seventh: first hour, Venus. In this astrological scheme, the first day of the week is Saturday. Dion Cass. (u. s.), who says that the practice of naming days after the seven planets, though in his time universally known, "had come in, so to say, but recently," must be understood to speak of its general diffusion. It was certainly known long before his time. "Pompey," he says, "throughout the siege of Jerusalem (B.C. 63) availed himself for his great operations, of the well-known ἀργία of the Jews on the seventh day, and so took the city by the final assault 'on the day of Saturn.'" And by the same name he subsequently calls the day of the taking of Jerusalem by Herod and Sosius (B.C. 37), in both statements clearly identifying Saturn's day with the Jewish seventh day (Browne's Ordo Saeclorum, § 207 sq.). The name, "day of Saturn," may have been Dion's own substitute for a "sabbath" or "seventh day" in the contemporary records relating to Pompey and Sosius. But early in our era, Tibullus (i. 3, 17) clearly identifies Saturday with the supposed inauspicious Jewish sabbath—"Aut ego sum causatus aves aut omina dira, Saturni aut sacram me tenuisse diem" (comp. Ovid, Ars Amat. i. 45; "rebus minus apta gerendis Culta Palaestino septima festa Syro"). Tacitus (Hist. v. 4) says that some imagined the Jews' sabbatical rest to have been in honour of Saturn; Frontinus, in the reign of Nerva (Strateg. ii. 1, 17), that Vespasian reserved his chief assaults upon the Jews for the "day of Saturn," on which it was unlawful for them to do any work. Between this and the time of Dion Cassius, we have Christian testimonies to the application of the planetary names to the days of the Jewish week in Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and his contemporary Clement of Alexandria. Plutarch's Qu. Sympos. iv. qu. 7, is unfortunately lost: according to the heading, its subject was the order of the planetary days, doubtless arising out of the two preceding questions, which relate to the Jewish sabbath. That the planetary week was known, at least to artists, early in our era, is further proved by monuments. In the Pittore di Ercolano, iii. pl. 50, is a series of seven heads of planetary deities — Saturn, Apollo = Sol, Diana = Luna, Mars, Mercurius, [a] Ideler (Hdb. der Chron. i. 179), on the warrant of this passage, held that the seven-day week, in connexion with the seven planets, was early known in Egypt. But no trace of such a week, civil, religious or astrological, has been found on Egyptian monuments; the Egyptian week from the earliest times was the decade. Lepsius, Chronologie der Aegypter, p. 131 ff.

Jupiter, Venus, i.e. in the order of the week-days; also an ancient bronze represents the same seven deities, likewise beginning with Saturn (Montfaucon, Antiq. Expl. Suppl. i. pl. 17, p. 37; J. C. Hare, u. s. p. 31).

Early Christian writers use the planetary names, for the most part, only in their apologies and other addresses to the heathen. Thus Justin Martyr, u. s. names the κρονικὴ and ἡ ἡλίου Saturday and Sunday; and Tertull. Apologet. c. 16, "Aeque si diem solis laetitiae indulgemus alia longe ratione quem de religione solis, secundo loco ab eis sumus qui diem Saturni otio et victui decernunt, exorbitantes et ipsi a Judaico more, quem ignorant;" the same matter is more fully expressed in ad Nationes, i. 13. In the Codex also solis dies often occurs, but with expressions of honour attached; thus, in a law of Constantine (Cod. Just. iii. 12, de feriis, l. 3, A.D. 321), "Omnes judices urbanaeque plebes et cunctarum artium officia venerabili die solis quiescant;" so Cod. Theod. ii. 8, de feriis l. 1 (same year), "diem solis veneratione sui celebrem;" and ibid. viii. 8, l. 3 (A.D. 386), "Solis die quem dominicum rite dixere majores." In addresses to Christians, when the planetary name, Sunday, is used, it is usually with a mystical or allegorical reference to the creation of light on the first day (alluded to in the passages of Barnabas and Ignatius, and clearly expressed in that of Justin Martyr, given above. Compare Leo the Great, Ep. Decret. 81, c. 1), or to Christ as the Sun of Righteousness. So St. Ambrose, Serm. 62: "Dominica nobis venerabilis est atque sollemnis, quod in ea Salvator velut sol oriens discussis inferorum tenebris luce resurrectionis emicuit: ac propterea ipsa dies ab hominibus saeculi Dies Solis vocatur, quod ortus eam Sol Justitiae Christus illuminat." Gregory of Tours (Hist. iii. 15), "Ecce adest dies solis: sic enim barbaris diem dominicum vocitare consuetudo est." Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vii. 12, § 75) finds a mystery also in the planetary names of the stationes: "The true Gnostic knows the aenigmata of the tetras and parasceve, our fasting days: to wit, that these being the days of Hermes and Aphrodité, he shall fast, his life long, for covetousness and carnal lust." The planetary names occur in some Christian calendars, and all through the Fasti Consulares Anonymi, from A. U. C. 246 to 1107, in which to the consuls of each year is appended, together with the moon's age, the week-day of 1st January: e.g. U. C. 1107 [= A.D. 354], "Constantio VII. et Constantio II. Sat. xxi.;" meaning that the 1st January of that year was Saturday (Norisii Opp. xi. 595 sqq.). And even in Christian epitaphs, as in the following (ap. Noris. l. c. 686), of A.D. 457, in which Paschasius is said to have been born, "Dies paschales prid. Non. April. die Jobis," i.e. "in the paschal days, on 4th April, Jupiter's day." By the generality of Christians, however, the use of these heathen names was avoided. Indeed Philastrius (or Philaster), contemporary and friend of St. Ambrose, cir. A.D. 380, in his work De Haeresibus, condemns the use of the planetary names as heretical. Isidore of Seville, A.D. 595 (Etym. v. 30), having explained, for the benefit of the unlearned, that "the first day of the week, the una sabbati of the Hebrews, is with us dies Dominicus, which day the Gentiles have dedicated to the Sun; the 2*da sabbati* our 2*da feria*, by them of the world is called dies Lunae," etc. goes on to say, that one does best to comply with the ritus ecclesiasticus by which the days are called feriae; and that if one of the heathen names should chance to escape one's lips, it should be considered that those whose names the pagans have given to the week-days were human beings who, as benefactors of mankind, received divine honours and were translated into the heavens, so that it is no sin if their names do, now and then, happen to be used by us. Comp. Bedae de Temporum Ratione, c. 6.

[H. B.]

When the Latin came to mingle with the Teutonic races, the Latin roughly translated the names of the Teutonic gods by names of deities with which they were familiar (Tacitus, Germ. 9; Ann. xiii. 57; Hist. iv. 64), and conversely the northern tribes found (as they thought) Teutonic equivalents for the names in the Roman Pantheon (Grimm, Deutsche Mythologie, p. 108 ff. 2nd ed.). Hence the days of the week received names which were thought equivalent to their classical planetary denominations. This fact renders it highly probable that the week was adopted by the northern tribes in pre-Christian times; for if it had been received from Christian missionaries, they would scarcely have adopted a nomenclature which tended to perpetuate the names of the very deities whose worship they sought to abolish. Both William of Malmesbury (Gesta Reg. p. 9, ed. Savile, 1601) and Matthew of Westminster (Flores, p. 82) make Hengist say to Vortigern, that the Saxons gave the name of Woden (as equivalent to Mercury) to the fourth day of the week, and of Freya (as equivalent to Venus) to the sixth. Further, the name of Tius or Zio (etymologically connected with Sanscrit Dius and Greek Ζεύς) was given, as equivalent to Mars, to the third day; and of Thor or Donar, as equivalent to Jupiter, to the fifth. Saetere or Sater (found in Saxon Sceteresdag, Frisian Saterdei, etc.) seems to be no more than the Teutonic way of writing the Latin Saturnus. Sol and Luna were simply translated into Sun and Moon. Hence arose the Teutonic and Scandinavian names of the days of the week, which are still preserved complete in English, Danish, and Swedish. In modern German Samstag (= Sabbatstag) has displaced Saturday, and Mittwoch Wednesday. In the Romance languages, the first day of the week has a name derived from Dies Dominica (Ital. Domenica, Span. Domingo, Fr. Dimanche), and the seventh day one derived from Sabbatum (Ital. Sabbato, Span. Sabado, Fr. Samedi = Sabbati Dies). The Slavs, Lithuanians, and Finns do not appear to have adopted the planetary names; they simply number the days, making Monday the first day, and consequently Sunday the seventh. (See further in Grimm, D. M. p. 111 ff.). [C.]

The Sunday Letters.—From the earliest times after the introduction of the Julian calendar, we find the first eight letters of the alphabet A—H ranged in unbroken succession against the days of the months, from 1st Jan. to 31st Dec. (monumental calendars collected by Gruter, and by Foggini, are enumerated by Ideler, Handbuch, ii. 135). These letters marked the nundines: viz. on whatever day of January the first nundines fell, the letter of that day marked the nundinal days throughout the year (except in leap year, when after 24th Feb. the letter fell back one place, e.g. from B to A). Familiar as this arrangement must have been to Christians living in or near Rome (or wherever the nundines were in use), it is strange that they did not earlier apply the like arrangement to their ecclesiastical calendars, for marking the Sundays of each year. Yet it is not until some time after the council of Nice that the Sunday letters are first met with, viz. in the calendar of the reign of Constantius, edited by Lambecius in the Bibliothec. Vindobon. t. iv., in which, side by side with the old eight nundinal, are ranged the seven dominical letters, "qua nulla antiquior dominicalium characterum memoria extat," says cardinal Noris (de Cyclo paschali Rarennate, Opp. t. ii. col. 786). See further, EASTER, p. 593. [H. B.]

WHIPPING. (1) For the use of the lash or of rods as a punishment, whether of monks or others, see CORPORAL PUNISHMENT, p. 469.

(2) Whipping was also used as a penitential discipline. Thus it is related of abbat Pardulph (†737), that in Lent he bared his whole body, and commanded his disciple to beat him with rods (Mabillon, Acta SS. Bened. iii. 537). In the Penitential of Cummean (Wasserschleben, Bussordnungen, p. 463) one of the methods of redeeming a year of penance is to receive three hundred strokes of the rod on the bare body. And there are many instances of the use of the lash for penitential purposes in later times.

(3) The discipline of the scourge applied by a man to his own back probably does not fall within our period. For though Gretser (De Spontanea Disciplinarum seu Flagellorum Cruce) claims to have produced proofs of the existence of this practice from writers as early as the fourth century, his proofs are either from spurious writings, or fail to prove the matter in hand. Some of them relate to the beating of the breast [TUNSIO PECTORIS] as an indication of penitence, which is a very different thing from whipping (Zöckler, Geschichte der Askese, p. 38 ff.) [C.]

WHITBY, COUNCIL OF (PHARENSE CONCILIUM), A.D. 664, when the conference mentioned by Bede between Colman, Agilbert, Wilfrid, and others in the presence of king Oswy respecting Easter took place (Mansi, xi. 67–72; Wilkins by Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 100–106). [E. S. Ff.]

WHITE GARMENTS. The white robes, or albs, in which the baptized were clothed as soon as they issued from the baptismal waters, are frequently alluded to by ancient writers. See, for instance, the poem De Resurrectione Domini attributed to Lactantius; Paulinus of Nola, Epist. xii. ad Sever.; Cyril of Jerusalem, Catech. Mystag. iv. 8; Ambrose, de Mysteriis, c. 7 [BAPTISM, p. 163]. The conferring of the white robe was accompanied, according to the Gregorian Ordo Baptizandi Inf., by the words: "Accipe vestem candidam et immaculatam, quam perferas sine macula ante tribunal Domini Nostri Jesu Christi."

It was the almost universal custom of the church that the white baptismal robes were worn for eight days, so that when baptisms took place on Easter-Eve the albs were taken off on the first Sunday after Easter, the Dominica in albis depositis. This ceremony appears to have taken place in the sacristy or vestry attached to the baptistery, where they were washed in water blessed for the purpose. What became of them after this is not quite clear. In some cases they seem to have been preserved in the church or by the sponsor; for a certain deacon Muritta (Victor Vitensis de Persec. Vandal. v. 9), produced as a witness against his godchild Elpidophorus, who had fallen into Arianism, the sabana which he had received at baptism. In other cases the baptized person seems to have retained it, for we read that St. Anthony of Egypt, in the prospect of martyrdom, appeared before the judge in his baptismal alb (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v. Aube; Suicer's Thesaurus, s. vv. λαμπροφορέω, λευχειμονέω; Ménard, note 327 on the Gregorian Sacramentary, p. 356). [C.]

WHITSUNTIDE. [PENTECOST.]

WIDOWS. It is clear that the care of the fatherless and the widow formed in early times an important department of ecclesiastical administration. Among subapostolic writings the Shepherd of Hermas is conspicuous for the prominence which it gives to the subject, repeatedly enjoining it as a Christian duty (Mand. 8, 10; Sim. 1, 8; 5, 3), and contrasting the "pernicious men who, abusing their ministry, plunder widows and orphans" with the good bishops who shelter and protect them (Sim. 9, 26, 2; 9, 27, 2). Ignatius makes it a reproach against certain heretics that they neglected widows and those who were in distress (ad Smyrn. c. 6), and urges Polycarp not to neglect widows, but to make them his especial care (ad Polyc. c. 4). Polycarp himself urges the presbyters of Philippi not to neglect the widow, the orphan, and the poor (ad Philipp. c. 4); and using a metaphor which was not unfrequently repeated, and which is of importance in relation to his conception of the Christian sacrifice, he speaks of widows as being "an altar of sacrifice" (θυσιαστήριον, ibid.). In the older dispensation the offerings which were presented to God were offered and partly consumed upon the great altar of the temple court, but under the new dispensation they are distributed among widows and others who were in need (so Const. Apost. 2, 26; 4, 3; Pseudo-Ignat. ad Tars. c. 9; Tertull. ad Uxor. 1, 7). Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 67) places widows and orphans first on the list of those to whom the offerings of Christian assemblies were distributed by their president. The Clementines (Epist. Clement. ad Jacob. c. 8; cf. Const. Apost. 4, 2) make it a primary duty of presbyters to stand towards orphans in the place of parents, and towards widows in the place of husbands. In the earlier books of the Apostolical Constitutions the references are frequent: so great was the care which was taken of widows and so liberal were the offerings which they received, that some of them shamelessly abused their privilege and made their widowhood a profitable trade (ἐργαλεῖα, 3, 7, 12 13; cf. Pseudo-Ignat. ad Philadelph. c. 4).

In order to entitle anyone to receive relief, widowhood seems to have been of itself a sufficient qualification. The number of widows thus relieved was large. Cornelius of Rome, in the middle of the 3rd century, says that at Rome the widows and others who were in distress amounted to fifteen hundred (Epist. Cornel. ap. Euseb. H. E. 6, 43); and Chrysostom reckons the number of widows and virgins who were supported by the comparatively poor church of Antioch at three thousand (S. Chrysost. Hom. in Matt. 66 (67), c. 3, ap. Migne, P. G. vol. lvii. 630).

Of the widows who were thus the objects of care to the church officers, some were formally enrolled on the κατάλογος, or list of church members, as a distinct class or "ordo": (the Clementines, Recogn. 6, 15, Hom. 11, 35, attribute the formation of this "ordo" to St. Peter). But even at the time at which the Pastoral Epistles were written it is clear that restrictions were placed upon admission to that class. It is laid down in 1 Tim. v. 9, 10 that a widow is not to be entered on the church-roll (καταλεγέσθω) "under three-score years old, having been the wife of one man, well reported of for good works, if she have brought up children, if she have lodged strangers, if she have washed the saints' feet, if she have relieved the afflicted, if she have diligently followed every good work." These restrictions seem to have been consistently maintained in the early church. They are elaborately repeated in the Apostolical Constitutions, 3, 1, 5; Origen (in Joann. tom. 32, c. 7, vol. iv. p. 422, ed. Delarue) shews that stress was laid upon every part of them by arguing against too literal an interpretation of the clause "if she have washed the saints' feet," the omission of which, he says, must not be taken to exclude a widow who, in her time of prosperity, shewed hospitality to the brethren in other ways; Tertullian (de veland. Virg. c. 9) shews that the restrictions of age and monogamy were maintained in Africa; and Ambrose implies that they existed in his time in Italy (Exhort. Virgin. c. 4, 23, vol. ii. p. 284, where Juliana of Bologna speaks of herself as being "adhuc immaturam viduitatis stipendiis," i.e. not yet sixty years old; so de Viduis, c. 2, 9, vol. ii. p. 188). There was sometimes the further restriction that a widow must not have children or grandchildren capable of supporting her (Ambrosiast. in Epist. I. ad Timoth. c. 3, in the Append. ad op. S. Ambros. p. 295); but in later times the restriction as to age was sometimes waived (Statt. Eccles. Antig. c. 101, "viduae adolescentes quae corpore debiles sunt sumptu ecclesiae cujus viduae sunt sustententur").

The possession of the qualifications which are mentioned in the Pastoral Epistles did not, ipso facto, entitle a widow to a place on the church-roll. She had to be definitely appointed (καθιστάνεσθαι, Const. Apost. 3, 1, Διατ. Κλήμ. 21; κατατάσσεσθαι, Const. Apost. 8, 25; both which words were in ordinary use for the ordination or appointment of clerks; see ORDINATION). It does not appear by whom the appointment was made. Chrysostom (de Sacerdot. 3, 16) counts the selection of fit persons among the burdens of the episcopal office; but there is no evidence that the right of appointment was confined to bishops.

The "order of widows" ("ordo viduarum," Clement. Recognit. 6, 15, τὸ τάγμα τῶν χηρῶν, Pseudo-Ignat. ad Philipp. c. 15; τὸ χηρικόν, Clement. Homil. 11, 35; Const. Apost 3, 1; 8, 25) which was thus formed was evidently a small class in each community. One of the earliest collections of ecclesiastical regulations fixe the number at three (Διαταγαὶ Κλήμεντος, c. 21 (24), ed. Pitra, Juris Eccles. Graec. Monumenta, vol. i. p. 84; Lagarde, Juris Eccles. Reliquiae, p. 74; Hilgenfeld, Novum Testamentum extra canonem receptum, fasc. 4, p. 101), but it had ecclesiastical rank (ἐκκλησιαστικὴ τιμὴ, Origen in Joann. tom. 32, 7, vol iv. p. 422, ed. Delarue), and it is enumerated as co-ordinate with, and therefore distinct from, both clerks and laymen (Const. Apost. 2, 25; 3, 11, 15; 8, 10, 12, 29). Its members were supported out of the church offerings until about the time of the council of Nicaea, when Constantine sent a rescript to provincial governors, ordering that they should for the future receive an annual provision in common with the church virgins "et aliis qui divino ministerio erant consecrati" (Incert. Auct. de Constant. ap. Haenel, Corpus Legum ab Imperat. Romanis ante Justinianum latarum, p. 196). Julian abolished this provision and compelled those who had received it to refund it (Sozom. H. E. 5, 5), but his successor restored it; and Theodoret speaks of it as existing in his own day (Theodoret, H. E. 1, 11).

The duties of the widows who had thus a separate place upon the church roll were of two kinds. For some of them the model was the Anna of the Gospel "which departed not from the temple, but served God with fastings and prayers night and day" (St. Luke ii. 37, referred to specially in Const. Apost. 3, 1: cf. S. Basil, Epist. 174 (283), p. 261): others were employed in the good works of nursing the sick, urging the younger women to live chastely, and, without teaching the mysteries of the kingdom of God, making converts of heathen women. The leading early rule is Διατ. Κλήμ. c. 18, referred to above, "Let three widows be appointed: of whom let two continue in prayer for all who are in trouble . . . . and let one attend to those who are being tried by illnesses, ministering to them, and vigilant, and reporting their necessities to the presbyters." This rule is repeated in the Jacobite canons of Gregory Barhebraeus, cap. 7, sect 7, ap. Mai Script. Vet. Nov. Coll. vol. x. pars ii. p. 50, and in the Coptic Apostolical Constitutions, ed. Tattam, p. 24. A more precise account of the duties of a widow, especially in regard to "those who are without," is given in Const. Apost. 3, 5: cf. Clem. Alex. Strom. 3, p. 536, who traces back this part of the ministry of women to the times of the apostles. Origen (in Isaiam, Hom. 6, vol. iii. p. 117, ed. Delarue) speaks of their duty in relation to younger women; Tertullian (de Veland. Virg. c. 9) implies the existence of a similar duty, in giving as the reason for the restriction as to age and having borne children, "ut facile norint ceteras et consilio et solatio juvare." The leading Western canon in Statt. Eccles. Antiq. c. 103, "viduae quae stipendiis ecclesiae sustentantur tam assiduae in dei opere esse debent ut et meritis et orationibus suis ecclesiam adjuvent." (It is interesting to find an allusion to the work of widows in the satirical account of the Christians which is given by Lucian, de Morte Per-

How long this primitive institution continued is not clear; the obligation of the church to help its widows of course continued, and a long catena of passages might be made to shew how constantly the obligation was recognised and inculcated; but there are no certain traces of the recognition of the primitive class of poor widows after the later books of the Apostolical Constitutions in the East and the Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua in the West. In the meantime another "ordo viduarum" was being formed, which was not limited to those who were more than sixty years of age or who were in need of support. This second order of widows, which long survived the first, and which (though distinguished from it so early as the time of Chrysostom, Hom. de Viduis, Op. tom. iii. p. 323, ed. Migne) has often been confounded with it, arose out of the strong feeling against second marriages which manifested itself in the course of the second century. It came to be considered meritorious for a woman who had lost her husband, not merely to abstain from a second marriage, but to take a vow of abstinence, and to indicate her vow by adopting a peculiar dress ("vestis fuscior," S. Hieron. Epist. 38 ad Marcell. vol. i. p. 174). This ascetic tendency was especially strong in the West, and the great Latin fathers of the end of the fourth century did their best to encourage it. St. Ambrose wrote a treatise De Viduis (op. vol. ii. p. 184), and elsewhere speaks of the "grace of widowhood" as a plant of specially Christian growth (in Evang. sec. Luc. lib. 3, 18, p. 1320; Hexaem. 5, 19, p. 105). St. Jerome's circle of noble ladies at Rome contained several who had taken upon themselves the vows of widowhood, and his letters contain many commendations of those who had done so (e.g. Epist. 38 ad Marcell. p. 174; Epist. 108 ad Eustoch. p. 690; Epist. 123 ad Ageruch. p. 900); to one who was wavering in her purpose, he ends a long letter by saying, "Reflect daily that you will one day die, and you will never think of a second marriage" (Epist. 54 ad Furiam, p. 282). St. Augustine also wrote a treatise De Bono Viduitatis (Migne, P. L. vol. xli.); in it he does not agree with the Novatians and Tertullian that second marriages are always to be condemned (c. 4), nor even with those who thought that the second marriage of a widow who had taken a vow of continence was adultery (c. 10), but he strongly urges that widows should take such a vow, and that having taken it they should persevere (c. 19).

The result of this inculcation of the virtue of widowhood was that a large number of widows took the vow. But some of those who did so appear to have been influenced only by a desire to gain greater freedom and to have a decent cloke for lasciviousness. The civil law, which had at first supported the ecclesiastical tendency, was compelled to check it. Majorian enacted, after reciting the abuse of the vow of widowhood, that childless widows under forty years of age must either marry again or forfeit half their property to the public chest (Novell. Majorian, tit. 8, 1, 1, ed. Haenel, p 306). The church, on the other hand, continued to proclaim the merit of perpetual widowhood. It made all persons who married a widow ineligible for admission to holy orders, or, if already in orders, ineligible for promotion [ORDERS, HOLY; Qualifications for, pp. 1485, 1492]; and if the widow of a clerk married again, she was liable to perpetual seclusion in a convent. A curious instance of the latter rule is afforded by Gregory the Great: the widow of a subdeacon who, after her husband's death, had married again, had been visited with this ordinary punishment of seclusion; but it was discovered that her husband, before his death, had resigned his office; whereupon Gregory orders the widow to be released (S. Greg. M. Epist. 4, 36, ad Leonem, p. 716). It is probable that among the Teutonic peoples the ecclesiastical tendency was fostered by the feeling against second marriages which is mentioned by Tacitus (Germ. c. 19), and which is expressed both in the Teutonic codes and in the Merovingian capitularies (cf. Walter, Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte, 2te Ausg. § 487).

It is clear that for several centuries widows who took the vow were free to live, as they had lived before, in their own houses. But by the eighth century a feeling had grown up, especially in Gaul and Spain, that the only safety from temptation lay in their living, as virgins under a vow usually lived, in monasteries. In A.D. 748 Pippin and the Gallican clergy put the formal question to pope Zachary "whether widows who lived in their own houses could save their souls," to which the pope gives no definite answer, but, following the decretal of Gelasius, leaves those who break their vows to the judgment of God (Zachar. Pap. Epist. ad Pippin. ap. Cenni Codex Carolinus, vol. i. p. 46, and Migne, P. L. vol. xcviii. 84). In the following century the Gallican church abolished the option which, though discouraged, had still continued to exist, and enacted that professed widows should no longer be allowed to live in private houses (6 Conc. Paris, A.D. 829, lib. i. c. 44). In this, as in some other respects, pope Nicholas I. disapproved of the Gallican enactment, and refused to allow widows to be forced into monasteries (Nicol. I. Respons. ad Bulgar. c. 87, ap. Mansi, vol. xv. p. 429). But ultimately the Gallican rule prevailed; the taking of the vows of widowhood implied entrance into a monastery; the order of widows was merged in that of nuns, and, as may be gathered from the omission of the rites of benediction of widows in the later Sacramentaries, at length disappeared altogether.

The taking of the vow of perpetual widowhood was accompanied by the adoption of a dress which at first probably differed from the ordinary dress only in its material and its colour (S. Hieron. Epist. 38 ad Marcell. vol. i. p. 174, S. August. Epist. cclxii. 9; ap. Migne, P. L. vol. xxxiii. 1081). The assumption of this dress was probably at first the private act of the widow herself, unattended by any ceremony; but it soon became usual to give greater emphasis to the vow of which it was the token by making it in the presence of a bishop. Even this was in the first instance a private and not a public ceremony; for the first council of Orange, A.D. 441, c. 27, speaks only of "viduitatis servandae professionem coram episcopo in secretario habitam imposita ab episcopo veste viduali indicandam."

But ultimately, in the West, the act was attended with a ceremonial for which provision is made in most early ordinals. This was especially the case after the identification or confusion of the order of widows with the order of deaconesses. In early times, and probably always in the East, the two orders had unquestionably been distinct. (1) Their functions were distinct, widows being employed in prayer and in tending the sick, whereas deaconesses had the special duties of assisting at the baptism of women, and of guarding the church doors. (S. Epiphan. Expos. Fid. c. 21, p. 1104, Pseudo-Ignat. ad Antioch. c. 12, Constit. Apost. 3. 15). (2) The mode of appointment was different, deaconesses having imposition of hands, which widows had not (Const. Apost. 8. 18, 29). (3) The Apostolical Constitutions state it as a mark of a good widow, that she subordinates herself to the deaconesses as well as to the presbyters and deacons (Const. Apost. 3. 7.). (4) A deaconess might be a virgin (Const. Apost. 4. 17, Sozom. H. E. 8. 23). But it is clear from the enactments of the council of Epaon, A.D. 517, c. 21, and the second council of Tours, c. 21, fifty years later, that in the Frankish and Burgundian kingdoms the distinction had come to be disregarded. It may also be noted that the Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua, c. 12, give to widows the same functions in the baptism of women which in the East were assigned to deaconesses. It was a natural result that many parts of the rite of ordination were common to widows and deaconesses. The earliest ritual is that of the Missale Francorum (Muratori Liturgia Rom. Vet. vol. iii. p. 463), which consists of two parts, (1) the benediction of the widow's clothes, (2) the benediction of the widow herself. For the first part two prayers are given, which are found also in Egbert's Pontifical (ed. Surtees Society, p. 110); where two other prayers, "Deus qui vestimentum salutare," . . . "Deus bonarum virtutum dator," . . . are added, which are also found in the text of the Gregorian Sacramentary (as given by Muratori, vol. ii. p. 785), and in the Codex Maffeianus (ibid. vol. iii. p. 103), for the consecration of the vestments of either a widow or virgin. The second part consists of three prayers, (a) "Consolare Domine hanc famulam," . . . . which is found also in Egbert's Pontifical, p. 110, in Hittorp's Ordo Romanus, p. 149, in the Gelasian Sacramentary (Muratori, vol. ii. p. 380), and in the Codex Maffeianus (ibid. vol. iii. p. 109); (b) "Domine Deus virtutum coelestium," . . . . which is found also in Hittorp's Ordo Romanus; (c) Deus qui Annam filiam Fanuelis," . . . . which is partly found also in Egbert's Pontifical and in the Missale Gallicanum Vetus (Muratori, vol. iii. p. 507); and which in Hittorp's Ordo Romanus, p. 144, forms part of the office of the consecration of a deaconess. Egbert's Pontifical adds another prayer, which is omitted from the other ordinals at the consecration of a widow, but occurs in Hittorp's Ordo Romanus, ibid. in the consecration of a deaconess. The rites of imposing the veil and of placing under the bishop's ban all who disturb the peace of the widow or deaconess are identical in the two cases in Hittorp's Ordo, pp. 144, 149; in each case, it is the deaconess or widow herself who places the veil upon her head. This point is of some importance, as interpreting and illustrating the Western rule that no bishop should veil a widow; (Gelas. Epist. 9 ad Episc. Lucan. c. 15, Decretum General. ap. Hinschius, Decretales Pseudo-Isidorianae, p. 652; repeated in Conc. Rotom. c. 9, Karoli M. Capit. Aquisgran. A.D. 789, c. 59. The rule seems sometimes to have been interpreted as prohibiting the veiling of widows at all; its meaning appears to have been that only bishops could veil virgins, and that only presbyters could veil widows; so 6 Conc. Paris. A.D. 829, lib. i. c. 40).

A widow who after thus making a solemn profession of continence broke her vow, was liable to severe ecclesiastical censure. Gelasius, Decretum Generale, c. 21, ut supra, had been content to leave such an one to the judgment of God. But the African, Spanish, and Gallican councils imposed the penalty of a more or less lengthened excommunication; Stat. Eccles. Antiq. c. 104, 3 Conc. Tolet. c. 10, 3 Aurel. c. 18, 4 Tolet. c. 56, 5 Paris. c. 15, 6 Tolet. 6. The Eastern rule visited a deaconess who married with death and confiscation (Nomocanon, tit. 9, c. 29, ed. Pitra, Jur. Eccl. Grasc. Mon. vol. ii. p. 564).

It is probable that at one time, in the East, the senior widows had as such a distinct rank and distinct functions. As women had their own deaconesses, so also they seem in some places to have had their own presbyteresses. The references to them are few in number. The most important is that of the apocryphal Acta et Martyrium Matthaei, c. 28 (according to the Paris MS. as edited by Tischendorf, Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, p. 187), which speaks of the apostle as having ordained the wife of a certain king as πρεσβῦτις, and his son's wife as deaconess. The Council of Laodicea, c. 11, implies their existence in its prohibition of their appointment for the future; but this prohibition must be held to refer to their functions, or to their place in church (προκαθημένας), and not to their existence as a class, since they are distinctly recognized in the Apostolical Constitutions as being co-ordinate with widows and virgins (2, 57), though inferior to deaconesses (2, 28), and also since Epiphanius (Expos. Fid. c. 4, p. 1060), arguing against the Collyridians, states that the church gave the title πρεσβύτιδας to the elder widows. The earlier Western collections of canons understand the Laodicean canon as referring to 'mulieres quae apud Graecos presbyterae appellantur, apud nos autem viduae seniores, conversae, et matriculariae' (Fulgent. Ferrand. Breviat. Canon. 221, ap. Migne P. L. vol. lxvii. 960; so Isidor. Mercat. ap. Migne, P. L. vol. cxxx. 287): and a canonist of the 10th century, whose source of information seems to be lost, speaks of them as having the power 'praedicandi, jubendi, vel docendi' (Atto Vercellens. Epist. 8, ap. D'Achery, Spicilegium, vol. i. p. 438). It is probable that they were also to some extent recognized in the West: for although in many places, e.g. in St. Greg. M. Epist. 9, 7, p. 931, the term 'presbyterae' may be only used of the wife of a presbyter, on the other hand Mabillon's Ordo Romanus, ix. p. 91 and Hittorp's Ordo Romanus, p. 88, make a distinct provision for the benediction 'presbyterissarum atque diaconissarum.' Unfortunately, however, these references, though clear and sufficient to establish their existence, stand altogether alone.

It may be added, partly in explanation of the above quotation from Ferrandus, that in the East as well as in the West the term 'widow' was applied to a wife who lived in voluntary separation from her husband: the most pertinent instance is afforded by a sepulchral inscription in Le Bas and Waddington's Inscriptions Grecques et Latines d'Asie Mineure, No. 816, found at Cotiaeum in Phrygia, σωφροσύνη ζήσασα ἐν χηροσύνῃ κατέλειψε σύνευνον χαλεπῷ πένθει τειρόμενον. [E. H.]

WIGS. Boldetti (Osservazioni, p. 297) relates that in a tomb of the cemetery of St. Cyriaca, which was without inscription, but which he supposes to be the tomb of a martyr, he found a wig with the hair arranged in plaits and still lying on the head of the corpse.

The use and abuse of false hair among the pagan nations of antiquity is well known. Juvenal and Martial direct all the force of their satire against the women who try to revive their youth by this means, "enclosing their heads in a sort of case," like a sword in its scabbard; against the men who change their hair-dye with the seasons of the year, and the dotards who think they can outwit Fate by a blonde wig. Lampridius gives an absurd sketch of the wig of the emperor Commodus, sprinkled with glutinous perfumes, and then powdered with gold dust.

Christians were not always free from the influence of the prevailing fashion; and it was to be expected that converts from Paganism would not at once abandon the fashions of their former life. Long and flowing locks have always been objects of admiration, at all events on women, and St. Paul expressly sanctions their use (1 Cor. xi. 15). Hence, perhaps, the desire among Christians to supply their place by artificial means. This brought down the censure of the fathers of the church, and Tertullian signalizes himself by an attack on women who "gave their hair no peace." He speaks in another passage (de Cultu Fœmin. 7) of "the monstrosities of twined and stitched hair," which were in vogue, and Jerome, in a letter to Marcella (xxiii.), pointedly alludes to the rage for wearing wigs among women "who with false hair make an edifice of their heads." In the frescoes and sculptures at the catacombs are to be seen representations of women in prayer, or seated at banquets, with abundant hair very artificially dressed. This marks their epoch, and is a great help in determining the date of these monuments. [E. C. H.]

WILLS (Testamenta). The rules of ecclesiastical law relating to testamentary matters cannot be collected in any systematic arrangement, as they are for the most part in the form of exceptions to the general law. The civil law upon the subject has been, to a large extent, incorporated into the canon law of the period subsequent to the limit of this article; and it is a matter of some difficulty to disentangle from this great mass of legislation those enactments which properly belong to the ecclesiastical law of the first eight centuries.

In this article the regulations to be found in the different codes will be arranged under the following heads:—

I. The Capacity to bequeath by Will.
II. The Capacity to take under a Will.
III. The Property which may be made the Subject of a Will.
IV. Miscellaneous Provisions.
V. Succession by Intestacy.

The law relating to the testamentary disposition of Apostates will be found in the article on that subject. [APOSTASY, p. 104.] See also PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH (p. 1750 ff.), HOSPITALS (p. 788, col. 1), BISHOP (p. 238, col. 1), and IMMUNITIES AND PRIVILEGES OF THE CLERGY (p. 826, col. 2).

I. The Capacity to bequeath by Will.

In France.—By the second canon of the second council of Lyons (A.D. 567), bishops and other clergy might bequeath property to the church without the formalities required by the civil law. This law was repeated in the tenth canon of the fifth council of Paris (A.D. 615). The eighth canon of this council contained the provision, that the archbishop or archdeacon should not appropriate to themselves or their church any property left by a clerk to another church

In the African Church.—According to St. Augustine the right of giving or receiving by will was taken away from the Donatists. (Lib. 1, contr. Ep. Parmeniani, 12.)

Under the Imperial Law.—The duty of bequeathing property to the church was enforced in the amplest terms and facilitated by Constantine in A.D. 321 (Cod. Theod. 16, 2. 4). For the history of this constitution, see the note of Gothofred, and Thomassinus (3, 1, 16, and 18). This injunction was repeated in the Code of Justinian (1, 2, 1). As regards its extent, the better opinion amongst civilians would appear to be that it does not give the right of making a will, to those who had not otherwise that right. The solution of other questions arising upon this constitution will be found in the commentaries and summarized in the notes of Van Leeuwen (Antwerp, 1809).

Bequests thus made were secured to the possession of the church by a constitution of Leo (A.D. 470), inserted in the Code of Justinian (1, 2, 14).

Women were forbidden to bequeath property to ecclesiastical persons by a constitution of Valentinian A.D. 370 (Cod. Theod. 16, 2, 20).

This was extended so far as regards the property of deaconesses to bequests to the church and poor by Theodosius, A.D. 390 (Cod. Theod. 16, 2, 27). This last constitution was two months afterwards repealed as regards movables (Cod. Theod. 16, 2, 28). Both constitutions were abrogated by Marcian in A.D. 455 (Nov. Mart. 6). The observations of Baronius (Ann. ad ann. 455 sec. 25–28) on this Novell. may be compared with the notes of Gothofred on the three constitutions of Theodosius, in A.D. 381 (Cod. Theod. 16, 5, 7), a disability which was extended by the same emperor to Eunomians in A.D. 389 (Cod. Theod. 16, 5, 17). This right of giving and receiving by will was restored to and taken away from these heretics several times during the subsequent forty years. The seventh book of the history of Sozomen illustrates these changes of imperial policy and feeling.

At length in A.D. 428 a comprehensive constitution was promulgated by Theodosius the younger (Cod. Theod. 16, 5, 65), which confirmed the loss of testamentary rights in the case of twenty-three classes of heretics mentioned therein by name. These penalties were confirmed by Justinian in his code (1, 5). In the 129th Novell., A.D. 559, he grants privileges to the Samaritani, but these were taken away by Justin in the 144th Novell.

By a constitution of Valentinian in A.D. 426 (Cod. Theod. 16, 8, 28), two privileges were given to the converted children of Jews. In the first place they could not be disinherited or passed over by their Jewish parents, nor given less than they would receive under an intestacy. Secondly, even if they were disinherited for a crime against their parents, they were still to receive the quarta Falcidia. In the code of Justinian is inserted a constitution of Marcian (A.D. 455), enabling women dedicated to religion, in the technical sense, to bequeath their property to ecclesiastical purposes (Cod. 1, 2, 13). Justinian himself in A.D. 538 forbad to monks the right of making a will (Nov. 76, 1). In the 123rd Novell. (A.D. 546) he secured to presbyters and clerks of inferior orders the right of bequeathing their property (Nov. 123, 19).

Under the Barbarian Codes.—By the laws of Luitprand, king of the Lombards in A.D. 721, minors under eighteen years of age could bequeath a part of their property in favour of churches and hospitals (Davoud Oughlou, vol. ii. p. 61).

II. The Capacity to take under a Will.

In France.—By the 6th canon of the council of Agde (A.D. 506) followed by the 20th canon of the council of Rheims (A.D. 625) property bequeathed to a clerk was considered to be bequeathed to his church.

In the African Church.—It had, in St. Augustine's time, become a rule that the church should receive no estates given to the great detriment and prejudice of common rights, as if a father disinherited his children to make the church his heir (Augustine, Serm. 49, De Diversis; Possidius, Vita Augustini, c. 24; cited by Bingham, 5, 4, 13).

By the 13th canon of the third council of Carthage (A.D. 397) bishops and clergy were forbidden to bequeath their property to non-Catholic Christians, even when blood relations. By the 81st canon in the Codex Ecclesiae Africanae (A.D. 419), bishops who appointed heretical or pagan heirs were pronounced anathema, and removed from the roll of those whose names were recited as priests of God. The same penalty was inflicted if by his dying intestate the property of a bishop should devolve on heretics or pagans.

Under the Imperial Law.—Justinian permitted the disherison of heretical children by their parents in the 115th Novell. A.D. 542, and of heretical parents by their children (3, 14; 4, 8). In A.D. 546 he forbad the disherison of children by parents and of parents by children by reason of their embracing a monastic life (Nov. 123, 41). He also directed that if a person had entered a monastic life, and had died before dividing his property, his children only took a pars legitima, the rest of the property going to the monastery (Nov. 123, 38). Parents were not allowed altogether to disinherit children taking orders or entering a monastery, as appears from a Constitution of Justinian, A.D. 534 (Cod. 1, 3, 55).

III. The Property which may be made the Subject of a Will.

In the East.—The council of Antioch held in A.D. 341, in its twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth canons, provides for the separation of the private property of a bishop from the property of the church under his care, so that the latter might not be bequeathed by him with his private property. [On these canons, and the apostolic canons on the same subject, see ALIENATION, p. 51, col. 1.]

A case in which this law was disregarded will be found in the acts of the council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451). Four presbyters of the church of Edessa accused their metropolitan, Ibas, of conniving at the misconduct of his suffragan, Daniel, who had bequeathed ecclesiastical property away from the church.

In France, by the thirty-third canon of the council of Agde (A.D. 506), if a bishop, not having children or grandchildren, did not make the church his heir, his property was to be mulcted of a sum equivalent to that spent by him out of ecclesiastical revenues on other objects; but if he left descendants, they must indemnify the church out of the inheritance. The canons numbered forty-eight and fifty-one (but which are of doubtful authenticity) forbid bishops to leave to heirs or legatees any church property. This provision as to legacies is found in the seventeenth canon of the council of Epaon (A.D. 517), but it excepts cases where the testator has given an equivalent out of his private property.

In Spain, the first canon of the first council of Seville (A.D. 590) repeated the above-cited thirty-third canon of the council of Agde.

Under the Barbarian Codes.—The laws of Aistulphus (A.D. 749) gave exceptional validity to wills in favour of holy places. In the laws of the Visigoths provisions will be found for restraining the cupidity of the heirs of bishops and other clergy (Davoud Oghlou, vol. ii. p. 151, vol. i. p. 163).

Upon the whole matter Van Espen (Jus Ecclesiasticum, 2, 4, 1, 8) draws the conclusion that in the ancient canons it was forbidden to the clergy as well as to the bishops to bequeath any property which they had acquired from the church.

As to the operation of the Lex Falcidia upon bequests for church purposes, see PROPERTY (p. 1731), and Ferraris, Bibliotheca sub voce Legatum, secs. 137–138.

IV. Miscellaneous Provisions.

In France.—By the fourth canon of the first council of Vaison (A.D. 442) any person as an infidel who should keep back the gifts of the faithful departed, was to be cast out of the church. This canon was repeated in the twenty-second canon of the third council of Orleans (A.D. 538). The fourth council of Orleans (A.D. 541) simply provides in canon fourteen that property left by a lawful will to the church or to a bishop cannot be demanded by the heirs of the deceased. The more stern provisions of the earlier councils were repeated by the fourth canon of the first council of Mâcon (A.D. 581).

In the African Church it was forbidden by the eighteenth canon of the Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua that a bishop should accept a guardianship under a will.

In Spain.—By the seventh canon of the ninth council of Toledo (A.D. 655) the relations of a deceased bishop were forbidden to deal with his property without the consent of the metropolitan, and in the case of the clergy without the consent of the bishop.

In England the only distinct enactment not brought in by the adoption of foreign councils would seem to be the second answer in the dialogue of archbishop Egbert of York (A.D. 732–766; see Haddan and Stubbs, vol. iii. p. 403), where he directs the clergy not to become witnesses of nuncupatory wills except in company with other persons.

Under the Imperial Law.—That the clergy should presume to decide upon testamentary questions seemed to Justin a most improper act —"absurdum etenim clericis est, immo etiam opprobriosum, si peritos se voluit ostendere disceptationum esse forensium," and he forbad it (A.D. 524) under a heavy fine. (Cod. 1, 3, 41).

Justinian in A.D. 528 gave 100 years as the limit of actions upon legacies to ecclesiastical purposes (Cod. 1, 2, 24); but he afterwards reduced it to forty years, except in the case of the church of Rome (Nov. 131, 6).

Justinian in A.D. 530 promulgated a long constitution (Cod. 1, 3, 46), imposing upon the bishops, and in their default upon the metropolitans, the duty of looking after the proper application of bequests to pious uses.

Two years later he exempted bequests by the clergy of their "peculium quasi castrense" from any "querela inofficiosi" (Cod. 1, 3, 50); but this privilege was taken away A.D. 546 (Nov. 123, 19).

There are provisions in a constitution of Justinian of A.D. 530 for determining the construction of wills when the object of the testator's bounty is obscurely indicated—e.g. bequests to Our Lord are to be held to be given to the church of the town or neighbourhood of the deceased, bequests to archangels and martyrs to churches dedicated by their name in the town or neighbourhood, failing such to the church so named in the metropolis. If there are more churches than one of the same name the intention of the testator must if possible be ascertained; if this cannot be done, then the poorest church is to be chosen (Cod. 1, 2, 26). [For the further legislation on this subject in the 131st Novell. see PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH.]

V. Succession by Intestacy.

In the earliest times the heirs of the clergy, whether bishops, presbyters, or others of inferior order succeeded in case of intestacy, as appears from a constitution of Valentinian, A.D. 334 (Cod. 1, 3, 20), in which no distinction appears. Care was, however, taken that the private property of bishops should be separated from the church property, which they administered in right of their sees, so that the former alone should pass to the private heirs. (See Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, cap. 24; Conc. Chalc. A.D. 451, cap. 22.)

In the 6th century the canons of councils, which directed bishops to make the church their heir in default of issue, affected to the same extent the succession by intestacy (see Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, cap. 33). But this restriction did not apply to the property of the clergy below the order of bishops; and in consequence attempts were wont to be made to exclude the heirs of the clergy. The seventh canon of the fifth council of Paris (A.D. 615) was directed against this abuse.

The contrary practice, by which the heirs of an intestate bishop appropriated church property, had to be guarded against. This temptation seems to have been especially felt in Spain, and canons of several councils are concerned with its suppression. (Conc. Tarracon. A.D. 516, cap. 12; Conc. Ilerdense, A.D. 523, cap. ult.) By degrees the moveable property of intestate ecclesiastics was claimed by the church on the pretext that this property had been acquired from church property. This claim was styled the jus spolii.

The order of succession to the property of intestate clergy did not differ from that of laymen, except as regards the children of those clergy who were forbidden to marry. These children could not by a constitution of Justinian in A.D. 530 (Cod. 1, 3, 45), even succeed to their mother's property. If a clerk died intestate and left no heirs, his property went to the church which he had served. (Cod. 1, 3, 20, A.D. 334; Nov. 131, cap. 13, A.D. 545; Capit. Carol. lib. 5, cap. 173.)

Passing to the rules which govern the succession by clerks to the property of intestates, they succeeded in the same manner as laymen (Cod. 1, 3, 56, 1) and their professional earnings were not brought into computation (Cod. 1, 3, 34). The same law applied both to seculars and regulars (Cod. 1, 3, 56), but this was afterwards altered, and the community succeeded to the rights of regulars. (Nov. 5 and 123, cap. 38.)

WOMEN. Certain features in the domestic and social influence of women among Christian communities will be found treated of in the article on SOCIAL LIFE. It is proposed here to notice some of the special points of difference in the Christian, as compared with the pagan, conception of woman's character and duties.

The estimate of womanhood in the earliest Christian literature exhibits a remarkable contrast to that of paganism, as both attaching far more importance to female modesty and chastity, and, at the same time, greatly enhancing the dignity of the female character and enlarging the sphere of woman's activities. The Epistle of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians speaks of the husbands whom he addresses, as exhorting their wives to the discharge of their duties with a blameless, grave, and pure conscientiousness, and in a spirit of conjugal affection, and also teaching them to superintend domestic matters with dignified decorum (σεμνῶς) [c. i. ed. Dressel, p. 48]. In the same manner, Polycarp (ad Philipp. c. 4) exhorts the Christian wives of Philippi to live in the faith, in love and purity, to duly honour their husbands, and to instruct their children in the fear of the Lord. Second marriages being systematically discouraged in the early church, the advice given by the same writer to the widows seems directed against the faults to which women, when lonely and unemployed, are specially prone — "calumny, speaking against their neighbours, bearing false witness, and avarice" (ed. Dressel, p. 381).

The advice of Tertullian (ad Uxorem, bk. ii. c. 8) that a woman should not refuse to marry one slightly below herself in station, provided he is likely to prove in other respects a good husband, points probably to the existence of a certain social ambition among those to whom his treatise is addressed, which he considered unworthy of the Christian character. As contrasted with the cruelty which too often disgraced the privacy of pagan households, we find Chrysostom observing that it is a shame for a man to beat his female slave, much more his wife (in Epist. i. ad Corinth. Hom. 26; Migne, Patrol. Graec. lxi. 222).

The teaching of the most enlightened of the fathers was undoubtedly to the effect that there was no natural inferiority in the woman to the man. Theodoret (Graec. Affect. Curat. bk. v.) insists emphatically on their exact equality, and says that God made woman from man in order that the tendencies and action of both might be harmonious. Sometimes, indeed, he observes, woman has been found superior to man in encountering adversity (Migne, lxxxiii. 836). Chrysostom (Hom. lxi. 3) says that no one is more fit to instruct and exhort her husband than a pious woman. This conception differed, however, materially from that of Plato (Repub. v. p. 455), in that while the Greek philosopher sought to obliterate the ordinary distinctions between the sexes, the Christian father held that nature assigned to woman her special and distinct province of activity. Chrysostom, in a passage of singular beauty, gives us a comparison between the duties of the wife and those of the husband, the former being represented as in some respects the more dignified; for while the husband is described as engaged in the rougher work of life, in the market or the lawcourts, the wife is represented as remaining at home and devoting much of her time to prayer, to reading the Scriptures, καὶ τῇ ἄλλῃ φιλοσοφίᾳ. When her husband returns, harassed with his labours, it is her function to cheer and to soothe him, περικόπτειν αὐτοῦ τὰ περιττὰ καὶ ἄγρια τῶν λογισμῶν, so that he again goes forth into the world purified from the evil influences to which he has there been exposed, and carrying with him the higher influences of his home-life (in Joann. Hom. lxi.; Migne, lix. 340).

The participation of young females in the exercises of the palaestra and in races, commended by pagan theorists (Grote's Plato, iii. 217), is condemned by Clemens of Alexandria (Paed. iii. 10) as altogether repugnant to the notions of female modesty (Migne, viii. 626). Chrysostom (in Matt. Hom. i.) contrasts the difference in relation to these points between Christian and pagan teaching, and even goes so far as to affirm that true virginity was a notion which paganism was unable to realise (Migne, lvii. 19).

At the same time we have satisfactory evidence that this exalted conception of the female character and female duties did not involve any renunciation of her humbler functions. Clemens says that it is right that women should employ themselves in spinning, weaving, and watching the bread-maker (τῇ πεττούσῃ), and that it is no disgrace for a wife to grind corn or to superintend the cookery with the view of pleasing her husband (Migne, viii. 626).

The excessive luxury of the 4th century would seem however to have been not less fatal to the maintenance of this high ideal than to other features of the Christian character. Amédée Thierry says that, by one of those contradictions which "déroutent la logique des idées," Christianity itself, essentially the religion of the poor, conspired to give to the manners of the Western empire a degree of effeminacy unknown in pagan times (Saint Jérôme, p. 2). Chrysostom declares that many of the ladies of Constantinople would not walk across even a single street to attend church, but required to be conveyed for the shortest distance (in Matt. Hom. vii.; Migne, lvii. 79). When there they were to be seen with their necks, heads, arms, and fingers loaded with golden chains and rings, their persons breathing precious odours, and their dresses of gold stuff and silk (Milman, Hist. of Christianity, bk. iv. c. 1). Others, again, affected masculine apparel, and seemed to blush for their womanhood, cutting short their hair, and presenting faces like those of eunuchs — "impudenter erigunt facies eunuchinas" (Jerome, Epist. 18). According to the same authority, the greater facilities possessed by ecclesiastics for gaining admission to female society was an inducement with some to become priests—"ut mulieres licentius videant" (ib.). Elsewhere Jerome strongly dissuades the clergy from accustoming themselves to private interviews with those of the other sex,—"Solus cum sola, secreto, et absque arbitro vel teste, non sedeas" (Epist. 52; Migne, xxii. 260).

The exaggerated importance attached by Jerome to the unwedded life, as one of superior sanctity, seems to have led him to dwell somewhat harshly on the weaknesses and worldliness of many of the wealthy matrons of his day. He represents them as given to excessive personal adornment, and bestowing much of their time on preparations for feasts and other household matters. When, however, we find him enumerating such obvious duties as "dispensatio domus, necessitates mariti, liberorum educatio, correctio servulorum," as prejudicial to the higher interests of the soul, we perceive that his tone is that of one to whom the ascetic life alone appeared adequately Christian (de ... p. Virg. c. 20; Migne, xxiii. 228). On the other hand, it is evident that the state of Roman society at this time rendered it exceptionally difficult for Christian women to carry the principles of their religion into daily practice. Of this Marcella's retirement to her mansion in the suburbs, as described by the same father, is an indication. He depicts the very different future which her mother Albina had designed for her—a splendid marriage and the possession of great wealth, while the daughter rarely issued from her seclusion save to visit the churches of the apostles and martyrs, especially those least frequented by the multitude (Epist. 93). The mistresses of large establishments, according to Jerome, were often exposed to exceptional temptations; and he states that young widows would sometimes consent to marry even pagan husbands in order to avoid being plundered by dishonest stewards and to escape the anxieties inseparable from the management of a large household, thus bringing home to their children by a former marriage "not a guardian, but an enemy; not a parent, but a tyrant" (Epist. 54; Migne, xxii. 291).

Among other indications of the confusion and demoralisation characteristic of the 5th century must be included that laxity of church discipline which permitted the performance of public religious rites to be sometimes entrusted to women. In the twenty-first canon of the collection ascribed to Gelasius this is spoken of as evidence of the "contempt" into which religion had fallen — "audivimus . . . . ut feminae sacris altaribus ministrare firmentur, et cuncta quae non nisi virorum famulatui deputata sunt, sexum cui non competunt exhibere" (Migne, lvi. 420).

It is generally assumed, though on somewhat scanty and doubtful evidence, that at the period of the conversion of the Teutonic nations the regard for female chastity and the respect paid to the sex were greater among pagan communities than among the Latin races. But however this may have been, it is certain that the views inherited and handed down by the Western church with regard to "the personal and propriety liberty of women" were greatly superior to those that find expression in any of the barbaric codes. Something of this feeling seems reflected in Jerome when (Epist. 130) he censures parents for their too common practice of leaving deformed or otherwise unmarriageable daughters inadequately provided for (Migne, xxii. 981). "The church," says Sir Henry Maine, "conferred a great benefit on several generations by keeping alive the traditions of the Roman legislation respecting settled property;" and he points out that Christianity was really carrying on the tradition of the Roman dos. The formula of the marriage-service, "With all my worldly goods I thee endow," is one, he says, "which sometimes puzzles the English lawyer from its want of correspondence with anything which he finds among the oldest rules of English law" (Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 337; see also De Broglie, l'Église et l'Empire, I. ii. 273, and Éclaircissement D).

WONDERS (miracula, signa, prodigia, portenta—θαύματα, θαυμάσια, σημεῖα, δυνάμεις, τέρατα, παράδοξα). The reported miracles which fall within the limits of our period constitute no compact homogeneous whole. They form themselves into distinct groups. One group, having for its object the conversion of the heathen, gathers round notable wonder-workers in pagan countries, such as Gregory of Neocaesarea (Thaumaturgus) and Martin of Tours. Another group, or other groups, of miracles, whose object is the support of Athanasian orthodoxy, gather round the great monks of the East—Antony, Hilarion, Pachomius—Ambrose in the West, and saints of lesser note and of later times in Spain, or appear as interpositions of Providence in the form of marvellous deliverances under cruelties inflicted by Vandal tyrants in Africa or Lombard invaders in Italy. Other miracles vindicate the sanctity of images or condemn the conduct of the Iconoclast. Others again, whose object is to glorify the enterprise and attest the piety of founders of monasteries, cluster thickly round a Benedict or Columban, amidst a galaxy of lesser wonders that stretch across the centuries in the acts of the saints. This classification, as bringing out the ethical features of the miracles and their relation to important events in church history, may well be borne in mind and allowed, so to speak, to run pari passu with a more methodical arrangement, according to which we shall classify the miracles thus:—

I. Wonders wrought by Living Saints.
II. By Relics.
III. By the Eucharist.
IV. By Pictures and Images.
V. By Celestial Visitants.
VI. Apart from human or angelic Agency, or the above-named Means.

In adopting for the purpose of further classification the division of miracles into those of beneficence and power, we do not regard these two heads as denoting distinct kinds of miracles, but simply classes, in the first of which the beneficence of the object and in the second the power of the performer is the dominant idea. Miracles of beneficence are also those of power—δυνάμεις—although miracles classed as those of power are not miracles of beneficence. Again, miracles of either class, but especially those of power, will appear as signs—σημεῖα—or pledges of a superhuman mission on the part of the performer, i.e. when they are wrought by a living saint, or, as Tertullian calls them, "documenta virtutum," attaining as such to the highest, because the ethical, character of a miracle, although both classes of miracles may degenerate into mere wonders—θαύματα, τέρατα—calling forth simply wonderment and amazement (see Trench, Notes on Mir. Introd.).

I. Wonders wrought by living Saints.—Whether by direct means, such as invocation of the name of Christ, prayer, signing of the cross, imposition of hands; or indirect, such as sending to the sick saints' garments or other garments, bread, oil, or water which had been blessed by saints.

One of the first points that strike us in the earlier notices of miracles which have reached us from the fathers is the absence of all claims on the part of the writers to the performance of the miracles they attest, and of all mention by name of those who wrought them. Thus Clemens Romanus states that there was a plentiful outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon all, and Ignatius, in his letter addressed to the church of Smyrna, says that church was mercifully blessed with every good gift; and they refer without doubt to miracles that were going on in the church, but they do not arrogate to themselves individually the power of overcoming the laws of nature, or specify any by name who possessed such a power, in which latter respect they stand in strong contrast with the chroniclers of the acts of later saints. As to the gifts here spoken of, they appeared in the form of the following powers: the casting out of devils, healing of diseases, raising the dead, speaking with tongues, the prevision of events, and seeing visions, the three first kinds being miracles of beneficence, the three last of power; the first finding their parallel in point of character and the sphere of human life they affect in the evangelical miracles; the last their source in the promises of our Lord and the predictions of Holy Writ.

1. Miracles of beneficence. (1) Exorcism and healing; (2) Raising the dead; (3) Deliverance, protection, succour.

(1) Justin Martyr says that Christians in the name of Jesus cast out demons from those whom pagan enchanters could not cure (Apol. ii. 6). Amongst the deeds of mercy which the true disciples of Christ performed in His name, Irenaeus specifies exorcisms and cures of the sick (Contra Haer. ii. 32). Cyprian writes, "O si audire eos velles quando a nobis adjurantur et torquentur" (Ad Demetr. xv.). Tertullian, "Place some possessed person before your tribunals; any Christian shall command that spirit to speak, who shall as surely confess himself to be a devil as elsewhere he will call himself a god falsely" (Apol. 23). And again, "Devils we not only despise, but both overcome and daily expose and expel from men, as is known to very many" (Ad Scap. 2; cf. also Apol. 37). [DEMONIACS; EXORCISM.]

When we pass from this general testimony of the early fathers respecting the existence of a miraculous agency at work in their days to the more detailed accounts of later miracles, we learn more as to the means by which the miracles were wrought. We gather that on the whole these means were much the same as those which the apostles themselves and the saints of their time made use of, who on their part were guided in some measure by the example of our Lord, viz. in respect of prayer and the imposition of hands (Mark vi. 41, vii. 34; John xi. 41; Mark vi. 5), and in some measure by the practices He enjoined, viz. the anointing the sick with oil, and the use of His name (Mark vi. 13, xvi. 17; Luke x. 17), although, as we may see from Acts v. 15, 16, xix. 12, they did not restrict their methods of working cures either to the divine precedents or precepts.

Taking first the miracles of exorcism and healing which were wrought by direct means, viz. invocation of the name of Christ, prayer, signing of the cross, and imposition of hands, we find that some of the earliest of which we possess any detailed account are those which Gregory, bishop of Neocaesarea in Pontus, wrought in the 3rd century, but the record of which belongs to the 4th century and is due to Gregory of Nyssa, who is said to have received his information from his grandmother Macrina. As being less notable than the miracles of other kinds which the saint wrought, we shall only refer to his exorcism of an evil spirit from a youth by imposition of hands (Newman, on Miracles, p. xxviii.), and to his miraculous healing of the plague-stricken in Neocaesarea (Fleury, liv. vii. c. 11). Of the miracles of this class which the earlier Eastern monks wrought, those of Antony and Hilarion may stand as examples. St. Athanasius, who wrote the life of the first-named monk and was his personal friend, says that "everywhere he had had an anxious desire for truth" in the accounts he had given. Of Antony's exorcisms we may name the instance of a boy whom he cured in a fishing-boat, and of whose state of possession indications were given by the presence of a foul stench in the boat (Newman, on Mir. xxxi.), and of a girl from whom he cast out an evil spirit at Alexandria, whither he had gone in his old age to support the party of Athanasius (Fleury, xi. 41); and of his cures that which he wrought in the desert upon a man afflicted either with epilepsy or madness, not by any means he employed on the spot, but by bidding him to go to Egypt, and assuring him that he would there be healed (Newman, on Mir. xxxi.). Respecting the miracles Hilarion wrought in Sicily, which island was together with Palestine the chief scene of his wonders, we have the testimony of a Jew, in Greece, who reported that "a prophet of the Christians had appeared in Sicily and was doing so many miracles and signs that men thought him one of the old saints." Jerome, who wrote his life, records the following miracles: restoration of sight to a woman who for ten years had been blind; a cure of paralysis; another of dropsy; exorcising the possessed—even a camel who in its fury had caused the death of many (Newman, on Mir. p. xxxii.; Jerome, t. ii.). Of his exorcisms we may specify one as remarkable for its being followed by the offer of a sum of money on the part of the man who had been dispossessed, and for the saint's reply that his acceptance of it would surely bring back the possession; and another as notable for the capacity which the energumen displayed, on the occasion of his cure, of speaking in Syriac and Greek, of which languages he, being a Frank by birth and uneducated, had no knowledge (Fleury, xii. 17).

Turning to the West, we find in the 4th century St. Ambrose curing a woman of palsy, laying his hands on her in prayer, while she touched his garment (Paulini Vit. S. Ambros. in Append. 2, § 10), casting out evil spirits, and on the other hand causing for his misdeeds a thief to be repossessed (Vita, 43; Fleury, xx. 20), and St. Martin of Tours delivering a slave of a devil, and healing a leper at Paris (Sulp. Sev. Vita, 16, 19); and in the following century Germanus of Auxerre, at Arles, curing a prefect's wife of a quartan ague; at Alesia, bestowing power of speech upon a girl who had lost it for twenty years; at Autun, healing a girl of a withered hand; in England, a boy of contracted limbs; at Milan and Ravenna, casting out evil spirits (Acta SS. ad d. 31 Jul.; La Vie du grand St. Germain, par Dom Viole, A.D. 1654).

As examples of exorcisms and cures wrought by indirect means—viz. the sending to the sick the garments of saints, or other garments which saints had blessed, or bread, oil or water, which likewise had been blessed—we may mention the following instances. Of the exorcisms two are noteworthy as indicative of the obstacles which the energumen, in the one case by persistence in wrong-doing, in the other by craftiness and obstinacy, could oppose to the salutary exercise of thaumaturgic gifts. The monk Pachomius had been applied to by a man whose daughter had an evil spirit to work a cure. The saint bade the man bring him one of his daughter's tunics, warning him at the same time that the blessing he should bestow upon it would be of no avail as long as his daughter continued to live a sinful life. Accordingly the girl was not cured till she had confessed and forsaken her sin. In the other instance, the saint had directed that in order to obtain a cure the energumen should before each meal take a small piece of a loaf of bread which had been blessed. As, however, he refused to touch the bread, the device was adopted of concealing morsels of it inside dates, but with no better success. The demoniac carefully extracted them. At last, having been left some days without food, he took the bread and was cured (Acta SS. ad d. 14 Maii; Fleury, xv. 60). By means of consecrated oil Hilarion healed the bites of serpents (Newman, on Mir. p. xxxii.; Jerome, t. ii.), and St. Martin of Tours cured a paralytic girl, when at the point of death, by putting into her mouth a few drops of the like oil (Sulp. Sev. Vita, 17). Threads frayed from St. Martin's garments healed the diseased when wound round the neck or fingers, and a letter written by the saint cured a girl of fever, when laid upon her chest (Vita, 19, 20). Straw upon which Germanus of Auxerre had reposed for a single night cured a demoniac when bound down upon it; and a barley loaf which the bishop had blessed and sent to the empress Placidia possessed, and for a long while retained, wonder-working properties (Acta SS. ad d. 31 Jul.; Vie du grand St. Germain, par Dom Viole). Lastly, by threads of her garments St. Geneviève of Paris cast out devils, and by bits of her candle cured the sick (Acta SS. ad d. 3 Jan.).

A miraculous cure, occurring in the 4th century, deserves notice, as having been wrought by the performer of it upon her own person, and by the employment—as doubtless was often the case—of more than one of the recognised means of healing, as well as for its indications of the asceticism of the age. Macrina, sister of St. Basil of Caesarea and St. Gregory of Nyssa, had for years suffered from a tumour in her breast, for the cure of which she had, from motives of modesty and in opposition to the earnest entreaties of her mother, persistently refused to avail herself of medical aid. One morning, having passed the night in supplication, she gathered from the floor a little dust upon which her tears had fallen and applied it to her sore, begging at the same time her mother to make the sign of the cross over the diseased part. The result was an immediate cure;—a slight scar, however, remaining, which years afterwards, when St. Macrina lay in death, was pointed out to her brother Gregory in proof of the miracle then for the first time divulged (Acta SS. ad d. 19 Jul.).

In illustration of the ethical aspect in which miracles of beneficence might be viewed by those who were the subjects or witnesses of them, we may note the cure of long-standing paralysis which Euthymius, a monk who lived in Palestine in the 5th century, wrought upon Terebo, the son of a Saracenic chief, and which resulted in the conversion to Christianity not only of the patient himself, but his father and attendants (Fleury, xxiv. 27).

With regard to the comparative prevalence of miraculous gifts of healing, as exercised by living saints, in the different ages of our period, we can form an opinion only from the records which have reached us. Judging from these the power of working cures was in no wise diminished in the 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries. Demoniacal possessions, madness, leprosy, paralysis, blindness, deafness, loss of speech, lameness—not to name other diseases and infirmities—were ills which, occurring no less frequently than in preceding ages, constantly called forth, and found relief through, the thaumaturgic powers with which monks and bishops were endowed, while accidents such as those to which monks themselves were exposed in the performance of their agricultural labours—the loss of a finger or thumb in reaping, or wounds on the forehead from the impact of a wedge in felling trees or cleaving logs—were naturally not excluded from the sphere of miraculous treatment (Vita S. Columb. in Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.). As a specimen of the powers with which monks were gifted for the casting out of evil spirits and working cures we have only to follow St. Columban in his journey from the east to the west of France when driven by Theodoric from his dominions (ibid.). Nor was there any partiality in the distribution of these miraculous powers over the various regions of Christendom, although the accident of the place of birth or dwelling of those who undertook to record certain miracles might lead us to an opposite opinion. If, for example, during the 6th century, thaumaturgy, as exercised in the matter of exorcism and healing, shone brightly in Italy in the persons of monks and bishops—as to judge from the writings of pope Gregory (Dial. i. 4; ii. 26, 30; iii. 6, 21; i. 10, et passim) it did—it shone no less brightly in Palestine in the person of the abbat Theodosius (Acta SS. ad d. 11 Jan.) or in France in the instances of Melanius, bishop of Rennes (Acta SS. ad d. 6 Jan.) and St. Geneviève of Paris.

(2) To the raising from the dead Irenaeus—although in terms less definite and precise than those he and others of the early fathers employ when speaking of exorcisms and cures—bears his testimony: "with much fasting and prayer the spirit of the dead returned" (Contra Haer. ii. 31); and again: "before now, as we have said, even the dead have been raised up, and have remained with us many years" (Contra Haer. ii. 32). As individual instances of this wonder as they occur in the course of our period we may take the following. Julian, who suffered martyrdom at Antioch in the Diocletian persecution, raised a dead man to life (Acta SS. ad d. 9 Jan.), and St. James, bishop of Nisibis (Antiochia Mygdonica) A.D. 325, a man who was brought to him, as dead, with a view to obtaining money (presumably to defray the expenses of burial), and who really died while counterfeiting death (Acta SS. ad d. 15 Jul.). St. Martin of Tours restored to life a catechumen who had died in his monastery unbaptized, by throwing himself upon the dead body and praying earnestly for its restoration (Newman, on Miracles, p. xxxii.; from Sulpicius Severus, who subsequently knew the subject of this miracle, and asserts that he lived for many years), and on another occasion a slave who had hanged himself (ibid. p. xxxiii.). Hilary of Poitiers raised a child to life who had died unbaptized (Fortunatus in Migne, Patrol. Lat. ix. 190; Acta SS. ad d. 13 Jan.). Marcellus, abbat of a monastery of the Acoemetae, near Constantinople, A.D. 446, a monk (Fleury, xxvii. 30), and Gelasius, abbat of a monastery in Palestine, A.D. 452, a child (Fleury, xxviii. 38). Germanus of Auxerre, when at Ravenna, raised a man from the dead (Acta SS. ad d. 31 Jul.; Vie du grand S'. Germain, par Dom Viole); St. Benedict of Nursia, a boy (Greg. M. Dial. ii. 32); St. Bavo of Ghent, A.D. 653, a man (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.); St. Walaricus, abbat of a monastery on the Somme, A.D. 622, one who had been unjustly hanged (ibid.); St. Wulfram, bishop of Sens, A.D. 720, five Frisian youths who had been hanged as a sacrifice to the gods (Acta SS. Ben. saec. iii. pt. 1).

(3) Miracles of deliverance, protection, succour—called forth as they were by the dangers and vicissitudes to which men were constantly exposed, and the various needs to which they were subjected—afford a series of wonders which, ranging downwards from the deliverance of cities from siege or assault, or of districts from inundation, to the multiplication of corn in a granary, or of wine or beer in a cask, differ widely from one another in respect of their object and importance, and the sphere they affect, and at times degenerate into little else than a display of miraculous power for its own sake—therein betraying their lack of the requisites of a true miracle: "miraculum si pia utilitate aut necessitate caveat, eo facto suspectum est" (Gerson, de Distinct. Ver. Mir.).

Of miracles of this class no instances are given us by the early fathers in their general notices of the deeds of mercy wrought by the true disciples of Christ, and we have to pass on to the more detailed accounts of later times. The raising of the siege of Nisibis well illustrates the protective power which living saints were enabled to exercise. Sapor II. of Persia was besieging the city. The inhabitants in their alarm appealed to their bishop, St. James. In answer to the supplications he offered, swarms of gnats attacked the besiegers, their horses and elephants, irritating both the latter to such a pitch of frenzy that they broke loose. To increase his discomfiture the Persian king mistook the bishop, when he appeared on the walls in his purple and with his diadem on his head, for the Roman emperor, and thereupon raised the siege (Acta SS. ad d. 15 Jul.). According to Theophanes (Chronographia, pp. 52, 53) the bishop's prayers had the further result of bringing famine and pestilence upon the besiegers when returned to their own land; with this miracle we may compare the deliverance of Paris from the Huns through the prayers of St. Geneviève (Acta SS. ad d. 3 Jan.). The miracle wrought by Gregory Thaumaturgus on the banks of the river Lycus furnishes an instance of the exercise of this power in another direction. The bishop having been appealed to by the inhabitants of a certain district to deliver them from the calamities to which they were from time to time exposed through the overflowing of the river Lycus, made a journey to the place, and, invoking the name of Christ, planted his staff at the particular spot where the stream was wont to burst through the mound which had been erected on its bank to prevent its encroachments. The staff became a tree; the water rose as usual, but henceforth never passed the tree (Gregory of Nyssa, t. ii. pp. 991, 992). This miracle had its ethical result in the conversion of the inhabitants who were heathens (Newman, on Mir. p. xxvii.; Fleury, vi. c. 14). Similar miracles were wrought by Hilarion at Epidamnus (Gretser, de Cruce, ii. 63), by Severinus, A.D. 475, in Noricum (ibid. Acta SS. ad d. 8 Jan.), by Fridian, A.D. 578, at Lucca (Greg. M. Dial. iii. 9), and by Attala, A.D. 627, a monk of Bobio, in Italy (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.).

As a rule the miracles we read of as belonging to this class were confined to a narrow sphere of beneficence, having been wrought for the good of small communities, and frequently individuals. Thus we find St. Hilary cleansing the Insula Gallinaria (Isola d'Arbenga) of serpents (Fortunatus in Migne, Patrol. Lat. ix. 190); St. Martin of Tours, when in his missionary zeal he had set fire to a heathen temple, successfully repelling the flames from an adjoining house (Newman, on Mir. p. xxxiv.); St. Maur walking on the water to save the life of his friend Placidius (Greg. M. Dial. ii. 7); Germanus of Auxerre restoring a stolen valise to its owner (Acta SS. ad d. 31 Jul.; Vie du grand St. Germain); St. Benedict of Nursia (Greg. M. Dial. ii. 6), and Leutfred, abbat of a monastery near Evreux, A.D. 738 (Acta SS. Ben. saec. iii. pt. 1), causing iron to swim; Honoratus, abbat of Fondi, A.D. 550, by the sign of the cross, arresting on the hill-side a huge fragment of rock which threatened in its fall to overwhelm his monastery (Greg. M. Dial. i. 1; Gretser. de Cruce, iv. 57).

In special connexion with their needs, whether on their missionary journeys, or at home, we may note the miraculous power monks possessed of causing water to flow in dry places by the simple expedient of plantiug a staff in the ground or of striking it, or, as the case might be, the rock with a rod—examples of which we find in the lives of Richarius, abbat of Centulles, A.D. 645 (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.), Furseius of Lagny, A.D. 650 (ibid.) and Wulfram of Sens (Acta SS. Ben. saec. iii. pt. 1)—, as well as of multiplying wine or beer in the cask—of the exercise of which gift numerous instances occur in the Acta SS. Benedict.—and of quenching the flames when fire had chanced to break out in a monastery or convent, as may be seen in the Lives of Sulpicius of Bourges, A.D. 644 (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.), and Leutfred of Evreux (ibid. saec. iii. pt. 1).

2. Miracles of power, wrought, (1) In confirmation of Christianity, (2) of orthodoxy, (3) In punishment of evildoers, (4) In illustration of gifts bestowed upon men in reward for pious enterprises.

The ethical character which attaches to such miracles as find a place in one or other of these categories proves them to be not only exhibitions of power (δυνάμεις), but also signs (σημεῖα).

The forms which miracles of power assumed in the early church were, as has been said, the speaking with tongues, prevision of events, and the seeing of visions. With regard to the gift of tongues—one of no long continuance in the church—it may suffice to quote the words of Irenaeus: καθὼς καὶ πολλῶν ἀκούομεν ἀδελφῶν ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ προφητικὰ ἐχόντων καὶ πανταδαπαῖς γλώσσαις λαλούντων: and with regard to that of prevision—a gift which on the contrary was long continued to the saints of the Church—we may give, as far as primitive times are concerned, the testimony of the same writer: οἱ δὲ πρόγνωσιν ἔχουσι τῶν μελλόντων (Contra Haer. ii. 32). The gift of seeing visions—one of no shorter duration, but of far wider significance than the last named—we reserve for consideration by itself. Of other miracles of power such as later saints wrought, whether as signs or as simple wonders (τέρατα), and of which examples will now be given, we find no mention in the writings of the early fathers concerning the church of their times.

(1) Amongst miracles wrought in confirmation of Christianity we may place those which Gregory Thaumaturgus performed upon the occasion of his being forced, through storm and the approaching fall of night, to take refuge, together with his companions in travel, in a heathen temple which happened to be famous for its oracles. Having invoked the name of Christ and signed the cross, the bishop, we read, spent the night in praising God. In the morning the priest of the temple found upon his arrival that the demons had forsaken their shrine. Gregory informed him that he could bring them back as well as expel them. Challenged to perform the former feat, he wrote upon a piece of paper the words "Gregory to Satan—enter," and handed them to the priest who placed them upon the altar. Forthwith the demons gave evidence of their return. To satisfy the priest still farther as to the truth of Christianity, Gregory accepted a challenge to move, by means of his word alone, a large stone which happened to lie near. He at once moved it, and thus convinced his opponent (Newman, on Mir. xxvi.). Hilarion wrought a remarkable miracle of this class at Gaza. A Christian named Italicus, who bred horses for the chariot-races, applied to Hilarion to help him against a rival who made use of magic to check the speed of Italicus's horses, and thus to secure the victory for his own steeds. The saint, although at first unwilling to lend his aid in so trivial a matter, acceded to the request and sent Italicus the vessel he was wont to use in drinking filled with water, wherewith horses, chariot, and charioteers were to be sprinkled. This done, the Christian's horses, flying like the wind, easily won the race. Whereupon the pagan party raised a loud shout: "Marnas (their god) is conquered by Jesus Christ" (Fleury, xii. 17; cf. Hieron. Ep. 7, ad Laet.). Of this class also is the miracle St. Martin of Tours wrought, in answer to a challenge from a pagan, in averting from himself by the sign of the cross a falling pine (Sulp. Sev. Vita Mart. 10; Fleury, xvi. 31).

(2) As confirmatory of orthodoxy we may note two miracles which St. Arnulph, who was put to death at Rheims in the beginning of the 6th century, wrought when in Spain. Having received a command from the king of the Visigoths, who wished to test the saint's powers, to rid the land of a serpent whose breath was of so fiery a nature as apparently to dry up water, St. Arnulph was conducted to the serpent's lair, where he laid his stola upon the head of the monster, and bidding him follow led him to a pond and forbade him ever to leave it or thenceforth to injure any living creature. In the same pond lay the body of a man who had died a violent death. Upon the saint's approach the dead man prayed to be delivered from his miserable resting-place. St. Arnulph at once raised him and buried him in a fitting grave. These miracles made such an impression upon the king and his courtiers that they forsook their Arianism and accepted the Catholic faith (Acta SS. ad d. 18 Jul.).

(3) As an example of a miracle wrought in punishment of evildoers we may take the following. When St. Willibrord, A.D. 739, was on a missionary journey, he with his company sought rest one day in a field. The owner of the land proceeded to drive him away, refusing to listen to his remonstrances or to drink with him in token of amity. "Then," exclaimed the saint, "drink not." Consequently the man lost the power of drinking while suffering all the pangs of thirst, nor did he regain it till he had confessed his sin to the saint upon his return in the course of a year (Acta SS. Ben. saec. iii. pt. 1).

(4) In illustration of the gifts bestowed upon men for their enterprise and piety, we may refer to the miracles of power St. Benedict of Nursia wrought, the record of which is to be found in the second book of pope Gregory's Dialogues, e.g. the saint's defeat of an attempt made to poison him (ii. 3); his miraculous detection of an infraction of the monastic rules on the part of some of his monks (ii. 12), and of theft on the part of a messenger (ii. 18); his enabling two monks to carry a heavy fragment of rock (ii. 9); with which miracles we may compare others of the same class wrought by St. Columban (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.).

As instances of miracles of power falling in none of the above categories, and appearing rather in the light of simple wonders, we may note the following: St. Macarius the elder, A.D. 356, causes a human skull he found in the desert to speak (Acta SS. ad d. 11 Jan.; Fleury xiii. 38), and Severinus of Noricum, A.D. 475, a dead priest (Acta SS. ad d. 8 Jan.); St. Mary the Egyptian, A.D. 421, after signing the cross walks on the waters of the Jordan (A. Butler's Lives of the Saints, s. v.); Hermenlandus, abbat of a monastery near Nantes, A.D. 720, by the use of the same means lights his lamp (Acta SS. Ben. saec. iii. pt. i.), and St. Gudule of Brussels, A.D. 712, by prayer her candle (Acta SS. ad d. 8 Jan.), while likewise after prayer two monks of Bobio are able to carry the trunk of a large tree (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.).

Before quitting the subject of wonders wrought by living saints we shall do well to note first, the aspect in which the workers of miracles regarded their achievements, and the causes to which they attributed them. When no answer was accorded to his prayers respecting the cures he was called upon to perform, Pachomius used to comfort himself with the reflection that often God shews more favour in refusing than in granting our requests (Fleury, xv. 60). Germanus of Auxerre displayed a like humility in attributing the cures he worked to the means he employed, and not least to the relics he bore about his person (Vie du grand St. Germain, par Dom Viole). Secondly, we may note the acknowledgment on the part of those who fully believed in and themselves recorded contemporary miracles, that those who wrought them were liable to be unduly elated by their own performances. Thus pope Gregory reminds Augustine, in respect of the miracles that saint had wrought in England, that the working of miracles was no requisite for obtaining a place amongst the elect (Ep. xi. 28).

II. Wonders wrought by Relics.

The relics of a saint perpetuated the benefits which the saint himself during his lifetime had conferred upon those who stood in need of healing or succour. [RELICS.] The translation, again, of a saint's body, for the purpose of obtaining for it a safer or more honourable resting-place, frequently gave rise to a display of its thaumaturgic virtues (e.g. Translatio S. Severini, Acta SS. ad d. 8 Jan.). We must note that, unlike those which were wrought by living saints, miracles due to relics form no continuous chain reaching from the earliest to the latest portion of our period, originating as they did in the latter half of the 4th century. The church, however, was prepared to believe in the working of miracles by relics through the operation of various causes: first, by the regard she had long paid to the remains of martyrs; secondly by the association of these remains—placed as they were beneath the altars of churches—with the mysteries: "Episcopus, qui super mortuorum hominum, Petri et Pauli, secundum nos, ossa veneranda . . . offert Domino sacrificia, et tumulos eorum, Christi altaria arbitratur" (Hieronym. ii, adv. Vigil. p. 153); thirdly, by the prevalence of a notion, of heathen origin, that the souls of the departed lingered about the graves in which the bodies rested (Lactant. ii. 2; Greg. M. Dial. ii. 38). Perhaps also in accounting for a readiness to believe in the virtue of that which was inanimate and possessed no powers of volition, we must not wholly eliminate even from the mind of the populace the effect of the teaching of philosophy that the Deity Himself wrought by inherent virtue rather than by will—φύσει οὐ βουλήσει; —while as an influence acting immediately and most effectually in bringing about this belief we must place the example of notable men such as Ambrose, Augustine, Basil and Chrysostom.

1. Miracles of beneficence. (1) Exorcism, healing; (2) Raising the dead; (3) Deliverance, protection, succour.

(1) Exorcisms and miraculous cures wrought. 1. By the bodies of saints. 2. By objects brought into contact with or proximity to the bodies of saints, living or dead. (a) The garments of saints or other objects possessed by saints. (b) Cloths laid upon the bodies of dead saints. (c) The candles which illuminated or the lamps which were suspended above the tomb of a saint. (d) The dust which gathered upon the tomb. (e) Water with which the tomb was washed. (f) The fabric and furniture of the church which held the relics.

1. By saints' bodies.

Many miracles were wrought by St. Stephen's relics.[a] And first upon their discovery at Caphargamala near Jerusalem, in consequence of a twofold revelation. The town of Calama had possessed relics of St. Stephen for about eight years, and that of Hippo for less than two years, when St. Augustine made the assertion that many books would have to be written in order to recount all the miracles of healing—to say nothing of others—which had been wrought by means of these relics during this space of time in the two districts of Calama and Hippo, and that of those which had taken place in the latter district alone nearly seventy accounts had already been written (De Civ. Dei, xxii. 8, § 20).

For further examples of miraculous cures wrought by saints' bodies we may refer to the following instances: the cures which took place at Milan, after the discovery made by St. Ambrose of the bodies of SS. Gervasius and Protasius, of the blind Severus [RELICS, p. 1769], and of demoniacs and other sick people upon their touching the cloths which lay upon the relics, or by means of the shadow the relics cast when borne through the streets of the town (Ambros. Ep. xxii. 9); the healing of a leper at Alexandria by the body of Elisha, A.D. 456 (Theoph. 176); the cure of a blind man who on touching the covering of the bier of St. Theuderius found blood flow from his eyes and received sight (Ado Viennensis in Migne, Patrol. Lat. cxxiii. 447); of a blind woman at the funeral of St. Aigulphus of Lerins, A.D. 675 (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.); of five blind persons and two with shrunken limbs, at St. Martin's tomb at Tours (Greg. Turon. de Mir. Mart. i. 12, 25; ii. 44, 58; iv. 42); of a palsied man at the tomb of Germanus, bishop of Paris (De Gloriâ Confessor. 90); frequent cures of ague at the tomb of St. Geneviève (ib. 91); one of toothache at that of St. Medard near Soissons (ib. 95); and various miracles of healing wrought by St. John Baptist's head at Emesa (Theoph. 685).

2. By objects brought into contact with, or proximity to, the bodies of saints, living or dead.

Miracles wrought by such means were, according to Gregory the Great, likely to make a deeper impression upon the popular mind than those which were wrought by the actual bodies of saints (Dial. ii. 38); and for this reason: in the latter case they might be regarded as wrought, in answer to prayer by the saint himself whose spirit was supposed to hover about its former tenement.

(a) Saints' garments or possessions.

The tunic of St. John the Evangelist, preserved in Rome, worked many miracles (Vita Greg. M. auctore Jo. Diacono, lib. iii. 59). The shoes of St. Gall, A.D. 646, healed a man, to whom they were given after the saint's death, of contraction of the limbs (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.); those of St. Cuthbert, A.D. 687, one afflicted with paralysis (ibid.). The bed on which St. Gertrude, abbess of a convent at Nivelles in Brabant, A.D. 658, had been wont to sleep, wrought cures (ibid.), as did also the fringe or threads of a chasuble which Nicetius, bishop of Lyons, had worn (Greg. Turon. de Vita Patr. viii. 5). The keys of St. Peter wrought many cures at Rome, "super aegros positae multis solent miraculis coruscare" (Greg. M. Ep. i. 26, 30, 31).

[a] So many indeed were wrought in the course of the ages as to give rise to a proverb: "Whoever pretends to have read all the miracles of St. Stephen, he lies" (Freculphus apud Basnage, Hist. des Juifs, tom. viii. p. 249, Gibbon, xxviii.).

(b) Cloths laid upon the bodies of dead saints.

From the habit of regarding cloths (BRANDEA) which had been laid upon the bodies of dead saints in order to obtain virtue from them, as possessed of properties equally miraculous with those of the body itself, it is frequently difficult, in the absence of any specific term, to determine whether the terms generally used to designate relics refer to the actual remains of the saints, or to objects which had been brought into contact with or proximity to them, and amongst these to relics manufactured, so to speak, like the brandea. To give an instance of cloths thus transmuted into relics, cloths were laid upon the face of Meletius of Antioch, on the occasion of his funeral at Constantinople, A.D. 381, and distributed amongst the people as prophylactics (Fleury, xviii. 2). And in a less formal manner handkerchiefs (oraria) and garments in use were cast upon relics, e.g. upon those of SS. Gervasius and Protasius (Ambr. Ep. xxii. 9), in order to invest them with remedial properties. We read also that threads frayed from a handkerchief (facietergium) which had been used to cover the face of Nicetius, bishop of Lyons, on the day of his death, when laid upon an altar, cured an epileptic who prayed before it (Greg. Turon. de Vit. Patr. viii. 8).

(c) The candles which illuminated, or lamps which were suspended above the tomb of a saint. [OIL, HOLY.]

(d) The dust which gathered upon the tomb, the ordinary method of administering which was to give it mixed with water as a drink.

Dust from the tomb of St. Hilary of Poitiers was the means of cleansing two lepers, bestowing sight upon a blind person, and soundness of limb upon two persons afflicted with withered hands (Fortunatus in Migne, Patrol. Lat. cxcv. 6, 7; Acta &c. ad d. 13 Jan.). Dust from the tomb of martyrs in Lyons, when gathered in a spirit of true faith, cured the infirm (Greg. Turon. de Gl. Martyr. i. 50), as also that from the tomb of Modoaldus, bishop of Treves, A.D. 640 circ. (Acta SS. ad d. 12 Maii). By dust from St. Martin's tomb at Tours, Avitus, bishop of Auvergne, and two youths got cured of fever, several persons of dysentery, and Gregory of Tours himself of a violent fit of faceache, of the pangs of which the bishop betrays a lively remembrance in the eulogy he passes upon this particular form of the Turonensian relics: "O theriacam inenarrabilem! O pigmentum ineffabile! O antidotum laudabile! O purgatorium, ut ita dicam, coeleste!" (de Mir. S. Mart. ii. 51; iii. 60).

(e) Water with which the tomb was washed.

During the prevalence at Tours of the epidemic already mentioned, several persons were cured of dysentery by the water with which St. Martin's tomb was washed in preparation for Easter (Greg. Turon. de Mir. S. Mart. ii. 51). Similar curative virtues attached to the water with which the corpse of a saint had been washed; instance the cure of a demoniac by this means (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.; Vita S. Cuthberti).

(f) The fabric and furniture of the church which held the relics.

A boy suffering from the effects of a poisoned dart was cured upon kissing the threshold of St. Martin's basilica, in accordance with a well-known ecclesiastical custom, prevalent alike in the East and West, and alluded to by Chrysostom (tom. xxx. in ii. ad Cor.) and Prudentius (Hymnus de S. Laurentio). Sidonius Apollinaris (Ep. i. 5) tells a friend that he lost the sense of his debility when prostrate upon the threshold of the Vatican basilica in Rome. In the neighbourhood of Bordeaux, horses were cured of disease by being marked with the key of the door of a chapel which was dedicated to St. Martin, and which held his relics (Greg. Turon. de Mir. S. Mart. iii. 33).

(2) Raising the dead.

For examples of this wonder as wrought by means of relics, see RELICS, p. 1777. To these we may add the instance of a man who was raised to life at the tomb of St. Geneviève of Paris (Greg. Turon. de Gl. Confess. 91).

(3) Deliverance, protection, succour.

The belief in the efficacy of relics to secure, whether for the individual believer or the whole population of a city, deliverance from or protection against all ills, was equally prevalent, and of the same date as to its origin with the belief in their curative virtues.

As instances of this belief, we may note that the inhabitants of Rome regarded the relics of SS. Peter and Paul as safeguards to their city. [PATRON SAINTS.] In the same light the people of Nisibis regarded the relics of their bishop, St. James, attributing, indeed, to the removal of them by Julian the loss of their town to the Persians (Fleury, xv. 44).

As examples of actual deliverance from danger arising respectively from hostile assault, infectious disease, inundations, and storms, we may mention the following instances. When a band of rebellious monks belonging to the monastery of St. Sabas in Palestine were on their way to attack the monastery, they were seized with blindness, and unable to reach their destination. This deliverance of the abbat and his party was attributed to the presence of the relics of St. Sabas (Fleury, xxxiii. 3). In the time of Gregory of Tours, the populations of several districts of Gaul were visited with a plague of an infectious character, amongst these, the province of Prima Germania. The town of Rheims, however, escaped, by virtue of the pall or covering of St. Remigius's tomb, which was carried in procession, with the accompaniment of crosses and candles, round the town (Greg. Turon. de Gl. Confess. 79). Gregory himself, when the disease had reached Auvergne, sought and obtained protection against it at the tomb of St. Julian (de Mir. Martyr. ii. 45). On the occasion of an inundation, caused by the overflowing of the Adige, at Verona, in the 6th century, a large crowd assembled in the church, and before the tomb of St. Zeno, bishop of Verona (Martyr. Rom. 12 April.), to beseech his protection. The waters surged up round the edifice to the height of the windows, blocking up the door, but did not penetrate into the church or endanger the lives of the supplicants (Greg. M. Dial. iii. 19). By the erection of a shrine with the usual accompaniment of relics, the frequenters of a festival held yearly in the Cevennes, were delivered from storms which had become a matter of certain occurrence on the occasion (Greg. Turon. de Gl. Conf. 2).

Besides affording deliverance from, and protection against, ills, relics could confer positive benefits. Thus at Nursia in Umbria, the carrying of the robe of Eutychius, formerly abbat of a neighbouring monastery, round the fields, in seasons of drought, invariably produced rain (Greg. M. Dial. iii. 15).

This belief in the miraculous virtues of relics led to the practice of carrying relics, as the Jews of old their ark, into battle. Thus the Frankish princes required their army chaplains to carry them at the head of their forces (Carlomanni, capit. i. ann. 742, c. 2; Caroli M. capit. viii. anu. 803); Chilperic had them carried before him when he entered Paris (Greg. Turon. vi. 27); and an Eastern king, according to a story Gregory of Tours repeats, went so far as to insert the thumb of St. Sergius in his own right arm, and was able, as a reward for his faith, by raising his arm, to conquer his enemies (Hist. vii. 31). And apart from this public and official use of relics, many were wont to carry them about their person for their own individual protection against dangers in general, especially such as might arise in travelling. Gregory of Tours illustrated the practice and the benefit resulting from it in his own case. When he was on a journey from Burgundy to Auvergne, a thunderstorm came on. Plucking some relics he carried from his bosom he held them up in the direction of an ominous-looking cloud. The cloud parted in two, and no harm befell the travellers (de Gl. Martyr. i. 84). Upon another occasion he extinguished a fire by producing a cross, which contained relics of the Virgin, the Apostles, and St. Martin (de Gl. Martyr. i. 11). In Gregory the Great's epistles frequent mention is made of relics being sent by that prelate to various individuals, amongst these to Childebert, Rechared, and Constantina, the wife of the emperor Maurice, which were to be worn round the neck as safeguards against physical ills, and for the sake of the spiritual benefit they were calculated to bestow, e.g. (1) keys of St. Peter, together with which, as a rule, was included a minute portion of his chains (Ep. i. 26, 30, 31, iii. 48, vi. 6, ix. 52, 122, xii. 7); (2) chains of St. Paul, i.e. particles filed off from (Ep. iv. 30); (3) crosses, containing relics, e.g. (a) particles of St. Peter's chains (Ep. iii. 33), (b) wood of the cross, and hair of the Baptist (Ep. ix. 122); (4) the gridiron, i.e. pieces of, on which St. Lawrence was tortured to death (Ep. iii. 33). With this use of relics as safeguards we may compare the like practice of wearing a portion (lectio) of the gospels suspended round the neck for the sake of protection (Jo. Chrysost. tom. xix. ad Antioch.), and of placing one on the head to obtain a cure (Aug. in Johan. c. 7).

2. Miracles of Power wrought by Relics. (1) In attestation of the righteousness of the innocent, and the guilt of the wrong-doer. (2) In punishment of those who treated relics with contempt, and appearing in either case in the light of signs.

(1) Gregory of Tours relates the two following instances: A priest who had taken refuge in the church of St. Martin at Tours, and was there put into chains, was proved to be innocent by the fact that his chains fell off him, and could not be made to remain on him when replaced (de Mir. S. Mart. i. 23). On the other hand, a priest who had falsely asserted his innocence before the tomb of St. Maximin in Troves fell down dead (de Gl. Conf. 93). For a similar instance occurring in Bourges, see Greg. Turon. de Gl. Martyr. i. 34, and for another in Milan, Fleury, xxi. 54; and compare pope Gregory's words: "Ad extincta nunque eorum corpora . . . perjuri veniunt et daemonio vexantur" (Dial. iv. 6).

(2) The power of relics to punish those who treated them with contempt is thus illustrated. When the relics of St. Babylas, bishop of Antioch, had been removed at the emperor Julian's command from Daphne, where their presence was supposed to render dumb the oracles of Apollo, the temple of Apollo caught fire, and no traces of it were left, A.D. 354 (Ruf. i. 35, 36; Sozom. v. 18, 19; Theoph. pp. 78, 77). During the troubles with which the 6th century drew to its close in France, a basilica which stood near Agen, on the Garonne, and held the relics of the martyr Vincentius (of that town), was set on fire. Of those who had done the deed, some were seized with madness, some were scorched with lightning, some inflicted wounds on themselves, some drowned themselves in the river, and others were tormented with various diseases (Greg. Turon. vii. 35; de Gl. Martyr. i. 105). We read of similar judgments in the instance of a count, who threatened to fire St. Martin's basilica (de Mir. S. Mart. ii. 27); a councillor who had suggested the partial demolition of a church (de Gl. Martyr. i. 92); a man who neglected to deliver relics when warned in dreams to do so (i. 42); a queen who stole some (Eddius, 33–38; Robertson, Ch. Hist. ii. 67); a Lombard who was about to make an incision in a key of St. Peter's (Greg. M. Ep. vii. 26); a band of Lombards who attempted to drag some monks away from a tomb (Dial. i. 4).

Other miracles of this class may be regarded in the light of wonders, such, for instance, as indicate the possession on the part of relics of a power (1) to postpone, with reference to themselves, the process of decay. Thus Hilarion's body ten months after death was wholly free from corruption and gave forth a sweet fragrance (Jer. t. ii.; Newman, on Mir. p. xxxii.). When the body of Amandus, bishop of Maestricht, A.D. 679, was translated, forty years after its burial, it was found to have so little perished in the interim that blood flowed from the gums when some teeth were extracted, while the beard and nails had actually grown (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.). See also in reference to St. Euphemia, Evagr. ii. 3; Fleury, xxviii. 1. (2) To increase in bulk, e.g.: Some dust taken from St. Martin's tomb at Tours so increased in quantity as to fill, and even force its way through the lid of, the box in which it had been placed (Greg. Turon. viii. 15). (3) To exercise a will and purpose. When the corpse of St. Theuderius was borne out to burial, it could be moved in no other direction than that of the saint's monastery (Ado Viennensis in Migne, Patrol. Lat. cxxiii. 448). (4) To vindicate their sanctity. Gregory the Great alludes to a story current about his predecessor St. Leo, who, to convince some who were sceptical on the subject of such relics, tore a "brandeum" with a pair of pincers. From the rent thus made blood flowed (Ep. iv. 30). All that is here said of other relics may be said of relics of the Holy Cross.

III. Wonders wrought by the Eucharist.

Partly from the solemnity of the rite, and partly from its intimate connexion as a mark of church membership with the doctrines of the Catholic faith, the miracles which were wrought by the Eucharist appear in the light of signs and of punitive miracles rather than, or at least as often as, in the light of works of mercy, whereas in the case of those wrought by saintly agency or the means we have hitherto noticed, miracles of beneficence preponderate over those of an opposite description. Especially, too, must we note that the miracles the Eucharist wrought, it wrought not only as a sacrament, but as that of the Catholic faith in contradistinction to the rite and in condemnation of the doctrines, of an heretical creed.

1. Miracles of beneficence. (1) Exorcism, healing; (2) Deliverance, protection, succour.

(1) A girl possessed of an evil spirit upon receiving the Eucharist from St. Austregisile of Bourges, A.D. 624, at once ceased to shout and rave (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.); and a singer in a church choir upon receiving it from Sulpicius, bishop of the same see, A.D. 644, revived when exhausted and in a prostrate condition from a conflict with demons (ibid.). The slaves and cattle of a tribune at Hippo were freed from sufferings inflicted by demons upon their owner's partaking of the Eucharist (Aug. de Civ. Dei, xxii. 8, § 6). (2) By means of the Eucharist a child was preserved from perishing by fire. At the time of the occurrence of the miracle—the reign of Justinian—it was customary to distribute amongst the young children of Christian parents such fragments of the Eucharistic bread as remained after communion. [EULOGIAE.] By accident a Jewish child, mingling with his Christian companions, received and ate one of these fragments. The father of the boy—a glass-blower by trade—was so enraged that he shut his son into his furnace in order not only to kill him but to destroy all traces of him. The child, however, was saved, and the miracle had its ethical result in the conversion of the mother, who was baptized together with her child (Migne, Dict. des Proph. et des Mirac. t. i. p. 641). The virtues of the Eucharist, as a means of succour, extended even to the dead. A young monk in St. Benedict's monastery, who had gone on a visit to his parents without obtaining the customary blessing from the saint before quitting the monastery, died on the day of his return. After burial his body was found to have been displaced and, when reburied, again displaced. St. Benedict then ordered it to be buried with the Host laid upon it, after which the corpse reposed in peace (Greg. M. Dial. ii. 24).

2. Miracles of power wrought (1) In condemnation of immorality; (2) of heresy.

(1) Gregory of Tours relates that as a deacon —a man of unholy life—was one day carrying the Eucharist into a church, the bread flew out of his hands and placed itself on the altar (De Glorid Martyr. i. 86). In the time of St. Liudger, bishop of Münster in Westphalia, A.D. 809, a woman, living in illicit connexion with a priest, sent a jar of honey to a church, where it was placed behind the altar. As soon as the bishop, who was officiating on the occasion, began the mass, the jar broke (Acta SS. Ben. saec. iv. pt. 1). (2) Certain members of the Donatist sect, in token of their contempt for the Catholics, once ordered the Eucharistic bread to be given to their dogs. Upon eating it the dogs went mad and bit their masters (Optatus Milev. de Schism. Donatist. bk. vi.). A woman receiving some of the Eucharistic bread of the Macedonians, to her alarm found that it had turned into stone (Sozomen, viii. 5; Theoph. 120).

As a wonder or prodigy wrought by the Eucharist we may note that according to Greg. of Tours (Hist. vi. 21), the Host on one occasion shed blood when broken.

The consecrated bread set aside and reserved [RESERVATION] was credited with similar if not equal powers of working miracles with that partaken of in communion. As constituting a means of grace, it was sinful to treat it from whatever motives with indifference, as may be seen from the following incident. A bishop named Marsius upon receiving the Eucharist from the hands of Melanius, bishop of Rennes, A.D. 530, let his portion fall into the folds of his robe, deeming it a mark of superior sanctity not to break his fast. The bread turned into a snake, which wreathed itself tightly round the bishop's waist and could not be got rid of till Melanius had spent a night in supplication on the sufferer's behalf, when it reverted to its original condition, in which form Marsius thankfully ate it (Acta SS. ad d. 6 Jan.).

Miracles were also wrought by holy baptism. St. Augustine (de Civ. Dei, xxii. 8, § 4) mentions the miraculous effect of baptism upon a surgeon afflicted with gout. St. Augustine further relates that an actor was cured of paralysis by this rite (§ 5). Theophanes records a similar cure in the instance of a Jew (Chronograph. 127). Sight was bestowed upon Othilia, afterwards an abbess in Alsace, on her baptism (Martyr. Rom. 13 Dec.). As a miracle of power, Theophanes relates that when Deuterius, an Arian bishop, A.D. 502, was about to baptize a catechumen after the Arian formula, "in the name of the Father in the Son," the water in the piscina suddenly dried up (Chronograph. 234).

IV. Wonders wrought by Pictures and Images.

(a) Pictures and images of our Lord and the saints.

In the controversy which was raised in the first half of the 8th century respecting pictures, one argument put forward in favour of their use was the fact that they possessed miraculous virtues. Heaven, it was urged, had wrought many miracles by means of pictures. Cures had been effected, charms broken, visions had been accorded. To this purport pleads Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople, in a letter addressed, A.D. 726, to Thomas, bishop of Claudiopolis (Acta Concil. Nicaen. ii. Actio iv. in Mansi, xiii.). Such miracles, however, were confined to representations of our blessed Lord and the saints.

1. Miracles of beneficence. (1) Healing; (2) Protection, succour.

(1) A picture of the Virgin Mary at Sozopolis

in Pisidia was wont to shed, at the point where the hand of the Virgin was represented, a sweet-smelling ointment. To this picture Germanus especially alludes as one whose miraculous virtues were attested by numerous witnesses (Mansi, xiii.; Fleury, xlii. 2). For the statue at Caesarea Philippi, see JESUS CHRIST, REPRESENTATION OF, p. 877. An image of our Lord on the cross which stood near the great gate of the imperial palace at Constantinople was supposed to possess miraculous virtues, and in fact was believed to have wrought a cure of hemorrhage similar to that mentioned in the Gospels. To the adoration paid to it on this score it owed indeed its destruction by the emperor Leo III. (Maimbourg, Histoire de l'Hérésie des Iconoclastes; Fleury, xlii. 3). John Damascene, after praying before an image of the Virgin, had his right hand, which had been cut off, miraculously restored (Robertson, Ch. Hist. ii. 84, 85).

(2) The victories which Heraclius won over the Persians were attributed to the fact of his carrying at the head of his legions images of our Lord and the Virgin Mary (Maimbourg, u. s.; cf. Fleury, xxxvii. 3); and the repulse of a Saracen army from the walls of Nicaea, A.D. 718, to the possession by that city of images of the saints (Theoph. 624, 625). For the destruction of the war machines of the Persians at the siege of Edessa, A.D. 621, by means of a portrait of Christ; see IMAGES.

2. Miracles of power.

A Jew stole a picture of our Lord from a church, and in token of his contempt for and hatred of the Person it represented, transfixed it with a dart. Forthwith blood began to flow from the picture, and in such quantity as to cover the Jew from head to foot. Whereupon he resolved to burn it, but the blood it had shed enabled its rightful owners to trace and bring condign punishment upon the thief (Sigeberti Gemblac. Chronicon, A.D. 560 in Migne, Patrol. Lat. clx. 105).

(b) Images of the cross.

As the portrait of a saint became endowed with miraculous powers by reason of the holiness of the individual therein portrayed, so representations of the cross obtained as such some measure at least of the virtues which attached to the true cross itself. Miracles of beneficence, healing, protection, succour, are attributed to such ordinary crosses, exactly similar to those attributed to the true cross itself. See Gretser, de Cruce, and his Hortus Crucis.

V. Wonders wrought by Celestial Visitants.

1. Miracles of beneficence. (1) Healing; (2) Deliverance, protection, succour.

(1) St. Cuthbert, bishop of Lindisfarne, A.D. 687, was cured of weakness in his knee by an angel who appeared to him on horseback (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.); and a nun in a convent at Pauvilly, in Normandy, of an ulcer in her throat after the hand of some invisible personage had been placed in support of her head, and a vision had been subsequently accorded to her of one clothed in the white robes of a virgin (Vita S. Austrebertae, Acta SS. Ben. saec. iii. pt. 1). In short we may say that whatever wonders were attributed to living saints were also attributed to celestial visitants.

As wonders wrought by celestial visitants we may class (a) the presentation by them of gifts, e.g. of a magnificent vestment which the Virgin Mary presented to Ildefonsus, bishop of Toledo, to be worn on her festivals, in reward for his defence of the doctrine of her perpetual virginity (Baron. ad ann. 657. 53, 56; Robertson, ii. 58); (b) directions given by angels in visions or dreams respecting the building of churches or monasteries in all instances in which the miraculous was not confined to the apparition itself. Thus when the archangel Michael had thrice appeared, A.D. 709, to a bishop named Autbertus, bidding him found a church to his honour on the mount now known as St. Michael's mount, on the coast of Normandy, the bishop found a confirmation of the superhuman nature of the behest in the fulfilment of an appointed sign, and further instruction as to the exact dimensions of the church in its lines being left untouched by the dew which covered the top of the mount (Appar. S. Michaelis, Acta SS. Ben. saec. iii. pt. 1).

VI. Wonders wrought apart from Human or Angelic Agency or the above-named Means.

Wonders of this kind, consisting as they do largely of instances of providential interference, whether merciful or punitive, rank in a different class from those wrought by saints or their relics, or by sacraments in contradiction to the laws of nature. Those, too, which are best attested are perhaps the least marvellous, although in different degrees—those which are most miraculous rest on manifestly insufficient testimony. Such phenomena as the fall of a shower, the death of an heresiarch, the interruption of a work by storm and volcanic disturbance, the apparition of a cross in the sky, may now be viewed, some as special providences, others as extraordinary coincidences; but at the time of their occurrence they were one and all unquestionably regarded as interpositions of Providence, intended to supply the needs or to confound the enemies of the faithful; and as such it is probable that they were deemed no less miraculous than many wonders wrought by living saints or by their relics after them; while many possessed the advantage of being widely known, whereas the knowledge of the others was often confined to the narrow sphere in which they had been wrought. With regard to such wonders as were rather of the nature of marvels or prodigies, it was different; of these some were in a measure signs, denoting as they did the piety of a saint when living, or the holiness of his memory when dead; many, however, were devoid of all ethical features, and provocative only of wonder, while few were well attested, resting as they often did on the authority of monkish traditions, or the testimony of solitary witnesses.

(a) Miraculous occurrences.

1. Miracles of beneficence. (1) Healing; (2) Deliverance, protection, succour.

(1) A body of Catholics living at Typasa in Mauritania, A.D. 484, for the crime of holding assemblies and refusing to communicate with an heretical bishop, had their right hands amputated and their tongues cut out by the roots by order of Hunneric, the Arian king of the Vandals. The miracle lay in the fact that on the third day they were able to speak as before. Three at least of the narrators of this miracle, viz. Aeneas of Gaza, a rhetorician and philosopher (in Theophrasto), the emperor Justinian (Cod. Justin. i. tit. 30), and count Marcellinus, his former chancellor (Chronic. Marcellin.), were witnesses both of the mutilation inflicted, and the capacity to articulate in the case of some of these martyrs who were living in their time. Marcellinus adds that one of the confessors having been born dumb, spoke for the first time after the excision of his tongue. Procopius (de Bell. Vandal. i. 7) states that two—Gregory I. (Dial. iii. 32) that one—out of their number lost their supernatural power of speech through having lapsed into evil living. No contemporary authority gives the number of the confessors; in an old menology it was fixed at sixty (Victor Vitensis in Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii. 245; Gibbon, xxxvii.; Newman, on Mir. cc.–ccxiii.). Other examples of the preservation of speech after mutilation occur in the instances of Aigulphus of Lerins, A.D. 675, and his companions (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.), and Leger bishop of Autun, A.D. 678 (ibid.); while of miraculous healing of another kind, we find an example in the instance of a band of five Catholic slaves in Africa who, after having been beaten, not once, but on several occasions, almost to death, had their wounds invariably cured by the morrow (Fleury, xxviii. 58).[b]

(2) As an example of protection and succour accorded to large bodies of men, we may take the miracle of the so-called thundering legion. When the emperor Marcus Aurelius was waging war against the Quadri, his troops on one occasion suffered greatly owing to the heat and from thirst. Amongst his soldiers were many Christians. Those who belonged to the Melitene legion fell on their knees in prayer; a shower of rain fell, refreshing and invigorating the Roman army, but terrifying and dispersing the enemy, to whom it had proved a storm of thunder and lightning. Such in the main is the account with which Eusebius (Hist. v. 5) prefaces the original statement of Claudius Apollinaris bishop of Hierapolis, in an apology addressed to Marcus Aurelius, A.D. 176, although no longer extant, and the few words in which Tertullian (Apol. 5, ad Scap. 4) alludes to the event. Dion Cassius (Hist. lxxi.), omitting all reference to the prayers of the Christians, speaks of the occurrence as "a wonderful and providential preservation," which he attributes to magic, as Julius Capitolinus (in Marc. Aurel.) to the emperor's prayers. The event itself is represented, with pagan features in the mode of rendering, on a bas-relief of the Antonine column in Rome. Manifestly, however, it is erroneous to derive the title "thundering legion" from this occurrence, as it already existed and was as old as the time of Augustus. Baronius's explanation (Ann. 176, 20) is that the Christian soldiers were in all parts of the army, and after this were incorporated into the existing thundering legion (Newman, on Mir. cxiii.–cxxii.; Migne, Dict. des Mir. t. i. p. 759).

As examples of protection afforded to individuals we may note the instance of Theotimus, bishop of Tomi, A.D. 400, who became invisible to his pursuers (Fleury, xxi. 5); St. Martin of Tours, the arm of whose assailant fell powerless (Sulp. Sev. Vita, 13); Armogastus, a young Catholic in Theodoric's service, whose limbs were freed from their bonds on his signing the cross and invoking Christ (Fleury, xxviii. 59). Of protection against the fatal effects of poison we find an example in the instance of Sabinus, bishop of Canusium, A.D. 593 (Greg. M. Dial. iii. 5), also of Samson, bishop of Dol, A.D. 565 circ. (Acta SS. Ben. saec. i.); and of miraculous succour, under circumstances of difficulty or absolute want, in the instances of Clovis who, when marching against the Visigoths, was after prayer guided to the right place for crossing the Vienne by a stag which began to ford it (Greg. Turon. ii. 37), and of St. Columban and his companions, who were fed by ravens in a time of famine (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.). Comp. also the instance of a prior in Life of Austregisile (ibid.).

2. Miracles of power. (1) Punitive; (2) Marvels.

(1) Of this class was the fiery eruption on the rebuilding of the Temple of Jerusalem. The emperor Julian had given orders for the rebuilding of the Temple, having entrusted the superintendence of the work to his lieutenant Alypius, and himself issued invitations to the Jews of all countries to assemble at Jerusalem and aid him in accomplishing his purpose. Of the marvellous manner in which the work was interrupted and the imperial designs thwarted, we learn the particulars, some from one writer, some from another. A whirlwind arose, scattering heaps of lime and sand in every direction; a storm of thunder and lightning fell, melting in its violence the implements of the workmen; an earthquake followed, casting up the foundation of the old Temple, filling in the new excavations and causing the fall of buildings, especially the public porticoes beneath which the terrified multitude had sought shelter. When the workmen resumed their labours balls of fire burst out beneath their feet, not once only, but as often as they attempted to continue the undertaking. The fiery mass traversed the streets, repelling from the doors of a church, even with loss of life or limb, those who had fled to it for safety. This miracle has the support of contemporary writers. Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. v. 4), and Ammianus Marcellinus (Hist. xxiii. 1); and of later historians Rufinus (Hist. i. 37), Socrates (iii. 20), Sozomen (v. 22), Theodoret (Hist. Eccl. iii. 20). See Warburton's Julian; Gibbon, c. xxiii.; Newman, on Mir. clxxv.; Migne, Dict. des Mir. t. ii. p. 1115. With regard to the death of Arius, the event was regarded by the Catholic party in general as a direct interposition of Providence in their favour, and in answer to the prayers of the bishop of Constantinople and his clergy, and by Athanasius himself as a sufficient refutation of the Arian heresy (Athanas. Decl. Epist. ad Monachos, 3 Op. v. i. 344; Milman, Hist. of Christianity, bk. III. iv.). Amongst miracles of this class those of an anti-Arian complexion are indeed conspicuous. We may instance the story of an Arian bishop who was struck blind when about to force his way into a Catholic church (Greg. M. Dial. iii. 29); of a man who, when counterfeiting blindness at the instigation of an Arian bishop who wished to display his pretended powers of healing, became actually blind (Greg. Turon. ii. 3); and pope Gregory's account of the prodigies which attended the re-consecration for purposes of orthodox worship of an Arian church at Rome (Dial. iii. 30). For further examples of Divine judgments—for as such they were regarded at the time (Socr. vi. 19; Sozom. viii. 27)—we may refer to the various accidents, unwonted illnesses and sudden deaths which took place at Constantinople, A.D. 404, after the persecution which was raised against St. Chrysostom (Fleury, xxi. 48). That Divine visitations were not confined to this side of the grave, see Greg. M. Dial. iv. 51, 53, 54.

[b] These cases of recovered speech after mutilation of the tongue have been investigated in a special treatise by the Hon. E. Twisleton, who has quoted several cases in modern times, authenticated by well-known surgeons, in which persons thus mutilated have been able to speak. [C.]

(2) Amongst marvels which were not specially connected with saints were the circumstances which led to the development of the angelic song, the Greek TRISAGION in the reign of Theodosius II. A child at Constantinople was caught up into the air, and on his return in the course of an hour reported that he had heard the heavenly host singing, ἅγιος ὁ Θεὸς, ἅγιος ἰσχυρὸς, ἅγιος ἀθάνατος (Mansi, t. vii. p. 1041); the fall, at Alexandria, of statues from their pedestals, proclaiming the death of the emperor Maurice and his sons (Theoph. 450); the filling of a piscina with water through some unknown agency (Greg. Turon. de Gl. Martyr. i. 24) and the mysterious strewing of the pavement before a saint's tomb with roses (De Mir. Mart. ii. 46).

(b) Miraculous appearances.

"They have visions," writes Irenaeus (Contra Haer. ii. 32), "when enumerating the gifts possessed by Christ's true disciples in his day." To quote the words of a historian who does not err on the side of credulity, "it is impossible to overlook the clear traces of visions and inspiration which may be found in the early fathers" (Gibbon, c. xv.). As the exercise of powers of healing and exorcism constituted the chief mode in which the early Christians exhibited in an active form the miraculous gifts which had been imparted to them for the good of others, so were visions no less the channel by means of which they became passive recipients of supernatural communications vouchsafed to them for their own edification and guidance. Thus the purport of visions was sometimes to allay the fears, to solve the doubts, to direct the steps of those who were in trouble or difficulty, sometimes to admonish the guilty, and sometimes to forewarn of approaching calamities. Nor were they restricted to those who are supposed to be the fitting recipients of communications of this sort—the hermit in his cave, or the monk in his cell—having been vouchsafed to men in general, to the young and old, to the lowly as well as to the great. During the first ages they constituted an important means towards the conversion of the pagan from his heathenism, the heretic from his schism. Tertullian writes: "Major paene vis hominum e visionibus Deum discunt" (De Animâ, 47), and Origen, "Many have come to Christianity through the medium of visions which occurred to them while awake or in dreams" (Contra Cels. i. 46).

1. Apparitions of Beings. (1) Angels; (2) Daemons; (3) Departed Spirits; (4) Living Saints.

(1) The appearances of the archangel Michael —"qui universalis ecclesiae a Deo patronus et protector est institutus"—were numerous both in the East and the West, e.g. near Byzantium, near Colosse, on Monte Gargano, A.D. 500 circ., in Normandy (see above), A.D. 709 (Martyr. Rom. 8 Maii). An angel appeared to St. Theuderius directing him where to erect his monastery (Ado Vienn. in Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiii. 447); two angels to Furseius, A.D. 650, admonishing him as abbat of a monastery that monks should pay less attention to the mortification of the body, and more to the cultivation of a humble, contented, and charitable disposition (Fleury, xxxviii. 28).

(2) As examples, we may take first the appearances of the evil one to St. Anthony in the guise of a woman, then of a black child; as a monk with loaves in his hands, when the saint was fasting; as a spirit calling himself the power of God, and lastly avowing himself to be Satan; and secondly, the appearance of demons to the same saint in the form of wild beasts and serpents uttering horrible cries (Newman, on Mir. xxix.; Fleury, viii. 7).

(3) First of scriptural saints. St. Stephen appeared, A.D. 420, to Pulcheria, sister of Theodosius II., informing her of the safe arrival of his relics (i.e. his right hand) from Jerusalem (Theoph. 133, 134); St. Barnabas, A.D. 484, to Anthimus, bishop of Constantia, in Cyprus, revealing to him the resting-place of his body, near Salamis, in that island (Fleury, xxx. 19). Secondly, of bishops and abbats. St. Ambrose on the night, being Easter Eve, on which he was laid out for burial appeared to the newly-baptized infants, varying the manner of his appearance, but to the parents of the children remaining invisible, even when pointed out. Again, on the day of his death he appeared to saints in the East, praying with them and laying his hands upon them, while in Florence he was frequently seen after his death, praying before the altar of a church he had built in that city (Paul. Vita, 48, 49, 50; Fleury, xx. 21). St. Benedict appeared after death to an abbat and prior of his order at Terracina instructing them as to the plan of a monastery they were about to build (Greg. M. Dial. ii. 22).

(4) As an example of the appearance of a living saint we read that a child who had fallen into a well was found sitting upon the surface of the water, and that his account was that St. Julian Sabas who at the time was being entertained by the mother of the child had appeared to him and borne him up (Fleury, xvi. 28). We find a similar story in the life of Theodosius of Palestine (Acta SS. ad d. 11 Jan.)

2. Visions of Purgatory, Hell, Heaven.

A vision the martyr Perpetua (Martyr. Rom. 7 Mar.) had of her brother, in whose behalf she had been moved to pray, first as suffering and in a place of darkness, and then as comforted and surrounded with light, has been supposed to refer to a state of purgatory (Robertson, i. 68; Milman, ii. 221). As indicative of the punishment of the wicked, an abbat in Auvergne had a vision of a stream of fire, and of men immersed in it bitterly bemoaning their sufferings. These had lost their footing when crossing a narrow bridge which spanned the stream, and were men who had been careless in the discharge of their spiritual duties. After this vision the abbat became stricter in the regulation of his monastery (Greg. Turon. iv. 33). Compare, as of similar signification, an hermit's vision of Theodoric the Ostrogoth being cast into the crater of a volcano (Greg. M. Dial. iv. 30). Visions of heaven were accorded amongst others to St. Furseus (Fleury, xxxviii. 28) and to Salvius, bishop of the Albigenses, as a place paved with gold and silver and illuminated by a cloud shining beyond the light of sun or moon (Greg. Turon. vii. 1).

3. Apparitions of Crosses. (1) In the air; (2) On the garments of men; (3) On animals.

(1) Constantine, when marching against Maxentius, A.D. 311, and in doubt to what deity he should apply for succour against an enemy whose forces outnumbered his own, saw in company with his whole army a luminous cross in the sky above the mid-day sun with this inscription, "In this conquer." The same night our Lord appeared to Constantine in a vision, shewed him a cross, and bade him fashion a standard after the pattern of it as a means of victory in his contest against Maxentius. Such is the account Eusebius gives in his Life of Constantine (i. 28–32), but not till twenty-six years after the occurrence, and which he professes to have heard from the emperor himself, who affirmed his statement with an oath. Socrates, Philostorgius, Gelasius, and Nicephorus speak of the phenomenon as seen in the sky; Sozomen and Rufinus in a dream, although [illegible] the authority of Eusebius they also [illegible] the apparition in the sky. In a panegyric delivered immediately after the victory the speaker, who is a pagan, refers to "the omen" (Bar. Ann. ann. 312, 14), and ten years after another orator, Nazarius, also a pagan, alludes to "the common talk of all the Gallic provinces that hosts were seen who bore on them the character of divine messengers" (ap. Bar. Ann. 312, 11). Gibbon alludes to a medal extant in the last century bearing the figure of the labarum with the inscription, "In this sign thou shalt conquer" (Newman, on Mir. cxxxiii.; Gibbon, xx.). On the feast of Pentecost, May 7, A.D. 351, a cross appeared in the sky at Jerusalem, stretching from Mount Calvary to Mount Olivet, and shining with a brilliancy equal to that of the sun's rays. The apparition lasted for several hours; the whole city beheld it, and all, residents and visitors, Christians and unbelievers, alike joined in the acknowledgment that "the faith of the Christians did not rest upon the persuasive discourses of human wisdom, but upon the sensible proofs of divine intervention" (Cyril, Ep. ad Const. Imp.). Of this phenomenon Cyril, then patriarch of Jerusalem, wrote an account to the emperor Constantius, who at the time was fighting against Maxentius in Pannonia, where also, according to Philostorgius (Hist. Eccles. iii. 26), it was seen by the contending armies to the confusion of the pagan and the encouragement of the Christian host (Theoph. 62, 63; Migne, Dict. des Mir. tom. i. 247). To other appearances of the cross in the sky we may thus briefly refer. Gretser mentions two towards the beginning of the 4th century—one as seen by Gregory, bishop of Armenia, and the other by Tiridates, king of that country, and by his fellow-converts on the occasion of their baptism. Cedrenus another, to which Gregory Nazianzen alludes (Orat. v. 7), at Jerusalem on the occasion of Julian's attempt to rebuild the temple, as surpassing in point of brilliancy that recorded by Cyril (Hist. Compend. i. p. 537). The same writer mentions two appearances of a cross, which he terms σημεῖα, at Constantinople, one in the second, the other in the third year of the reign of Constantine Copronymus (ibid. ii. p. 5), while another was vouchsafed to St. Euphemia shortly before her martyrdom, which took place at Chalcedon in the Diocletian persecution (Martyr. Rom. 16 Sept.), "a symbol," writes Asterius, bishop of Amasea, "of the punishment she was to undergo."

(2) As examples of crosses appearing on the garments of men, we read that when the emperor Julian was entering Illyricum the vines appeared laden with unripe grapes, although the vintage had taken place, and that dew falling from them upon the garments of the emperor and his companions left upon them the imprint of crosses; a phenomenon which by some was supposed to portend that the emperor should perish prematurely like unripe grapes (Sozomen, H. E. i. 5). The appearance of the luminous cross in the sky on the occasion of Julian's attempt to rebuild the temple, was accompanied by the appearance on the bodies and garments of men of crosses which were luminous at night (Ruf. i. 37), in some instances of a dark colour (Theodor. iii. 20) and would not wash out (Socr. iii. 20). Nor was the phenomenon confined to Jerusalem, being seen in Antioch and other cities likewise (Theoph. 81; Cedren. Hist. Compend. i. 537). See Newman on Mir. clxxvi.; Migne, Dict. des Mir. t. ii. 1117. Crosses "as of oil" (σταυρία ἐλαιώδη) appeared in Constantinople in the sixth year of the reign of Constantine Copronymus on the garments of men as they walked in the streets, and on the altar-cloths of churches. Those whose clothes were thus marked were attacked with mortal illness. The pestilence which prevailed was such as to turn the capital into a desert. The Catholic party attributed both it and the portents to the iconoclasm of the emperor (Cedrenus, Hist. Compend. ii. 8; Migne, Dict. des Mir. i. 248).

(3) Of crosses appearing on animals we find the following instances. When the emperor Julian was inspecting the entrails of an animal he was offering in sacrifice, he beheld in them the figure of a cross encircled by a crown (Sozom. v. 2); φρικὴν παρέσχε καλὰγωνίαν, writes Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. iv. 54). St. Placidas, when hunting a stag, beheld amidst its horns a luminous cross and the figure of the Crucified, and heard a voice saying: "Quid me persequeris, Placida? Ecce propter te adsum: ego sum Christus quem ignorans veneraris" (Niceph. iii. 19). St. Meinulphus also saw a cross amidst a stag's horns (Gobenus in Vitâ S. Meinulphi).

The above classification of apparitions and visions, according to the form of the one and the subject of the other, has placed in less prominence the notion, but not precluded a passing notice of their object and purpose. The use of apparitions and visions has been exemplified under other sections of our subject—for their use in admonishing the guilty, see section II. under miracles of power wrought by relics. For their use in animating the courage of the faithful we may refer to the visions by which Perpetua was sustained in prospect of her martyrdom (Rob. i. 68), and for their use as prognostics of approaching calamity we may instance those which were vouchsafed to the church in Africa, A.D. 480 circ., to prepare her for her persecution by the Vandals (ib. i. 500; Vict. Vit. ii. 6).

Lastly, in the eyes of the monkish and episcopal chroniclers of the dark ages celestial or atmospheric phenomena, such as comets, meteors, displays of the aurora borealis, wore the aspect of "wonders" (prodigia), especially when coincident with or preceding the deaths of saints, e. g. St. Liudger, A.D. 809 (Acta SS. Ben. saec. iv. pt. i.) or princes, e. g. Theodebald (Greg. Turon. iv. 9) Merovechus (v. 19), Gundobald (vii. 11), or the occurrence of plagues and pestilences (iv. 31). Certain concomitants of these phenomena, such as a shower of blood from the clouds besprinkling the garments of men and the interior walls of a house (vi. 14), and the conversion of the water of a pond into blood (viii. 25) do not it is true belong to the same natural order of things. XANTIPPE, Sept. 23, commemorated in Spain with her sister Polyxena, disciples of St. Paul (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.; Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

XENODOCHIA. Guesthouses for the reception of strangers and pilgrims. [HOSPITALS.] There were four such of ancient foundation in Rome, which, having fallen into decay, were restored by pope Stephen II., A.D. 752–757, and furnished with all things needful both within and without. He also founded a "xenodochium" where a hundred poor men were fed daily (Anastas. § 228), and built two without the walls near St. Peter's, which he attached to the ancient "diaconiae" of the Blessed Virgin and St. Silvester (ibid. § 229). Pelagius II., A.D. 557–590, converted his own house into a guesthouse for poor and aged men (ibid. § 112). Belisarius, c. 540, erected a "xenodochium" in the Via Lata (ibid. § 102). We find these Roman guesthouses distinguished by different names, probably those of the founders, e.g. "xenodochium Valerii" (§ 274); "xenodochium Firmi," containing an oratory of the Virgin (§ 385), and adorned with gifts by Leo III. (§ 402); and the "xenodochium quod appellatur Tucium," containing an oratory of SS. Cosmas and Damian (§ 408). [PILGRIMAGE, § vii. p. 1641.] [E. V.]

XENOPHON, monk, "holy father," cir. 520, commemorated on Jan. 26 with his sons Arcadius and Joannes (Basil. Menol.; Daniel, Codex Liturg. iv. 251). [C. H.]

XEROPHAGIA (ξηροφαγία, aridus victus, dry food). This word, as expressive of the act or habit of living on dry food or a meagre diet, is in common use by ecclesiastical writers, both Greek and Latin, to denote the Christian rule of fasting. Tertullian compares its adoption by Christians for spiritual ends, to its practice by the heathen athletes for earthly victories (de Jejun. cc. i. xvii.). Ξηροφαγεῖν is employed of the Lenten fast in the fiftieth canon of the council of Laodicea, A.D. 390; of the fast in Holy Week by Epiphanius (Compend. Doct. Cath. vol. ii. pp. 295, 296, 361, ed. Paris, 1622), when bread and salt was the only solid food allowed, and water was drunk only in the evening. For the varieties of practice which existed with regard to fasting in the early church, see Socrates, Eccles. Hist. v. 22; Balsamon, Epist. de Jejun. in Cotelerii Eccles. Graec. Mon. tom. ii. p. 498, edit. 1681. [F. E. W.]

XYSTUS (SIXTUS II.), pope, martyr, commemorated on Aug. 6 (Mart. Met. Bed.; Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Rom.). [C. H.]

YEAR, THE ECCLESIASTICAL. The object of this article is to supplement that on CALENDAR [p. 256], by giving a complete account, according to the principal calendars, of the arrangement and designations of the several Sundays of the ecclesiastical year, as also of the Festivals in the weeks corresponding with them.

This Calendar presents an abnormal number of Sundays (57), in order to shew the full arrangement of these for both an early and late Easter, according to the position of which festival some either of the earlier or of the later Sundays in the Calendar would need to be omitted; it must be remembered, however, that in different years the correlation of Sundays would vary, inasmuch as those, whose place depends upon that of Easter, may occur more than a month earlier than in our Calendar, while other Sundays, dependent upon fixed festivals can only be a few days earlier or later in the year. While care has been taken to exclude festivals of later origin than the 9th century, the alternative names (mostly Latin) of festivals and Sundays, the precise period of the origin of which is uncertain, have generally been included, on account of their common use in early and mediaeval documents; and the Latin introits are also given for the same reason. Besides other obvious abbreviations the following have been used:—D. Dominica dies, Hebd. hebdomada, Sab. Sabbatum, fest. festum, mart. martyr, com. companion. An alphabetical index to the names of the Sundays and festivals is subjoined.

The chief authorities used in the compilation of the Calendar are: the ancient Roman (Rom.) and Greek (Gr.) Calendars to be found in Allatius (de Domin. et Hebd. Graecis); the Ambrosian (Amb.) and Mozarabic (Moz.) Calendars; the Sacramentary bearing the name of Gregory the Great (Greg.); the Armenian (Arm.) and Georgian (Georg.) Calendars; the Gothic (Goth.) Calendars in Migne (Patrology); the Syrian (Syr.) and Nestorian (Nest.) in Etheridge (Syrian Churches) and Assemanus (Bibl. Orient. iii. 2, 380); for the British and Irish (Br.) ZABULUS, another form of Diabolus, as a designation for Satan, often found in the writings of the Fathers. It is well known how readily the letter ζ passes into δ. (Cf. Ζεύς = Δεύς, ἀρίζηλος = ἀρίδηλος, ζυγόν for δυογόν, and conversely δια- into ζα-. Of this we have examples in ζάβατος = διάβατος, ζάδηλος = διάδηλος, and in Latin zacones = diaconi, zametrus = diametrus, zebus = diebus, zeta = diaeta (Rönsch, Itala und Vulgata, p. 509). We find instances of the use of Zabulus in Cyprian, "nobis a Zabulo obsistitur" (Orat. ii.), "Zabulum qui zelum imitatur" (Zel. et Liv. lib. iv.), "invidia Zabuli" (c. 8), "in laqueum Zabuli"); in Ambrose, who denounces Arius as being worse than "pater suus Zabulus. Zabulus enim verum Dei filium fatebatur, Arius negat" (de Fid. lib. v. c. 8); in Augustine, who says of St. Lawrence, "adversus omnes Zabuli terrores . . . animus immobilis perstat" (De diversis; Serm. 123). Lactantius uses it frequently; cf. providens Deus ne fraudibus suis Zabulus . . . corrumperet (Instit. ii. 14. 1), "novem praeliis Zabulum debellasti" (De Mort. Persec. 16. 5), "a te Zabulus victus est" (ibid. 16. 10). It is also found in Hilary in Matt. xii. can. 12; Matt. xxiv. can. 26; Paulinus, pp. 28, 50, 55, 291, 498, and Commodian, Instr. i. 35; ii. 17, 18, 31).

Z

[E. V.]
